
TopR's final song, "Watching the World End, is a deeply personal, cynical piece that talks about his unwillingness to conform to societal expectations and his reliance on liquor. TopR says that growing up on the drug-ridden California streets has left an indelible mark on his psyche that prevents him from spitting up-beat lyrics. TopR feels that it is essential to release inner frustrations, to prevent unfortunate events from occurring. This emcee is talented and hungry. His solo album is titled, "Legalize Murder."

See GRANOLA on page 5

COURTESY GRANOLAFUNK.COM

Many critics agree that the artists that form the Granola Funk Express are not the average group, but their formula has had much success. The group performed last week for a packed crowd at the Pearl Street Nightclub.

Elephants, Cats and Who's...Oh My!

By JOE PIEDRAFITE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

MEGAN MUNSTERTEICHER/COLLEGIAN

The members of the UMass Theater Guild have been practicing five times a week since February in order to prepare for their recent performance of the Dr. Seuss inspired musical titled "Seussical."

Somewhere in the opening number of "Seussical the Musical," the Cat in the Hat, who serves as our proverbial narrator through the Seussian oeuvre, says something like "I hope you're prepared, to be scarder than scared! Cause this ain't mother goose!" No truer words have been spoken in the entire musical theater cannon. I was prepared to be scareder than scared. Fortunately, the UMass Theatre Guild's production of "Seussical" was not quite the disaster I had been bracing myself for.

Luckily (or not, depending on who you talk to), I had seen the original production of "Seussical" in the fall of 2000 when it played Boston's Colonial Theatre prior to its Broadway opening and enjoyed it a great deal. Even before the Boston engagement started, the production had been plagued with problems; costume designer Catherine Zuber was fired and replaced with William Ivey Long and Rob Marshall came on as a "second pair of eyes" to help director Frank Galati, and eventually ended up replacing him altogether by the time the show hit New York in November.

There were some problems with the show in general, but I found it to be overall inoffensive, fun and enjoyable piece of musical theater. The critics (in both Boston and Manhattan) clearly thought otherwise, and "Seussical" became the whipping post of the 2000-2001 theater season. It didn't help that other hugely successful musicals opened during the season as well ("The Full Monty" and a little show called "The Producers") and "Seussical" fell into obscurity and ran for a little less than 200 performances.

Sadly, all of the problems that I had with the show in 2000 were evident in the UMTG production. The oodles of books and stories that Dr. Seuss wrote is not natural source material for a musical. In fact, it seems that Seuss would be extremely difficult to musicalize, let alone tell one coherent story. That's where my major issues with "Seussical" lies; it tries to tell too many stories in too short amount of time.

Writers Stephen Flaherty and Lynn Ahrens (who found enormous success with their adaptation of E.L. Doctorow's novel "Ragtime" in 1998) have assembled some of Seuss's best know characters, The Cat in the Hat, Horton the Elephant, the Who's, Gertrude McFuzz and Mayzie LaBird among others, but each character is severely underdeveloped. Due to Seuss's uncanny ability to rhyme, Flaherty and Ahrens were forced to be extremely creative when coming up with the book of the show, and took a few liberties and invented quite a few words.

The main storyline revolves around Horton the Elephant and his quest for saving the planet of Whoville that he finds on a clover "On the 15th of May, in the Jungle of Nool". Of course, as in all musicals, Horton has to overcome numerous obstacles to save his beloved Who's, and this where the other various Seuss characters come into play. I was able to overlook the paper thin-ness of the plot earlier because of the attractive casting of the parade of Seuss characters, but in the UMTG production, most of the actors seemed to be trying a little to hard to impress the audience with their mastery of the Seussian language.

All of the leads had more than adequate voices; it was the numbers that included most of the ensemble that were the biggest disappointment. Granted that the Student Union Ballroom is not a place that is conducive to live theater, but I was seated towards the front and had a hard time hearing and understanding the cast in the opening number and throughout other subsequent ensemble numbers throughout the show. I appreciated costume designer Rainy Stanford's attempts at designing fun and colorful costumes, and for the most part they were successful, the Wickersham brothers and the Cadet uniforms especially, but at times they were a little less than inspired, mostly the members of the Circus McGurkus and the residents of Whoville.

All is not lost in world of Seuss however. Laura Clark was adorable as love-struck Gertrude McFuzz and John Courtney gave a wonderfully campy performance as a tap dancing Cat in the Hat. The Wickersham brothers were also great, decked out in camouflage gear and their quirky choreography, thanks to Erin Odell. Brian Kelly delivered a sweet performance as Horton, and Kim Ayers had the right set of pipes to do the Aretha Franklin-like Sour Kangaroo justice. Director Jenniler Parsons and scenic designer Lindsey Robitaille are to be commended for making the most of the cavernous space that is the Student Union Ballroom and providing a staging that while at times was uneven, kept a fairly quick pace throughout the show. One scene that worked particularly well for me was the "McElligots Pool" number. It was fun and creative, and showed just what kind of potential "Seussical" could have risen to.

There seemed to be a recurring theme throughout "Seussical," that anything was possible. I suppose, that with "Seussical" anything is possible, and the UMTG unfortunately didn't fully realize all of the possibilities that "Seussical" could have been. "Oh the things you can think"

Rockin` with granola

GRANOLA from page 4

Granola Funk began their performance with a ritualistic Ohm, or prayer, and immediately rocked this small Western Mass venue. Their opening tune about the manner in which opinions and attitudes are formed set the tone for the night.

The group performed the tune, "Everybody Get High." This GFE classic had the crowd screaming and jumping. Granola Funk lyricist, Agent 23, ignited the crowd with his onstage antics during this marijuana anthem. This married father of one, is finishing a new solo album, "The Road Less Traveled." Agent 23, AKA Cactus, is also working on a variety of production projects for a number of musicians, including Scotty Rock from Deep Banana Blackout.

Granola Funk's performance included instrumental grooves that had everyone shaking. They also displayed their freestyle capabilities, an element that the crowd enjoyed. Although their words were not always crystal-clear, their lyrical abilities are serious and legitimate. This group, particularly the contributing emcees have the potential to gain heavy hip-hop recognition in the near future.

GFE performed "It Doesn't Really Matter," as the encore. This head-nodder features Adam Strange on lead vocals. This tall, lanky D.C. native is also no stranger to the road. He left home at sixteen to follow the Grateful Dead. Strange says that he loves playing in Northampton. He met his current girlfriend at Pearl Street two years ago.

Following the show, GFE's Cactus was all smiles. "Tonight was excellent," he said. He felt that the crowd's energy enabled the group to perform at a high level.

Jamie Mason of Cheshire, Connecticut saw GFE for the sixth time.

"Every time I come to see them it's awesome, I always have a good time."

Graduating Seniors— Considering Law School?

Paralegal Boot Camp—June 1–15, 9 a.m. – 4 p.m.

This intensive paralegal class is designed for recent college graduates considering law school. Upon completion of this two-week course you will receive a certificate in paralegal studies from Boston University.

BY WORKING AS A PARALEGAL, YOU CAN:
- Enhance your credentials for law school
- Gain exposure to the legal work environment
- Confirm your decision to pursue a legal career

LEARN MORE AT AN OPEN HOUSE: MAY 3, 4–6 P.M.
SCHOOL OF MANAGEMENT 595 COMMONWEALTH AVE., ROOM 415

RSVP
Call 617-353-4197
Email cpe@bu.edu
Visit www.bu.edu/professional

BOSTON UNIVERSITY
CENTER FOR PROFESSIONAL EDUCATION

Spring Specials
$5 OFF Style Haircut
$15 OFF Any Foil Highlite
*With Andrea Only
Starting at $30
FREE Eyebrow Waxing
With any other salon service
Exclusively at: 549.5610
Styles by Deborah
65 University Drive, Amherst (413) 549-5610
Now also featuring hairstyling, manicures, pedicures and body waxing.

- Want a job?
- Want a great experience?
- Want to meet great people?

COLLEGIAN

Then come work for
The Daily Collegian
Now Hiring for Advertising Executive Positions

Interested? Contact Kerry at 545-3500

$

VELVET REVOLVER
ELECTRIC WONDERLAND SHOW™
SPECIAL GUEST
hoobastank
Photo: Ross Halfin
Tuesday, May 3 at 8pm
Joe Fletcher Presents
MULLINS CENTER
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST
NEW ALBUM CONTRABAND
Present your Student ID at the Arena Box Office this week, and get $10 off the regular ticket price!
FOR VIP TICKET PACKAGES AND MORE GO TO VELVETREVOLVER.COM
GET IT NOW

UMass downs Hoyas

MEN'S LACROSSE from page 8

offense down until Cannon was able to find some open room to get off another shot from straight on.

Schell stopped the shot but was unable to keep it in his stick, and the Hoyas collected the ground ball. The Massachusetts defense suffocated Georgetown's attack, and Brendan Cannon — Pete Cannon's younger brother — could only get off a low shot to Schell's left that was saved as the clock hit zero.

"It was obvious that I was struggling at the beginning of the game, and the rest of the team kind of carried me there," Schell said. "The last 30 seconds I was kind of relaxed, and said that we really needed this and I got [the saves]."

The Hoyas took over in the third quarter, shutting down the UMass attack and tying the game at 9 heading into the final 15 minutes off goals from Nick Miaritis, Dave Paolisso and Sean Denihan.

Georgetown took its first lead of the day at the 12:13 mark of the fourth quarter when Pete Cannon beat Schell up high on an extra man opportunity.

The lead was short-lived, though, as the Minutemen answered just 49 seconds later when Chris Doyle fell down, regained his footing, spun around a pair of defenders and beat D'Andrea low to tie the score at 10.

Jake Deane helped UMass out by winning the next two faceoffs that led to two more goals by Zywicki and Morris to extend the Minuteman advantage to 12-10 with 6:17 to play.

In a first half that was mostly dominated by the two defenses, play started to pick up in the final minute before the break. Morris picked up his second goal of the game with 47 seconds to play to give UMass an 8-5 lead.

Georgetown won the ensuing faceoff, called timeout with 30 seconds on the clock and scored just 15 seconds out of the huddle on a Pete Cannon bounce shot.

Jake Dean won the next faceoff for the Minutemen, quickly got rid of the ball to Jeff Zywicki, who was able to find Morris, who got off a bounce shot that beat D'Andrea with 1.2 seconds left in the half, giving UM a 9-6 lead.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

A Mixed Bag

Anthony Santos had a hit, an RBI, and a walk in UMass' 8-4 loss to Fordham yesterday in Jamaica, N.Y. The Minutemen won one out of the three game weekend series against the Rams.

Spiders topple over Minutewomen

TENNIS from page 8

Departing senior captain Sasha Edelstein competed against Courtney Klein in the No. 3 tilt. Klein took the match, defeating Edelstein 6-3, 6-1. Edelstein will be sorely missed by the Minutewomen as she has been described by Dixon as the team's heart and soul.

Junior Dorothy Iwanowicz and junior Susan Johnson both lost their matches in the No. 4 and 5 spots respectively.

Iwanowicz was defeated by Meghan Wolfgram 6-2, 6-2 and Johnson lost to Beatrice Grasu 6-0, 6-4.

Before the tournament, Dixon had said that Iwanowicz was struggling and trying to right her game. Despite her loss on Sunday, Dixon believed Iwanowicz kicked up her level of play.

"She definitely accomplished that," Dixon said. "She stepped it up all weekend and even told people that she and her game were back."

UMass lost the crucial doubles point by losing two of the three matches played. In the last meeting it was the doubles point that allowed the Minutewomen to win.

Johnson and Iwanowicz lost their No. 1 match against Cox and Wolfgram by a count of 8-4.

The No. 2 doubles match was hard fought battle between the teams of Spiess and Pozar and Richmond's Carter and Klein.

"We were down 5-1 at one point," Dixon said. "We caught up and forced three match points but Richmond came up big in the tie break."

The Spiders won the tie break and took the match 9-8.

Bartoloni was able to pick up another win for the Maroon and White when she teamed up with Edelstein in the No. 3 slot. They defeated Grasu and Zivanovic 8-6.

After the match Dixon said she told her team to keep their heads up.

"This is a solid tennis team," Dixon said. "I just told them to keep their heads up and to hold the whole tournament in their hearts. We'll be back next year."

Wolfpack sweep Maroon and White

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

A week after losing its first home game in 82 decisions, the Massachusetts softball team (24-14-1 9-3 Atlantic 10) dropped two more home games yesterday against North Carolina State in a doubleheader sweep.

The Minutewomen will look to get back on their feet tomorrow in a doubleheader against Harvard.

Throughout the afternoon, the Maroon and White only managed five hits and four runs, and were shutout for the first time since Mar. 5.

"I thought North Carolina did a good job executing," Sortino said. "I was disappointed in our execution today. I was very disappointed in our defense."

Despite not registering a hit, UMass took an early lead in Game 1 after three batters were walked by N.C. State pitcher Abbie Sims. Senior Pam Sulick flied out to center field, allowing sophomore Amanda Morin to score, and giving the Minutewomen a one run lead.

The differential was quickly erased in the second inning as the Wolfpack came back and recorded four runs, three of which were earned off of a double to left field. UMass cut the lead in half in the bottom of the second inning, however, when senior Hilary Puglia drove in junior Lesley Ferrara.

With N.C. State increasing the score 5-2, the Maroon and White looked to its homerun champion, junior KJ Kelley, to begin a potential comeback. With four previous hitless innings by the Minutewomen, Kelley proceeded to hit a homerun to left field.

A scoreless sixth inning by both teams was followed by dramatic seventh. A homerun by N.C. State made the score 6-3. Morin, who had a 14-game hitting streak coming into yesterday's games, homered to right field in the final inning. With two batters on base, the Minutewomen were unable to take advantage and consequently dropped Game 1, 6-4.

"Defense wins championships, it really does," Sortino said. "We certainly generated against a pitcher whose ERA is 1.4. We put four runs on the board, that should have been enough to win the ballgame."

Game 2 brought a much different story, as UMass was unable to gain a single run and recorded two hits. Junior pitcher Jenna Busa pitched three scoreless innings, but was unable to slow down the Wolfpack hitting squad, which scored six runs over the course of three innings.

With four of the six runs earned, the fielding proved to be a problem for the Maroon and White, which had trouble both catching fly balls and handling groundballs in both games.

"Simply taking care of the little things: making routine plays, catching fly balls," Kelley said. "You have to keep the game simple and make the routine plays. We make those plays and we win that game."

Facing 26 batters, N.C. State pitcher Shaina Ervin struck out eight of them and allowed two hits against a team that recorded 16 hits in a doubleheader sweep against St. Bonaventure last Friday. Both of those hits came from senior Denise Denis.

"The second game we just didn't show up to hit," Sortino said. "Hitting will come and go like that. We let them get a big inning because we can't field a couple of ground balls."

While diving for a line drive in the infield in the fourth inning, Puglia injured herself and had to exit the game for the day. Freshman Stacey Cullington came into the game and proved to be a bright spot for a struggling UMass defense.

"We know that when somebody goes down, you just have to step it up," Kelley said. "Everybody on this team is capable of going out there and starting a game."

Cullington has two homeruns and eight RBI in her first collegiate softball season and has a fielding percentage of .889. The two other rookies on the team are Lauren Proctor and Sarah Hurd, who have made several appearances as newcomers.

Proctor is second on the team in batting average with a mark of .348 and has accumulated 24 homeruns on the season. Hurd has amounted seven hits and two RBI in 2005.

Despite the two losses, the Minutewoman offense leads the A-10 in several categories. Kelley and Puglia both lead the team in RBI with 29 each, while Denise Denis is third with 28.

Sophomore Candice Molinari has an A-10-high 26 steals on the season and has yet to fail on any attempt. Sulick has a homerun on the season and is fifth on the team in RBI with 15.

Defensively, the Maroon and White have depended on its duo, senior Barb LaFogg (15-9) and Busa (9-5). LaFogg leads the A-10 in strikeouts with 169 on the season and Busa has 94 K's in 25 appearances.

With a week that consists of five home games, the Minutewomen will look to rebound from their two-game skid and will rely heavily on their defense.

"If you don't have defense, you can't win," Kelley said. "Today was an example of that."

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST

CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

A special message for state employees

It's Your Health.

You Can't Afford To Limit Your Options.

If you're an employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, you have until May 13 to select your health insurance plan for the coming year. This year, your menu of options includes three plans that use tiers to set copays at various hospitals. Because of the tiering criteria used by some of these plans, state workers who enroll in one of them may have to pay more to be treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital. There are some things we think you should know before you opt for one of these plans.

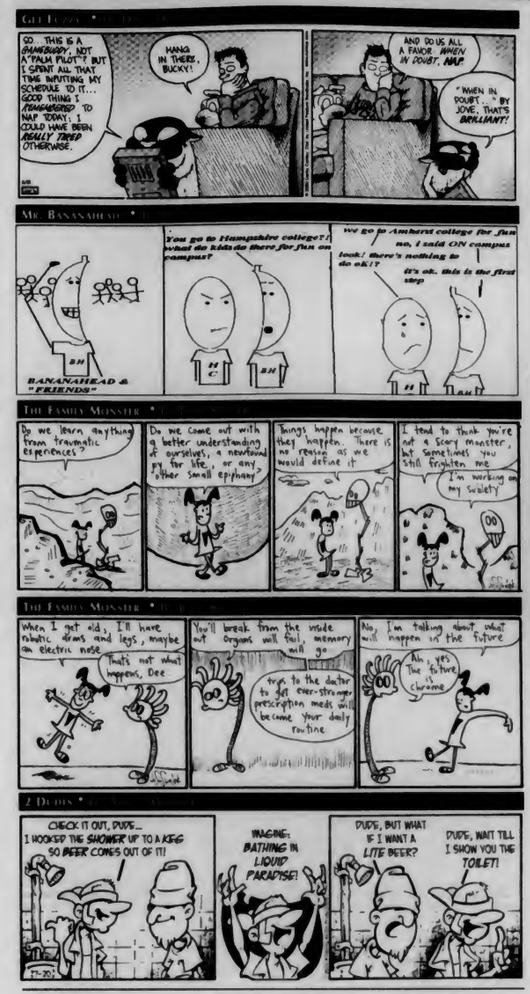
Of the three plans offering tiered networks:

- One ranked Cooley Dickinson as the best one based on quality and affordability.
- One ranked Cooley Dickinson Hospital in three different tiers based on three different measures of quality and affordability.
- One ranked Cooley Dickinson Hospital in the second tier, using minimal quality measures.

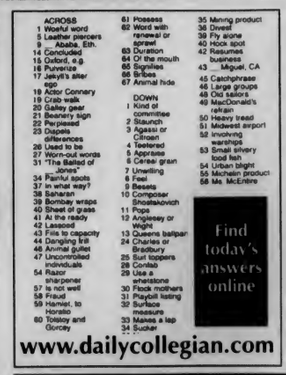
We believe that the quality of care provided and your relationship with your doctor and local hospital are what really matters. Under tiered plans, however, you could be financially penalized for choosing to seek treatment at the hospital nearest your home and your family, and the hospital at which your doctor has admitting privileges.

We encourage state workers to think long and hard before signing on to a plan that limits their healthcare options. We also encourage state workers to make an informed decision on this important matter. Talk to us or your health care provider before you choose a plan. Call (888) 554-4GDH (4234).

Making a great community better.



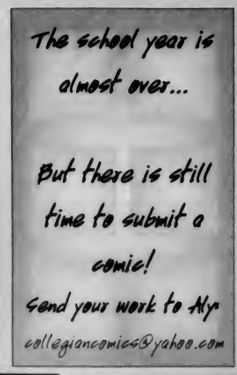
Cooley Dickinson Hospital
Dartmouth-Hitchcock Alliance



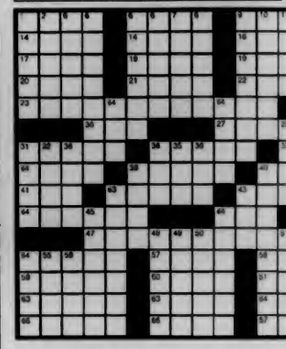
30 LOCUST STREET + NORTHAMPTON, MASSACHUSETTS + (413) 582-2000
www.cooley-dickinson.org

Rent One of Ours
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
No additional fee for 21–25 year old drivers
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTALS
OOPS!
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

new balance
SoccerFest 2005
It's Your Shot, Take It!!
REGISTER Now!
Look for our tables in the Campus Center and at the SOM Atrium on Monday 4/25, Tuesday 4/26 and Wednesday 4/27
For more information check out our website at www.soccerfest.org



MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
TUESDAY NIGHT!
FOAM PARTY
TWISTED TUESDAYS
TUESDAY APRIL 26th
DJ Fred E
COME SLIP AND SLIDE ACROSS OUR FOAMY DANCE FLOOR! RE-LIVE SPRING BREAK MOMENTS ALL OVER AGAIN!
Upcoming Events:
5/28 Indoor Pub Crawl - 5 bars in one!
5/5 Cinco De Mayo Wet T-Shirt Contest $500 Prize!
DRINK SPECIALS
$4 Jager Bombs!
$2.50 Barney on Acid
$3 Corona Liquts!
$1 Patriotic Blasts!
1970 Memorial Drive - Chicopee, MA www.maximumsportsbar.com



Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Next time, do your job and there won't be trouble.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You should've taken a nap instead of pretending to do work.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Walk carefully down the basement steps or you might wind up with a big bruise.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Your shoe fetish is getting a little bit out of hand.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You never know when you might meet someone named after a sweater.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
It's Monday, which means it's time for your weekly dose of bubbles.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
One day you will have to rock the spiky hair do.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Lunch will be extra good today, because you'll see all your favorite people.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Wheely chairs are great because you can move around without ever getting up!

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Watch out for those Doritos — a little goes a long way.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
A friend from your past has been missing you a lot lately.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Be careful what you do in the Campus Center — someone may be watching.

Quote of the Day

"The point, ladies and gentlemen, is that greed, for lack of a better word, is good. Greed is right. Greed works. Greed clarifies, cuts through and captures the essence of the evolutionary spirit."

—Gordon Gekko, 'Wall Street'

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-1449.

Holyoke 5 1/2 spacious rooms great Location $800 includes heat Joanne 538-8894

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 Mill ValleyEstates@winnco.com

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Htwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

1 Bedroom w/in 2 bedroom condo in North Amherst Clean, Washer/dryer in condo $425 includes heat & electric Summer rentals considered. On bus route, 1 mile to UMass, female student preferred. Call Liz 508-367-8893.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-4900

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms; hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES! www.amherstlivingrealty.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

1993 Nissan Maxima SE V6, 5 speed stick, loaded, $3500. Elaine@educ.umass.edu

EMPLOYMENT

NOW HIRING CAMPUS MANAGERS Ready for the UReps challenge? UReps is looking for the most outgoing, enthusiastic leaders for our Campus Managers position for the Fall, 2005 semester! Work 10 hours per week, gain valuable business experience, and earn while you build your resume. $100 weekly salary plus bonuses. To learn more, and apply visit www.UReps.com

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER IN MAINE Males and females. Meet new friends! Travel! Teach your favorite activity. Tennis, Swim, Theatre Tech, Canoe, Water ski, Kayak, Gymnastics, Nanny, Lacrosse, Archery, Theatre Costumer, Copper Enameling, English Riding, and more. TRIPP LAKE CAMP For Girls 1-800-997-4347 www.tripplakecamp.com

Smart. Fun. Motivated. Entertaining. (But enough about us.) EATS Magazine needs 2 bright, persuasive, entrepreneurial individuals to head up sales for our UMASS Off Campus Guide – UMass Alum Dave Sheff is looking for several motivated sales reps, to work to build new relationships with many of Amherst's most popular establishments. There will be a HIGH- incentive commission structure for those selected ...and lots of free food. Send a cover letter to info@eatsmagazine.com telling us why you are the perfect candidate!

Direct Sales Consultants Needed Call Heather 863-4119

EMPLOYMENT

Deadline extended to April 26th to apply to become a legal assistant at the Student Legal Services Office. Earn 12 credits while gaining valuable experience. Hurry! Call 545-1995 or stop by 922 Campus Center to get your application

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with sch-ol-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education is highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 35-40 hours per week. June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

EMPLOYMENT

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives CampusFundraiser is hiring outgoing students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 o $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

ACTIVISM Summer Jobs for the Environment $3,000 - $5,000 / Summer *Stop global warming *protect the environment Make a difference Career opportunities, Call Chris 413-256-6443

Moving: Local moving company looking for self-motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for trips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until Late Spring; Then Full-Time thru late August. Call: 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

EMPLOYMENT

Spring Break 2006 with STS. America's #1 Student Tour Operator. Hiring Campus reps. Call for group discounts Intl/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPrinting.com Call Dan 413-682-9020

SUMMER ADVERTISING INTERNSHIP Excellent Advertising Sales and Marketing opportunity. Earn $3,000-$8,000 and gain valuable business EXPERIENCE developing the UMASS Official Campus Telephone Directory. GREAT RESUME BOOSTER! Call Jen at College Directory Publishing, Inc. 1-800-466-2221 ext 724 www.campusdirectory.com

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nec. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Counter help. Part-time (sometimes) position. Experienced, detail-oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodfort Cafe, 86 Main St., Northampton

HOUSE FOR RENT

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 bedroom houses home. Laundry. Hookups. Large yard. 549-4222

Houses for rent 4 Bedrooms Double living room Near Park in Northampton. Juniors sooner. No pets. $1,300 plus utilities. Skibski Realtors 586-1877

House Hadley Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7450

INSTRUCTION

University Bartending classes start soon! 1-800-U-Can-Mix www.universitybartending.com Sign up now!!!

ROOMMATE WANTED

Need two roommates! An apartment in 95 Putton Please contact Pete immediately at 978-835-3561

Roommate Wanted in House 63/3 Call 413-665-4076

SERVICES

Legally stop collection agencies 508-414-2012

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 548-9992

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

SUBLET

Room available June 10th Aug 15th on Amherst Center Call Noah 413-687-2365

Puffton Village Summer Sublet 2 bedroom Call 978-530-3961

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

SYRACUSE: 5 Days

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Top Dogs

UMass takes first place in the ECAC with win over Hoyas

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

There is a changing of the guard in the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference.

The No. 9 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team put itself into position to win the ECAC for the second time in the last seven seasons by knocking off No. 3 Georgetown 13-12 in front of 1,224 fans who braved through torrential downpours on Saturday afternoon at Garber Field.

With the win, the Minutemen (9-2 4-1 ECAC) leapfrogged the Hoyas (8-3 3-1 ECAC) into first place of the ECAC. Georgetown has won the conference championship in five of the last six years, the only exception being UMass in 2002.

UMass	13
Gerogetown	12

In an intense finish, UMass goalie Bill Schell stopped Brendan Cannon's last-gasp shot to tie the score with time expiring, and the Minuteman sideline erupted and charged out onto the field toward their net minder to celebrate what UMass coach Greg Cannella deemed as one of the top-10 biggest victories of his 11-year coaching reign in Amherst.

"I'm going to remember the end of the game for the rest of my life," Schell said after the game. "That's why you play athletics. You play for big moments."

"We told our guys [Friday] night that this is a game the coaches would rather play in or watch than coach," Cannella said about the game's importance. "Certainly, you don't have that opportunity as a coach, but it's still a great pleasure to go out there and watch our guys do their job."

With the win, UMass now controls its own destiny in terms of winning the conference championship, and it will take home its first crown in three years with a win at Rutgers on May 7.

Before that, however, the Minutemen will travel to Harvard tomorrow to take on the Crimson at 3 p.m. and return home on Saturday against historic rival Syracuse at 1 p.m.

"You don't get it any better than that," UMass' leading scorer, Sean Morris, said. "It's the type of game where Friday night all you do is think about it, you wake up, all you do is think about it, think about it, think about it. Then you get [to the game], and it's raining out, it's muddy, and you get down and dirty. It was fun, a lot of fun."

With just under five minutes remaining in the game, UMass attackman Gene Tundo curled around the Georgetown cage and beat goalie Rich D'Andrea to put the cap on a 4-0 run and give the Minutemen a 13-10 advantage.

The Hoyas responded, though, as the Minutemen were trying to ice the game just 30 seconds later. Jeff Zywicki found himself open in front of the net, but D'Andrea stoned his shot, allowing Georgetown to take over the ball.

Pete Cannon bounced a shot past Schell for his fourth score of the day with 3:43 to play in the game and cut the lead to two.

The Hoyas were able to kill off a one-minute slashing penalty whistled on sophomore defenseman Jerry Lambe with 2:45 to play, gaining them another possession as time was waning down.

Georgetown continued to keep the pressure on UMass when Cannon rocketed a high sidearm shot past Schell with just 62 seconds left on the board, trimming the Minuteman advantage to 13-12.

The Hoyas won the ensuing face-off, called a timeout and slowed their

See MEN'S LACROSSE on page 6

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Senior Gene Tundo scored two goals in the Minutemen's 13-12 victory over Georgetown on Saturday. With the win, UMass moves into first place in the ECAC.

Ford inks Life to NLI at UM

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford has cut right to the chase in addressing the biggest hole on his roster.

Ford announced Thursday that National Junior College Athletic Association (NJCAA) All-American James Life has signed a National Letter of Intent (NLI) to play basketball for the Minutemen, and will come to Amherst with two years of NCAA eligibility remaining.

Life's signing follows the recent announcement that Mt. Vernon (NY) High School standout Chris Lowe has also signed an NLI, doubling the amount of scholarship guards on UMass' roster following the graduation of seniors Anthony Anderson and Chris Chadwick.

"We are thrilled to have James joining the UMass basketball family," Ford said. "He is a Junior College All-American who was among the top scorers in the country. James is a deadly shooter from the perimeter that we were seeking.

"[He] lives and breathes basketball [and] is a gym rat who will be a great addition to our team."

Life, 6-foot-4 190 pounds, was honored as the Florida Community College Association Player of the Year in addition to his All-America accolades after scoring 25.4 points per game last season for Manatee Community College in Bradenton, Fla.

He was also named the NJCAA Region VIII Player of the Year, Florida State Player of the Year and Suncoast Conference Player of the Year.

"We are very proud of James, not only for what he has accomplished on the basketball court, but for how he has developed as a person and as a citizen," Manatee head coach Brac Brady said. "He has represented himself and the school well since he has been with us."

Life was widely considered as the best junior college player in the Sunshine State, and will join the Minutemen after reconsidering a verbal commitment to Utah State.

GW ends UMass' season

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (4-9 1-3 Atlantic 10) came into last weekend needing to win the rest of its conference games to make the Atlantic 10 tournament. The first step in that challenge, however, would not come until Sunday against No.20 George Washington.

Last Friday, the Minutewomen took the field to face the Longwood Lancers in their last non-conference game of the year. The Lancers came into the contest with a 10-2 record, with both losses coming against A-10 teams (St. Bonaventure and George Washington).

GW	14
UMass	8

The Minutewomen made it Longwood's third as they defeated the Lancers 17-14 at Garber Field. However, with a 14-8 loss against George Washington on Sunday, UMass' hopes for an A-10 tournament appearance will have to wait until next year.

UMass	17
Longwood	14

This UMass squad has made it a habit of starting fast and limping to the finish line this season. This time the Maroon and White jumped out of the gate and did not look back.

After freshman Jeanette Villapiano scored her third goal in the last two games to push UMass to a 2-1 lead with 26 minutes to go in the first, Longwood sophomore Cathleen Strain tied the game at 2-2 with 23:20 left.

UMass took over from there. With two straight goals by freshman Ashleigh Szawlowski and another by sophomore Samantha Sepulveda, the Minutewomen took a 5-2 lead with 20 minutes remaining in the half.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Sophomore Lauen Reid notched an assist during UMass' 11-5 win over Longwood on Friday.

Sepulveda had three goals on the day but also contributed in other aspects of the game, controlling the ball for the Minutewomen in the midfield and off draw controls.

"Sam [Sepulveda] did a lot in the midfield," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said. "She came up with a lot of key draw controls for us. She didn't have to do a lot of defensive work so we used her more in the midfield and she didn't get as fatigued as usual."

UMass rolled to an 11-5 halftime lead and didn't look to be slowing down as they dominated the action from the opening draw. Coach Bolduc had said that halftime was the Minutewomen's worst enemy and a momentum killer. Holding on to half-time leads has been the Minutewomen's greatest challenge this season, and Longwood gave UMass a reason to worry again.

Forty-five seconds into the second half, Longwood junior Jen Shipp scored to make it 11-6 in what started to look like another UMass collapse. But the Minutewomen quickly put to rest any notion that they were going to lay down in this game.

The Maroon and White answered with four straight goals with two notched by Szawlowski, en route to a career-high four goals.

The must win, however, was George Washington.

It was a tough opponent with a freshman goalie — Caitlin Garman — on her way to the Colonials' single season record for wins. Colonials' sophomore Laura Hostetler — the niece of NFL quarterback Jeff Hostetler— has 65 points on the season with 46 goals and 19 assists. It was a battle for the Minutewomen who fought until the end and were not done justice by the 14-8 score.

The pre-game match up was a good one, with the defending A-10 Defensive Player of the Year (Kristin St. Hilaire) battling with Hostetler, who is second in the A-10 in goals and assists per game, while leading the A-10 in points per game. It was the best at each position going at it for 60 minutes in a heated conference game; fans and coaches alike enjoyed the action.

"It's fun. It's a challenge," Bolduc said. " Saint [Hilaire] is so competitive and rises to a challenge and you can see that Hostetler rises to a challenge too. [Hostetler] steps up her play even more so it's fun to watch. You can see the battle of the two individuals out there working hard."

St. Hilaire, a senior, is known for her defense, but she provided a spark for the Minutewomen on the offensive end by scoring her first career goal. The UMass sideline erupted when she put it in the net, with her teammates quick to congratulate her.

The Minutewomen went into the half down 5-4 after a three goal run by the Colonials gave them the one goal lead going into the break. This was an adjustment for the Minutewomen who have gotten used to taking leads into the second half.

"This was the first time in the second half that we've had to hunt and not be the hunted," Bolduc said. "This is the first time we've been down in a long time and had to rally back."

Talented freshmen show promise

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The recurring theme for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team has been their youth. It has been in the game plan, the expectations, the program's future aspirations, and the immediate success of the team. There has been some strategic things — like possessing the ball and killing clock — that coach Carrie Bolduc has had to hold off on because of the team's inexperience. But on the bright side, this team is very promising.

Success, in terms of winning, will not come this year as UMass was eliminated from the Atlantic 10 tournament yesterday by George Washington, moving their record to 5-10 on the season and 1-4 in conference. However, the best remedy for the loss will be patience, as UMass is boasting a freshmen class full of scorers and potential impact players.

First and foremost in this group is Kathleen Typadis, who has had an immediate impact since the start of the season, posting three consecutive hat tricks in her first three games, the first time that has happened for a freshman in the last decade. Her talents are undeniable and there are no 'ifs' when talking about Typadis. Over the weekend, she broke the UMass freshmen scoring record previously held by Joanna Dignazio with 40 points. Typadis added the freshmen goals record to her resume as well, as she scored four goals this weekend (two in each game) to get her total to 36, to pass Dignazio with 35. Typadis ended the weekend with 43 points, three better than Dignazio's 40.

Freshman Ashleigh Szawlowski has hit mid-season form after an injury in the fall sidelined her until the spring. After she worked the kinks out, her true talent has shown through, as she has become a reliable player for coach Bolduc down the stretch of this season. She scored a career-high four goals against Longwood on Friday.

"As the season progresses, we're seeing her develop a little later because she didn't have the fall," Bolduc said. "Obviously you can see the things she is capable of."

Against Longwood, the depth of the team's freshmen class was glaring, as Jeanette Villapiano, Katie Bottini, Alana Jakas, and Julie Papaleo all received significant playing time. Villapiano scored two goals against Longwood and two the game before against Duquesne. Bottini made her third career start yesterday against the Colonials and scored a goal in the Longwood game. Typadis, Szawlowski, Bottini and Jakas also scored against the Lancers, making it five freshmen that made the stat sheet, a monster effort in a significant win.

"The more games we have the better they are going to be," Bolduc said. "It was the same thing in the fall. We maximized the number of games so we could get more experience in game situations. They're really coming into their own. You can see what they're capable of in time."

About two minutes into the George Washington game, Szawlowski hit a streaking Typadis who then put it in the cage for the first goal of the game. It is a combination that UMass fans will have to get used to, as coach Bolduc is hoping that time will only help these underclassmen.

Minutewomen fall in A-10 final

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts tennis team learned first hand yesterday, at the Atlantic 10 Conference Championship Tournament, the meaning of the phrase all good things must come to an end.

The Minutewomen were not able to pull out the championship match against the Richmond Spiders yesterday in College Park, Md. UMass fell 5-1 to the Spiders under a cold and windy Maryland sky.

"They came out fired up to beat us," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "Their energy was a little intimidating to us in the beginning. Today they were just the better team."

UMass had defeated Richmond 4-3 earlier in the season when the schools squared off in Philadelphia. Dixon said she believed the Spiders were out to gain revenge for that loss.

"Richmond picked up their level of play by at least 20%," Dixon said. "They had a lot of support down there from fans and parents."

One factor that worked against the Minutewomen was that fact that star sophomore Michele Spiess and senior captain Sasha Edelstein were sick with bad colds all weekend.

"Michele was probably only competing at 50%," Dixon said. "The whole weekend took a toll on the both of them."

Only junior Jana Bartoloni was able to pick up a singles victory for the Minutewomen. She defeated Jelena Zivanovic in the No. 6 slot by a score of 6-3, 6-2.

"It was a good match for Jana," Dixon said. "She was able to beat the girl she lost to the last time we played Richmond."

All the other UMass singles competitors were downed in straight sets by the Spiders.

Star sophomore Michele Spiess was defeated by Lindsay Cox in the No. 1 slot. Cox won by a count of 6-1, 6-4. Dixon believes that Cox is a leading candidate for this year's A-10 Performer of the Year award.

The No. 2 match was won by Richmond's Robin Carter. She beat UMass freshman Masha Pozar 6-2, 2-1. The match was not completely played out because by that time the overall score had already been decided.

See TENNIS on page 6

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, April 26, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 124

UMass student is recipient of prestigious Barry M. Goldwater scholarship award

By Dan Terk
Collegian Staff

Heather A. Harrington, a junior at the University of Massachusetts is the recipient of the prestigious Goldwater Scholarship, which is awarded to students in the math and science fields who have demonstrated high academic achievement.

The Barry M. Goldwater Scholarship was established in honor of Senator Barry M. Goldwater who was both a Senator and a solider, and is awarded to no more than 300 students across the country each year. According to the programs Web site, the purpose of the scholarship is to create more highly skilled mathematicians, scientists, and engineers.

Harrington as well as two other students were nominated from UMass. Harrington is the fifth UMass student to win the Goldwater Scholarship.

A native of Concord, MA, Harrington is an Applied Mathematics major with a minor in philosophy. She has a great interest in mathematical biology, something that she hopes to make a career out of one day.

Harrington would like to continue on in academia to obtain her PhD and become a professor. She is currently a teaching assistant, which she says has only increased her interest in teaching. "It's rewarding to know that I can share something I am good with others," said Harrington, "I think that is why all professors teach."

A member of the Commonwealth College and of the Women's Varsity Crew team Harrington stays very busy with her classes and her research.

Harrington, as well as a few other undergraduates, have recently completed research on developing a mathematical model for how chemical inhibitors prevent the growth of tumors in the cornea.

"[The scholarship] is really great because it means that other people believe in me and want to support me in what I am interested in," explained Harrington.

The two advisors of the research team, Professor Nathaniel Whitaker and

COURTESY SAUNDER

Heather A. Harrington.

Professor Panayotis Kevrekidis, were both very proud of her. "They both did a lot as they guided us each step of the way," said Harrington.

"She's the perfect person to get this type pf scholarship," said Whitaker, "I think she's going make UMass proud."

Another advisor who was instrumental in Harrington's success was Professor Susan Whitbourne, the director of the Office of National Scholarship Advancement (ONSA). Professor Whitbourne worked with Harrington throughout the application process and Professor Whitbourne was also with Harrington when she found out she had won, which was an exciting moment for both.

"The Goldwater Scholarship is a tribute to Heather's hard work and her research efforts.

Applications for these highly competitive awards are evaluated as scientific grant proposals and must be on the cutting edge," explained Whitbourne. "Heather did an exceptional job throughout the tough vetting process."

Professor Whitaker noted that "It's very, very rare for an undergraduate to pursue research opportunities with such enthusiasm" as Harrington. In addition to her research at UMass Harrington also studied at the Park City Mathematics Institute in Utah last year. This summer she has been selected to study at the Mathematics and Theoretical Biology Institute at Los Alamos National Laboratory.

Harrington however does not spend all her time in classrooms and laboratories. She is a very active member of the Amherst

See GOLDWATER on page 2

Murder suspects get life in prison

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON — The nightmares about his daughter's death stay with Bernie Nachiwey well after he wakes up. He says he hears the voice of his "little Jo" crying for help, even feels the stab wounds that killed her on a Boston railroad bridge.

"It's like a living death," he said. "It's like nothing anybody can ever know."

On Friday, a judge ordered the four men convicted of Jo Nachiwey's November 2001 murder to serve their mandatory life sentences at the state's maximum security prison in Walpole.

Ismael Vasquez, 27, his 23-year-old brother Luiz, Harold Parker, 31, and Scott Davenport, 31, were convicted Thursday of first-degree murder in the death of Nachiwey, once a promising language student from Hawaii who dropped out of community college and ended up homeless in Boston.

Prosecutors said the Vasquez brothers and Parker planned Nachiwey's death to send a message to rebellious members of the gang they recruited from among the young drifters who hung around Harvard Square. Davenport testified he did the actual stabbing after his life was threatened.

"These people are a disease in the human population and they need to be excised from the population of humanity," Bernie Nachiwey said in an emotional victim impact statement delivered by audiotape in Suffolk Superior Court on Friday.

Nachiwey's parents live in Hawaii and did not attend the trial because they said it would be too painful.

More than a dozen court officers were in the room for the sentencing and one stepped between Davenport and the others after Parker said several words in Davenport's direction. Davenport initially accused Parker of doing the stabbing.

Afterward, a relative of the Vasquez brothers who did not identify herself called the conviction an "injustice" and another criticized the brevity of jury deliberations, which defense attorneys also said was far too short to fairly decide the complicated case.

The jury deliberated about five hours after more than six weeks of testimony.

Suffolk County District Attorney Daniel Conley said the state simply had a compelling case.

"To say the jury didn't do their job, they didn't understand the facts, is way off base, in my opinion," he said.

Juror Todd Herriott, 35, a college administrator, said the panel took its job "very seriously."

"Whether it was five hours or five weeks I believe we would have come to the same conclusion. The evidence against all four defendants was overwhelming," he said.

Prosecutors said Nachiwey was murdered because her boyfriend had led a revolt within the ranks of the gang.

Davenport, a heroin addict, hooked up with the group earlier in the day because he knew they could get him drugs. He testified that he stabbed Nachiwey after Parker and Ismael Vasquez threatened to also kill him if he didn't.

Prosecutors said Luiz Vasquez silenced Nachiwey's screams by striking her in the head with nunchucks.

Two 21-year-old women accused of subduing Nachiwey while Davenport stabbed her, Ana White and Lauren Alleyne, pleaded guilty to manslaughter and testified against the men. White will be sentenced to 12 years while Alleyne will receive 12 to 15 years.

Jo Nachiwey grew up in Makawao, on the island of Maui, in a strict family where the girls weren't allowed to wear clothes that showed their legs. Jo's father picked her name because the two vowels were believed to be a powerful combination in his native language.

She was conversant in Russian, German and Italian and received a certificate for excellence in conversational Spanish from her high school. According to her resume, she hoped to use her language skills as a flight attendant.

ANN B. IVES/AP PHOTO

Luiz Vasquez, 23, listens to his sentence during the hearing last Friday. Vasquez and three others were sentenced to life in prison for first degree murder committed in 2001.

African speakers shed light on culture, elephants

By Cameron Metiner
Collegian Correspondent

Several lecturers spoke to students last Thursday in Southwest about four African countries, emphasizing the importance of culture and resources.

The first presenter, Alfred Kikoti, 34, who is from Tanzania, is studying African Elephant Ecology at the University of Massachusetts. Kikoti presented a brief history on Tanzania and the issues of women's right of the Maasai tribe. He showed pictures of varying Tanzanian landscapes and of Mount Kilimanjaro, which he says he has climbed 14 times. Kikoti mainly focused on his favorite thing in Tanzania, the elephants.

"I call them 'guys' because I admire them," he said.

Kikoti has been involved with the Kilimanjaro Elephant Research Center, which studies elephants outside of National Parks. He gave insights into the herd dynamics and the intelligence of elephants.

"The oldest female elephant is the one who leads the herd, they remember the most. If the herd loses her then they could be lost," he said. Kikoti also gave the crowd some interesting facts about them as well, "Mud to them is soap, and it's how they wash," he said.

Godfrey "Arnold" Ssali, from Uganda is studying Public Health and gave an in depth depiction of Uganda's history. Ssali concentrated on the problems that are facing Uganda at this time.

"1986 was the first reported case of AIDs, Uganda then started a crusade for behavioral change. We have progressed from 40 percent to four percent just from education," he said.

He was able to bring some facts about the historical struggle that Uganda experienced out into the open, describing Uganda as a proud and noble "warrior nation."

"Uganda is part of the Rift Valley and there is a great deal of resources, a typical day at the market is full of fruit," he said.

Ssali also focused some on the animal life in Uganda, "There are so many hippos and they are quite hot-tempered, there is also a rich bird population."

The next presenter was Doctor Mohmed Good who is the Resident Director of Prince/Crampton and received his doctorate in International Education from UMass Amherst. Good is from Somalia and was in the traditional dress of his country. He was able to bring a detailed political history of Somalia.

"There exists a deep connection between the three countries (Somalia, Ethiopia, and Republic of Djibouti), since they all come from the same people."

He spoke a great deal of the improvements of the country by the military, which took over in 1969.

"Eight-thousand military trucks were used for the literacy program to reach the rural areas."

Peter Asuzu, 22, is studying Electrical Engineering and is from Nigeria. Asuzu presented last and spoke mainly about Lagos, the capital of Nigeria and his hometown, the land and the people.

"Nigeria is just a little larger than Texas, with a population of 134 million, and so many people in that space you can guess the problems that we face," Asuzu said. He talked about famous athletes and his favorite artist in Nigeria.

"My favorite artist, Fela Kuti, did crazy stuff like he married 47 women and played concerts in his underwear." Asuzu concluded his presentation with mentioning that Hakeem "the dream" Olijuwan was from Nigeria.

The African presenters were organized by Roderick Anderson, a graduate student, and Arash Mashayekhi, a junior studying electrical engineering and is a Resident Assistant, they both live in the Prince/Crampton cluster.

The cluster is home to grad students and international students too.

"Every year there are 45 to 47 countries represented in the cluster and 38 U.S. states too. There is such a diverse population. That is why we started this program, this is something you can't learn in books," says Good.

GA toddlers found dead

WARRENTON, Ga (AP) — Two toddlers who were reported missing from their home over the weekend were found dead in an algae-covered sewage pond a few hundred yards away Monday after a two-day search.

The cause of death was not immediately disclosed, and Georgia Bureau of Investigation spokesman John Bankhead said it was not known whether the youngsters were the victims of foul play. Autopsies were planned.

Nicole Payne, 2, and her brother, Jonah, 3, were reported missing on Saturday from their lakeside house about 100 miles east of Atlanta. The children's mother called authorities to report that the toddlers vanished after she went into another room. Police said their mother found the front door open and the children gone.

Bankhead said green algae made it difficult to see the children when authorities first searched the 1 1/2-acre pond, situated at the end of road behind the family's house.

The pond — part of the city's sanitation system — is surrounded by a fence, but has several holes where a child could easily get through.

Police Chief Jim McClain said that earlier in the day Saturday, the children got out of the house. He said Nicole figured out how to unlock the front door and gate and left with Jonah at around 4 p.m. A neighbor returned the children a half-hour later, he said.

Authorities said Nicole needed a breathing machine daily and her brother was on medication for an unspecified condition.

On Sunday, agents from the Georgia Bureau of Investigation questioned the children's mother, Lottie Kain. Authorities said more than one person was given a polygraph test. They would not comment on the tests.

Up to 100 law enforcement officers searched for the youngsters, using heat-seeking devices, infrared radar at night and cadaver dogs. Searchers combed the woods, and divers looked in a lake.

The children's disappearance shocked and saddened people in Warrenton, a town of narrow, two-lane roads known mostly for the sweet potatoes at Jane's Restaurant.

Stephanie Johnson, walking with her 22-month old daughter, Ella, said she had been praying for the family.

—Associated Press

MEGAN BRINSTER/COLLEGIAN

Spring is here!

Trees around the campus pond are in full bloom as spring weather invades UMass.

Security breach at Logan causes six flight delays

BOSTON (AP) — A security breach that forced the partial evacuation of a terminal at Logan International Airport on Monday was not a serious threat, officials said.

An unidentified woman was seen on a security tape entering the Terminal B boarding area through an exit around 11:10 a.m., Transportation Security Administration spokeswoman Ann Davis said.

The woman was a passenger who left the area, turned around and re-entered through the same exit, then left again 90 seconds later, she said.

"We suspect she walked back through the exit lane inadvertently," Davis said. "Nonetheless, we needed to take all precautions."

Airport security evacuated the American Airlines portion of the terminal to conduct a sweep. Passengers were re-screened before they were allowed to return to the boarding area around 2 p.m. A total of six flights were delayed.

Davis said the woman apparently left the airport after leaving through the exit door.

"We don't anticipate being able to identify her," she said.

—Associated Press

ANN B. IVES/AP PHOTO

A woman walks through a medal detector at Logan yesterday during a security breech.

ARTS & LIVING
ROB THOMAS
The Matchbox Twenty singer steps out on his own.
PAGE 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
SGA VS. LOMBARDI
One columnist offers a new look at the role Lombardi plays at UMass.
PAGE 4

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H71°, L47°
TONIGHT Cloudy, H58°, L40°
TOMORROW Rain, H63°, 43°

SPORTS
OFF TO CAMBRIDGE
UMass mens lacross travels east to take on the Harvard Crimson today.
PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marrelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Copy Editor Alisson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Matthew Reid
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Riggans
Family Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginia Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Assistant Operations Linda Wallish
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Family Thomas Hecht
Assistant Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Garzaro
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brimster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is independently owned and operated. Founded in 1890, the Collegian operated as Index Log and Massachusetts Collegian from 1892 to 1908, the College Signal in 1903, the Massachusetts Collegian in 1908 and the Massachusetts Collegian in 1950. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been awarded since January 1998. For advertising rates and information, call (413) 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Spring snow blankets Ohio

By Andy Resnik
Associated Press

COLUMBUS, Ohio — An unusual spring storm dumped nearly 2 feet of wet snow on parts of the Midwest and Appalachians, covering newly sprouting plants, snapping power lines and taking a bite out of baseball.

"We've been kind of spoiled because the weather was so nice last weekend," said Tina Adams, 37, who described about 18 inches of snow in her yard in the northeast Ohio town of Chardon. "The kids got to go outside, play baseball and now we're stuck inside again. It's like the seasons have reversed."

The two-day weekend storm brought temperatures as much as 25 degrees below the normal of around 60 as snow fell across parts of Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, eastern sections of Kentucky and Tennessee and western North Carolina.

Police in Indiana said snow-covered pavement contributed to two traffic deaths.

Northeastern Ohio was hardest hit, with 21 inches of snow in North Royalton, 15 in Solon and Tina Adams' 18 in Chardon. Cleveland got 12.4 inches including 1.6 inches Monday morning. Dozens of school districts closed in the area Monday because of slippery roads.

Up to 16 inches of wet snow had fallen on parts of Michigan's Thumb peninsula and Detroit's northern suburbs, the National Weather Service said. Wind gusting to 40 mph created drifts 3 and 4 feet high on the Thumb.

"A week ago we were wearing shorts and tank tops," said Misti Hunt, a bartender in the Thumb town of Bad Axe, where some roads were impassable Sunday evening.

In the Appalachians, 8 inches fell at Terra Alta, W.Va., more than double what was forecast. On Grandfather Mountain in western North Carolina about 5 inches of snow fell, the temperature dipped to 16 degrees and wind gusted to 139 mph, meteorologists said.

The weakened storm system headed toward the northeast on Monday and any additional snow accumulation was expected to be light.

The Detroit Tigers postponed two weekend home games against the Minnesota Twins because of the wretched weather.

The cold likely will harm some fruit trees, but perennials and planted garden seeds should be OK, experts said. Farmers were wary of the cold wave's effect on seed they planted early.

Associated Press

An Ohio resident trudges though wintry weather yesterday as an April snow storm blasts the area — dumping nearly two feet of snow.

Afghan drug lord apprehended in New York yesterday

NEW YORK (AP) — A reputed Afghan drug lord who authorities say operated with the protection of the Taliban has been captured and faces charges that he tried to smuggle more than $50 million worth of heroin into the United States, authorities said.

Bashir Noorzai, who is on the U.S. list of most-wanted drug kingpins, was ordered held without bail at his initial court appearance in Manhattan. If convicted, he could face a maximum sentence of life in prison.

The full circumstances of Noorzai's capture were not made public. Prosecutor Boyd Johnson told a judge that Drug Enforcement Administration agents arrested the defendant Saturday in New York, but he did not elaborate.

Noorzai, 44, wearing a full beard and a dark blue polo shirt, remained silent during the brief hearing. He was given a court-appointed attorney, David Greenfield, who declined to comment outside court.

Prosecutors say the smuggling attempt involved about 1,100 pounds of heroin.

U.S. Attorney David Kelley said that between 1990 and 2004, the defendant and his organization "provided demolitions, weapons and manpower to the Taliban."

"In exchange, the Taliban allowed Noorzai's business to flourish," he said.

The Taliban protected Noorzai's opium crops, its heroin laboratories in Afghanistan and Pakistan and its drug transportation routes out of the country, prosecutors said.

Last year, the White House added Noorzai and nine other people and organizations to the list of most wanted drug lords. The White House gave Noorzai's name as Haji Bashir Noorzai.

The Taliban militia had ruled Afghanistan until it was toppled by the United States in late 2001. Taliban-led militants are still operating along Afghanistan's mountainous eastern border with Pakistan.

Kelley refused to comment on reports that the defendant has ties to the al-Qaida terrorist network.

"It's not something that's part of the case," Kelley said.

—Associated Press

Production Crew

On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Erika Lovley
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brimster
COPY EDITOR
Mike Busack
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleston
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nick Belanger, Tom Heslin

Correction

In yesterday's article featuring magician Andre Kole, the Collegian incorrectly quoted Kole as saying, "Jesus could have faked miracles." It should have read, "Jesus could not have faked miracles."

Harrington receives prestigious award

GOLDWATER from page 1

community in which she has participated in many volunteer activities including the Make-A-Wish foundation and Shelter Sunday. She also volunteers at local nursing homes and for food, clothing, and toy drives.

As a member of the UMass Woman's Crew Team, which won their tenth consecutive Atlantic 10 Conference Championship on Saturday, Harrington has practice two times a day and races on the weekends which keeps her very busy.

In addition to all this Harrington also some how finds time to be a member of the Northampton Bridge Club, the Math Club, the Biological Sciences Club, play intramural softball, and still maintains a high GPA.

"I don't think most undergrads have had the opportunities I've had," said Harrington, "I'm rowing with an Olympic coach…conducting research and I'm an undergraduate grader for a calculus class. I really appreciate all of the support I've received from my professors and ONSA."

Bush discusses rising oil prices

By Jennifer Loven
Associated Press

CRAWFORD, Texas — President Bush on Monday pressed Saudi Arabia's Crown Prince Abdullah to help curb skyrocketing oil prices that are hurting American families and businesses, and a top adviser said a Saudi plan to increase production would have an impact.

"When you increase the capacity by a significant amount, which they are talking about, that can't help but have a positive downward effect on prices," said Bush's national security adviser, Steve Hadley.

As Bush and Abdullah met for several hours at the president's ranch, the Saudis presented a plan — outlined last week in a speech by Saudi Oil Minister Ali Naimi — to increase production capacity to 12.5 million barrels per day by 2009 from the current 11 million limit.

If necessary, Saudi Arabia would eventually develop a capacity of 15 million barrels per day. The kingdom now pumps about 9.5 million barrels daily.

The talks also included Middle East peace initiatives, the pace of democratic change in the desert kingdom and counterterror efforts.

But the president, aware that record-high gas prices are hurting his popularity, put that issue at the top of the agenda.

"The crown prince understands that it is very important ... to make sure that the price is reasonable," Bush told reporters as he and Vice President Dick Cheney awaited the arrival of the Saudi officials.

Bush said he would appeal to Abdullah's self-interest, telling him that persistent high crude prices could erode the long-term market for Saudi Arabia's biggest source of revenue. He said he would urge Saudi Arabia to make the necessary investment to increase its production capacity, especially in light of the fast-growing, energy-gobbling markets in China and India.

"A high oil price will damage markets, and he knows that. I look forward to talking to him about that," the president said. "We'll talk about his country's capacity."

The president then pivoted to the domestic scene, prodding the Senate to follow the House and pass the comprehensive energy strategy he supports. "Now is the time for something to happen," Bush said.

Abdullah and his small entourage were nearly a half-hour late. Bush gave Saudi Arabia's de facto ruler a warm embrace and a kiss on both cheeks in welcome. Bush kept a firm, guiding grip on his guest's hand as they walked up the path, past a field of bluebonnets that the president took care to point out, to a new office building on a corner of the sprawling ranch.

Bush's goal of spreading democracy across the Arab world faces a difficult test in Saudi Arabia, a longtime ally ruled by a monarchy.

Associated Press

The war of the beers

Stacked cases of Busch Light and Milwaukee Best Light are seen in a local liquor store. Just as the war over light beers has reached a fever pitch, Miller Brewing Co. has decided to open a new front in the economy beer segment. Anheuser/Busch Inc. currently rakes in 53 percent of the beer market.

STUDENTTRAVEL
Cheap Student Airfare

London	$313
Paris	$368
Rome	$443
Amsterdam	$375
Frankfurt	$375
Lima, Peru	$501
Tokyo	$703
Bangkok	$937

"The world is a book, and those who do not travel, read only a page."
We've Got EVERYTHING You Need for Summer Travel!
Europe Rail Passes

Eurailpass	$382
Britrail Flexipass	$199
France & Spain Pass	$199
Greece & Italy Pass	$200

Inca Journey — A great adventure combining Andean culture, the most famous Incan ruin and the lush Amazon Rainforest. 9 days from $875
Northern Thailand — Experience the River Kwai, rose bangs, Chiang Mai, elephant rides, hilltribe trek and the Golden Triangle. 15 days from $585
South African Nomad — Travel along the southern coast of Africa and continue inland through tropical rainforest to the impressive Victoria Falls. 20 days from $995
Airfare is roundtrip from Boston. Featured packages do not include airfare. Subject to change and availability. Taxes and other applicable fees not included.
STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com
(413) 256.1261

THE DAILY COLLEGIAN NEEDS YOU

Are you interested in covering SGA?

Would you like to be a News Editor?

How about an assistant news editor?

ALL THREE POSITIONS ARE AVAILABLE. GET YOUR APPLICATION TODAY

new balance
SoccerFest 2005
It's Your Shot, Take It!!
REGISTER NOW!
Look for our tables in the Campus Center and at the SOM Atrium on Tuesday 4/26 and Wednesday 4/27
For more information check out our website at www.soccerfest.org

- Want a job?
- Want a great experience?
- Want to meet great people?

Then come work for
The Daily Collegian
Now Hiring for Advertising Executive Positions
Interested? Contact Kerry at 545-3500

PHOTO TECH
The Collegian is looking for some well qualified photographers to take pictures.
Come to the Collegian in the basement of the Campus Center and ask for Alex or Megan
PHOTO TECH

Commuter rail crash kills dozens in Japan

By Mari Yamaguchi
Associated Press

AMAGASAKI, Japan — Investigators focused on excessive speed and a 23-year-old train driver's lack of experience after a crowded commuter train jumped the rails on a curve Monday and plowed into an apartment building, causing Japan's deadliest rail accident in four decades.

Rescuers worked into the night trying to free survivors from twisted rail carriages left when the train hit the nine-story building's parking garage, killing at least 57 people and injuring 441. It was not clear if any bystanders or apartment residents were among the victims.

Early Tuesday, rescuers working under floodlights pulled out a conscious but seriously injured 46-year-old woman and took her to a hospital, police official Hiroshi Yamatani said.

Two men were trapped in the same car. They were conscious and receiving emergency medical care but rescuers were hampered by worries about leaked fuel, said Shuhei Matsuda, an Amagasaki fire department official. Others also were caught in the wreckage and feared dead.

Distraught people rushed to hospitals looking for relatives who might have been injured or killed.

Takamichi Hayashi said his elder brother, 19-year-old Hiroki, might be among those still in the wreck. He said Hiroki had called their mother twice on a mobile phone from inside one of the train cars hours after the crash but remained unaccounted for.

"He told my mother: 'I'm in pain. I'm not going to make it,'" Hayashi said.

Jammed with 580 passengers, the seven-car train derailed at 9:18 a.m. on a curve near Amagasaki, about 250 miles west of Tokyo, then plowed through an automobile and slammed into the wall of the building's parking garage. Two of the five derailed train cars were flattened and one was bent around a corner of the building.

Officials said no cause had been ruled out but added that investigators suspected speed and the driver's less than a year on the job.

The driver — identified as Ryujiro Takami, 23 — was unaccounted for.

He got his train operator's license last May. A month later, he overshot a station and was issued a warning, railway officials and police said. Passengers said he also stopped too far past a station platform Monday just before the crash.

Tsunemi Murakami, safety director for train operator West Japan Railway Co., said it had not been determined how fast the train was traveling.

CLR/REUTERS/LANDOV

Extensive debris litters the city of Amagaski, Japan after a massive commuter train crash. The commuter rail is believed to have jumped off the track, killing at least 71 people.

Suspect denies September 11 affiliation

By Daniel Woolls
Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — The man accused of leading a Spanish al-Qaida cell denied charges he helped organize the Sept. 11 attacks by arranging a final planning meeting, telling judges Monday he had nothing to do with that act of "terrible savagery."

Imad Yarkas, the main suspect in Spain's case against al-Qaida, described himself as a hardworking father of six who struggled to make ends meet.

He took the stand on Day 2 of the trial of 24 terror suspects — Europe's biggest court case against radical groups with alleged ties to Osama bin Laden's terror network. If convicted, he faces a symbolic sentence of almost 75,000 years in prison — 25 years for each of the nearly 3,000 people killed in the 2001 attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Two alleged accomplices also face charges that they helped plot the Sept. 11 attacks, and 21 others are charged with belonging to a terrorist group, illegal weapons possession and other offenses.

Yarkas, arrested in November 2001, denied leading a cell of radical Muslims with ties to al-Qaida, or knowing two of the alleged Sept. 11 ringleaders.

Yarkas, 42, a Syrian-born Spanish citizen, was questioned about a Spanish indictment that accused him of arranging a July 2001 meeting in the Tarragona region of northeast Spain where suicide pilot Mohammed Atta and purported Sept. 11 operations coordinator Ramzi bin al-Shibh allegedly discussed the final details.

Prosecutor Pedro Rubira provided no evidence. He simply asked Yarkas if he arranged such a meeting.

Yarkas said he had not. "I don't know Ramzi bin al-Shibh. I don't know Mohammed Atta," he said.

He called the Sept. 11 attacks "terrible savagery," adding: "I didn't have anything to do with it."

Yarkas also was asked about an August 2001 telephone conversation in which a Moroccan associate allegedly called him from London and said people he knew "had entered the area of aviation and had even slashed the throat of the bird," according to a translation from Arabic contained in the September 2003 indictment against Yarkas.

The judge in charge of the terror investigation, Baltasar Garzon, has said the conversation suggests that the Moroccan, identified as Farid Hilali, was involved in the Sept. 11 plot to hijack airliners. Hilali remains jailed in Britain fighting extradition to Spain.

Pope Benedict XVI meets with Muslim community Monday

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — A day after reaching out to other Christians and to Jews in his installation Mass, Pope Benedict XVI met Monday with members of the Muslim community, assuring them the church wanted to continue building "bridges of friendship" that he said could foster peace in the world.

Benedict made the comments while meeting with religious leaders who attended Sunday's installation ceremony, saying he was particularly grateful that members of the Muslim community were present.

"I express my appreciation for the growth of dialogue between Muslims and Christians, both at the local and international level," he said.

He noted that the world is marked by conflicts but longs for peace.

"Yet peace is also a duty to which all peoples must be committed, especially those who profess to belong to religious traditions," he said. "Our efforts to come together and foster dialogue are a valuable contribution to building peace on solid foundations.

"It is therefore imperative to engage in authentic and sincere dialogue, built on respect for the dignity of every human person, created as we Christians firmly believe, in the image and likeness of God," he said.

Later, Benedict kiddingly told an audience of German pilgrims that at one point during the conclave he viewed the idea of being elected pope as a "guillotine," and he prayed to God to be spared selection.

"As the trend in the ballots slowly made me realize that — in a manner of speaking, the guillotine would fall on me — I started to feel quite dizzy," a smiling Benedict said, clearly joking. "I thought that I had done my life's work and could now hope to live out my days in peace. I told the Lord with deep conviction, 'Don't do this to me.'"

Speaking in his native German, Benedict, 78, told the audience that a cardinal slipped him a note of paper reminding him what he had preached about Christ calling Peter to follow him even if he did not want to go.

"Evidently, this time he didn't listen to me," the pontiff said.

Benedict was interrupted several times by applause and cheering, and he seemed to enjoy the welcome from his countrymen, smiling and chuckling. He apologized for being late, saying the meeting with the religious leaders had been "heartfelt" and had gone late.

"The Germans are used to punctuality," he joked. "I'm already very Italian."

The Vatican did not say which Muslim leaders attended the meeting, which was closed to the press.

It did release a list of those who attended Sunday's Mass, including Saeed Taghavi, head of the office of religious minorities in Iran's culture ministry, and the head of Rome's central mosque.

CLR/REUTERS/LANDOV

Pope Benedict XVI speaks to a crowd of thousands Sunday during his first papal ceremony. The Pope spoke yesterday to the Muslim community.

The BIG Chill
Wednesday, May 11
Library Lawn 2-6 pm
At the Big Chill, everything is FREE!
Come chill out with your friends and celebrate the end of the year. A fantastic afternoon of music, rides, free food, and giveaways all on a perfect May afternoon. These are the days you come to college for!
Rain date: May 12

TENSION BREAKERS
Thursday, May 12
Campus Center - Concourse
10am-2pm
Save the drama for yo' mama, serenity now. Come by the Campus Center Concourse and relieve your stress with some sugar, a massage, or some aromatherapy.

MIX IT UP DANCE SERIES - COUNTRY
Thursday, May 12
Student Union Ballroom
8-10pm
A fantastic boot stomping dance for all who have "got friends in low places" or all who know "it's five o'clock somewhere." Come early for line dancing instruction and as always, fantastic giveaways for all who attend!

ULTIMATE CHILL DISC TOURNAMENT
Friday, May 13
Library Lawn
12-6pm
Take a study break and grab your friends for an afternoon of ultimate. Sign up in teams of eight and compete or just come out to cheer on your friends. All skill levels welcome. Prizes for the winning teams and bags for all participants! Don't forget to register your team early at chill_disc@yahoo.com

The BIG Chill
Ultimate Chill-Disc Tournament
Registration Form

Captains Name: _____ Student ID#: _____
Captains E-mail: _____ Phone #: _____

Team Members

Name	Student ID
Captain:
1:
2:
3:
4:
5:
6:
7:
8:

*Please note that there may be up to 8 people on a team, however, only 6 will play at a time. Each team may request up to two Zoodisc members by writing Zoodisc in slots 7 and 8. You need a minimum of 6 to play.
*Check in is at 11:45
*Games are 25 minutes long.
*Please complete this form and return it to the Resource Room in the Student Union (across from the Cape Cod Lounge) or sign up by e-mail at Chill_disc@yahoo.com by 5/6/05
Register early to ensure your team's spot in the Tournament.
Sponsored by the Student Activities Center, Student Affairs and Campus Life and Campus Center Administration/Auxilary Services.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A new look at Lombardi

David Lawrence

It seems that every time we read an article about the SGA's doings, some high-ranking member is releasing a statement opposing whatever Chancellor Lombardi is up to. In fact, if you knew of only students' actions and statements, you'd think our Chancellor had some secret vendetta against them.

Believe it or not, he doesn't.

As the man in charge here at UMass, the well-being and success of the students is actually among Lombardi's top priorities. It is part of his job description. He has had the best interest of UMass students in mind whenever he has made a decision or recommendation or even, as he is most recently noted for, when he issued his Chancellor's draft plan for diversity.

You may have recently been told that Lombardi has plans to take over the SGA, the Collegian, WMUA and every other RSO on campus. You've probably read or heard the comments of SGA leaders claiming that Lombardi is "tackling the SGA." At the GEO rally last week, one ill-informed speaker proclaimed that the plan gave Vice Chancellor Gargano control of all the RSOs. This is a rumor which has no basis; it simply isn't true. The source of this rumor is a misreading of Lombardi's recent first draft action plan.

The administration and the student government are both on the same team; there is no need for the high level of animosity that we have seen lately.

In the plan, he calls for these organizations to develop new diversity programs, and sets up a system to ensure their implementation, but he does not, by any means, request control of them. Though organizations would receive extra money from the administration to implement diversity protocols and would be formally given a new administrative office, the SGA would still keep all of its existing financial control. This is hardly "tackling the SGA."

Ironically, it is the SGA that has been tackling Lombardi. They seem to be under the impression that Lombardi is not fighting for the students just as hard as they are, but instead, fighting against the students. The administration and the student government are both organizations charged with the task of helping students. The administration and the student government are both on the same team; there is no need for the high level of animosity that we have seen lately.

Unfortunately, some members of the SGA seem to think that they are fighting against Lombardi. They talk like they aren't on the same team as him and they act like they aren't fighting for the same things that he is. These students come up with all manner of ways to criticize him, and it is getting out of hand.

You've probably also heard that Lombardi and the administration are racist or discriminatory. I've read these comments several times and it seems to be the accepted opinion among some members of the SGA and campus at large that our good Chancellor just has it out for minorities. The example that is commonly brought up is the "International Student Fee" debacle of last year.

There was never anything wrong with the International Student Fee, we should get that straight. The administration didn't care if you were black, white, gay or straight: if you were from outside the U.S., you paid an additional fee for your time here at UMass Amherst and that was that. It was analogous to the ongoing discrimination against non-Massachusetts residents that we give the euphemism "out-of-state tuition."

I am from out of state, and just like every other out-of-state student, regardless of my ethnicity or sexual preference, I pay an additional fee for my time here at UMass Amherst because I am from outside of Massachusetts. It is not geographic "discrimination." There is nothing wrong with charging higher fees for out-of-state students, and there was nothing wrong with charging higher fees for International students (who are by definition also from out-of-state, incidentally). The IS fee should not reflect poorly on Lombardi or the administration, but somehow it is brought up in the context of anti-Lombardi sentiments.

The result of the confrontational stance the SGA has taken with Lombardi is a significant reduction of the group's overall power. You see, the SGA's ability to doll out money to the RSOs isn't all that significant in terms of campus politics. What is significant is their position as the student conduit to the administration, and the student voice to the outside world in general. When the SGA severs itself from the administration with wild claims of discrimination or hostile takeovers, they destroy their own credibility. Without credibility as an organization, the level of influence the group holds with the administration is significantly reduced.

The good news is that Lombardi, as someone who is trying his best to improve life for the students, sincerely wants to work with the SGA and the students in general. He has demonstrated this recently by showing extreme patience and openness with the moves he has made surrounding the diversity commission; extending deadlines and opening himself up to students. If group members start playing like they are on his team, I'm sure he'll be more than willing to play their game. Without a doubt, that is the healthiest and most efficient way to really get things done for all of the students here at UMass.

David Lawrence is a Collegian columnist.

Uniformity dangerous in 'The O.C.'

Samantha Sharac

Aside from its shallowness and materialism, "The O.C." seems to misrepresent men and women, particularly women, during its one-hour show time. "The O.C." is by no means a realistic documentary of Orange County, Calif. "The O.C." is intended to be entertaining.

"The O.C." centers around characters with an abundance of wealth and privilege. The underprivileged in this Orange County are the poor and overweight. People of color seem to be invisible in the show. Senior citizens are also excluded. All the women showcased in this show are thin and white while the men are also white as well as muscular and tall.

Why is a show that excludes the populations who are over 55, middle class or poor, overweight and non-white, seem to be such popular entertainment?

Entertainment is often unrealistic and usually tries to imitate or create appealing fantasies. Entertainment is art that aims to please the audience. Why are the images of "The O.C." considered to be entertaining? Are images of thin WASPs really that fantastic for so many people that they just cannot seem to wait for the next episode of "The O.C.?"

In 2005, there is a hope that casting directors will ensure that more "average" people would be included in a television show. It is unfortunate that so many people have to be excluded for a show to be deemed entertaining.

The lead female character Marissa, played by Mischa Barton is, I believe, a horrible portrayal of a young, contemporary American woman. Barton is extremely thin and also often underdressed. Fox should consider more appropriate attire for Barton's waiflike body. First, Barton may catch pneumonia. Second, and more importantly, it would be creditable for Fox to require Barton to cover up, say her razor-sharp collarbone for example, for the sake of the young, impressionable females who watch the show.

Young females may understand that the emaciated looks of Barton and other sickly entertainers are not necessarily real. However, women with low self-esteem and body dissatisfaction are prone to eating disorders, often anorexia nervosa and bulimia. Such diseases also have psychological consequences and such emotions usually override one's rationality of what's real.

Having watched "The O.C." for the first and last time, I find that Marissa's contribution to the plot of the story is of mostly nonverbal actions of smiling, blinking and staring.

Barton's character epitomizes the negative images of women in the media; especially the nonverbal and simplistic plots. Her attribute to the storyline is that of few words. Marissa rarely pursues her own goals; rather she places her attention on being a helper for others. What a revolutionary media figure for women.

The character that she plays is a terrible stereotype of a young, modern woman. Barton's character Marissa lacks intelligence as well as the means of supporting herself. Marissa is most often helping the male figures in her life, sometimes by looking pretty or standing in the background with an expression of perplexity.

To improve the representations of people, Fox could introduce some creditable roles to "The O.C.," among other television shows. Fox could include more diverse characters in the lineup. Additionally, in between Marissa's stares and references to popular culture, Fox could possibly tackle the concept of developing Marissa into a more verbal, thinking figure. Now that would be good entertainment.

Samantha Sharac is a Collegian columnist.

Students can degrade UMass

Stacy Kasdin

This is my senior year of college. I'm graduating in a month. At first, the thought of graduating terrified me; the thought of moving into an apartment where I'll have to clean my own bathroom; the thought of having to cook all my own meals and more importantly, finding a job where I'll make enough money to purchase the food for my meals, not to mention pay my rent. However, things are pulling together. I have a job interview lined up for May in my destination city of choice. I've become quite adept at bargain shopping. Most importantly, whether I'm ready or not to move into the real world, I am certainly ready to leave college, because the more I witness some of the ridiculous things that occur on this campus, the more I realize I'm sick and tired of this crap.

The first mistake I made pertaining to my senior year of college was staying on campus. Nearly every night I am kept awake by people setting off fireworks outside my building, dumpsters being knocked over or police sirens chasing these those people down. On calmer nights, I'm simply kept awake by my hallmates, who choose to have loud conversations directly outside my door, despite the fact that they have a perfectly good empty dorm room in which these conversations could take place. If you want to stay up late and have a good time, fine, but don't keep up those of us who are trying to sleep.

As for those using their evenings for destruction of property, well, it's not funny. The money being spent to replace the burnt trash cans, the couches that get thrown off the balconies; the money spent to strengthen the police forces and security on campus is money that is being taken away from our educational programs. If we stopped destroying this university, maybe we could give it a chance to improve.

We complain that our lounges don't open up until mid-spring semester. Well why should a room be opened when its sole purpose will be a place to throw things from? Furthermore, this isn't only disturbing the peace and costing massive amounts of money, but it is an extreme safety hazard. Suppose someone is walking below when that couch goes flying off the balcony. I know for a fact people have been walking below balconies and gotten lit cigarettes thrown into their hair. A couch would hurt a lot more than a cigarette.

So we've established a lack of respect for the school's property. The second sickening thing I've noticed on this campus is the lack of respect many students have for each other and themselves. I enjoy a glass of wine or a mudslide now and then, but I don't understand how people can allow themselves to get so drunk they would think nothing of urinating in the middle of a public hallway, or worse, some stranger's dorm room that was accidentally left unlocked.

The money being spent to replace the burnt trash cans, the couches that get thrown off balconies; the money spent to strengthen the police forces and security on campus is money that is being taken away from out educational programs.

This has occurred on multiple occasions in this semester alone. I've returned to my dorm on more than one occasion to find someone vomiting all over the grass people sit out on during sunny days. What is so great about being drunk that it's worth risking your health, your dignity and your relationships with your fellow students?

That brings me to a Web site that was recently brought to my attention. This site, umassboobs.com, is not affiliated with the University, but with our school's nickname in its address I feel it represents us in some way. As of Sunday, April 24, this site boasts 27 topless photos of female UMass students, some of which include those student's faces. I've seen the "Girl's Gone Wild" commercials, and I always comment on how I don't understand what compels these women to degrade themselves for five seconds of fame.

This is not the same as being a porn star or a stripper because, while they are not professions I would personally pursue, they are professions nonetheless. They are getting paid. These young women are not getting paid. They are simply exposing themselves to whoever wants to look (and those who'd rather not). It pains me to think that many who read this column and see that Web site address will not be outraged but enthralled, will not visit the site to post a complaint on their "shout out," page but to ogle at these women and their lack of self-respect.

I'm not losing hope in the University. I know there are a lot of construction plans for improvement to take place over the next few years. I sincerely hope these lovely sounding new buildings are not destroyed with fires and urine stains. I hope the lot of students engaging in the destruction of their campus and themselves get their acts together and realize that nothing good can come of this behavior. I hope everything works out for the best, but right now, listening to the dumpsters being toppled over outside my window, I'm sure glad I won't be here to witness it, for better or worse.

Stacy Kasdin is a Collegian columnist.

The Hookah revolution

Yousef Munayyer

You may have seen them on campus and you may even be smoking out of one right now. The hookah, also known as the argile, shisha, nargile, hubbly-bubbly and so on, has caught fire on this campus like a freshly lit coal.

Perhaps some of you have no idea what I'm talking about. The hookah is a water pipe used to smoke flavored tobacco (or other things, but what you do with your hookah is your business). Its origins are not quite clear. We can say with some degree of certainty that it originates somewhere between India and Iran, but exactly where is unsure. It is evident that the hookah met the western world through the Ottoman Empire, which ruled over much of the Arab lands in which the Hookah was popular.

In the 19th century, it became very much a symbol of the east. The pipe fascinated orientalists coming from the west, frequently documenting its presence in their travel logs. It became so fashionable at one point that pictures could not be taken unless the hookah was present. It was to be recorded as part of a culture, part of a people.

It all hit me earlier this month on the first sunny day. Like animals that have grown tired of hibernation, everyone was outdoors in bathing suits and shorts, even though it was only 60 degrees. Yet there, spread out in between clumps of sunbathers were several hookahs. The hookah revolution is here.

Today that fashion craze is back. It started up again within the last 10 years. I am not quite sure how it happened, but I watched it evolve. I remember a few years ago when friends of mine and I were spotted on campus with one; we were looked at as if we were walking around with the Holy Grail. People would frequently stop by and ask what it is and ask to smoke, once their skepticism wore off.

Now this is no longer the case. In the few years I have been at this University, I have watched the boom happen right here in what is surely a microcosm of hookah culture worldwide. Surely this is tied to marijuana culture and its popularity on college campuses, but the hookah revolution has spread further then the grassy hippie-filled fields of universities.

The hookah is now present in many Arab American households. It has become a way to symbolize the heritage. It has become a way to hang on to what you are so far away from. In fact, the hookah in the Arab household has also become a fashion statement. Much like "The Da Vinci Code" in the trendy-posing-as-educated white homes, if you cannot find a hookah in an Arab house, their authenticity as Arabs may be questioned.

It all hit me earlier this month on the first sunny day. Like animals that have grown tired of hibernation, everyone was outdoors in bathing suits and shorts, even though it was only 60 degrees. Yet there, spread out in between clumps of sunbathers, were several hookahs. The hookah revolution is here.

Unfortunately, it saddens me. It saddens me that the hookah has become the ambassador of Arab culture. It is not even originally Arab, though it is widely popular in the Arab world today. Hookahs, along with belly dancers, have become the symbols of Arab culture in America today. The civilization, which brought the world the Arabic numeral system and algebra; preserved Greek philosophy for centuries and developed chemistry and medicine while Europe was in the dark, is now represented here in the U.S., not by these accomplishments, but rather by scantily clad dancing women and smoking devices.

These accomplishments of ancient Arab civilization are centuries old, yet modern Arab civilization has a rich culture filled with literature, art and music, all which are drowned out by the hubbly-bubbly.

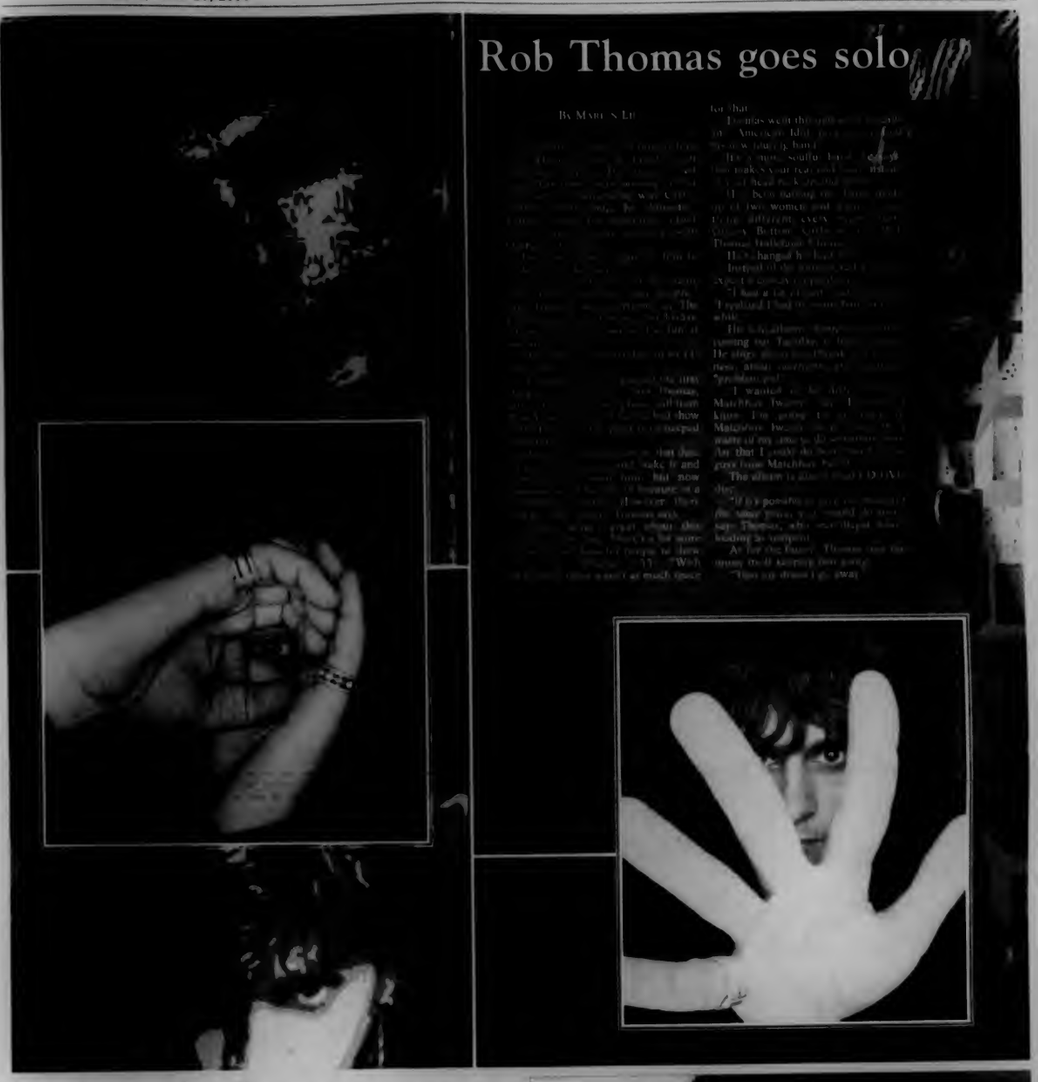
Part of the blame for this lies on Arab Americans who struggle to assimilate with American culture and are thrilled by the attention they get when some one is inquiring about their "bong" or about a woman that can shake. Arabs here in the United States have an obligation to be ambassadors of a proud culture and cannot allow the demands of a culture driven by consumerism and sexuality to affect the message they carry into the western world.

The hookah revolution is the resurrection of an unhealthy trend. Surely it offers a glimpse of the east, but only as well as a cigarette defines western culture to the rest of the world. On college campuses, there is a slightly higher understanding of Arabs then in the rest of the country. In many places around this country, Arabs are still seen as rag wearing terrorists, yet at universities, they are symbolized by hookahs and dancing women.

I am by no means asking anyone to give up his or her hookah. That would just be terrible. Yet, it is our duty, Arabs and Americans alike, as the future of educated America, to change the stereotypes about Arab culture and broaden the understanding of foreign lands here at home.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian columnist.

Write for EdOp.



Send submissions to editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Rob Thomas goes solo

By Mabel S. Lee

Grab a pole: Striptease comes to the gym circuit with heat

By Vikki Ortiz
Milwaukee Journal Sentinel

CHICAGO — The girls had been waiting, so when Antonio Coke arrived, he went straight to the corner of the aerobics studio, popped in a sultry CD and hurriedly pushed a large, square platform with a silver pole to the front of the room.

"Welcome," said Coke, a 5-foot-8, 180-pound dance and fitness instructor with muscles bulging out of his sleeveless T-shirt.

"Everyone got a pole?"

Poles are a necessity for this class, called Cardio Striptease and offered every Monday night at Crunch Fitness, a trendy Lincoln Park neighborhood gym. The class promises a rigorous workout using sexy moves, naughty looks and sensual choreography. Stripper bodies and layered clothing are optional, but participants also shouldn't be surprised when Coke hands out feather boas.

For years, Cardio Striptease has been wildly popular at the fitness chain's New York, Miami and Los Angeles branches, fueled in part by the publicity gained when celebrity Carmen Electra took an interest in the workouts. But it was discontinued at the Orange County, Calif., Crunch because the area's conservative clients weren't, well, turned on by the trend. Management at Chicago's flagship Crunch gym worried people in the buttoned-up Midwest might be reluctant as well.

Nope.

Since the Chicago Cardio Striptease classes began last year, there routinely have been anywhere from 20 to 30 people of all sizes, mostly women, thrusting their pelvises and crawling on the floor in each class. Participants are encouraged to slap their booties, use "come hither" gestures and crawl between each other's legs. At a recent class, Coke taught participants several sets of eight-count moves, one of which culminated with all participants on their backs, legs in the air, spread eagle.

"It's a huge workout," said Alexis Leventhal, a 24-year-old high school teacher and Cardio Striptease regular. "It's like a dance class, just a little bit sexier."

Her friend and fellow teacher, Carolyn Briggs-Gaul, 32, said she's told some of her students about the class, which she sees as a lighthcarted way to get into shape.

"You see yourself in the mirror doing all these crazy moves and you end up laughing half the time," Briggs-Gaul said.

Coke said he makes up most class routines spontaneously. He's never had any professional dance training, except for a few months in New York when he worked as a stripper to help pay the bills.

The classes are just one of many innovative group lessons that Crunch, which boasts the motto "No Judgments", offers. The class before Cardio Striptease is called "Bounce," where members work out on mini-trampolines to music. On Sunday mornings, there's "Gospel Aerobics," in which a full gospel choir serenades a sweating exercise group.

"People are just waiting for something like this to come along, and they say, 'Finally, I can come out of the box,' " said Richard Marshall, the 36-year-old general manager of the Lincoln Park Crunch, of the classes.

Shae Bitton, 22, almost could have passed for a shy girl, sitting quietly by herself on a bench outside the Crunch aerobics studio before a recent Cardio Striptease class started.

Moments later, Bitton was dancing and whipping her shoulder-length brown hair from side to side. The TV sales rep said she was lured into the class because she missed dancing, which she did for most of her childhood. After one Cardio Striptease class, Britton said she was hooked.

"Oh, yeah," she said. "This will be my Monday ritual."

Model actress Carmen Electra made headlines when she began endorsing Striptease workouts through her own video excercise series. She helped the new trend take residence in cities like New York and Miami.

Kidman and Penn flourish but 'Interpreter' lacks cohesiveness

By Jake Monte
Collegian Correspondent

Sean Penn seems like he's at his best when he's playing a thug, or a character with a well-developed dark side, but in "The Interpreter," he proves he can play an "everyman" just as well.

Penn plays Tobin Keller, an FBI agent assigned to investigate a mysterious U.N. interpreter, Sylvia Broome (Nicole Kidman), who claims she has heard the inklings of an assassination attempt on President Zuwanni, an African head of state. When the assassins begin to threaten the life of Broome, Keller is forced to unravel her mysterious origins and political persuasions. Broome's past is full of skeletons in the closet, one of which includes her brother, who is murdered in Matabo, Africa in the early part of the film.

"The Interpreter"
Directed by Sydney Pollack
Starring Nicole Kidman Sean Penn
Universal Studios
Rated PG-13
Grade C

The script is written by veterans Scott Frank, Charles Randolph, and Steven Zaillian. Scott Frank wrote "Dead Again and Get Shorty". Steven Zaillian wrote "Schindler's List", "Searching for Bobby Fisher", and countless other successful films. The writing has the tightness that bespeaks of old pros but the characters don't push the story along as much as the writers do. Keller believes Broome is lying about the assassination plot, but this doesn't jive with how smart we know Keller to be. We know she's telling the truth, so why doesn't he? It's the little contrivances that make this story just shy of really being impressive.

Director Sydney Pollack, who you may remember ruined the promise of "The Firm", proves he can make the same mistakes twice.

"The Firm" was stylized when it shouldn't have been and the climax was a mess. You know those films that just seem to have materialized on the screen, so effortless and natural, as if they were never acted in or directed? "The Interpreter" isn't one of them. The story doesn't move of it's own accord, the director pushes it. In the final act of "The Interpreter", which is a little too similar to "In the Line of Fire", Pollack employs about ten quick flash-back scenes that feel forced and incompetent. It is like a director stuttering and asking over and over, "Does it make sense yet?"

This last half-hour is the worst part of the film. The very last scene feels glued on like an afterthought post-It note. The best aspect of the film, however, and reason enough to see it, is a centerpiece involving a host of characters from different sides all boarding the same bus as Broome. It is a very suspenseful scene partly because Kidman plays it with a steely persona masking her obvious inner angst. It is brilliant acting as is the rest of her portrayal, and the sequence is superb.

The message of the film is very good. Broome sums it up when she says, "Vengeance is a lazy form of grief." "The Interpreter" is every bit worth seeing, but you may feel you've just seen a very good film ruined by the director and screenwriters who can't seem to step aside and let the movie do what it should do best: just be.

Nicole Kidman portrays Sylvia Broome, a U.N. interpreter who receives a chilling phone call about a plot against an African head of state. Sean Penn, usually the bad guy in films, stars opposite Kidman as an FBI agent.

Overcoming test anxiety: we can survive the end of semester

You've participated in class, done all of your homework, studied hard, and you think you have a grip on the material. But then the day of the test comes. Suddenly, you blank out, freeze up, zone out, or feel so nervous that you can't get it together to respond to those questions you knew the answers to just last night.

If this sounds like you, you may have a case of test anxiety, that nervous feeling that people sometimes get when they're about to take a test.

It's pretty normal to feel a little nervous and stressed before a test, just about everyone does. And a touch of nervous anticipation can actually help you get revved and keep you at peak performance while you're taking the test. But for some people, this normal anxiety is more intense. The nervousness they feel before a test can be so strong that it interferes with their concentration or performance.

WHAT IS TEST ANXIETY?

Test anxiety is actually a type of performance anxiety, a feeling someone might have in a situation where performance really counts or when the pressure's on to do well.

Like other situations in which a person might feel performance anxiety, test anxiety can bring on "butterflies," a stomachache, or a tension headache. Some people might feel shaky, sweaty or feel their heart beating quickly as they wait for the test to be given out. A student with really strong test anxiety may even feel like he or she might pass out or throw up.

Test anxiety is not the same as doing poorly on a certain test because your mind is on something else. Most people know that having other things on their minds, such as a breakup or the death of someone close, can also interfere with their concentration and prevent them from doing their best on a test.

WHAT CAUSES IT?

All anxiety is a reaction to anticipating something stressful. Like other anxiety reactions, test anxiety affects the body and the mind. When you're under stress, your body releases the hormone adrenaline, which prepares it for danger (you may hear this referred to as the "fight or flight" reaction). That's what causes the physical symptoms, such as sweating, a pounding heart and rapid breathing. These sensations might be mild or intense.

Focusing on the bad things that could happen also fuels test anxiety. For example, someone worrying about doing poorly might think thoughts like, "What if I forget everything I know?" or "What if the test is too hard?" Too many thoughts like these leave no mental space for thinking about the test questions. People with test anxiety can also feel stressed out by their physical reaction and think things like "What if I throw up?" or "Oh no, my hands are shaking."

Just like other types of anxiety, test anxiety can create a vicious circle: The more a person focuses on the bad things that could happen, the stronger the feeling of anxiety becomes. This makes the person feel worse and, because his or her head is full of distracting thoughts and fears, it can increase the possibility that the person will do worse on the test.

WHO'S LIKELY TO HAVE TEST ANXIETY?

People who worry a lot or who are perfectionists are more likely to have trouble with test anxiety. People with these traits sometimes find it hard to accept mistakes they might make or to get anything less than a perfect score. In this way, even without meaning to, they might really pressure themselves. Test anxiety is bound to thrive in a situation like this.

Students who aren't prepared for tests but who care about doing well are also likely to experience test anxiety. If you know you're not prepared, it's a no-brainer to realize that you'll be worried about doing poorly. People can feel unprepared for tests for several reasons: They may not have studied enough, they may find the material difficult, or perhaps they feel tired because didn't get enough sleep the night before.

WHAT CAN YOU DO?

Test anxiety can be a real problem when someone is so stressed out over a test that he or she can't get past the nervousness to focus on the test questions and do his or her best work. Feeling ready to meet the challenge, though, can keep test anxiety at a manageable level.

Use a little stress to your advantage. Stress is your body's warning mechanism — it's a signal that helps you prepare for something important that's about to happen. So use it to your advantage. Instead of reacting to the stress by dreading, complaining or fretting about the test with friends, take an active approach. Let stress remind you to study well in advance of a test. Chances are, you'll keep your stress from spinning out of control. After all, nobody ever feels stressed out by thoughts that they might do well on a test.

Ask for help. Although a little test anxiety can be a good thing, an overdose of it is another story entirely. If sitting for a test gets you so stressed out that your mind goes blank and causes you to miss answers that you know, then your level of test anxiety probably needs some attention. Your teacher, your adviser or a tutor can be useful resources to talk to if you always get extreme test anxiety.

Be prepared. Some students think that going to class is all it should take to learn and do well on tests. But there's much more to learning than just hoping to soak everything up in class. That's why good study habits and skills are so important, and why no amount of cramming or studying the night before a test can take the place of the deeper level of learning that happens over time with regular study.

Watch what you're thinking. If expecting to do well on a test can help you relax, what about when people expect they won't do well? Watch out for any negative messages you might be sending yourself about the test. They can contribute to your anxiety.

If you find yourself thinking negative thoughts ("I'm never any good at taking tests," or "It's going to be terrible if I do badly on this test"), replace them with positive messages. Not unrealistic positive messages, of course, but ones that are practical and true, such as "I've studied hard and I know the material, so I'm ready to do the best I can." (Of course, if you haven't studied, this message won't help!)

Accept mistakes. Another thing you can do is to learn to keep mistakes in perspective, especially if you're a perfectionist or you tend to be hard on yourself. Everyone makes mistakes, and you may have even heard teachers or coaches refer to mistakes as "learning opportunities." Learning to tolerate small failures and mistakes, like that one problem you got wrong in the math pop quiz, is a valuable skill.

Take care of yourself. It can help to learn ways to calm yourself down and get centered when you're tense or anxious. For some people, this might mean learning a simple breathing exercise. Practicing breathing exercises regularly (when you're not stressed out) helps your body see these exercises as a signal to relax.

And, of course, taking care of your health, such as getting enough sleep, exercise, and healthy eats before a test, can help keep your mind working at its best.

Everything takes time and practice, and learning to beat test anxiety is no different. Although it won't go away overnight, facing and dealing with test anxiety will help you learn stress management, which can prove to be a valuable skill in many situations besides taking tests.

Knight Ridder.

For more answers and advice from the health experts of The Nemours Foundation, visit www.MyStudentHealthZone.com.
Knight Ridder.

Many factors contribute to test anxiety and end of semester stress. With finals creeping up, being prepared for the exams, as well as the stress they bring with them, will be a sure-fire way to minimize anxiety.

A true Jack of all trades

KELLEY from page 10

the school home run record is, her teammates and coach understand the significance of setting a career record in only her junior year.

"She might not think it's a big deal, but we all think it is," junior pitcher Jenna Busa says. "She came into this program as a freshman and took charge. She started every game her freshman year. She was very successful right off the bat. It was very exciting for us to see her break the record."

"Any records that have been standing for a while are obviously worth breaking," coach Elaine Sortino says. "It means that we're still getting great players here, because Brandi Cross and Scooter Wheeler were great players in this program. I think it's a sign of how much she's worked on her hitting. She's really come a long way since her freshman year."

Setting a school home run record was nothing new for Kelley. The Rainier, Oregon native set the school record at Rainier High School with 20 career home runs.

Establishing the home run record only highlighted an incredible high school career. Kelley was a four-time All-COWAPA League selection and won the league MVP as a senior. Kelley was also a three-time All-State pick and was a finalist for the Wendy's High School Heisman Award. Perhaps Kelley's most amazing feat in high school was becoming the first athlete ever to win three COWAPA League MVP awards in one year, as she won the award for basketball and volleyball as well.

Obviously with such an illustrious high school career Kelley was a highly touted recruit, and Sortino knew she was exactly the type of player she wanted to build her program around.

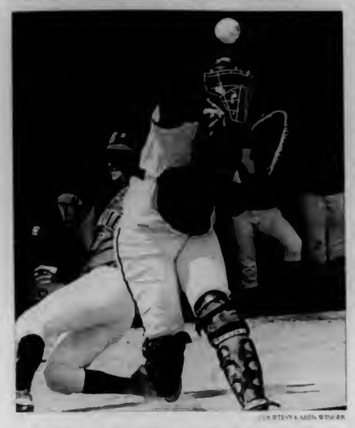
"I thought when we recruited her we recruited a prolific hitter," Sortino says. "I met with her on July 1, the first time we can have off-campus contact. I was one of several coaches that talked to her that day. She liked me and I liked her and that was about it."

When Kelley arrived at UMass Sortino played her at third base. Kelley manned the hot corner for her first two years, but after catcher Jamie Cahalan graduated, Sortino knew she would need to find a new catcher this year.

Knowing she would need a strong leader behind the plate, Sortino decided to move Kelley to catcher, even though she had never played the position. While Kelley says the change was an adjustment, she has played like a seasoned veteran behind the dish.

"It's a big difference," Kelley says. "I haven't really been a catcher on a team so it's been a change. But I've taken the responsibility and I'm making the best of it. The team has confidence in me, so that makes me more confident. I like being in control."

Sortino has been impressed with how smoothly Kelley has made the transition.



"There aren't too many people running on her," Sortino says. "She has an arm like a cannon. It's nice to have that defensively. She does a good job giving us information about how pitchers are going. She's the only player that everybody on the team looks at. It's a strong leadership position, and she fits that role pretty well."

One of the biggest jobs Kelley has as a catcher is to handle the pitching staff, and she has done an excellent job at that, as UMass is second in the A-10 in pitching (2.44 ERA).

"I love having KJ behind the plate," Busa says. It's very different having her behind the plate than having Jamie. Jamie was two years older so I didn't feel as comfortable as I do now throwing to KJ. We're the same class and we know each other better. She knows what works for me and I know what works for her. We have a very good relationship, and I'm very confident in her behind the plate."

It's already been a big year for Kelley, as she's broken the home run record and made the seamless transition to catcher, but now that she has that out of the way her focus will be on getting the Minutewomen to the postseason.

UMass has made 10 straight trips to the NCAA Tournament, and with Kelley leading this year's team, there's a good chance this year's team will make it 11 in a row.

KJ Kelley goes to throw out a runner during the Minutewomen's game against NC State last weekend. Kelley used to play third base for UM.

Track teams finish in fourth

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Four was the magic number as both the men's and women's track and field teams finished fourth in the UConn Select Invitational this weekend. The meets consisted of a mix of individual records and team effort.

The women's competition was given a jump-start by freshman pole-vaulter Kristen Bakanowski, who not only placed second overall, but also recorded the second best vault in UMass history. Bakanowski also qualified to compete in the ECAC Championship after recording a mark of 3.66 meters and was honored as the Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Week for her contributions.

Other production came from junior Christina Huff, who placed second overall in the 100-meter dash, with a time of 12.68. In the 200-meter dash, Huff recorded a time of 25.70, which was good for fourth place.

The long distance category was lead by a first-year runner, freshman Christina Derosa, who finished second in the 5,000 meter run with a time of 17:55.48. A veteran countered Derosa's mark, as senior Alexis Anzelone gave the Minutewomen an edge with her fourth place finish in the 3,000 meter steeplechase.

After amassing 61.5 points throughout the day, the Maroon and White finished behind four teams, UConn, Brown, Rhode Island and Albany, with URI and Albany tying for third place.

While some will be participating in the Penn Relays this Thursday and Friday, the team as a whole gets back into action on Saturday in a rematch against UConn.

On the men's side, junior Chris Brayley was a contributing factor as the men beat out Central Connecticut and Quinnipiac for fourth place. Brayley placed second in the 100 meter dash, with a time of 11.23. Another second place finish came from senior Henry Smith, who gave the team eight points with a mark of 14.27 meters.

Javelin thrower, senior Mike Carr, recorded the only first place finish for the Minutemen, with a throw of 57.23 meters. In a day that featured a combination of rookies and veterans, freshman Nathan Barksdale placed third in the 400 meter dash, junior Steve Miceli placed fourth in the 200 meter dash, with a time of 22.99.

The men will take part in the Husky Invitational this Saturday before heading to Richmond, Virginia for the Atlantic 10 Championships on May 7.

This season has been up and down to the Minutemen as they came in sixth place at the Brown Invitational on Apr. 16 and finished seventh out of 36 at the New England Championship on Feb. 26.

UMass gets two in NFL

FREE AGENTS from page 10

Cowboys and Buffalo Bills, will be fighting for a spot on a roster that traditionally only holds two fullbacks, though the Bengals have two others signed right now in Jeremi Johnson and Doug Easlick.

"He's real happy about the situation," Peebler said of his former teammate. "They have one fullback that is a starter (Johnson) and one other one they brought in in January (Easlick). I know they only keep two fullbacks on the roster so I know he is going to be fighting for that second spot. I think he's in a good situation. It just depends on how he goes in and handles it."

Both players left UMass last semester to train for the NFL and a chance to earn this opportunity, a decision Brown fully supported.

"The reality is those guys really wanted to chase their dream, and you've got to get after it at 100 percent," Brown said. "If things don't work out, they can always come back and finish their degree. I'd rather have them do it that way than [not focus on] school and have them finish it that way."

Peebler concluded his career with the Maroon and White as one of the best wideouts to ever step on a UMass football field. He finished his collegiate career with the second most receiving yards in school history (2,395), second most receiving touchdowns (27), second highest career per-catch average (19.4) and third most career receptions (123).

Rich Demers, a former fullback for UMass was picked up as a free agent by the Cincinnati Bengals. Demers had 13 touchdowns for UM.

Former UMass wide receiver Jason Peebler was picked up as a free agent by the Philadelphia Eagles. Peebler had 27 touchdowns for UMass.

"I can bring explosiveness, but I'm also a little bit of a bigger receiver, not height-wise but weight-wise, so I feel that I can come across the middle and take some hits from the linebackers without it really phasing me," Peebler said. "I can go deep. I can go up and get balls.

"Pretty much, I'm just really trying to fit in on the special teams area. That is my ticket to get on the field is the special teams area so I'm just going to do everything I can to get into that area as well."

Demers played in two seasons with the Minutemen after transferring from UMass Lowell, which dropped its program. He rushed for 846 yards and caught 47 passes for 350 yards in his two years. Demers also scored 13 total touchdowns during his time at UMass.

"Those two guys have worked their tails off, and I know it's a dream come true," Brown said. "I'm just happy, obviously, it's kind of a culmination of a four-year period. Not too many guys get to make that next jump. They have an opportunity, and I know they'll make the best of it."

Be Scene.
Thursday, April 28
Library Lawn
Good food, good music, good fun.
ALL FREE!

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or job concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problem?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course!)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
523 Campus Center
Office hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0867
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Greek Week 2005 Presents
Aaron Karo
Comedian and Author
Sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Amherst Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council

Open To All Students Performing At
The Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
On The Date Of
April 27, 2005
At The Time Of
9:00 PM
Ticket Price
$ 5.00 At FAC Box Office
General Admission
www.AaronKaro.com
Join The Over 40,000 People On His Mailing List

Ready for the long haul

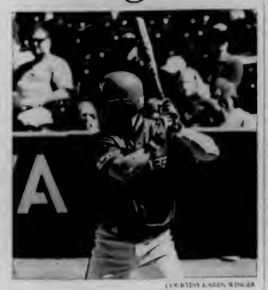
By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team has a busy week ahead of it with six games in six days.

The first contest will be today against Quinnipiac at 3 p.m. in Hamden, Conn. Then on Wednesday, the Minutemen travel to Chestnut Hill to play Boston College in a rematch of last week's Beanpot Classic consolation. After the two road games, they return to Amherst for a make-up game with Scared Heart on Thursday before their three game series on the weekend with St. Bonaventure.

"The traveling doesn't concern me," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I look at the pitching performance that concerns me more than [traveling]. The people in the pack of pitchers need to step up and give us some solid pitching performances. We are just looking for quality innings out of the pitchers."

The UMass team earn run average (ERA) is 5.75 opposed to its opponent's overall ERA of 2.68. Junior right-handed starter Matt Torra and junior reliever David Sullivan are the only pitchers with ERAs under four.



The UMass offense has improved over the last two weeks, posting its first convincing win of the season with 13-1 victory over Fordham. However, the Rams took over two of three games in the weekend series.

Senior right fielder Jason Twomley continues to lead the Maroon and White in several major offensive categories. The left-handed slugger leads the team in batting average (.392), runs (28), hits (31), runs batted in (21), total bases (69), slugging percentage (.873), on-base percentage (.529) and home runs (11).

With Twomley leading the way, other players are starting to find their stride. Sophomore Bryan Adamski had back-to-back weekends with homers. Two weekends ago against Saint Joseph's, Adamski hit his first career homerun and followed that up with his first career grand slam this past weekend in White Plains, N.Y. against Fordham.

Right-handed pitcher Jason Lavorgna is 0-2 on the season and has posted a 5.62 ERA for UMass.

Senior outfielder Jason Twomley leads the Minutemen in home runs (11) and average (.392).

"I think we are making progress towards everyone hitting the ball a lot better," Stone said. "Twomley has been impressive. There is no question he has been solid. Other people during the first game on Saturday stepped up in the clutch and we need more of that, but this weekend was better offensively."

As the team starts to collect more runs, it will need to find a replacement for their junior center fielder and No. 2 hitter Derrick Durepo. The Ware native has suffered a hamstring injury that will likely sideline him for the remainder of the season.

"I think he's going to be out for the season," Stone said. "I'd be surprised if he came back. He gutted it out, did as much as he could and played through as much pain as he could. He's probably needs to rest it for three weeks to a month. It'd be a bonus if he could come back and play, but I doubt that will happen."

Quinnipiac (15-14, 10-4 Northeast) has won 10 out of their last 11 games. Junior third baseman Bryan Sabatella was named Northeast Conference Player of the Week for April 25 after hitting an impressive .812 (13-for-16). The NEC triple-crown candidate is 32 in his last 46 at bats, which is a .696 BA. He also has posted four homeruns and 17 RBIs in his last 12 games.

"With a kid like [Sabatella], you can't let him beat you. If there is an opportunity to pitch around him or walk him, we'll do that. You just can't let guys like that beat you," Stone said.

Thursday's match-up against B.C. (26-14, 11-5 Big East) will be the second time these two teams have meet over the course of a week. During Thursday's game at Fenway Park, Eagles right fielder Jason Delaney launched a game-winning two-run homer over the Green Monster to give the Maroon and Gold an 8-6 win and third place in the Beanpot Classic.

B.C. starter Nick Asselin pitched five hitless innings before giving up a single to sophomore second baseman Anthony Santos.

UMass gears up for Harvard

MEN'S LACROSSE from page 10

the game to be closer than it looked on paper.

"I was at the Brown game they weren't really destroyed, it was a good game," Cannella said. "It was snowing that night, it was so cold I couldn't write, so imagine how hard it was for those guys holding sticks."

The Crimson have a very tight offensive front, with 11 players currently in the scoring column. Leading the way for Harvard has been the play of Brooks School, who has 16 goals (a team high) and three assists.

Zach Widbin, Jake Samuelson, and Evan Colbert have also been big for the Crimson. The three have combined for 26 goals on the year.

"I think they are an attacking group, I think they attack the cage." Cannella said. "They have the horses to do it so you have to watch them, they aren't holding the ball back."

The Crimson have also received a boost from its freshman keeper, Evan O'Donnell. O'Donnell has started every game this year for Harvard and has 99 saves, with a respectable 8.48 GAA (goals against average).

O'Donnell had a stellar performance against the Bulldogs, where he had a season-high 13 saves.

Cannella sees O'Donnell as another example of excellent recruiting which the Crimson have done over the past few seasons. He also sees that this younger group is more comfortable at home at Jordan Field, where they are 4-1 on the season.

"They have a really good team. They've had a great couple of recruiting classes that have been great for them." Cannella said. "They play a lot of young guys and are very talented on both sides of the ball. I'm sure they are really comfortable at home."

If the Minutemen pull out the victory today, they will win their 20th New England title. UMass is set up for the championship after defeating Yale, Brown, and Sacred Heart in NEILA play.

NOTES: UMass coach Greg Cannella was named the US Lacrosse Coach of the Week after the Minutemen's 13-12 victory over Georgetown on Saturday... Sean Morris, the leading scorer of the Minutemen and in the ECAC (47 points), is one of the 16 finalists for the Tewaaraton Award, the top honor in college lacrosse.

Brett Garber has 10 goals and seven assists on the season for the Minutemen. UMass takes on Harvard today for a 3 p.m. face-off.

Minutewomen set for Crimson

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts softball team will play eight of its final 10 games at home, beginning today with a doubleheader against Harvard at 3 p.m.

In recent years, this many home games would almost certainly translate into a dominant finish to the season for UMass. But things have been different this year for the Minutewomen at home.

UMass (24-24-1 9-3 Atlantic 10) entered the season with 72 consecutive regular season home wins, but has lost three games at the UMass Softball Complex this season, including both games of a doubleheader against North Carolina State on Sunday.

UMass has still been strong at home this year, posting a 10-3-1 record, so the slate of home games to close the regular season should put the Minutewomen in a good position for the A-10 Tournament.

Over the final two weeks of the season, the main objective for UMass will be to lock up the No. 2 seed in the A-10 Tournament. Fordham has a stranglehold on the top spot, as the Rams are undefeated in A-10 play, with only four conference games remaining. Fordham swept the Minutewomen in a doubleheader earlier this year, and therefore holds the tiebreaker over them.

Pam Sulick has a home run and nine doubles this year for UMass. Sulick is also batting .284.

"Our goal is to keep getting better for the tournament," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "We've been a front-runner in the tourney for years. We're in a different position this year, but all that matters is how you play those three days."

With a sweep on Friday at St. Bonaventure, UMass pulled to within a game of the second place Bonnies. Before returning to conference play on Friday with a doubleheader against LaSalle, UMass will face Harvard today, and Connecticut tomorrow in a single game.

UMass will look to put an end to its two-game slide today against Harvard (15-15 6-2 Ivy League), a team it has dominated in the past, leading the all-time series 15-0.

On the mound today for UMass will be Barb LaFogg and Jenna Busa. LaFogg has anchored the rotation all year, starting 22 games. LaFogg has 15-9 record with a 2.14 ERA, while her 169 strikeouts are 38 more than any other A-10 pitcher.

Busa has also been strong on the mound, sporting a 9-5 record to go along with a 2.56 ERA and 94 punch-outs.

A big factor for UMass down the stretch will be the health of shortstop Hilary Puglia. Puglia left the second game against NC State when she injured her shoulder diving for a ball in the hole. Puglia is day-to-day with a separated shoulder, and Sortino does not expect her to play today.

"It's better for us to save her," Sortino said. "We have two conference games Friday that are important. Obviously this will cause us to shift the batting order around, but when things go wrong is when a great team steps up."

The injury comes at an unfortunate time for Puglia as she was having a big weekend. Puglia went 3-for-7, with live RBIs and three runs in the two games against St. Bonaventure on Friday. Puglia hit two home runs in the games, bringing her season total to eight, one behind team leader KJ Kelley.

Puglia has been steady all year at the top of the order for the Minutewomen, as she leads the team in runs, hits, doubles, total bases and is tied for the lead in RBIs. While Stacy Cullington is capable of filling in for Puglia, UMass will need the reigning A-10 Player of the Year healthy in order to make a run in the postseason.

A culture of success at UMass

CREW from page 10

Part of the demand is the early morning regiment that the women must go through. Every weekday morning that the Minutewomen train, they meet under the Calvin Coolidge Bridge anywhere from five to six o'clock in the morning and go.

There they meet, sometimes before the sun rises, and share the water with Amherst College and other schools in the area. After practice the team gets breakfast together, goes to school, and gets ready to do it all over again.

"It is a crazy culture under that bridge," Dietz said. "You look and can see dozens of kids rowing for their schools. We get Amherst, Smith, just a bunch of colleges in the area."

Most east coast schools are forced to practice in the early morning because it is the only time the water is calm enough to effectively train. UMass, however, is not in this situation as the Coolidge Bridge stands over some of the calmest water on the east coast.

The Minutewomen are forced to do this because the University does not set aside blocks of time for athletic training as other schools do, most noticeably in the Ivy League. Each day these schools are allotted a few hours in the afternoon to train, whereas UMass does not.

"A lot of those schools (Ivy League) have time during the day to work out and train," Dietz said. "I'm sure the Chancellor could do something about this, I know that professors have control over when their classes are."

Although crew is not typically a sport in the limelight, there is a definitive subculture that spans much further than the Pioneer Valley. Throughout the A-10 there are schools with underfunded programs, filled with athletes that are looking for the next step, the next challenge.

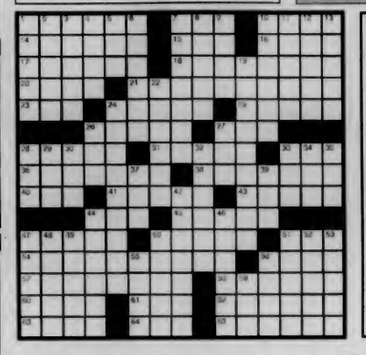
"I think we are all on the same level in the A-10," Dietz said. "Obviously there are schools that have more money, but throughout my time here the conference had been pretty even."

Even with this even playing field, the Minutewomen have shown that the A-10 is their conference. Perhaps it's the coach who pushes his team through the mist of frosty Western Massachusetts mornings, or maybe its the tradition that fuels the program.

Either way there is a culture of winning at UMass, one that goes deeper than the waters its team dominates.

Resumé EXPRESS
Wednesday, April 27
TOMORROW!
10 am - 3 pm
in front of Goodell
Bring your resume for a quick critique
Get an employer's perspective on your experience
Representatives from a wide variety of industries
Also plan to stop in at the Career Services OPEN HOUSE on 4/27 in 511 Goodell
phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building

Regency Hair Stylists
Spring Essentials
1. Foil Highlights √
2. 5 Tanning Visits √
3. All for $75.00 √
Call for an appointment or stop by the salon
253-9526
189 North Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01002



Quote of the Day

"Not a shred of evidence exists in favor of the idea that life is serious."

—Brendan Gill

ACROSS
1 William Inge play
7 Lo-la lead-in 10 Gent
14 Forward flow
15 Ewe's mate
16 Nevada city
17 Danish seaport
18 Green gems
20 Untruths
21 Ecstatic states
23 Maple drippings
24 Urges
25 Shut
26 Faithful
27 ___ out (scrape by)
28 Desert stopovers
31 Rule
33 Shell-game sphere
36 Spanish celebrations
38 Lear and Mailer
40 New Deal pros
41 Iron
43 Joyce Carol
44 Drunkard
45 Heavy strong rope
47 Blemish
50 Pertaining to punishment
51 Sweetie
54 Office basket
56 Secure
57 Sassy
58 Light
60 Barest sound
61 Summer cooler
62 In agreement
63 Sea eagles
64 Old salt
65 Me-ine rebellion
DOWN
1 Lotto in Great Britain
2 Pakistan's neighbor
3 Scuzzball
4 Convent group
5 NASA's orbiting outpost
6 Strong red shade
7 Foot-operated lever
8 Sloping walkway
9 Iowa State location
10 Infant's bed
11 Sun prefix
12 Aconcagua's range
13 Sheriff's band
19 Kingdom of Elvis
22 Husky-voiced
24 Put on
26 Guitarist Paul
27 Self-esteem
28 Switch position
29 Assistance
30 Sun homily
32 Deranged
33 Basketball coach Riley
34 Wind dir.
35 Blockhead
37 Carney or Linkletter
39 West of Hollywood
42 Symbol of sovereignty
44 At dominoes' exercises
46 Malleable metal
47 Filch
48 Domesticator
49 Forest quaker
50 Bamboo lover
51 Hispaniola republic
52 Frequently
53 Destitutes
55 Dog collection
56 Agitated state
58 Plains antelope
Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

The school year is almost over...
But there is still time to submit a comic!
Send your work to Aly
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
Spring is Here!
Come in and get the attention you want!
•Free haircolor consultations
•We specialize in Multi-Color Highlighting and eyebrow shaping
•Facial and Body waxing
Walk-ins Welcome
253-1200
Mon-Fri 10-6 40 Main St
Sat 10-4 Downtown Amherst
We do not accept checks
$2 OFF BLOWOUT
1/2 PRICE HAIRCUT
With this COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You still have to tell your friend your secret.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Today you're going to hear something really funny on the news.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
The longer you stare at something, the more aggravating it gets.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today you and your friends will have plenty to gossip about.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Remember to keep PDAs to a minimum. Don't let your raging hormones get carried away.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Today you will encounter a few minor setbacks, but everything will be ok.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Today you will get a second wind when you least expect it.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Some people can really get you going. Just take it with a grain of salt.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
If you're hungry, just get something to eat. You'll be grumpy, otherwise.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Just try to keep your stress levels under control.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Your collection of sandwiches has been dwindling lately.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Yes, you will have to go to the library today, and no, it will not be fun.

$$$ Build your business with our business. Place your ad here, in The Collegian. $$$

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0620

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@comcast.com

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Htwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Wisher/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Holyoke 5 1/2 spacious rooms great Location $800 includes heat Joanne 538-8994

1 Bedroom w/in 2 bedroom condo in North Amherst. Clean, Washer/dryer in condo $425 includes heat & electric. Summer rentals considered. On bus route, 1 mile to UMass, female student preferred. Call Liz 508-367-8993.

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstincolorealty.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

1993 Nissan Maxima SE V6, 5 speed stick, loaded, $1500 Elainew@echo.umass.edu

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Smart. Fun. Motivated. Entertaining. (But enough about us.) EATS Magazine needs 2 bright, persuasive, entrepreneurial individuals to head up sales for our UMASS Off Campus Guide. – UMass Alum Dave Stoff is looking for several motivated sales reps, to work to build new relationships with many of Amherst's most popular establishments. There will be a HIGH- incentive commission structure for those selected…and lots of free food. Send a cover letter to info@eatsmagazine.com telling us why you are the perfect candidate!

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 o $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Day camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

Direct Sales Consultants Needed Call Heather 863-4119

EMPLOYMENT

ACTIVISM Summer Jobs for the Environment $3,000 - $5,000 / Summer *Stop global warming *Protect the environment Make a difference Career opportunities. Call Chris 413-256-6443

Moving: Local moving company looking to sell motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Spring Break 2006 with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator. Hiring Campus reps. Call for group discounts. Info/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

MARKETING/SALES- Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPrinting.com - Call Dan 413-682-0020

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER ADVERTISING INTERNSHIP Excellent Advertising Sales and Marketing opportunity. Earn $3,000-$5,000 and gain valuable business EXPERIENCE developing the UMASS Official Campus Telephone Directory. GREAT RESUME BOOSTER! Call Jen at College Directory Publishing, Inc. 1-800-466-2221 ext.724 www.campus-directory.com

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe' 60 Masonic St. Northampton

Administrative Assistant for Teen-Bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until Late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call: 800-344-6132 Student Housing Program, Conway, MA

HOUSE FOR RENT

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 bedroom Newer home Laundry Hookups. Large yard 549-4270

HOUSE FOR RENT

Sunny, Single Family House. 4 bedrooms, Amherst Center, On bus route. Wisher/Dryer hookups, dishwasher, 1 1/2 bath. Avail. July 1st Call 587-9574

House Hadley- Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

INSTRUCTION

University Part-ending classes start soon! 1-800-U4-Class www.universitypartending.com sign up now!!!

ROOMMATE WANTED

Need two roommates! An apartment in 85 Puffton. Please contact Pete immediately at 978-808-3683

Roommate Wanted in House, $325 Call 413-687-4976

SERVICES

Purchasing a used car? Having your car repaired? Do you know your legal rights? Contact the Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center, 545-1695

Legally stop collection agencies 508-414-2012

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst, 548-9092.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

SUBLET

Room available June 16th Aug 31st in Amherst Center. Call North 413-687-2365

Puffton Village Summer Sublet 2 bedroom Call 978 500-1961

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

COUNTDOWN TO SYRACUSE: 4 Days

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass gets set for Harvard

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After its biggest win of the season, a 13-12 victory over then-No. 3 Georgetown on Saturday, the No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (9-2 4-1 ECAC) will face two enemies today when it travels to Cambridge to face Harvard.

The Crimson and itself.

UMass coach Greg Cannella, who has been harping on the importance of every game this season, is concerned that many are looking past Harvard (5-5 2-3 Ivy League) after such an impressive win.

"We talked to them yesterday (Sunday) about that and we'll talk about it at practice. We'll talk about it until the game is over," Cannella said. "As good a win as it was this weekend, Harvard doesn't care, they had a big win of their own, they're carrying a lot of confidence. Winning on Saturday isn't going to make it easier tomorrow."

With its victory over Harvard, UMass moved into sole possession of first place in the ECAC. The Minutemen can take home the conference crown if they can defeat ECAC rival Rutgers on May 7.

Similar to the Minutemen, the Crimson are coming off a huge victory this past weekend. Harvard dominated then-No. 16 Yale 11-4 at home, in a game, which the Crimson controlled from start to finish. Harvard allowed two goals in the first quarter, but held the Bulldogs scoreless, until they put up another two in the fourth.

"It's a big game for both teams. It's another opportunity to prove ourselves as a team. Mentally and physically it's going to be hard on us," Cannella said. "We have to travel to play a good team coming off a great win."

The win broke a four-game losing streak for Harvard, who lost to Denver (9-8 on April 2), Cornell (16-6 on April 9), Brown (12-3 on April 12), and Princeton (12-4 on April 16). Previous to the streak, the Crimson won four out of its first five games.

Both UMass and Harvard played Brown, yet the Minutemen thumped the Bears 12-5 at home. Cannella, who went to Harvard's game against Brown, saw

See MEN'S LACROSSE on page 8

COURTESY KARIN WINCER

Sean Morris winds up for a shot against the Georgetown Hoyas on Saturday afternoon. The Minutemen won the game 13-12 and moved into sole possession of first place in the ECAC. UMass faces Harvard today at 3 p.m.

Peebler and Demers sign as free agents

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Two former players on the Massachusetts football team signed NFL free agent contracts yesterday, a day after the NFL Draft concluded in New York City.

Wide receiver Jason Peebler signed on with the NFC Champion Philadelphia Eagles, and fullback Rich Demers signed with the Cincinnati Bengals. Both players concluded their senior seasons last fall, when the Minutemen finished 6-5.

Peebler may be in the more ideal situation, as he is entering a team with serious questions in terms of their wide receivers.

Terrell Owens is in the middle of a contract war with the front office, and Freddie Mitchell's status with the team is uncertain due to his continuous acts of self-promotion during last year's playoff run. The Eagles also only selected one wideout in the draft, taking Reggie Brown from Georgia in the second round with the 35th overall pick.

"That's why I chose to go there," Peebler said. "You come out as a free agent, and you've got a couple options. I went and looked at the depth charts and looked at who they brought in, and I think this is the best fit for me.

"It's pretty much a dream come true. You've got to look at it from a business standpoint, though. I've got to go out there and not drop a ball and just take care of business."

If Owens does solve his contract issues — he wants an extension and more money — Peebler is excited to be able to work with someone he used to cheer for. Growing up in California, he was a San Francisco 49ers fan, where Owens began his NFL career, and idolized Jerry Rice.

"I think I can learn a lot from [Owens]," Peebler said. "He's been in the league for 10 years. I think he can be a real good teacher, not necessarily teaching me stuff visually, just watching things he's done and things he's learned to hopefully pick up on some stuff."

Peebler received a good amount of attention from several NFL teams, and he was listed as high as a sixth-round pick on some draft boards around the league. He had an extensive interview with the New York Giants, worked out in Santa Clara with the San Francisco 49ers and also talked with the New England Patriots.

"I pretty much knew that I would have a home when the draft ended," Peebler said. "[The draft] is good because everyone sees that you get drafted, but in the long run, I think this is the best situation for me."

Ironically, he spent most of his time in the offseason working out in Philadelphia, and he attended the Eagles' Super Bowl rallies in February.

Demers, who also received interest from the Dallas

See FREE AGENTS on page 7

Purely powerful

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

On a team loaded with as much talent as the Massachusetts softball team, it's hard to pick just one player that stands out.

There's Hilary Puglia, last year's Atlantic 10 Player of the Year, a smooth fielding shortstop and consistent contributor at the plate. There's Candice Molinari, UMass' version of Ichiro, who slaps the ball all over the field and uses her blazing speed to be one of the best base stealers in the country.

Then there's Lauren Proctor, the freshman outfielder who has stepped right into the lineup and has led the A-10 in batting most of the year. And of course there is the dynamic pitching duo of Barb LaFogg and Jenna Busa who consistently shut down opposing offenses.

But even with all of this talent, in softball it is often the player that wows the crowd with the long ball that stands out the most. And for the past three years KJ Kelley has been the one delivering tape-measure home runs for the Minutewomen.

The junior catcher hits for average and plays flawless defense, but it is the home runs she is capable of hitting that causes the buzz around the UMass Softball Complex every time she steps to the plate.

Kelley, an All-Conference selection in each of her first two years, has been consistently putting up big power numbers since she arrived at Amherst. Kelley hit eight homers in her freshman season and followed that with a single season school-record 13 homers last year.

With 21 home runs in her career, it appeared that Kelley would break the career record of 26 in no time this year. And Kelley got off to a hot start, hitting four dingers in the first month of the season to put her within one of tying the record.

But Kelley was stuck on the doorstep of the record from March 6 until coming to the plate in the third inning of a home game against George Washington on April 9. Kelley stepped up to bat and smashed a mammoth homer over the scoreboard in left field to tie the mark set by Scooter Wheeler (in 2002) and Brandi Cross (in 2003).

While it took Kelley over a month to tie the record, it took her only one game to break it. In UMass' next game at UConn, Kelley went deep twice to put the old record in her rear view mirror. Kelley has since gone on to hit two more home runs to bring her career total to 30 and her season total to a team-leading nine.

What has been most impressive about Kelley's pursuit of the record is that she really hasn't pursued it. She doesn't try to hit home runs. It's just that her swing and power tend to generate deep drives, and she's happy with the results as long as she's getting hits.

"I could care less if it's a home run or a base hit," Kelley says. "As long as it's a hit and it helps our team, that's all that matters."

This attitude certainly helped Kelley as she got closer to the record, and the home runs stopped for a while.

"I really don't think too much about droughts of hitting home runs," Kelley says. "I think more about droughts with getting hits. Of course it (the record) was in the back of my head because everyone brings it up, but it wasn't one of my main focuses. My goal was more to push the team. I really don't think much of it. It feels good to break it, but I just try to get hits. It's just a bonus."

While Kelley's modesty doesn't reflect how big of a milestone

See KELLEY on page 7

COURTESY KAREN WINCER

Junior catcher KJ Kelley broke the school record for home runs (26) this year. Kelley broke the single season record (13) last year.

A tradition of winning

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Crew is a culture for some, one that requires a collective strength, mixed with a tremendous time investment. At the University of Massachusetts, this same culture exists, except there is an added bonus, this culture includes winning.

On Saturday afternoon, in Cooper River at Pennsauken, NJ, the Massachusetts women's crew team accomplished a feat that no other university has done in Atlantic 10 history; it won its 10th straight conference championship.

After winning both the Varsity 4 and the Varsity 8 races, the Maroon and White knew it had clinched the title. However, there was nothing easy about this race, as the Minutewomen saw the Dayton Flyers take them to the wire, winning two races, both Lightweight events.

UMass finished the afternoon with 45 total points while the Flyers tallied 39, good for second place.

Minutewomen coach Jim Dietz was confident about his team's chances to win the A-10 championship after winning the Knecht Cup on April 17. Dietz, however, was taken back by Dayton's talent and mentioned that he was "relieved" when it was all said and done.

"We made up these t-shirts," Dietz said while pointing at a box of A-10 Championship shirts. "When we were going into the last few races, and Dayton was in the lead, I was hoping that we left them on the bus."

Dietz was named the A-10 Coach of the Year award for the seventh time during his tenure. Dietz, who is in his 12th year as UMass' head coach, has turned the Minutewomen into one of the preeminent squads in the nation, while dealing with an underfunded program.

This is where the culture of crew meets well-coached athleticism.

Throughout his tenure, Dietz has never had an abundance of scholarships, yet he has consistently put together the best team in the A-10 conference. Every year, nearly 70 women go out for the team, looking for a sport and a shot at being a Division 1 athlete.

They come in and soon find out that crew is not just another sport at UMass, its hard work, running, and a slew of physical demands that quickly separate the contenders from the pretenders.

"We get a lot of girls that are great athletes in high school and want to take their talents to the next level," Dietz said. "We get basketball players and soccer players, but after the first few practices we find out who really wants to be a part of this team."

See CREW on page

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Members of the UMass crew team poses for a picture after it won its 10th straight Atlantic 10 championship on Saturday. The Minutewomen beat out the Dayton Flyers by six points on the afternoon.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, April 27, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 125

Glaciologist speaks on climate change

By Ashish K. Saiu
Collegian Staff

Internationally recognized glaciologist Lonnie Thompson from Ohio State University spoke at the University of Massachusetts about Rapid Climate Change with Earth Systems, past, present and future.

The talk was held at the Bernie Lecture at the Goodell Building on April 25, 2005 organized by The Environmental Institute at UMass.

Dr. Thompson who was recently awarded the Tyler Prize for environmental achievement, an award regarded by some in the field as equivalent to a Nobel Prize, spoke about the importance of glaciers for the tropics.

He has written more than 200 scientific articles and his projects have been in collaboration with 15 countries. He has led nearly 80 expeditions to recover ice cores from the Peruvian Andes, China, Pamir and Tien Shan of the former USSR, Mt. Kenya, Africa, Franz Josef Land, Russia, Bolivia, Greenland and Antarctica.

Ice cores are circular blocks of ice that are obtained by drilling deep into the glacier. The ice core is later transported to the laboratory for analysis.

From the ice cores one can obtain information on temperature, humidity, vegetation changes, volcanic history, microorganisms, dustiness, and anthropogenic emissions. He spoke about the extensive infrastructure required to store these ice cores and how it revealed information dating back to B.C's.

Dr. Thompson showed pictures of Quelccaya Ice Cap, the largest tropical ice cap on earth, which lies in Peru and how this ice cap had retreated since 1977.

The ice core obtained from Peru was dated back to 200 B.C. From the analysis of this ice core which the present technologies one could see anions like chloride actually increased in that region during the years 1780 and 1350 A.D. The reasons for increase cannot be estimated because of lack of data. Also, a well-preserved insect was found, all the right shape and features, which dated back to a range of 1640 to 540 years old.

Some of the interesting features included pictures from Mount Kilimanjaro, Africa where he showed pictures of a glacial ice cap that had retreated from 12 square kilometers in 1910 to 2 square kilometers in the year 2000.

Seventy percent of the worlds population lives in the region of 30 degrees North and 30 degrees South latitude. It is in this region that 80 percent of the worlds agriculture takes place and 20 percent world's births originated in the twenty-first century and so it is important to study how glaciers effect these areas. "Temperature profile makes tropics unusual," said Dr. Thompson.

Glaciers are a valuable paleo-climate archive which is being lost, which also threatens the world's water reserves as sources of rivers stem from these glaciers. Crops, irrigation, municipal waters and hydroelectric all depend on these glaciers. It also has an impact on tourism. Mount Kilimanjaro itself gets about 25,000 visitors every year.

COURTESY UMASS PHOTO

Dr. Lonnie Thompson.

Three men arrested in armed robbery

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Three Amherst citizens have been apprehended in conjunction with an armed robbery that took place Sunday morning in Van Meter Dormitory.

Lt. Thrasher from the UMPD said that the arrests were made "because of a couple of things — good police work and video communication."

Seventeen-year-old Christopher Brooks of 51 Valley View Dr. in Amherst was apprehended yesterday morning on charges of assault in a dormitory while armed and armed robbery. Two other suspects were apprehended last night, however, their identities have not been released, although Thrasher said that they are believed to be "in their twenties."

The three suspects, all of whom are not UMass students, allegedly entered Van Meter at 4:30 a.m. Sunday morning and "ransacked the victim's room," Thrasher said.

Incidentally, a fire alarm sounded just as the suspects threatened the victim, and the suspects exited the building, but not before security cameras captured their identities.

"[The fire alarm] was unrelated — it was dumb luck," Thasher said.

Although Lt. Thrasher could not comment on the motive for the crime, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano said that he thinks, "that it is over drugs."

Both Lt. Thrasher and Gargano admitted that the once controversial cameras installed last summer helped tremendously in the investigation efforts.

"The truth of the matter is, is that the cameras really do help solve significant crimes on campus," Gargano said, " I don't think that we would have been able to apprehend [the suspects] without the cameras."

According to the UMass News Director Ed Blagezeuski, it was the distribution of the incriminating footage that led to the warrants. "The pictures were distributed in a number of ways," Blagezeuski said, "the cameras were helpful."

Last summer the cameras were installed without the permission of the Student Government Association, who collectively opposed the installation, citing that they were an invasion of privacy, however, Gargano disagrees.

"The same kind of activity has occurred in Southwest and without the cameras we wouldn't be able to get the true identity of the issue — it is helpful with all thefts," Gargano said.

Cameras are installed in all of the dormitory buildings in both the front and the back entrances, and according to Thrasher, the timing of the suspects entering and leaving the building coincides with the time the incident took place.

The victim, whose name has not been released, is not suffering any physical harm, however, "he is suffering emotional harm — he had a gun to his head and a pillow case over his head," Thrasher said.

"Both Gargano and Thrasher said that the suspects entered the building because of "tailgating," a frequently used method of letting strangers into the dorms.

"Students just see someone waiting to get in and they open the door for them," Gargano said. "Students need take high levels of precaution everyday."

The two subjects who have not yet been identified will be arraigned in court this morning. For more information on the incident, UMPD urges you to contact them at 545-2121.

COURTESY UMASS PHOTO

Van Meter Hall sits on the top of the hill in the Central living area. Three suspects have been apprehended for robbing a room at gunpoint.

Students turning to poker for income

By Jill Bergeron
Collegian Correspondent

Some UMass students are discovering a way to earn money without performing any labor: poker.

Some students say that gambling earnings have become their newest source of income.

By gathering with fellow poker players, sometimes on campus, frequenting online poker Web sites and attending poker tournaments in the New England area, some young adults are winning spending money while attending college.

Accounting senior Mike Albert has found much success in the game.

He said he gets together with his friends to play two or three nights a week.

"I usually make $120-$140 each week," he said. "This is my spending money."

Katrina Shabo, a senior majoring in art, said her "interest is more skill-related. I wanted to be as good as I possibly could at it ... anyone can play a hand of poker here and there, [but] it takes real intellect to beat the game."

After playing three times a week since September, Shabo said she has acquired the talent necessary to win enough money to "get by at school without a job."

Majoring in art, she said, results in many expenses that her poker earnings help to pay.

Freshman finance major Mark Belmarsh said what drew him to play the game initially was "the money," but he and his friends get together an average of four nights a week because "there's not much else to do."

His interest in the game has won him up to $120 in one night, although he's played only since September, he said.

Belmarsh said his main source of income and that of many of his peers is poker.

ANDREW TABLEYNASCH/COLLEGIAN

A student uses the Internet to play poker.

He even sought to have the Undergraduate Leadership Council sponsor a campus tournament in November.

"All of the Undergraduate Leadership Council and probably 50 other people that I didn't even know [were] coming up to me about it," Belmarsh said. He said he approached building supervisors around campus at Boyden, the Student Union, the Dining Commons and the Campus Center, but could not rent any space to hold the tournament.

"None of them liked the idea of the cash prizes and gambling," Belmarsh said. "but some places were just, like, booked up and didn't really have space to hold the tournament."

He also said he could not get a required gambling permit for the event.

"I don't think the school really appreciates gambling too much," he said, "so they were all skeptical about letting us have it here."

While poker brings money to several lucky students, others say it's just as easy to lose it. Accounting junior Glenn Haegle, who said he has been playing poker for about a year, has won up to $200 on several occasions, but at times has "lost a lot ... around $500." What keeps him in the game?

"Addiction," Haegle said.

Senior English major Dan Hillman said he has been playing poker for two years. He and his friends took up the game together, playing cards whenever they were bored.

"I lost a lot of money at first," Hillman said. He said the only way anyone can improve game is by losing money.

"Now I'm playing with my friends about two times a week, winning tournaments and making up to hundreds of dollars," Hillman said.

While some students who play poker are finding they don't need jobs because their earnings can pay for their weekly necessities, the majority seems to understand that after graduation they must enter the work force

Now, in his last semester at college, Hillman said he'll get a job after graduation, but will continue playing poker recreationally.

Fellow senior Albert said, "I will probably stop playing poker after college.

I only play with my friends at night when I have free time. When I'm working I won't have enough time to play.

My income from poker in college will be supplemented by my income from my job when I graduate."

GA toddlers' deaths ruled as drowning

WARRENTON, Ga. (AP) — Autopsies confirmed Tuesday that two toddlers found dead in a sewage pond after disappearing from their home drowned, and the coroner said there appeared to be no sign of foul play.

Jonah Payne, 3, and his 2-year-old sister, Nicole, were reported missing Saturday by their mother, who said they vanished after she went into another room. She said she found the front door open and the children gone.

Their bodies were found Monday in an algae-covered pond a few hundred yards down the road.

Autopsies found no significant injuries to the children's bodies, said Georgia Bureau of Investigation spokesman John Bankhead. Warren County Coroner Paul Lowe said there appeared to be no foul play.

Authorities continued their investigation, reinterviewing family members and neighbors.

"The parents are still very much in shock and mourning," said family spokesman Jaye Jones. "They are only able to speak for a couple minutes at a time before being overcome with tears and sobbing."

Earlier on the day of the youngsters' disappearance, Nicole figured out how to unlock the front door and gate and left with Jonah, police said. A neighbor returned the children a half-hour later.

—Associated Press

ANDREW TABLEYNASCH/COLLEGIAN

Lend your ears ...

Steve Berkowitz, senior vice president of Sony Legacy Recordings, will be giving a lecture titled "Music, Business, Passion, Life" today at Memorial Hall.

Teacher found dead, estranged husband suspected in murder

WOBURN (AP) — A teacher was shot and killed by her estranged husband, who then turned the gun on himself, days after he learned she may have been having an affair with someone she met on the Internet, authorities said Tuesday.

The bodies of Sylvie Desilets, a 31-year-old middle school teacher, and her husband, Ajit Chordia, 33, were discovered Monday evening at a Woburn apartment complex after a downstairs neighbor heard muffled gun shots and called police.

The neighbor, a retired police officer, reported seeing blood dripping from his ceiling about 20 minutes after the shots were fired, Woburn Police Chief Philip Mahoney said.

Desilets had been shot three to four times in the head and torso with a semiautomatic handgun, while Chordia had one apparently self-inflicted gunshot wound to the head, Middlesex District Attorney Martha Coakley said.

Desilets, a native of Sherbrooke, Quebec, and her husband moved from Canada to Woburn three years ago to teach French and Spanish at Daniel Joyce Middle School. Her husband worked for a financial institution in Burlington, but Coakley didn't name the company.

Woburn Superintendent Carl Batchelder called Desilets a dedicated teacher who often stayed late to work with students.

"Sylvie was the kind of teacher that every parent would love to have," he said.

In January 2004, Alyssa Presti, a seventh-grader at the same school, was stabbed to death along with her mother in their Woburn home. Convicted sex offender Michael J. Bizanowicz is awaiting trial on murder charges in a case that prompted lawmakers to push for closer monitoring of sex offenders.

"This is just deja vu," Mahoney said. "These things just rip you apart."

—Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING
BRINGING THE FUNK
Cold Duck Complex raps at Iron Horse this Friday.
PAGE 8

EDITORIAL/OPINION
WARNING FOR HOEDOWN
Recent destruction on campus calls for stricter behaviors at the Hobart Hoedown.
PAGE 6

WEATHER
TODAY Rain, H61°
TONIGHT Showers, L45°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H62°, L39°

SPORTS
CRIMSON GOES DOWN
UMass men's lacrosse downs Harvard yesterday.
PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Matthew Reid
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginia Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Promotions Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Chancellor Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gaccetta
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life. Known as the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Healy
Photo Technician
Andrew Tamulynas
Copy Editor
Peter Foundas
Production Supervisor
Cory Rosenberg
Production Staff
Nate Freedman, Jodi Wenner

policelog

Amherst resident arrested in armed robbery

Friday April 22

6:27 p.m. Ryan Buckley, 19, of Middleton, Conn., was arrested on Cance Road for being a minor in possession of alcohol.
6:54 p.m. Daniel Resca, 20, of Reading, was arrested near Baker Hall for being a minor in possession of alcohol.
8:59 p.m. Lindsey Farina, 18, of South Boston, was arrested in the Southwest Circle for being a minor in possession of alcohol.
9:54 p.m. Victoria Hodgerney, 19, of Worcester, Jenniler Smith, 19, of Livingston, N.J, and Joseph Kayer, 19, of Worcester, were all arrested for being minors in possession of alcohol in the parking lot across the street from the Hagis Mall.

Saturday April 23

4:52 p.m. Bruce Castonguay, 19, of Chicopee, was arrested near Patterson Hall for being a minor in possession of alcohol and resisting a police officer making a lawful arrest.
10:24 p.m. Terrence Sullivan, 19, of Dorchester, was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol and possession of a class D substance. Timothy James Kochis, 20, of Harvard was arrested for being a minor in possession of alcohol. Both were arrested in the parking lot behind Sylvan.

Sunday April 24

4:04 a.m. Christopher Brooks, 17, of Amherst, was arrested in Van Meter Hall for assault and being armed with a firearm.

Monday April 25

Following a traffic stop on Massachusetts Avenue, Adam Swerdlow, 20, of New Canaan, Conn., was arrested for the misuse of a Registry of Motor Vehicles document and a marked lanes violation.

—Compiled by Brendan Heck

Former Governor Weld considering NY governor

ALBANY, N.Y. (AP) — Former Massachusetts Gov. William Weld said Tuesday he is seriously considering running for governor of New York if fellow Republican Gov. George Pataki doesn't seek a fourth term next year.

Weld, who spoke to The Associated Press by telephone from Kentucky, said he would also stay out of the race if former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani runs.

"I'm very close to both those guys," said Weld, a lawyer who moved back to his native New York in 2000.

Weld was elected governor of Massachusetts in 1990 and easily re-elected in 1994. He ran for U.S. Senate in 1996 but was defeated by Democratic incumbent John Kerry. He resigned as governor in 1997 when then-President Clinton nominated him to become U.S. ambassador to Mexico, but the nomination was blocked.

If he won the governor's race, he would be only the second person in history to serve as governor of two states.

There has been growing speculation in New York political circles that Pataki is eyeing a run for the GOP nomination for president in 2008 and will not run for re-election, although he has not tipped his hand.

Later Tuesday, during a lunch with reporters, Pataki praised Weld as a "very good governor" and a "very bright, talented person." But Pataki said others also fit that bill. The current governor said he would make a decision about seeking a fourth term "within the next few months" and that he was not ruling out a run for president.

"I think he's going to run for president, but I don't know," Weld said when asked about Pataki's plans. "I have actually not spoken to him about that."

As for Giuliani, his top political adviser told the AP earlier this month the former mayor was too busy with private business interests to run for governor or for U.S. Senate against Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton next year.

Weld said he was not considering running against the former first lady, noting they were old friends, having worked together as young lawyers on the Watergate hearings in 1973-74.

"I think governor is a better job," he said.

"It's certainly an intriguing possibility and it depends on what the governor decides, what Mayor Giuliani decides and to some extent how the business I'm involved in develops," he said.

Weld is a partner in the New York investment firm Leeds Weld & Co.

Sam Houston is the only two-state governor in history, having served in Tennessee from 1827 to 1829 and Texas from 1859 to 1861.

Weld expects to make a decision this fall. State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, a Democrat, has already announced he is running for governor.

"I think he would be very strong," Weld said. "I think I could beat him. I think he could beat me. It'd be pay-to-get-in. Neither of us is a shrinking violet."

Weld said he was very close to Pataki on some issues, supporting strong environmental initiatives as well as abortion and gay rights but parts company on Pataki's strong advocacy of gun-control legislation.

—Associated Press

State Senate backs final version of stem cell research bill yesterday

BOSTON (AP) — The state Senate overwhelmingly backed the final version of a stem cell research bill on Tuesday, even as supporters acknowledged that some thorny questions remain unresolved — including whether women should be paid for their donated eggs.

The bill, which encourages embryonic stem cell research in Massachusetts, was approved by a 34-2 vote, meaning the Senate could easily override an expected veto by Gov. Mitt Romney.

The legislation approved Tuesday by the Senate is a compromise between two separate versions approved last month in the House and Senate. It would allow scientists to create cloned embryos and extract their stem cells for research.

Supporters say the research could lead to the cure or treatment of diabetes, Parkinson's disease and spinal cord injuries. But critics it will allow scientists to create new human life just to destroy it, and that there are other kinds of stem cell research that don't require the creation of new embryos.

Under current state law, scientists conducting stem cell research first need the approval of the local district attorney. The bill would remove that requirement, give the state Health Department some regulatory controls and ban cloning for reproductive purposes.

The bill also creates a 15-member biomedical research advisory council to hold public meetings and provide lawmakers with an annual report on the new research. Among other things, the panel would be charged with investigating whether women should be compensated for their eggs.

State Sen. Cynthia Creem, D-Newton, said allowing the sale of eggs could lead to the exploitation of women who need money or who don't fully understand some of the risks involved in donating eggs.

State Rep. Brad Hill, an opponent of the bill, also said he was concerned about the possible exploitation of women. He said there's no rush to approve the bill now.

"We wanted to take a little bit slower," he said. "We don't want to see women abusing their bodies."

The final version of the bill now heads to the Massachusetts House, where it could be debated as early as next week.

Romney had vowed to veto the bill, which also appears to have more than enough support in the House to override a veto.

—Associated Press

University Productions and Concerts in association with the SGA, present
SPRING CONCERT 2005
^FABOLOUS^ FREE
Dropkick Murphys

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
• a grade dispute?
• teacher, roomate or job concerns?
• billing problems?
• harassment?
• ...or any other University related problem?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course!)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
523 Campus Center
Office hours: 8:00 a.m. - 9:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0567
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Looking for something more out of college?
Don't know where you Fit in?
Join La Familia @ The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
APPLY FOR ASSISTANT NEWS EDITOR

WANT TO MAKE SOMETHING OF YOURSELF?
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is now looking to hire a circulation manager for the 2005-2006 school year.
If you want to work in a friendly, competitive atmosphere, come to the main office to apply. Please bring a copy of your resumé.
Preferably looking for a freshman or sophomore.

National News

Jobs, Apple retaliate against publisher

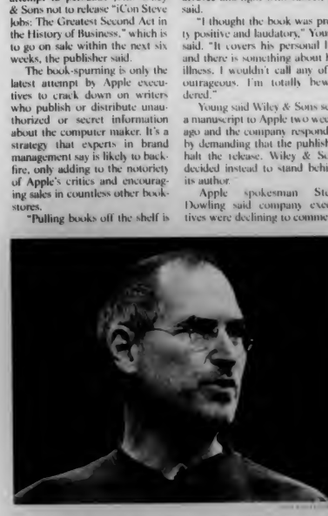
By Greg Sandoval
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — Apple Computer Inc. has retaliated against the publisher of an upcoming unauthorized biography about chief executive Steve Jobs by removing dozens of other technology books sold by the publisher from Apple stores around the world.

Apple removed the books last week from all 104 of its stores after failing in a month-long attempt to persuade John Wiley & Sons not to release "iCon Steve Jobs: The Greatest Second Act in the History of Business," which is to go on sale within the next six weeks, the publisher said.

The book-spurning is only the latest attempt by Apple executives to crack down on writers who publish or distribute unauthorized or secret information about the computer maker. It's a strategy that experts in brand management say is likely to backfire, only adding to the notoriety of Apple's critics and encouraging sales in countless other bookstores.

"Pulling books off the shelf is a little draconian," said Rob Frankel, a brand consultant. "It reeks of repression."



"This is not the first time anybody has said anything good or bad about Steve Jobs," Frankel added. "He has a much better public brand image than one book could ever dispel."

The book's author, Jelfrey Young, says Jobs has nothing to fear from "iCon." It's a chronicle of Jobs' rise as an innovator and entrepreneur and includes details about his personal life such as his divorce and fight with cancer, he said.

"I thought the book was pretty positive and laudatory," Young said. "It covers his personal life and there is something about his illness. I wouldn't call any of it outrageous. I'm totally bewildered."

Young said Wiley & Sons sent a manuscript to Apple two weeks ago and the company responded by demanding that the publisher halt the release. Wiley & Sons decided instead to stand behind its author.

Apple spokesman Steve Dowling said company executives were declining to comment.

Steve Jobs, founder of Apple Computers Inc., is retaliating against a publisher who is printing unauthorized copies of a book about Jobs.

Insurgent attacks increasing in Iraq

By John J. Lumpkin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After a post-election respite, the pace of insurgent attacks in Iraq has increased in recent weeks to approach last year's levels, Pentagon officials said Tuesday.

"Where they are right now is where they were almost a year ago, and it's nowhere near the peak," said Air Force Gen. Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, in a Pentagon press conference.

That's about 400 attacks a week of all kinds: bombings, shootings, rocket and mortar attacks, Pentagon officials said. About half cause significant damage or injure or kill someone.

Though they vary daily, those figures are close to the rate of attacks that took place through much of last year, except for spasms of violence in Najaf, Fallujah and elsewhere. In pre-election violence in January, the number spiked to twice the usual rate.

The frequency of attacks is one measure of the strength of the insurgency in Iraq, and the success of the efforts of the U.S.-led coalition to combat it.

But Myers and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld disputed a suggestion that the figure demonstrates a lack of progress in Iraq. Rumsfeld said the focus of U.S. forces has been training Iraqi security forces rather than directing counterinsurgency operations.

"The United States and the coalition forces, in my personal view, will not be the thing that will defeat the insurgency," he said. "The people that are going to defeat that insurgency are going to be the Iraqis. And the Iraqis will do it not through military means solely, but by progress on the political side and giving the Iraqi people a sense that they have a stake in that country."

Myers pointed to the creation of new government institutions. "I think we're definitely winning. I think we've been winning for some time," he said. "If you look at where we are, we've had elections. They're about ready to form a government, albeit slower than perhaps some would have hoped, forming the Cabinet and so forth."

A U.S. defense official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said post-invasion attacks in Iraq were at lower levels — 150 to 200 per week — until April 2004, when uprisings occurred in Najaf and Anbar province. The first pictures of tortured prisoners from the Abu Ghraib prison were also made public that month.

Afterward, the rate of attacks doubled, to around 400 or more per week, the official said. The number spiked during U.S. offensives in Najaf in August and Fallujah in November.

In January, as Iraq prepared to hold its elections, the numbers increased to as high as 825 attacks in one week, the official said. Afterward, the number dropped again to 400 per week in February and 350 in March, leading to some hopes that the insurgency — a mix of Saddam loyalists and foreign terrorists — was finally ebbing because of the elections.

A soldier watches as a car bomb explodes outside of Baghdad.
Associated Press

Marine faces questioning about combat

By Aaron Beard
Associated Press

RALEIGH, N.C. — A former Wall Street trader who rejoined the Marines after the Sept. 11 attacks is now faced with the consequences of another choice — the split-second decision he made in a combat zone.

Defense attorneys for 2nd Lt. Ilario Pantano and military prosecutors agree that the Marine shot and killed two Iraqis last year in a search for a terrorist hideout. But they do not agree on circumstances surrounding the shootings.

Defense attorneys say Pantano was doing his job. Prosecutors say it was murder, and were expected to present their evidence at a preliminary hearing set to begin Tuesday at Camp Lejeune.

The case has stirred debate on whether troops should be second-guessed for decisions made in fleeting seconds of combat. A North Carolina congressman has urged President Bush to intervene and dismiss charges against the 33-year-old New Yorker.

Pantano also has become a popular subject for conservative radio hosts, and his mother, Merry, has started a Web site in his defense.

"This Web site has raised awareness, which is what we has hoped it would do," Merry Pantano said Tuesday on ABC's "Good Morning America." She said supporters "do not understand how a warrior in combat can be charged with premeditated murder for self-defense for defending his men."

Rep. Walter Jones, a Republican, has said Pantano was doing nothing more than "defending the cause of freedom, democracy and liberty in his actions."

The Article 32 hearing, similar to a civilian grand jury hearing, is held to determine whether to recommend a court-martial or other punishment. An investigating officer will then make a recommendation to the commanding general of the 2nd Marine Division, who determines whether to proceed to trial or modify the charges.

If convicted of murder at a court-martial, Pantano could be sentenced to death. He has asked to waive the investigatory hearing and proceed straight to a court-martial.

A call to military defense attorney Maj. Phillip Stackhouse was not returned Monday afternoon. Base spokesman 2nd Lt. Barry Edwards declined to comment Monday.

The case stems from an April 15, 2004, incident in which Pantano's unit was ordered to search a house in Mahmudiyah, Iraq. Marines stopped Hamaidy Kareem and Tahah Ahmead Hanjil as they tried to drive away.

According to charges, Pantano ordered other troops to remove the suspects' handcuffs and look away, then shot the pair in the back, vandalized their vehicle and hung a sign over their corpses bearing a Marine slogan: "No better friend, no worse enemy."

In a statement, Pantano told investigators the two men had their backs to him and continued talking to each other despite warnings to be quiet

Back By Popular Demand
Chocolate Extravaganza
Wednesday, April 27
5:00-8:00 pm in all DCs
CHOCOLATE TORTE
CHOCOLATE GANACHE TORTE
VEGAN CHOCOLATE CAKE/GANACHE
CHEESECAKE WITH CHOCOLATE SAUCE
DINING SERVICES

BEN & JERRY'S
NEW ENGLAND'S FAVORITE ICE CREAM WILL BE SERVED
Thursday, April 28, 2005
from 5:00–8:00pm
Choose from your favorite flavors!
Cherry Garcia,
Chocolate Chip Cookie Dough,
Chocolate Fudge Brownie,
Coffee Coffee BuzzBuzzBuzz,
Mint Chocolate Chunk,
Vanilla and Low Fat
Black Raspberry Frozen Yogurt

See Green Day and My Chemcial Romance

THE GRAMMY® AWARD WINNING ROCK ALBUM OF THE YEAR

APPEARING AT MULLINS CENTER APRIL 30TH

MY CHEMICAL ROMANCE.

THREE CHEERS FOR SWEET REVENGE

"Scary-sad punk that lives up to emo's unspoken promise, that sometimes the most miserable songs are also the easiest ones to sing along with."
- Rolling Stone

Featuring "HELENA," "I'M NOT OKAY (I PROMISE)" and "THE GHOST OF YOU"

DON'T MISS MY CHEMICAL ROMANCE ON TOUR WITH GREEN DAY THIS SPRING

Go to mychemicalromance.com for all the latest news, tour updates, ringtones and merch.

Available at:
For the Record
104 N. Pleasant Street
Amherst, MA 01002

Get involved with one of the most important events at UMass

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

at Undergraduate Commencement Sunday, May 22, 2005

We need and depend on volunteers to help manage approximately 4,000 Graduates and 22,000 guests.
To present a ceremony with pageantry and to display our pride for graduates, we will need 50 aides and 40 ushers.

What You Can Do

Aides: greet guests as they enter the stadium, distribute programs, and help guests locate seating and other services.

Ushers: assist guests in the stands of the stadium with seating, directions, and program information.

Time Commitment For All Groups

Friday, May 13
10-11:00 am at Mahar Auditorium, Orientation for volunteers.
Friday, May 20
10-11:00 am at the stadium, rehearsal for volunteers.
Sunday, May 22
8:00-12:00 pm at the stadium, Commencement.
Sunday, May 22
12 pm Volunteer Thank You Luncheon.
(Optional- Following Commencement at Rafters)

PLEASE COMPLETE THE ONLINE VOLUNTEER REGISTRATION FORM AT:
www.umass.edu/commencement/2005/vol_form.html
OR CALL 577.1101 FOR FURTHER INFORMATION

International News

Last soldier welcomed home

By Sam F. Ghattas
Associated Press

MASNAA, Lebanon — Syria's last soldier in Lebanon walked across the border Tuesday, welcomed home with cheers and flowers after a modest farewell from the Lebanese, a quiet end to a once indomitable 29-year military presence that was the key to Damascus' control of its neighbor.

With the Syrians gone, Lebanese now look ahead to an election that should prove freer of Syrian influence but still runs the risk of sinking into violence. Lebanon's anti-Syrian opposition is hoping to defeat Damascus' political allies at the ballot box.

The withdrawal would have been unthinkable only a few months ago. But amid series of strategic blunders by Syrian President Bashar Assad, Damascus came under relentless international pressure that intensified after the Feb. 14 assassination of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. The United States in particular is keeping up demands for an end to Syria's influence.

After weeks of Syrians vacating their posts — with celebrations by Lebanese elated to see them go — Lebanon's pro-Syrian leadership was eager to give a dignified finish to the pullout.

Top military brass from both sides exchanged medals at an hourlong ceremony at an air base near their shared border, and they emphasized the nations' close ties will continue.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Soldiers celebrate the homecoming of the last soldier to walk over the border. The soldier was welcomed with cheers and flowers from Syrians.

A Syrian commander told Lebanese troops at the ceremony: "Brothers in arms, 'til we meet again." The Lebanese replied, "'Til we meet again" — using the Arabic phrase "ila liqaa," a breezier goodbye than the more formal "farewell."

"Brothers in arms, thank you for your sacrifices," a Lebanese commander then told the Syrians.

Lebanese army commander Michel Suleiman pledged continued cooperation and credited the Syrian army with ending the 1975-90 civil war and rebuilding Lebanese forces. "Together we shall always remain brothers in arms in the face of the Israeli enemy," Suleiman said.

The two dozen or so Lebanese who stood at the border were less charitable as they watched the last 250 Syrians leave — remnants of a one-time mighty force of 40,000 that ran the country virtually unchallenged since arriving as peacekeepers in 1976.

"I feel like someone who was suffocated and jailed and has finally emerged from jail," said Shaaban al-Ajami, mayor of the Lebanese border village of Majdal Anjar.

"We don't want to say goodbye. We are happy to see them leave," said Hussein Mansour, 27, who stood at the border holding the lone Lebanese flag.

Opposition leader Walid Jumblatt was delighted.

Clinton urges tsunami efforts

By Nick Wadhams
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — The world's response to the tsunami could serve as a blueprint for future disasters, but only if donors don't give up on people in Southeast Asia who still need help, former President Bill Clinton said Monday.

Clinton, the U.N. envoy for tsunami recovery, told a conference of U.S. executives that there is still much to be done to help the region after the Dec. 26 disaster. He said now was the most difficult time — initial relief efforts are over but the region has a long way to go until it fully recovers.

"If you do something that works well, then other people will copy it. We need to leave something here that will be copied," Clinton said. "We have got to prove that we can see this through in an honorable and effective way."

The conference at the United Nations saw U.N. emergency relief officials meet with the Business Roundtable, an association of 160 leading U.S. chief executives. They discussed coordination among companies that wanted to contribute to relief efforts and the U.N. agencies and non-governmental organizations doing the work.

Hank McKinnell, CEO of the drug company Pfizer and chief of the roundtable, said the most important thing to learn was speed — how to get companies to respond as fast as possible when disasters happen.

"I can only say that we in the private sector want to do the right thing and in times of crisis we want to do it quickly," McKinnell said.

An undersea earthquake of at least magnitude-9.0 off Indonesia triggered a tsunami that traveled across the Indian Ocean, killing at least 126,000 people in Indonesia, almost all of them in the Aceh province, and another 48,000 in 10 other countries.

So far, the United Nations says, there have been $6.7 billion in pledges, about $2 billion of which has been either been guaranteed or distributed, according to the U.N. Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.

Japanese mourn train crash

By Mari Yamaguchi
Associated Press

AMAGASAKI, Japan — At least he was alive.

Hours after Japan's worst train crash in decades, rescue teams found Hiroki Hayashi in an open space in the wreckage with his legs badly hurt, but he was still conscious.

Workers, however, faced a major hurdle: they couldn't get the 19-year-old college student out. Rescuers could pass him water and put him on an intravenous drip, but he was pinned down by slabs of metal and the bodies of victims.

Firefighters feared sparks from an electric drill would ignite spilled fuel.

"We had to use hydraulic-equipped machines to pry open a space," said Hideki Maeda of the Amagasaki Fire Department.

Early Tuesday, rescuers finally freed Hayashi from the wreckage 22 hours after the crash in Amagasaki in western Japan, the final survivor pulled from the shattered train. As of early Wednesday, the death toll was 81, with more bodies expected to be uncovered. At least 456 people were injured.

"He really endured a lot, despite hours of pain," firefighter Shohei Matsuda said.

Hayashi's survival was remarkable considering the devastation of the accident. Cruising at a reported speed of 65 mph, the commuter train hit a curve in Amagasaki, 250 miles west of Tokyo, and tumbled from the tracks. The speed limit was 43 mph.

Several cars of the train smashed into an apartment house just beside the rails, with the flattened shell of one wrapped around the corner of the building. The crash was Japan's deadliest train disaster since 1963.

On Tuesday, agents swept through eight offices of train operator West Japan Railway Co., carting away cardboard boxes of documents. The probe into possible professional negligence has focused on the actions of the 23-year-old driver — who has not yet been accounted for — and the speed of the train.

Investigators examining the accident site said they had found the train's "black box," a computer chip that stores information about the time and train's speed in the final seconds before an accident. But they cautioned it would take time to analyze the contents.

The seven-car train was packed with 580 passengers at the time of the accident near this Osaka suburb. Monday's accident was the worst rail disaster in nearly 42 years in this safety-conscious country, which is home to one of the world's most complex, efficient and heavily traveled rail networks.

The driver — identified as Ryujiro Takami — got his train operator's license in May 2004. One month later, he overran a station and was issued a warning for his mistake, railway officials and police said.

Investigators said the driver may have been shaken after overrunning the station just before the crash by 130 feet and falling 90 seconds behind schedule. Speculation was high that the driver may have been rushing to make up lost time.

Hayashi was panicked between the crash and his rescue.

COURTESY CNN.COM

Dozens try to clean up the rubble left in the city of Amagasaki, Japan after a commuter train derailment left 81 dead and hundreds injured.

WRITE FOR US!

Announcing GamesGrid Poker and our Grand Opening

1,000% DEPOSIT BONUS

For a limited time, get 10x return on what you deposit, up to $5,000 bonus. Hurry to www.gamesgrid.com/bonus for details.

GamesGrid Poker
Make your best play.™

Fancy NAILS
Walk-ins Welcome
Summer Special!
$5 off any manicure or pedicure*
expires August 1
*with coupon only

Amherst Computersmiths
Is your computer unhappy?
Call us – we'll fix it up and take your worries away
We come to you and specialize in quick turnaround
We also offer free loaner computers and late night emergency service.
Grand opening special:
The first hour of regular service is only $35!
(Special valid until May 25, 2005. *Additional fee applies for late night service.)
Phone: (413) 687-1665
http://www.amherstcomputersmiths.com

ZANA
downtown Amherst

A special message for state employees

It's Your Health.

You Can't Afford To Limit Your Options.

If you're an employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, you have until May 13 to select your health insurance plan for the coming year. This year, your menu of options includes three plans that use tiers to set copays at various hospitals. Because of the tiering criteria used by some of these plans, state workers who enroll in one of them may have to pay more to be treated at Cooley Dickinson Hospital. There are some things we think you should know before you opt for one of these plans.

Of the three plans offering tiered networks:

- One ranked Cooley Dickinson as the best one based on quality and affordability.
- One ranked Cooley Dickinson Hospital in three different tiers based on three different measures of quality and affordability.
- One ranked Cooley Dickinson Hospital in the second tier, using minimal quality measures.

We believe that the quality of care provided and your relationship with your doctor and local hospital are what really matters. Under tiered plans, however, you could be financially penalized for choosing to seek treatment at the hospital nearest your home and your family, and the hospital at which your doctor has admitting privileges.

We encourage state workers to think long and hard before signing on to a plan that limits their healthcare options. We also encourage state workers to make an informed decision on this important matter. Talk to us or your health care provider before you choose a plan. Call (888) 554-4CDH (4234).

Making a great community better.

Cooley Dickinson Hospital
Dartmouth-Hitchcock Alliance
30 Locust Street • Northampton, Massachusetts • (413) 582-2000
www.cooley-dickinson.org

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Destruction serves as warning for Hoedown

With spring approaching, campus-wide acts of senseless violence also begin to sprout. Between fires and armed robbery recently occurring on this campus, University of Massachusetts students can no longer feel safe in or outside their dormitories. Behaviors such as these cannot go unnoticed, nor can they go without punishment, and rightly so.

The first fire that occurred took place on campus in the Orchard Hill Residential Area. Two garbage cans were set on fire in a student lounge, causing Grayson Hall to be evacuated at midnight. The inconvenience of the situation to all of Grayson's residents is of the least concern in the matter. It is behavior like this that only proves to the administration that it is more than necessary for the UMass Police Department to posses and use TASERs on students.

The second fire happened in a garage behind a house owned by Alpha Tau Gamma, a fraternal organization for students of the UMass Stockbridge School of Agriculture. The fire started at 2 a.m. and there were no reported injuries, including the fire at Grayson. The amounts of damage caused in both situations resulted to over a combined $12,000 in repairs and were both deemed to be intentionally set. If the intention was to make the Amherst Fire Department work for their money, it wasn't well received.

In addition to the fire, there was an armed robbery that took place in Van Meter dormitory early Sunday morning. A handgun was involved in the scenario and the whole incident was caught on videotape. Short of bag searches upon entry and random room sweeps, there is no sensible way for an event like that to be prevented. Bag and room searches were things that have been brought up in the past by members of the administration as ways to keep problems like this from happening, but were met with great opposition.

Chancellor Lombardi has an obligation to all the students that attend this University to make the campus and the environment as safe as possible. Students are paying hard-earned dollars to try and achieve an education in a safe atmosphere. His suggestions may have seen extreme when first mentioned, but with armed robbery and active fires taking place in campus dormitories, what other choices is the administration left with?

The use of TASERs is certainly a scary thought that will soon become a scary reality next semester. However, the recent incidents that have occurred on campus prove the administration's points in purchasing them. This also fairs as a warning to all students planning to participate in the upcoming relocated Hobart Hoedown planned for Saturday night on Main Street. Though the location of the event is rumored to have changed, there is nothing to suggest the nature of the party won't change from the last two years.

Senseless destruction and violence should not be what makes a party fun, nor should it be what attracts masses of people. The stupidity of the recent destructive events on campus should be a red-hot warning to the campus community to have a good time, but to remain civilized and safe.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Church changes U.S. society

Andrew Freeman

If you want to know what Christianity in America is really about, you needn't go to church. A simple two-word phrase will do it for you: "Jesus Dolls."

Beverly Hills Teddy Bear Co. has created a series of dolls called "Messengers of Faith," which include Jesus, Mary, Moses and David. The foot-high dolls are "fully posable," recite verses from the Bible and are "great for collectors, to," according to the company's Web site, www.one-2believe.com.

Jesus dolls are just one element in a fascinating trend in today's society: the merger of Christianity and consumer capitalism. This plays out in countless ways: "What would Jesus do?" bumper stickers, Christian bracelets and faith-based instant messaging buddy icons.

The ties between commercialism and Christianity are deep. The sociologist Max Weber wrote, in his 1905 essay "The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism," that some Protestant theology encouraged individuals to enrich themselves. This was a break from the disdain for materialism and greed that had characterized previous years, particularly the Middle Ages. This embrace of wealth and material success fosters the growth of today's Christian mass-market.

The market for Christian goods is enormous. One of the highest-grossing films last year was "The Passion of the Christ," which, for its extremely violent portrayal of Jesus' death, made over $370 million, according to www.boxofficemojo.com. The "Left Behind" series of novels by Tim LaHaye and Jerry Jenkins, which depict an interpretation of the Apocalypse, have sold between 40 and 50 million copies, according to money.cnn.com, and the series is also represented in audio books, children's books and even a movie on DVD.

Increasingly, Christianity in the United States has become commoditized, and its adherents have become an emerging market for products. This is leading to a coarsening of religion. People trumpet their religious identity in the same way they announce their child is an honor student: on a T-shirt or bumper sticker.

People trumpet their religious identity in the same way they announce their child is an honor student: on a T-shirt or bumper sticker.

For many, this is not a problem. They believe that all aspects of their life should represent their religious identity. I think that such visible portrayals of piety are often false. If you believe it with your heart, that should be rewarding enough in and of itself, and you needn't proclaim your faith to the world. Jesus distinguished between hypocrites and true believers, urging the latter to "go into your room, close the door," when they pray, as opposed to the former, who pray "in the synagogues and on street corners so that people can see them," (Matthew 6:5-6).

Moreover, some of these products promote a very violent and hateful version of Christianity. The "Left Behind" novels depict slaughter and genocide, while "The Passion of the Christ" features the lashing of Jesus with a whip and accompanying gore, with caricatures of Jews looking on. Such bloodlust contrasts with the pacifist and tolerant philosophies of Christianity.

While such works claim to be based on the scriptures, that is misleading. "The Passion" was heavily inspired by the writings and visions of an early 19th century nun, Anne Catherine Emmerich. Minister William Cork writes, on www.wquercus.com, that Em-merich's book, "reflects both misunderstanding and ignorance of the scripture," as well as embraces the widespread anti-Semitism of the time.

In the case of the "Left Behind" novels, the concept of the rapture on which the books are based is far from universally accepted in Christianity, with followings only among conservative Christians. The rapture hails from a doctrine called Premillenialism that the Church declared a heresy in the fourth century, and which was resurrected around 1830, according to www.religioustolerance.org.

I am not entirely sure how to confront these commercialist trends. On one hand, there is the possibility that religious belief will become weaker. If this serves to lessen the power of violent fundamentalism, then it would be positive, but it could also lead to the decline of churches and religion overall.

On the other, making Christianity more mainstream and commercialistic may compel society, business and culture to become more Christian, ostracizing atheists and members of other religions. This has happened already in politics, as the Republican Party is dominated by its fundamentalist Christian base, which is silencing more moderate or libertarian elements.

One thing is for certain: the collision of Christianity and Capitalism is a defining force of our times, and it will change American society, for good or ill.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

Punk rock dream come true

Thomas Naughton

"Oooh, I don't think I can do this," I said under my breath while watching the crowd of people enter the cramped venue my band was playing.

It was my first big show as the new vocalist of the band I had recently joined, Pushing For Summer (I didn't come up with the name, so don't make fun of me). The band was comprised of kids I had grown up with, but as I watched the huge crowd of hardcore boys stomp towards the front, I felt completely alone. The other vocalist, Matt, who screamed exclusively while I unleashed my show tunes-yelp, smirked at me; he knew I was about to pee the bed.

I was 17, gay and absolutely not "hardcore." I don't remember standing out so much in a crowd of such diversely weird-looking punk rockers. We were opening for the ugly hardcore heroes, BANE, for reasons I still don't understand, and when I opened my mouth and began to sing, the looks on their faces that read "what the hell are you doing?" are still burned into my memory — looks that I wouldn't remember getting again until I went to my first gay bar.

The fact that many of the 'hardcore' kids still came to my shows, said nice things to me, didn't shut me out or beat me up showed me that things were absolutely changing.

I'm too "punk rock" (whatever that is) for the gays, too gay for the punk rockers. Growing up, I never really had any gay punk role models, except, perhaps, for my childhood friend and super-crush Nick Fitt, Morrissey of the Smiths and Makeoutclub.com mogul Gibby; all of which frequently "jumped the shark" with regards to committing to homosexuality or sexual labels in general.

In punk music, the closest I could get to discernable "role-models" were Pansy Division. Pansy Division made their gayness a joke, which was certainly a way to deflect jabs from the notoriously homophobic punk rock community. They were to punk rock what 70s Blaxploitation Films were to the movie industry: boundary breakers; laughable, perhaps damaging, but boundary breakers nonetheless.

I could hang onto people like Rob Halford, Freddie Mercury and Michael Stipe all I wanted, but when it came down to visibility within the community of which I was immersed, the aforementioned crooners were of the past and did not apply. Around the time I began singing in PFS, I saw a documentary by Martin Sorrondeguy (formerly of Los Crudos), the lead singer of a new all gay-male hardcore band, XLimpwristX. I became friends with XLimpwristX guitarist Mark Telfian who was also the ex-vocalist in the New York hardcore mainstays, Hail Mary.

I realized that an emergence was occurring. Like Riot-Grrrl of the early 90s, which punched a small hole in rock for women to raise their voices. These gay male punk rock veterans were punching a new hole in the musical landscape by becoming visibly gay. On an admittedly small level, (I was in a local band) I was apart of this emergence.

I never revealed in my lyrics that I was singing about males, I didn't have to. The fact that many of the "hardcore" kids still came to my shows, said nice things to me, didn't shut me out or beat me up showed me that things were absolutely changing.

I started singing for a new band, The Lead Hour (lead like the metal), after PFS broke up. I wanted to keep the momentum going. I had a job to do, remain visible and not give up. The straight guys of my band deserved medals of honor for not making me feel like an alien, for believing in me and most of all, for not being ashamed to be my friend and collaborator in a punk rock scene where the word "faggot" still flies out of teenage mouths freely (regardless of how "enlightened" punk and hardcore listeners claim to be).

The Lead Hour had two strikes against it: an openly gay male vocalist and a female pianist/violinist/vocalist. However, as said before, an emergence was occurring. A few people at a show would make fun of my voice or say gross things about Allie, our triple threat, and they would wait for the other members of the crowd to join in. I remember this ritual because it would happen at almost every show. I'd wait and watch while the two or three jerks in the back called me a "homo" to see if others would join them.

And then nothing would happen. No one would laugh with them, most of the time. The audience would keep their eyes to the front, to my friends and I while we played our hearts out. That showed me why I was there, why it was important for me to stand out and bear being embarrassed and afraid.

Then I noticed a new crowd of people at these shows: teenage gay boys. They would talk to me after the show, tell me how much they liked the music, how much they wanted to be in a band and sometimes, how much it meant to see me onstage not hiding. I started calling them "baby-gays," and I realized that if they can feel like they have a voice in me, even on a minute, local band-level, something I never had at their age, perhaps my gay-teen punk rock dream really has come true.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

Decoration or destruction?

Jessica Rich

For generations, there have always been trends and fashions that most people conform to; whether it was the bell-bottom and tie dyed craze that took place in the 1960s and came back in the 1990s, or the present day Ugg boots phase. However, there is one phase that has never lost its stylishness: tattoos and body piercing. But why is this obsession with "self-mutilation" a popular pastime? Do some people actually consider this act as "beautification?"

Being a young girl in this American society, most girls are expected to get their ears pierced on both earlobes. It's pretty, it's sophisticated and it's what girls do. So when I was only six years old, my mother took me to get my ears pierced. I screamed and cried after the jeweler put these two holes through my ears. "Beauty hurts" my mom always told me. About 10 years later, my friends and I decided to get our cartilage pierced on our left ear as a symbol of our friendship.

The next year I got two more holes on my earlobes, which didn't hurt as much as the first set, but was not that pleasing either. Finally, this past month, I got my cartilage on my right ear pierced, just as a spur-of-the-moment decision. What is the point of putting numerous amounts of holes in your body, you might be asking. For the look? For the pain? Or just for fun?

According to Radar Love, a body modification artist in Anniston, Alabama, "this has been underground for years, but it has finally gone mainstream in the last five to 10 years ... Western civilization, and the United States primarily, is the only civilization to shun body piercing.

Everywhere else in the world it is a status symbol." Most people who you come across with piercings do it for decoration or as a form of self-expression or even just to go with the crowd. For example, the typical college female comes into a piercing studio for the "way-too-common" belly button ring. It's a cute, yet sexy, way to express yourself, so why not?

Shannon Larratt, the editor and publisher of bmezine.com (a full-spectrum body modification publication) once stated in an article, "... that if you speak ill of someone simply because they've chosen a star or a kanji symbol to express themselves, that you're a moron. It's not relevant what language a person is speaking — what's relevant is what they're saying and if anyone else is listening." Many people with tattoos can relate to what she is saying. It's so easy for people to criticize other people, but once you know where they are coming from, you will never understand their tattoo, or them.

Within my first month of coming to the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, I went into Amherst Center with my new friends one weekend. We found a tattoo parlor, Mom's Tattoos, and at this point I found out all of my new friends have already been "inked." They all had only one tattoo, except for my suitemate's brother who had seven at the time. We went inside because her brother wanted yet another tattoo. It has always interested me to find out the stories and sentimental value behind each tattoo. Even though certain tattoos are considered "mainstream" or "overdone" — star, cross, rose, heart — no one is at liberty to judge you or your tattoo since they have no idea the significance it holds to you.

In the back of my mind I always wanted one, but what would I get? Where would I get it? What would my parents say? It had to be something I was happy with and actually wanted; it's going to be with me for the rest of my life, and it had to be perfect. Everyone always says that the feeling of the needle across your skin when you get a tattoo feels like a bee sting.

So the irony behind a bumblebee tattoo would be humorous because I am allergic to bee stings. Nevertheless, I didn't think that I would actually go through with it.

Joking about getting inked and actually doing it are two completely different things. I made up any excuse possible so that I wouldn't have to get it that day; I hate needles, I didn't have my picture with me, I didn't have enough money. However, I knew that if I didn't do it that day, I would never get it done.

Fifteen minutes before the tattoo parlor closed, I finally got up the courage to get it done, and asked if they had enough time to do one last small tattoo. Once everything was ready, he comforted me and continued to remind me how minimal the pain is. At first it was awkward, there was a man I just met drawing a bumblebee on my backside trying to make small talk, and my friends peeping around the corner. But before I knew it, it was finished. Everyone tells me they're addictive, and now I know why; the adrenaline rush and the anticipation for how it will turn out.

People of older generations might disagree with this rush of "beautification" that teenagers and young adults do to their bodies. However, whether your modification is permanent or temporary, there's that motive behind every mark you make on your body. You will always remember that day you got it, who you were with and your eagerness to see how it will look when it's finished.

Jessica Rich is a UMass student.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

Take me to 'Funkytown'

Kenny Mulligan

I'm a small town kind of guy. So you can imagine how overwhelmed I was when I took a trip into New York City recently. I had been there before, but I was merely a fifth grader, with ADHD, too hopped up on Ritalin to really have any appreciation for the grandeur of it all. What really caught my attention this time around was the ferociously beating heart of all consumerism, called Times Square.

As I stood on the sidewalk with wide eyes and a gaping mouth, my head tilted up at the mesmerizing array of bright flashy lights and spinny things. About five minutes passed before people began tossing loose change at my feet, mistaking me for a hobo. I was perplexed. Had I remembered to blink that whole time? The harsh scrape of my eyelids across my corneas was evidence enough that I hadn't.

I realized that I should have been appalled by such a chaotic and capitalistic display, but what I was looking at was far more hypnotic than the back of any Spencer Gifts store I had ever been in.

I realized that I should have been appalled by such a chaotic and capitalistic display, but what I was looking at was far more hypnotic than the back of any Spencer Gifts store I had ever been in.

Sure, nature is great. Mountains are great. The Grand freaking Canyon is great. But how long does nature take to create all that crap? She takes her sweet time is what she does. Man created Times Square, and it has grown and still grows even faster than a gestating fetus from zygote to birth. It was as if Whoros, the Greek god of consumerism, had stood beside a commercially barren Times Square and cracked one off into the face of a once benevolent city. It was beautiful and pornographic at the same time.

Later on, as I stepped out of the Virgin Records Megastore, which was way more 'mega' than any store in which I had ever set foot in, it looked like the evening sun was still shining. But after walking five feet beyond the exit, I finally saw a large enough patch of sky to realize that it was really nighttime and that the luster emanating from the overlooking signs had blessed the streets with an eternal evening glow. I'd like to see Mother Nature do that.

I must also say that this place made me feel like a movie star. Pestered from every single direction with every step I took, I reveled in a sense of personal significance. "All these people want to talk to me. They all have presents for me." Albeit, just about all of those presents were fliers for goods and services for which I didn't even think it was possible to flier, at least as a law-abiding citizen. Seriously, it was like walking through a thousand UMass Campus Centers.

At one point, I found myself in the Times Square Toys 'R Us. What caught my attention most in that store was a "Shrek" version of the classic medical malpractice simulator, Operation. It was ostensibly the same game. It just had Shrek in place of that dopey, anatomically impaired, red-nosed freak of nature. I could picture, in my head, a family sitting in the living room on board game night, drinking hot cocoa or something of equally generic wholesomeness. I then imagined a little boy gritting his teeth at that father responding, dreaded buzzing sound, and his "Sorry Johnny. You killed Shrek."

Finally, Saturday came, and I hopped a bus out of the city. I felt like a shell of a man. My mind was defiled and had been penetrated from all directions, in ways too kinky to describe. I thanked God that I could finally relax and enjoy my assortment of $15 souvenir coffee mugs.

Had I liked New York? Or was I disgusted by the chaotic commercialism, pollution, crowdedness and the overall rudeness of the people? Then again, I couldn't deny how enchanted I was by the glitz, the glamour and the awe-inspiringly meticulous arrangements of millions upon millions of tiny flickering lights. Is it possible to have such a reluctant affinity for something? To want more and more, yet have some grand desire to just say, "No, none of that hedonistic crap for me. It only does more harm than good."

If only there was something else in my life that had the same effect on me. Then I might be able to elaborate on these quandaries; perhaps have some greater understanding of it all. Arriving at no conclusion, I lit up a cigarette and said, "Eh, screw it."

Kenny Mulligan is a UMass student.

Inciting riot by campus' design

S.J. Port

The architecture and layout of the University of Massachusetts' campus are major factors in a campus design that fosters riotous behavior.

Here in Amherst, 90 miles west of Boston, lies the University of Massachusetts' flagship campus. The University appears as a metropolitan mirage to visitors approaching through the rural back roads of the valley around Amherst proper. Southwest's cement towers stand out against the mountains; they are the first thing new arrivals see of the campus.

In the architecture of the University, Southwest is the largest student living area in the middle ring of the Campus. Fifty percent of students living on campus, approximately 5,400, cohabitate together in the centrally located Southwest area, which contains all but one of the largest residential buildings on campus, according to the University's Housing Web site.

Composed of five identical towers (Kennedy, John Quincy Adams, John Adams, Washington and Coolidge) and 11 low-rise dormitories and three of the campus' five dining halls, Southwest is set around a quadrangle area through which the majority of its residents pass several times a day.

It is there, in the quad that the infamous UMass riots always begin.

The architecture of the five identical 22-story towers around a cement quad at the center of Southwest creates a sense of being anonymous and of being able to get "lost in the crowd." The way the buildings block the view of the "outside world" gives Southwest the feeling of being its own city, making it easier to commit acts, like riots, without the consciousness that might come in different living structures. Unidentifiable from the masses, students feel Southwest is an area in which to commit these isolated criminal acts, as demonstrated by the riotous behavior following recent athletic events.

Once people are out in the middle of Southwest, they are confined by the tight living space created by the boundaries of the towers and low-rises, and sometimes even by the shear numbers of bodies around them. Southwest's reputation precedes itself enabling news students and visitors to rationalize their behavior.

When riots have moved to more open areas, like the Campus Pond or Northeast, not only are fewer students arrested (perhaps, in part due to their ability to escape authorities) but also the activity is generally less destructive and more quickly dispersed.

It is ironic that the Southwest towers are named for five men known for their contributions to our systems of law and government. Four of the towers are named for Massachusetts' most presidential sons, John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Calvin Coolidge, and John F. Kennedy; the fifth is named for founding father George Washington. The majority of students have probably not made this connection, suggesting that the image of law on campus is invisible — or possibly dead — to most students.

The built space in which law and justice is delivered is perhaps the most obvious example of visualizing law, however at UMass Amherst the only building associated with this is the administration's home in Whitmore. Residents of campus do not have an image of law or justice at UMass.

Law, in the modern period, doesn't want to be seen — politics is what we see. However, it is law by definition, not politics, which takes away the deviancy of something. Without an image of law on campus we are left with only politics.

The campus media, specifically The Massachusetts Daily Collegian, presents community members with visual glimpses of the actions and reactions, as well as textual detail and discussions of such, but not necessarily the consequences of criminal activity on campus. The police report is the only regular example The Collegian provides of the consequences of inappropriate behavior by students.

Punishment is meant in part to be shaming, which in turn is dehumanizing, effectively suppressing the rebellious or controversial speech/actions of the "criminal." However, to shame an individual the process must be public and the audience engaged, without attention the punisher has less power and the gravity of the punishment is less. The authority of the administration lies in the attention it is given by the community. At UMass, the Student Government Association is given broader press than administrators or authoritative decision making bodies like the Faculty Senate.

As punishment becomes less public, law enforcement becomes more public. At UMass the number of law enforcement departments required to suppress student rioting has drawn attention 90 miles to the west in the state's capitol, Boston. However budget cuts have withdrawn protective programs like late-night dorm escorts from different points of campus from the student's eye, making actual enforcement bodies fewer and less visible to the people who need to see it the most: students.

The University of Massachusetts must revolutionize the design of its campus — starting with the newly planned additional dormitories and then attacking poorly designed older residential areas. That said, students are responsible for their actions — good or bad.

However, the University must consider significant changes to the living atmosphere at UMass in order to quell the destructive behavior of students and inspire attitude changes in the ranks.

S.J. Port is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

PRIVATE CONVERSATIONS ARE JUST THAT

Remember when private conversations where just that...private. Not in today's world.

In the short time it took me to walk across campus from the School of Education to Whitmore and back, I was privy to several extremely personal conversations. Not that I wanted to be, mind you. The people sharing their deepest thoughts were all talking on cell phones in voices that would make stage whispers seem soft spoken. What part of "if you talk as if the person is down the street from you then everyone within a 10-foot radius is going to hear you" don't these people understand?

A few of the conversations unwittingly shared with me went something like this:

"No, Ma, I'm not coming home. I don't care, I going to stay over at Jim's house. Oh, yeah, we'll be sleeping in separate rooms." At this point, the young woman speaking was beside me. She looked straight at me and rolled her eyes the way my daughters do when they think I have asked a stupid question.

Then there was from another coed, "Yeah, well I am going to talk to him. You know it. He's so hot."

The best or maybe I should say worst was shared near the entrance of the campus center. I'm still shaking my head at this one.

"Hey there honey, you were so good last night." The remainder of the conversation, which had captured the attention of several other people, was rather graphic in the details of just what "honey" did to be so good. Spare me.

After 50 something years of life, I can venture to say that almost nothing shocks me anymore. I am definitely not a prude, but I do believe emphatically in keeping my private life private. I would like to think that others feel the same.

Cell phones are very handy tools to have. They are great in emergencies. They do have their place in our world. However, when they are used as extensions of our audio-visual systems, something just doesn't seem right.

If we are all walking around with cell phones plastered to our ears, we miss so much. How are we going to hear the delightful call of the birds in spring? What if that potential "special someone" calls us from across the street? We could even miss the opportunity to answer a request for help from someone in need.

Life is short. Opportunities to see beauty abound in this glorious spring season. The people we pass each day all have stories to share, if we are open to it. All we need to remember is that there's a big difference in sharing each others stories in quiet conversation, face to face, one on one and announcing to the world what is happening in your life over a cell phone.

Linda Neas
UMass graduate student

I don't believe in fairytales

Ryan Welsh

In the house that I grew up in, every Sunday morning was a battle. My sister and I would both fight my parents as much as we could in an attempt to avoid the second most boring hour of the week, church; the first being CCD. Despite the abomination I had for Catholic lessons, I really didn't make the choice to become agnostic until I was in my freshman year of high school.

Coming from the freedom of a public school into the conservative environment of a Catholic high school, one could imagine the possibilities for conflict. For the entire four years I was in high school, I was required to take numerous religion classes that explained more than just Christianity. This, for the first time, really enabled me to understand the religion, and how strong followers act and feel as a result of these beliefs.

The catalyst of my conversion was the book "Cosmos," by Carl Sagan. I always knew space was enormous, but I never really had an appreciation for the overwhelming reality of trillions and trillions of other planets being just as inhabitable as earth. It is an accepted estimate among scientists that there are anywhere from a billion to a trillion stars in a single galaxy. Around every one of these stars there are planets orbiting them, many of which are of the same distance to their star as earth is from the sun.

To go even further, Carl Sagan, said, "There are more galaxies in the cosmos then there are grains of sand on the earth." With these unfathomable numbers, it would be incredibly ignorant to assume that there aren't billions, if not trillions, of planets that support life; some in the form of bacteria and others in a state that is simply inexplicable.

This hypothesis on its own is enough to challenge everything any religion has ever taught.

Assuming that every religion that was ever practiced was wrong, one might question why religion was ever created. The answer to this question really isn't that hard to understand. People are needy, and in general, pretty stupid. Contemplating such questions like, where one goes when they die, or how they got on the earth can be overwhelmingly complicated thoughts.

However, despite the complexity of these questions, people need answers to them, and often the answer is one that makes them happy. For example, there is a perfect being that loves you and has unconditional forgiveness for anything that you may do, so that, in turn you can spend an eternity in paradise. In my personal opinion it is a lot nicer to believe this; it is probably why religion is so popular.

People will believe whatever they are raised to believe. There have been numerous examples of this throughout history, such as the Hitler youth, the belief that the world is flat or simply the idea that if one dies attacking an opposing religion, they are a hero. It is unreasonable to expect people to question such beliefs that they were raised to practice, especially one, if opposed, could result in having them brutally killed and sent to an eternity in the fiery pits of hell.

So, people choose to accept these beliefs and reflect them in their everyday lifestyle due partly to fear and partly to ignorance.

The other part of religion, especially Christianity, that turns me off is the overall nature of those who lead it. The Vatican's track record isn't nearly as perfect as people think. Throughout history, there have been numerous "mistakes," such as the church's acceptance of slave trade and their policy of non-involvement during the Holocaust. Although these things are surprising, they don't question the overall validity of what they preach.

However, there is one event the church underwent that could raise some suspicion. The First Vatican Council spent the majority of their time sorting through the gospels. The reason for this is because, prior to the council meeting, there were 31 gospels, not the four we have today: Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. The reason for this was because the gospels contradicted one another at parts, making it increasingly difficult to attract followers.

Religion is also hypocritical. I say this because every religion preaches peace, and we all know that history is nothing but peaceful. It forces conflict by having people preach their different moral values, as based on their religion, in an attempt to have them incorporated in with society. If one religious group has conflicting views with that of another, there is no happy medium; it always results in a fight. As George Carlin once said, "More people have died in the name of religion than any other reason. All you have to do is look at Northern Ireland, the Middle East, the Holocaust, the Inquisition, the Crusades and 9/11 to see that the more devout religions are, the more they see killing as being negotiable."

Ryan Welsh is a UMass student.

UMass and all it has to offer

Evan Mowery

When I tell people I am a high profile member of the University Gallery's elite security group, I am usually met with a blank stare for a second or so, occasionally accompanied by the appearance of a thin line of saliva that has gradually built itself up and has decided to hang down and wave in the breeze like a shoelace. Then, if the person has been attending this fine establishment as long as I have, he or she will usually begin with a barrage of questions regarding where this place is and why they had never heard of it. Having worked in the gallery every semester of the last three years, I have lost count of the amount of times that I have engaged in conversations of this nature.

They seem fascinated at the things that I relate; deeply motivated to see some of the fine pieces that have been on show recently. Even more so, how they have managed to pass by what was lying right under their very noses.

... Regardless of your future career, you never know where inspiration is going to come from. It may just be waiting for you down in a grey, cavernous pit of a room.

Welcome to the University Gallery. I'm Evan, your freakin' tour guide and you are the patient observer, who will gape in awe as you listen to what I am about to tell you. No, you won't really but it's always nice to hope.

First of all the place is located underneath the ... dum dum dum, Fine Arts Center. It's right there. You walk by it; you might even walk through it, every day single day of your college career. You might have even seen the set of doors right next to the FAC box office, the ones with the fine bold letters emblazoned across the glass of the door announcing the gallery's immediate access point. "Come to me," it seems to call. "Enter and bear witness to new and enchanting products of human creation that you have never seen before." Don't the words "University Gallery" in large white print inspire such delusions in you? Maybe I'm just crazy.

Step through the doors and enter the gallery's cavernous confines. You will be greeted by other smiling professionals like myself who will inquire as to the fine make up of your day thus far. But this fine greeting is only the beginning.

After the guards' greetings, which will no doubt restore any faith that you might have lost regarding the decency and kindness of the human race, you will have the choice of turning either left or right. Regardless of which path that you choose to take, your life experience will be forever changed.

Never in your life will you think back upon your college experience and say "wow, I really wish that I could have stood in a garage of a room and ponder art when I was a senior at UMass. I would have liked to see the concrete contrasted with, for example, the cluster of large mud caked, straw filled birds nests that Ranjani Shettar used to make. Oh, and the cakes of adhesive that dissolve slowly to reveal an angel underneath. Those works were my favorite. Seeing them might have inspired me to take that last class instead of dropping out and taking a job as a proctologist's assistant. Oh, well."

OK. You might say that anyway. I can't stop you. Proctology is a very highly esteemed profession in the medical world, so I'm told. You might, instead, be saying, "Wow, I am so glad I went to see those works at the University Gallery. They inspired me to finish my college career strong and fulfill my dreams of becoming a fully licensed proctologist." Anyway, regardless of your future career, you never know where inspiration is going to come from. It may just be waiting for you down in a grey, cavernous pit of a room.

I write at this moment not with any intention to persuade anyone of you to take a walk through the University Gallery. As a member of the security personnel, the last thing that I would want would be more crazy college students running rampant in the place, with their attitudes and crazy haircuts, playing with everything they can get their grubby little fingers on, and leaving their raunchy smells all over the place.

Instead, I would like to inspire in all of you to go out, explore and take some time from your busy schedules to do something for yourself. Just think of all the cool inventions, like fake poop or puke, that wouldn't have been invented if people stayed all academic and busy their whole lives.

So if you come by with the intention of changing your life around, please remember to spend a little time talking to the charming group of security elite that are giving 110 percent of their energy to please you art lovers and are always up for a good conversation. But leave your bag at the door, use a pencil and don't touch the art unless you want that 110 percent of the security energy to come down upon you like so many ferocious and rampaging wild beasts. And no photography, damn you.

Evan Mowery is a UMass student.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Ashton Kutcher and Amanda Peet talk up 'A Lot Like Love'

By Mike Szymanski
Zap2it.com

LOS ANGELES — Outwardly, it looks like Amanda Peet and Ashton Kutcher are an item. They stroll into an interview together, practically hand in hand. He's protective of her, she lets him pull her chair out for her. They pepper their banter to each other with "honey" and "sweetie."

On screen, their director Nigel Cole says, "I'm amazed how sizzling the two of them come across when they're together. I wish I could take credit for that."

Of course, Kutcher is teamed with actress Demi Moore in real life, and Peet has no comment about her personal life. Yet the two of them are aware that they come across well as a couple who dance around their feelings for each other over a seven-year period in their latest movie, "A Lot Like Love."

"We actually read an actress in Los Angeles, and it wasn't working," Kutcher begins.

"You read 20 people," Peet interrupts. "You can tell the truth."

"We read other actresses and the chemistry wasn't just right," continues Kutcher. "We wanted someone who had the combination to be vulnerable, but also to be funny. I've seen Amanda and she's beautiful, very funny and able to be vulnerable."

Peet looks at her co-star skeptically as if she's being "Punk'd" and then says, "I guess that when we auditioned with each other we fell in love with each other, or I fell in love with Ashton."

In the story, Kutcher's character meets Peet's character on an airplane and they have a quick sexual encounter in a tiny bathroom. She's a New York Goth-like character and he's a kid who's still living at home. They reconnect over a period of years and eventually realize their encounters feel a lot like a real love for each other.

Peet says her character's early years remind her of growing up in New York. "I was a hipster, kind of an artsy person, it was my Goth phase — or at least I tried to be like that. Actually, I was kind of a prude in high school and I did my homework and I went to college. But I identified with this artsy, tough girl."

In reality, both of the young actors are rather cynical about love. Kutcher, 27, admits, "I'm somewhat of a love cynic in that I don't know if it's truly 100 percent attainable every day, but I think that to me love is when your desire for someone else is greater than your desire for yourself — or equal to that."

Peet, 33, adds, "I certainly don't believe in love at first sight. I definitely believe in a lot of chemistry and lust at first sight. But I think that love is something that takes work. As you can see in the movie, I think that timing is everything."

Both of the actors admit doing crazy things for love.

Peet laughs, "I've tried to make a move at the wrong time. I've thrown pebbles at someone's window. I've gone after them when there's another woman in the picture."

And Kutcher recalls a long-distance relationship. "One of the craziest things I did was when I was in Canada shooting a film and I flew in to Los Angeles for 30 minutes to see a person and then flew back out to Canada. I had a 30-minute window where I could see them, and they weren't there. They showed up with about 15 minutes to go. And then I had my 15 minutes and I was gone."

Kutcher says his more-than-15-minutes in the proverbial fame spotlight is always a bit stunning to him. "I often wonder what I'm doing here, why am I sitting in front of this microphone talking to you? Why me?"

When Kutcher is told that his director compares him to legendary star Cary Grant, the young actor is floored. "That's very generous of him, wow!"

But Kutcher disputes Cole's rendition of the nude scene that the two stars performed in the desert. They were posing for an artistic photo shoot, and the director says, "Ashton has a great body, one that I would give 10 years of my life for, and yet he was so hesitant to get naked."

"No, no, I like being nude as often I can, as much as I can be nude I try to be nude," he smiles and then corrects himself. "Seriously, no, it's not that great for me. For other people I like them being nude, but not me so much. You're completely exposed. I had this thong with like a catcher's mitt to wear. It was a little awkward."

Peet adds, "Luckily it was halfway through the shoot, so we already knew each other well, and it was shot on a soundstage, not really in the desert. It worked."

"We were so self-conscious, I think we weren't looking at anything else except ourselves," says Kutcher, pausing and then adding "Well, I was looking at her."

"Oh, I was looking, too," she giggles. "Never mind!"

Fan celebrates nearly 30 years of 'Star Wars' with collection

Enthusiast discusses toy fascination, new film

By Joe Guy Collier
Knight Ridder Newspapers

WESTLAND, Mich. — If Obi-Wan Kenobi and his green friend Yoda could visit the home of John Muse, they would come away with just one conclusion.

"The Force is strong in this one."

Muse, a 35-year-old business consultant, has seen the "Star Wars" movies too many times to count. In 1998, he co-founded a Michigan club for "Star Wars" enthusiasts.

And in a room not that far, far away, he has hundreds of pieces of "Star Wars" memorabilia — everything from a Boba Fett bobble-head to a giant Darth Vader Pez dispenser that plays the ominous Imperial March when the head is tilted open.

Thursday through Sunday, Muse and thousands of other "Star Wars" fans were in Indianapolis for "Star Wars" Celebration III. The convention was a prelude to the May 19 release of "Revenge of the Sith," the sixth and final installment of the "Star Wars" series.

Muse wouldn't miss the movie or convention for the universe.

"It's the last hurrah," says Muse, standing in the midst of his "Star Wars" shrine. "It's the last one. It answers all the questions."

Twenty-eight years after the original "Star Wars" movie hit theaters, the franchise continues to draw allegiance unmatched in the entertainment world.

The first five "Star Wars" movies are among the top 25 U.S. box office draws of all time, earning a combined $1.8 billion domestically and $3.4 billion worldwide, according to industry tracker Box Office Mojo. The sixth movie is expected to be a blockbuster as well.

But "Star Wars" goes beyond the theater. It has spawned clubs, conventions and an endless stream of toys.

Last weekend in Indianapolis, grown-ups, many with kids of their own, donned Storm Trooper suits and Jedi outfits, parading around as though they were members of an intergalactic community.

"It's not just something they do on weekends," says Matthew Kapell, 35, a Wayne State University anthropologist and historian who studies popular culture. "It's almost a religion."

The "Star Wars" franchise has been successful because creator George Lucas stuck to a simple, universal story about good vs. evil and a hero's attempt to save the day, says Kapell, co-author of a book titled "Finding the Force in 'Star Wars'" expected to be released later this year.

"Ordinarily, seeing a film is something that's very passive," Kapell says. "With the 'Star Wars' films, it's something where people can participate."

The love of "Star Wars" started at an early age for Muse. His parents took him to see the original "Star Wars" when he was 8 years old. Before the summer was out, Muse had seen the movie six or seven times. (Among "Star Wars" fans, the original is known as "Star Wars: Episode IV, A New Hope," marking its place in the series.)

"At the time, it was such a different movie," he says. "It

See STAR WARS on page 9

COURTESY RAMIAH KUCKER

"Star Wars" fan John Muse, of Westland, Mich., is pictured at his home with his "Star Wars" collection.

'Star Wars' fan shares life-long love of toys had everything you needed. It had the villains and the good guys you could identify with. ... It had the effects that hadn't been seen before."

STAR WARS from page 8

A year after the movie hit theaters, "Star Wars" action figures filled toy stores. Muse received a few figures for Christmas. When he could scrounge together a couple of bucks, he would buy another at the nearby Kmart.

As he hit his teens, he put most of his "Star Wars" stuff away. But about 10 years ago, he noticed a renewed interest in "Star Wars." Interest soared when word spread that Lucas was making three prequels to the original "Star Wars" trilogy.

In 1998, a year before "Episode I: The Phantom Menace" was released, Muse and four others formed the Michigan "Star Wars" Collectors Club. It has grown to about 80 members.

They have their own Web site, www.mswcc.com, meet six or seven times a year to talk about the movies and collectibles, and frequently attend conventions together.

Members of the club aren't too concerned about being called sci-fi geeks. They aren't, after all, known as "trekkies," a label given to followers of that other sci-fi franchise.

The meetings and conventions are simply a way to reconnect with a major event of their youth, says Scott Chapman, a 34-year-old graphic artist from Utica.

"It's a sense of community," he says. "You can walk up to anyone in the room and start talking and you're on the same page."

Muse attended the past two conventions building up to "Star Wars" Episodes I and II. The first was in Denver and the second in Indianapolis. He also has a tribute to "Star Wars" at home.

"I don't usually clean in here," says wife Tracy, standing at the entrance of what has become John's "Star Wars" Room.

Tracy had never seen "Star Wars" before she met John, but she likes the movies and supports his hobby. She didn't, however, plan to attend the convention in Indianapolis. A four-day adult pass cost $110. One-day passes were $40.

"Eventually, I would probably get bored," she says. "I want him to go and have fun."

Muse never seems to tire of "Star Wars." In his "Star Wars" room, a series of shelves and bookcases wind around the walls with displays of collectibles. The top shelf is lined with a series of plastic character heads, Yoda, Luke, Darth Vader and Chewbacca. It creates something akin to a "Star Wars" Mt. Rushmore.

On the lower shelves, Muse has used the 4-inch action figures to recreate famous scenes from the movies. On one shelf, he has set up the cantina scene from the original "Star Wars." Han Solo and Chewbacca sit at a side table in a bar filled with dozens of strange-looking characters.

In the corner of the room, on a large shelf, Muse is still piecing together what likely will be the most magnificent display: the Emperor's landing from "The Empire Strikes Back." The scene will require hundreds of Storm Troopers lined up in formation.

Fortunately, Muse has hundreds of Storm Troopers. He buys them by the box. He has more than 1,000 figures in all.

The room displays only a fraction of his collection. His collection of the original 130 figures isn't even in his house.

"They're in an undisclosed location guarded by dogs," he says, only half-joking.

Muse won't cough up the location of his vintage collection. It includes a Boba Fett figure still in its case that's valued at more than $1,000. He estimates the entire collection would sell for $15,000 to $20,000.

On eBay last week, more than 50,000 "Star Wars" items were up for auction, including several vintage collections that already had received bids of more than $3,500.

"We want to keep them safe," Muse says about his most prized action figures.

Muse isn't sure how long he'll continue to collect the figures and be so active in the "Star Wars" community. He has a 3-year-old son, Joshua, who is more interested in Hot Wheels than the Force. Joshua's not old enough to appreciate "Star Wars," Muse says.

The Muses also hope to have more children, which could push the figures out of their "Star Wars" room. "They might move down to the basement," Tracy says.

For at least the next month, though, Muse will bask in "Star Wars" glory. He'll likely be in line at midnight for one of the first showings of "Revenge of the Sith."

The movie will end almost 30 years of "Star Wars" immersion for fans like Muse. "Revenge of the Sith" brings the story full circle, tying the newest three movies to the old movies.

"This will fill in all the gaps and all the holes," Muse says. "Then you can move on. You can close the book on it at that point."

Well, sort of. More action figures are on the way. There's also speculation about a TV series.

"If they start making a TV show, I don't know that I'll buy into that," Muse says.

He has to draw the line somewhere.

Experimental rappers bring funk to Iron Horse

By Matthew M. Burke
Collegian Staff

When somebody from the University of Massachusetts is exceptionally talented — and the rest of the country takes notice — it is immensely important that the University community also extends its support. In the case of UMass' own Cold Duck Complex, most of you may have already been to a show to get down with the Duck. Nevertheless, Cold Duck Complex will be rapping its way into the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Thursday and they hope the UMass massive come out in force to support them. Cold Duck will no doubt bring their phenomenal stage presence to the Iron Horse. The show starts at 10 p.m.

Cold Duck Complex
Friday
Iron Horse
Northampton
$8 (advance), $10 (door)

Cold Duck has received numerous accolades over the past several years since they started playing their jazz fusion-funk/island influenced blend of hip-hop that is trademarked by their bone rattling beats and electrifying bass lines. They were the Valley Advocates 2004 Best Hip-Hop Artists and won the battle of the bands here at UMass in 2003. This earned them a slot on the bill that featured 50 Cent, Reel Big Fish and Rahzel at the Mullins Center. Their sophomore album, "Figureheads," reached as high as number 11 on CMJ's North American hip-hop charts. They have toured extensively here in Massachusetts as well as New York and have established a good reputation for rocking the house. They also appeared on MTV University and opened for Esoteric, Soulive, Gramola Funk Express, 7L, Ordinary K and the Addison Groove Project. They have just completed dates in Rhode Island, New York and New Hampshire all the while enrolled in classes here at the University.

Cold Duck Complex is a trio made up of Makaya McCraven on drums, Joe Cardoza on bass, and Jeff D'Antona on keys. They back up Platypus Complex — better known as Casey Hayman — whose lyrics range from the goofy to the introspective. Hayman is a brilliant front man who never seems to slip up in his pursuit of extraordinary lyricism. McCraven's three-piece kit work is equally as amazing and he is truly a sight to see as well as hear. As far as the rest of the band goes, D'Antona and Cardoza are as talented as the rest of this UMass based outfit, and what they lack in stage presence they make up for in skill.

"This show should be a humdinger," McCraven said. "These shows [when we come home] are always our best."

Opening the show is Outernational. They are an N.Y.C. based jazz fusion/Latin/ dancehall/ hip-hop quintet whose political message is just as important as their outstanding stage performances and lead singer Miles Solay's smooth and powerful raps. They often play at rallies for their political causes and have toured with everyone from Wyclef Jean to Tom Morello (Rage Against the Machine, Audioslave) who had nothing but great things to say about them in interviews.

The show promises to be a great night of hip-hop, so come out and support UMass' own Cold Duck Complex as they make a bigger name for themselves and put UMass on the hip-hop map.

UMass alumni Cold Duck Complex blend funk, jazz, and hip hop on their latest studio album, "Figureheads."

PUFFTON VILLAGE

Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments-1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410 Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145 www.pufftonvillage.com

STUDENTTRAVEL
Discover Europe!
Perfect trips for your European Adventure
The Big 3 $491
Mediterranean Explorer $551
UK & Beyond $561
Eastern Europe Experience $327
These packages do not include airfare. Taxes and other applicable fees are not included.
STA TRAVEL
(413) 256.1261
www.statravel.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
Artistic?
Enjoy pop culture?
Want some money?
Apply to work for Arts!

Bring these back and get pennies on the dollar.
Bring these back and get $250 in discounts on travel, DVD movies, software and more!

Here's all you need to do:
> Return your Comcast cable box, remote, and/or Comcast-provided modem to your local Comcast Payment Center (visit www.comcast.com to find the Payment Center near you).
> Go to www.comcast-ne.com/students and register for your $250 rewards card.
> When you receive your rewards card via mail, you'll have exclusive access to a website marketplace with tons of deals, including travel, DVD movies, magazines, software, and more! It's that simple!
Comcast.

Rapper wants to be country's first black star since Charley Pride

By Mario Tarradell
The Dallas Morning News

DALLAS — Cowboy Troy can't walk into a concert venue without turning heads. He knows there's no way a 6-foot-5-inch black country rapper can escape the curious stares. Especially when he's wearing a Superman T-shirt. The spotlight, he admits, can be intimidating.

"There are times where if you let it wear you down, you can feel the pressure," says the 34-year-old Dallas-raised artist. "There are times when I find myself walking through venues and I can kind of feel the looks from people.

'Oh, so he's the one.' I walk through places and I can hear the whispers. When the lights come on and the music starts and you're out there on stage and you hear the people cheering, clapping, it's pretty cool."

It's also historic Cowboy Troy Coleman is country music's first rapper, a purveyor of what he calls "hick-hop," a mixture of authentic country instrumentation, hip-hop rhythms and flowing, rhyming words.

And if he's successful, he will become the first black country artist to break out since Charley Pride almost 40 years ago.

Cowboy Troy first attracted the attention of country fans in 2004 during Big & Rich's tour. He rapped on "Rollin' (The Ballad of Big & Rich)," a cut from the pair's 2-million-selling debut album, "Horse of a Different Color."

When he performed that rap at last year's Country Music Association Awards in Nashville, he was the first black artist since Pride to take the stage at the awards show.

"That's pretty interesting to me on a historical basis and pretty humbling at the same time because they didn't have to let me do it," he says. "They could have said, 'No, no, that's not where we want to go.' But the CMA board was very gracious and very kind to me in allowing me to participate."

The buzz on him grew louder after five months on the road with Big & Rich opening for country superstar Tim McGraw. McGraw was so impressed with Cowboy Troy's rapping abilities that he asked Coleman to write a rap to perform during "She's My Kind of Rain," one of McGraw's hit country ballads.

"You already had this rap on a major-label release and then you've got one of the biggest names in country music saying, 'Hey man, we want you to do something like that on my set,'" says Coleman. He rapped during "She's My Kind of Rain" every night until the end of the trek.

He also wore a Superman T-shirt every night of the tour. It was supposed to be a onetime goofy sight gag, but the crowd and the other musicians on the tour loved it, so it became his uniform.

"I ended up having to buy five or six of them," he says. "You wash one five times in one week and eventually it starts fading. ... I retired it at the end of the tour."

Now Coleman's on his own. "Loco Motive," which arrives in stores May 17, is the first release on Big & Rich's label, Raybaw, which stands for "red and yellow black and white." He hopes to capitalize on the success of Big & Rich's album and the media attention showered on the Muzik Mafia, the no-boundaries artist collective formed by Big Kenny and John Rich. That collective includes sizzling newcomer Gretchen Wilson ("Redneck Woman"), Cowboy Troy and a cast of quirky musicians and offbeat characters.

"It's important that Cowboy Troy is the first one because it kind of goes along with the whole Mafia theme of music without prejudice," says Cory Gierman, general manager of Raybaw Records and one of the founders of the Muzik Mafia. Coleman's time on the Big & Rich tour helped, too.

"He was the first one to get the exposure. So we decided to kick it off with him and get the train rolling."

Every track on "Loco Motive" showcases Cowboy Troy's way with rhymes. His robust voice glides smoothly over country-rocking instrumentation. Big & Rich sing on three cuts, and McGraw and Muzik Mafia members James Otto and Jon Nicholson each sing on one track.

The lead cut on "Loco Motive" is the rock-and-hip-hop-influenced "I Play Chicken With the Train," a loose metaphor for his battle to stare down the country music world:

"People said it's impossible ... not probable ... too radical/But I already been on the CMA's ...," he raps.

"I'm big and black, clickety-clack/And I make the train jump the track like that!"

For Troy Coleman, that country, rock and hip-hop combo was the soundtrack of his high school days.

He was enthralled with music, all kinds of it. He moved from the country sounds of Charlie Daniels, the Oak Ridge Boys and Jerry Reed to rockers Kiss, Kansas, Eagles, ZZ Top and Foreigner. But he had a penchant for rappers LL Cool J, Sir Mix-A-Lot, Run DMC, Ice-T and Ice Cube. Rapping was a fun pastime that got him noticed.

Cowboy Troy Coleman of Dallas knows he stands out in his field, being country's only black rapping cowboy. Calling his style "hick-hop," Coleman became inspired by Tim McGraw after five months of opening for him on tour.

COURTESY MICHAEL MCVAY

"I was kind of messing around with it, listening to the cassettes back then at the house and I had my headphones on hitting the rewind button over and over. I kept hitting that rewind button so I could deliver it just like the guys did on the tape. It became kind of a party trick. I messed around with that from time to time. I remember one time doing that in front of a group of students and they would say, 'Didn't know you could do that.'"

Coleman decided to give it a shot. He kept in contact with John Rich, whom he met in Dallas in 1993 when Rich was a member of Texassee, which later became Lonestar. By 1999, Cowboy Troy was making trips to Nashville, unsuccessfully trying to stir up interest in his unique style. That's when Rich introduced him to Big Kenny. Four years later, when Big & Rich were recording their debut CD, Rich called Cowboy Troy with the proposition of a lifetime.

"'Rollin' didn't originally have a rap part in it," he says. "And they asked me to write a rap part for it. They said they had gotten the go-ahead from the label to put the rap in there. They wanted me to be on the record. That was just nuts for me. I was like, 'Sure!' It began to sink in that I was going to make an appearance on a major-label release for mass consumption. I was trying to wrap my mind around it at the time."

Today, Cowboy Troy's life is on a roller coaster. He and his wife, Laura, relocated to Nashville. He's promoting the upcoming "Loco Motive" with the usual media interviews and personal appearances. But he knows the album might face an uphill battle.

In a genre guilty of supporting the conventional and ignoring the experimental, his one shot is make-or-break. Unconventional artists such as Cowboy Troy either explode instantly or fizzle quickly. But like Big & Rich, a top-selling act not often played on the radio, Cowboy Troy has honky-tonks on his side.

Big & Rich's mix of traditional country, rock, hip-hop and some Southern gospel appeals to the young fans who crowd the clubs every weekend. Walk into any honky-tonk and before long you'll hear the DJ play a rock tune or a hip-hop track. And when that happens, everybody flocks to the dance floor.

"I'm one of those people at the bar jumping out on the floor dancing around when those songs came on," says Coleman. "I knew there were other people out there like myself that enjoyed those combinations of music: rock, rap and country, all in one song."

The first sign country music could be hip enough to accept Cowboy Troy came when rap rocker Kid Rock morphed into Southern rock before completely embracing his inner hillbilly on 2003's "Kid Rock." Then Big & Rich sold 2 million albums.

And country rap may not be the big stretch it appears. In the original square dancing, the announcer was essentially rapping to an Appalachian beat.

"Cowboy Troy is what he says he is," says Paul Worley, head of the artist and repertoire department for Warner Bros. Nashville and a co-producer of "Loco Motive." "We did not make him up. He's a 6-foot-5 black rapping cowboy that grew up in Dallas loving all kinds of music, and yet his first love is country music. ... So when I started hearing some of these songs, I thought, 'We gotta do this 'cause it's great.'"

UMassAmherst Student Activities Center
UP TO THE MINUTE

Sunday, May 1
University Productions and Concerts (UPC) presents
2005 Spring Concert
Nas, Fabolous, and Dropkick Murphys
Mullins Center, Doors open 6pm, Showtime 6:30pm
Tickets are FREE for UMass Amherst students with valid ID.
$15/Five-College students $35/general public

Tuesday, May 3
The Republican Club presents
Dan Flynn
Campus Center 163C, 7pm

Wednesday, May 4
Music Injection Wednesdays
Bring your lunch and get a healthy dose of live music between classes!
Student Union, South Steps, 11am – 1pm.
Rain location: Cape Cod Lounge

International Movie Series
Goodbye Lenin
Directed by Wolfgang Becker
Campus Center, 163C, 8pm FREE

Thursday, May 5
2nd Annual Festival of the Arts
Be amazed by the musical, dramatic, and artistic talents of your fellow students. Come find your inner artist at the interactive art displays!
Fine Arts Center Plaza, 12pm-3pm, rain or shine!

Saturday, May 7
Black Mass Communication Project (BMCP) presents
Funk-O-Thon
With DJ James "Showtime" Bennett
Curry Hicks Cage, 9pm – 2am
$8 UMass Amherst students / $15 General public
Must have college ID for entrance.

Monday, May 9
Arab Students Club presents
A Talk by the Syrian Ambassador:
View from the Middle East
Bowker, 7pm FREE

Stonewall Center presents
Queer Awards Ceremony & Graduation
Memorial Hall, 7pm

Tuesday, May 10
Mass PIRG presents
The Used Book Funeral
Library Lawn, 10am – 3pm

Wednesday, May 11
The Big Chill Carnival and BBQ
Library Lawn, 2pm – 6pm
Free food, incredible rides, great giveaways, and amazing music.
Rain date: May 12 FREE

Thursday, May 12
Tension Breakers
Save the drama for yo' momma, but let us help relieve your stress.
Sugar, Massage, and aromatherapy!
Campus Center Concourse, 10am – 2pm FREE

Student Alliance for Israel presents
Israeli Independence Day
Music and Kosher food!
Pond Lawn, 5:30pm FREE

Mix it Up Dance Series: Country
Come hear the greatest country music and learn the dances that keep the Texas two-steppers on their toes.
Free giveaways for all!
Student Union Ballroom, 8 pm-10 pm FREE

Friday, May 13
The Ultimate-Chill Disc Tournament
All skill levels welcome. Prizes for the winning teams and sport bags for everyone who participates!
Sign up in teams of 8 by May 6.
Email chill_disc@yahoo.com for more information.
Pond lawn, 12 noon FREE

Saturday, May 14
Vocal Suspects presents
The WMSF Vocal Suspects Radio Concert
A flashback to 1940's radio with a favorite campus a cappela student group.
Campus Center Auditorium, 8pm
$2/UMass Amherst students $5/general public

Brought to you by Student Affairs and Campus Life
UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/uhome/events

Freshman has future

TYPADIS from page 14

Typadis has joined the ranks of the UMass women's lacrosse team with 13 other freshmen on a 24 person roster. This is a huge amount of underclassmen for UMass coach Carrie Bolduc to handle, with a young team always in danger of catching the immaturity bug.

However, as coach Bolduc has repeated countless times, the youth on the team responded well to the adversities of a full lacrosse season and provided a spark when needed.

This year's women's team — like the Boston Red Sox — has a cast of interesting and colorful characters. Although their antics fall well short of throwing back shots of Jack Daniels before games, Typadis will admit that this isn't your run-of-the-mill squad.

"We're pretty crazy," Typadis joked. "We go to the campus pond to try and catch fish sometimes."

Fishing in the pond? Maybe these girls have gone off the deep end, but it has been these types of stunts that have become emblematic of the freshmen identity. Typadis fits right in.

When the team started going on road trips at the beginning of the year, three freshmen started a band that they called "Agoo". Typadis led the gang and rocked out on the acoustic guitar, while freshmen Julie Papaleo and Kristina Twichell helped with the vocals and the song writing.

The lyrics are in a dialect that, apparently, no one can understand except a select few on the team. While they haven't been getting together as of late, they are still writing lyrics chock-full of inside jokes and comic relief.

The lacrosse schedule is intense and time consuming all year long, but — along with playing the acoustic guitar — Typadis finds time to watch various reality shows on MTV, and she is an admitted "OC"-watcher (many people watch it but there are very few who can admit it). She is an avid Red Sox fan and her favorite player is — of course — Johnny Damon, with Jason Varitek running a close second.

Kathleen Typadis has been a leader for the Minutewomen, despite only being a freshman.

ANDREW TAMBURINO/COLLEGIAN

Her athleticism goes well beyond the lacrosse field. She was a soccer player in high school and plays pick up basketball once in a while. While most of us are sinking in to the coach watching "Sportscenter", Typadis is always outside when she can be, using all of her athletic skills that have stood out so much at Garber Field this year.

It is appropriate that Typadis started her career off playing with the guys, and no coincidence that the "Rocky" movies are some of her favorites. Typadis plays tough and prides herself on hustle. She is the type of player in sports who you love to have on your team, but hate to see on the other sideline.

"My expectations of myself are very high," Typadis said. "So if I'm not doing what I know I should be doing, I get frustrated. I don't think about anything else except what I can do to win."

Her affable personality is complemented by an intensity that is reflected in her play. But she has not become the player she is without some help. It doesn't hurt to have the defending Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year push you around in practice every day. That would be senior captain Kristin St. Hilaire, who — along with junior Kerri Connerty — has become a guiding influence for Typadis on and off the field.

"Kerri [Connerty] has been working with me every day and telling me what I need to work on constantly. And I like that," she said. "Saint [Hilaire], as a defender, there's no one better than her. They're very good to me."

There was an intimidation factor going against the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year, however.

"She's pretty intimidating," Typadis said. "I had to become more multidimensional. But once I knew I could face her I knew I'd be alright."

St. Hilaire, a fifth-year senior, is as tough as they come — you don't become defensive player of the year without knowing how to throw a few elbows. And she has seen a little bit of herself in Typadis, as the freshmen has brought the aggressiveness to the offensive end of the field this year.

"She's feisty like I am," St. Hilaire said. "Which is good because you usually don't see that in attackers. It's nice to have that mentality down at the other end [of the field]."

Over the weekend, St. Hilaire matched up with George Washington sophomore attacker Laura Hostetler who leads the Colonials in multiple offensive categories, and is in the top 3 in the Atlantic 10 in goals, assists and points. That was just the usual for St. Hilaire, as most of the time she gets matched up with the other team's best. Her biggest praise, however, was reserved for Typadis.

"She challenges me just as much as I challenge her," St. Hilaire said. "I haven't played against an attacker this year that's better than she is, so it's good to get out there everyday and play against her. She's hard to read and you never know what she's going to do. She's the hardest person I've had to guard throughout my career."

And this is coming from a defender that regularly chews up the A-10's best attackers. But Typadis' game demands this kind of attention, as she has lead the team in scoring this year, and is right behind Kerri Connerty for the team lead in points. Connerty, along with St. Hilaire, has helped Typadis progress and develop a multidimensional offensive game.

"She has so many new elements to her game," Connerty said. "She's gotten more knowledgeable about what's going on, on offense. In the last couple of games, we've seen her mature in terms of coming up with something big, or not getting down. She's also talking more now and becoming more of a vocal leader."

Twomley hones in on record

BASEBALL from page 14

be making errors."

First baseman and star hitter Bryan Sabatella was neutralized by the Minutemen, finishing only 1-for-5. However, the hitters ahead of, and behind Sabatella were on fire. Sophomore centerfielder Tim Binkoski and Magee both 3-for-5, with a home run and four RBI.

Freshman third baseman John Delaney also had a stellar game, going 4-for-4 with two RBI.

"The problem was they had other good hitters around [Sabatella]," Stone said. "Their number three and five hitters were good left-handed hitters. That made it tough to pitch around [Sabatella] that we started to pitch to him. Early in the game the pitchers didn't have the command to do it."

ANDREW TAMBURINO/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore Bryan Adamski and the UMass baseball team will look for redemption against Boston College tomorrow.

Pacers, Celts knotted at one

By Steve Herman
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — Stephen Jackson has a message for all those Celtics fans who were taunting Reggie Miller during the first two games of Indiana's first-round playoff series against Boston: Thanks.

"When I played against him, I never said anything to Reggie because once you upset him, he's going to wake up and drain five straight 3s," Jackson said. "That woke him up, and we needed Reggie to have the type of game he did."

A rejuvenated Miller, faced with the possibility of his final playoff series, showed he's still capable of postseason magic. He quieted the crowd at the FleetCenter in Boston with 28 points, including a game-clinching basket in the closing seconds, and the Pacers tied the best-of-seven series with an 82-79 victory Monday night. Game 3 is Thursday night in Indianapolis.

As for the mocking chants, the 39-year-old Miller said he's heard far worse in his 18-year career.

"I'm just trying to play hard and finish my tenure here. Sometimes you just let sleeping dogs lie," said Miller, who plans to retire at the end of the playoffs. "I haven't talked trash in six or seven years in a playoff series."

Miller had only seven points in a 102-82 Pacers' loss Saturday.

"All I can say is, please keep chanting his name," Pacers center Scot Pollard said. "Make him angry. Please Boston fans, make Reggie Miller angry."

Boston's Paul Pierce said the Celtics let Miller find a groove early.

"As a scorer, once you hit your first couple of shots, then it's going to be tough to stop you the whole night," Pierce said Tuesday. "We have to do a better job finding him in transition, be a little bit more physical, not let him catch the ball as easy as he did last night because he was a major factor last night."

Neither team practiced on Tuesday. The Celtics, who watched tape of Game 2, plan to practice at home on Wednesday before flying to Indianapolis.

Boston coach Doc Rivers said the Celtics lost the game on defense, even though the Pacers scored only 82 points.

"The game was so slow in my opinion we could have played better defense, as crazy as that sounds," he said. "And then showing them the last seven minutes (on tape) would make anybody who was a Celtics fan cry. It really would. It was bad basketball."

Miller, who donned a Superman T-shirt for warmups during a first-round series against Milwaukee in 2000, when the Pacers reached the NBA Finals, has been playing the role again out of necessity. Ron Artest, the NBA's defensive player of the year in 2004, was suspended almost the entire season, and Jackson and Jermaine O'Neal also received lengthy suspensions following the November brawl with fans in Detroit.

Injuries also devastated the Pacers.

O'Neal, a four-time All-Star, also missed time with a shoulder injury that's still not completely healed. Guard Jamaal Tinsley played in only 40 games because of a variety of ailments and missed the past 29 games because of a bruised foot, although he is on the 12-man playoff roster and still hopes to play against Boston.

"Reggie Miller in the playoffs, and after what happened in Game 1, we all knew he would come back in a big way," Pacers coach Rick Carlisle said.

Steroids remain as an issue

NFL from page 12

said in remarks prepared for testimony Wednesday before the House Government Reform Committee and released by the league Tuesday. "We have not had all the answers but we have worked with leading institutions and top scientists to seek to stay ahead of an ever-changing curve."

The change in the testosterone ratio threshold mirrors the practices of the International Olympic Committee and World Anti-Doping Agency.

Wednesday's hearing is a follow-up to last month's session in which lawmakers questioned baseball players and officials about that sport's steroids policy.

Tagliabue and players' association executive director Gene Upshaw are among 10 witnesses scheduled to appear, including one former player, Steve Courson, an offensive lineman who has spoken out against steroid use.

Upshaw said the changes to the NFL's drug policy were not brought about by the congressional attention.

"This is something we do every year. Annually, we review our policy, and if there are changes to keep up with science, we do it in the course of our annual review," Upshaw said. "This is no reaction whatsover to appearing before this committee. To tell the truth, we've been doing this for years."

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
no hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-643-0160
Please Drink Responsibly

EASTERN MOUNTAIN SPORTS
Upgrade Your Gear SALE!
20% OFF
Everything in the Store.
April 29-30
Special Club Member Shopping Hours
April 28 4PM to Close
We're giving you a break on everything we've got. That means all kinds of upgrade options. Bring the right tools to the wilderness. Don't go out there without prime gear.
Go to www.ems.com for the store nearest you.

TODAY!
rain or shine
Career Services OPEN HOUSE
10am - 3pm in 511 Goodell
Stop in and meet our Career Counselors
Tour our new offices
Check out the computer lab/resource room
Register for eRecruiting
Preview our upcoming events
Pick up information about internships/co-ops & enjoy free refreshments!
You can also come get an employer's perspective on your resume at...
Resumé EXPRESS
phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building

Zywicki sparks UMass in win

TRAP from page 14

Connolly's goal set the score at 3-1, and served as a spark for the Minutemen's offense, which would net four more goals in the next four minutes.

Chandis again was called for a foul with seven minutes remaining in the period, as he was given a minute in the box for pushing. Jeff Zywicki, who had four goals in the game, scored on the man-up opportunity after stick-faking Macleod on the outside of the crease.

"I think that goal Connolly got when we were a man up helped get us going. It pulled us away by two then we went on a little run there," Zywicki said. "That definitely did help us, those penalties."

One of the more impressive performances came from the Minutemen's defense, which was able to shut out the Crimson for nearly 37 minutes, during their 7-0 run. This scoreless streak was the longest for UMass this season.

Leading the way on defense for the Maroon and White was the solid play of Schell, who recorded nine saves in the game.

"Billy [Schell] saved those guys when he needed to. I'm not sure how many saves he had, but he was stellar today," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

"Defensively, we just have to keep on playing; sometimes the offense isn't going to score 14 goals, so we've got to hold them down," Schell said. "If you've got to win 2-1, then whatever, that's the way it's got to be."

With the win, the Minutemen won their 20th New England title. UMass has won four out of the last five titles.

"I had no idea about it until before today's game when guys were saying it to get fired up," Zywicki said. "We didn't make that big a deal out of it, it's just another game, just another game to win."

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Jeff Zywicki led the Minutemen to a victory over Harvard, scoring four goals against the Crimson. UMass will meet its next opponent on Saturday at Garber Field.

Morris, who leads the Minutemen in goals (32) and assists (18) had a goal and two assists in the game. Morris was not pleased with the way the offense came out and mentioned that he was relieved when the game was over.

"Offensively, I didn't think we were there today at all. We just weren't clicking, it was 2-1 at halftime, I don't we've ever been 2-1 [at halftime] since I've been here," Morris said. "We were able to bounce back in the third. In the fourth we were able to kill the clock and hold them down on D."

One thing Cannella was impressed with was the hustle of some of his offensive players. He mentioned that both teams were tired after last weekend, but was pleased with the way some of his players responded to fatigue. With three minutes left in the first quarter, Zywicki chased down the ball from halfway across the field in an attempt to keep it inbounds. He dove and swung his stick, but the ball trickled harmlessly out of play as Zywicki hit the ground hard.

A minute later, Zywicki and Morris chased down starting keeper O'Donnell and checked the ball loose, regaining possession.

"I think he (Zywicki) was a little frustrated. I think all those guys were out trying to do a lot, and it wasn't happening for them," Cannella said. "It was great to see, when they're struggling on the offensive end, to do the extra things. Jeff did a good job with that."

'Cuse is next on tap

TRAP from page 14

tle tripped up.

"When we started out pretty slow, I was a little worried, but once we started picking things up in the third quarter, I knew that we'd be alright," UMass senior attackman Jeff Zywicki said.

He was speaking of the slim 2-1 lead his Minutemen had with just inside 24 minutes left to play in the game.

Then, in a span of 2:47, UMass rallied for five straight goals in five consecutive possessions to stretch its advantage to 7-1, virtually ending any glimmer of hope the Crimson had and slamming shut that trap door that had an open invitation for the Maroon and White.

The Minutemen staved off a small flurry of Harvard goals in the fourth quarter and headed back to Amherst with an 8-5 victory snuggled tightly in their hip pockets.

"It's good to get through it," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "We talked about it the other day. It's a setup game, and a difficult one, so it's good to get through it and get the W, so we're happy."

"It's tough," junior attackman Sean Morris said. "Everyone was sore [Monday] and Sunday. It's tough to get your legs back, and we got so hyped up on Saturday, and we had to get hyped up again today...Now it's said and done, and we're on to Syracuse, and it's time to step our game up."

When the game ended, the noticeably worn-out Minutemen breathed a huge sigh of relief and a weight the size of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library lifted off their collective shoulder.

After receiving a day off on Sunday, the players only had about one full day to prepare for the Crimson, who were coming off an impressive 11-4 trouncing of No. 16 Yale.

And just like that, Cannella knew on Monday that Harvard didn't and wouldn't care about UMass' two Old-West-like showdowns that were surrounding this game.

One player who will benefit from this extra outing before Syracuse makes its way to Amherst is goalie Bill Schell, who made nine saves, with five of them coming in the fourth quarter.

"It's good because I'm seeing a lot of shots to help me get ready for Syracuse, so that kind of keeps me kind of fresh," Schell said. "I don't lose my edge too much."

Zywicki, who scored a game-high four goals including the eventual game-winner, admitted that it was a tough task to completely concentrate on Harvard, but also said he likes the thrill of playing three games in eight days.

"Anytime you get to play more games instead of practicing all week, it's a great week, especially when you get Georgetown, and then Harvard and then 'Cuse, three of our big rivals," Zywicki said. "It's awesome... We've got to prepare for 'Cuse now, and I can't wait for the weekend."

At least now, with this trap door embedded in the team bus' rearview mirror, they can afford to get ready for that orange circle that has been drawn around April 30 since the season began.

Softball wins two

SOFTBALL from page 14

moved up a base on a fly out by KJ Kelley.

Denise Denis then hit a fly ball to center that scored Morin easily. Molinari also tagged up and tried to advance to third. The throw from the centerfielder to third was offline allowing Molinari to score the game-tying run. Busa (10-5) set down the Crimson in order in the top of the seventh setting up the dramatic finish. Both teams received strong pitching efforts in the first game yesterday, as the game was scoreless for the first three innings.

UMass pitcher Barb LaFogg (16-9), who was named co A-10 Pitcher of the Week for the third time this season on Monday, was strong on the mound and received excellent defense from her teammates.

The play of the day was turned in by the UMass defense with runners on first and second and one out in the fourth inning. Harvard's Danielle Kerper laced a grounder up the middle that Cullington laid out to snare. Cullington attempted to get the force out at second but her flip to second baseman Kristi Stefanoni was late.

While the play at second was taking place, Lauren Stefanchik attempted to score all the way from second. Stefanoni fired a strike to home where Kelley did a superb job blocking the plate. Kelley caught the throw and tagged Stefanchik out after she was unable to touch the plate. Harvard got on the board first in the fifth on three consecutive singles to take a 1-0 lead.

The Minutewomen answered in the sixth inning, as Candice Molinari led off with a double over the left fielder's head and scored on a single to the right-center gap by Kelley. Maggie Feix came on to run for Kelley and was moved to second on a bunt by Denis. After a hit batter and a strike out, Cullington came to the plate with two on and two out.

Cullington connected with a shot to right field that bounced on the top of the wall and went over, giving UMass a 4-1 lead it would not relinquish.

Following the two come-from-behind wins, Busa was happy to see that her team was able to come through in the clutch, but believes the Minutewomen need to come out and score early so they aren't always playing catch-up.

"It gives us the notion of knowing that no matter what position we're in we can do it," Busa said. "We've come from behind a lot this year. We need to be more ready at the beginning of the games, but we're used to it now. The one thing we should work on is scoring first. Sometimes we press, but mostly we stay calm and composed."

Wells out with sprained foot

BOSTON (AP) — Red Sox left-hander David Wells will go on the 15-day disabled list after he sprained his right foot in Monday's 8-4 loss to Baltimore.

Manager Terry Francona said Tuesday that Wells could be out for more than a month.

He injured the foot in the fourth inning as he tried to field Javier Lopez's slow roller. He hobbled back to the mound but remained in the game for five more batters before leaving.

Left-hander John Halama will take Wells' spot in the rotation and start next Tuesday in Detroit.

Wells (2-3) gave up six runs and eight hits in 3 2-3 innings on Monday.

He entered the game with a 15-inning scoreless string over his past two starts, both Boston shutouts.

— Associated Press

Pats ink Scott

FOXBORO (AP) — The New England Patriots signed free agent cornerback Chad Scott on Tuesday after he was released by the Steelers following eight seasons in Pittsburgh.

Scott, 30, was a Steelers starter for six-plus seasons before he injured a knee in October. He was unable to win his job back after returning in December and spent the rest of the season and the playoffs as a reserve.

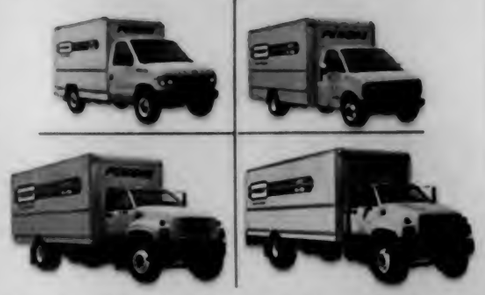
Pittsburgh needed to get under the salary cap and Scott's salary was the highest among Steelers defensive starters. He was due to make $3.8 million in 2005 under the $25 million, six-year contract he signed in 2001.

—Associated Press

NFL tough on steroid abuse

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The NFL is tripling the number of offseason steroid tests each player can face, part of several changes to the league's drug policy that officials will tell members of Congress about Wednesday.



Players now will be subject to a maximum of six random drug tests during each offseason, up from two, NFL spokesman Joe Browne said Tuesday.

The league and union also had recently agreed to add new substances to the list of banned performance enhancers, to put in writing previously agreed-to policies to test for designer steroids, and to lower the testosterone ratio threshold.

"For two decades, the NFL has had very strong programs in place to rid its locker rooms of performance-enhancing drugs," commissioner Paul Tagliabue

See NFL on page 11

Heading Home for the Summer?

Local ~ One Way ~ Do-It-Yourself Moves

We'll Take You Where You Want To Go

PENSKE Truck Leasing

* Low Rates
* Full Line of Moving Accessories
* Free Unlimited Mileage on One-Way Truck Rentals
* Full Range of Clean, Fuel-Efficient Trucks
* 24-hour Emergency Road Service
* Automatic Transmission and Air Conditioning Available

10% student discount with coupon below.

Receive a 10% discount WITH THIS COUPON on your next Local or One-Way truck Rental

Call (413) 549-1644

10% Discount — PENSKE Truck Leasing — 10% Discount

Affordable, new, clean trucks at convenient rental locations

This coupon is not valid with any other offer. One per truck rental and subject to availability. A One-Way rental means your Penske truck is rented at one city and returned to another.

For Reservations Call 549-1644

Do you dream of the highest quality, craftsmanship & comfort in your mattress?

The YANKEE Mattress Factory

Luxurious, hand crafted sleep sets

Custom-made sizes, antiques, RV mattresses and waterbed inserts

Locally owned with 14 years of providing affordable, superior mattresses for a great night's sleep

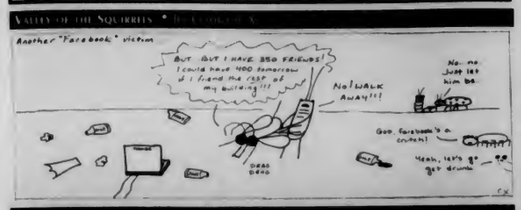
Now conveniently located in Amherst Center!

220 North Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002
413-658-0013

Time To Put On Your Party Shoes At Northampton Bowl

Where you can party and Still hear a pin drop!

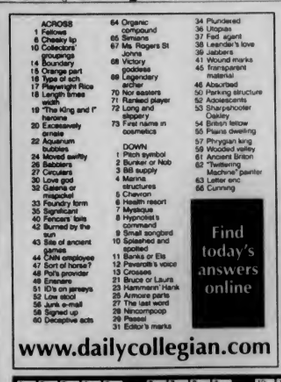
College Rock N Bowl
Every Thursday night...9pm-Midnight
Includes: Unlimited Bowling * Shoe Rental * Music & Laser Lights



Full Service Lounge * Snack Bar & Gameroom

OPEN LANES EVERY DAY CALL FOR AVAILABILITY

Northampton Bowl
525 Pleasant Street
Northampton 584-4830



QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I guess I should warn you, if I turn out to be particularly clear, you've probably misunderstood what I've said."

—Alan Greenspan

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP

NEW!! Wireless Internet

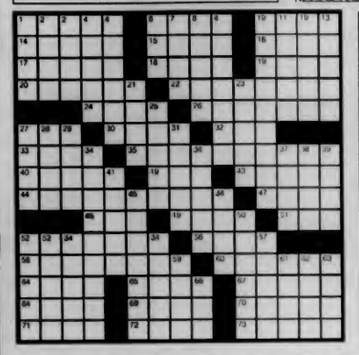
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted

Irish Pub

April Special!

$1.50 PBR Bottles, Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher

UMASS/Cherry Hill Open House Moved to Mon, May 2nd



WED. ·Breakaway sol.
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Seisiun
Sat: ·Amity Front

No Cover!

"Come Party Like You're Irish!"

413-548-6900 www.theharp.net

163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

559-3384 ROUTE 63 ROADHOUSE Rt. 63 North Millers Falls

Only 15 minutes from campus

Wednesday
Thursday
Friday - Saturday
CATAMOUNT
Classic Rock at 9:30 PM
Sunday
Monday
Tuesday
Texas Hold-em Night
All remaining patrons 7:00PM

NEXT THURSDAY MAY 5th
Cinco de Mayo Party

$5.00 pitchers of Bud and Bud light always

www.rt63roadhouse.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You can't always expect everyone to be happy all the time.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
If there was any doubt before, you're definitely going to hell now.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You could practically order Wings with all that change you've got lying around.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Never trust a person who mumbles something to you while half-asleep.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Someone is definitely trying to mess with your mind.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Wearing loose shoes is almost as hard as wearing shoes that are too tight.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You are a hug machine. Just keep giving out the hugs to the people that need them.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You'd be surprised at all the things you wrote in your journal last year.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Don't ride your bicycle into any trees or animals.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't take on too many things at once. It's bad news.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You need to talk to your manager very soon. This is getting out of hand.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You're going to have a jolly good time making fun of your roommate today.

Build your business with our business.

Place your ad here, in The Collegian. $$$

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-2900

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

Holyoke 5 1/2 spacious rooms great Location $800 includes heat Joanne 538-8804

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

1 Bedroom w/in 2 bedroom condo in North Amherst. Clean, Washer/dryer in condo $425 includes heat & electric Summer rentals considered. On bus route, 1 mile to UMass, female student preferred. Call Liz 508-367-8893.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

2 bedroom $1050/ 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 Mill ValleyEstates@aminno.com

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SHOWING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstdevelopreality.com 253-7879

AUTO FOR SALE

2001 Toyota Corolla 5 Speed 59k asking $6400 Call Terry 413-256-8737

1993 Nissan Maxima SE V6, 5 speed stick, loaded, $3500 Elsinew@educumass.edu

EMPLOYMENT

NOW HIRING CAMPUS MANAGERS Ready for the UReps challenge? UReps is looking for the most outgoing, enthusiastic leaders for our Campus Managers position for the Fall, 2005 semester! Work 10 hours per week, gain valuable business experience, and earn while you build your resume. $100 weekly salary plus bonuses. To learn more, and apply visit www.Ureps.com

EMPLOYMENT

Smart. Fun. Motivated. Entertaining. (But enough about us.) EATS Magazine needs 2 bright, persuasive, entrepreneurial individuals to head up sales for our UMASS Off Campus Guide. – UMass Alum Dave Stoll is looking for several motivated sales reps, to work to build new relationships with many of Amherst's most popular establishments. There will be a HIGH incentive commission structure for those selected…and lots of free food. Send a cover letter to info@eatsmagazine.com telling us why you are the perfect candidate!

Live in Babysitter needed for two girls this summer in Wellfleet on Cape Cod. Salary, Room, and board. Please Call 508-349-6192

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives CampusFundraiser is hiring outgoing students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 o $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour; 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

[redacted]

EMPLOYMENT

Moving: Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Bases commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Café. 60 Masonic St. Northampton.

Spring Break 2006 with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator. Hiring Campus reps. Call for group discounts. Info/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.sterninet.com

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetThrusing.com - Call Dan 413-682-0020

"Parttending" $400/day potential. No experience nece. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Painters 2-3 years experience Must have a vehicle part-time, full-time Call Michael 367-9845

SUMMER ADVERTISING INTERNSHIP Excellent Advertising Sales and Marketing opportunity. Earn $3,000-$8,000 and gain valuable business EXPERIENCE developing the UMASS Official Campus Telephone Directory. GREAT RESUME BOOSTER! Call Jen at College Directory Publishing, Inc. 1-800-466-2221 ext.224 www.campusdirectory.com

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until Late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call: 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

HOUSE FOR RENT

Sunny, Single Family House 4 bedrooms, Amherst Center, On bus route. Washer/Dryer hookups, dishwasher, 1 1/2 bath Avail Feb 1st Call 587-9574

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 bedroom Newer home Laundry Hookups. Large yard 549-4270

HOUSE FOR RENT

House Hadley, Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass, $2750 plus utilities, Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

INSTRUCTION

University/Internship classes start soon! 1-800-WE-Learn. www.universitylearning.com Sign up now!!!

MISCELLANEOUS

www.hotclubs.com

Just Look Stupid

ROOMMATE WANTED

Need two roommates. An apartment in 55 Pulton. Please contact Pete mmirdamadeh at 978-808-3683

Roommate Wanted in House, $425 Call 413-687-4976

SERVICES

Do you know your rights as a student, tenant, worker and consumer? The Student Legal Services Office can help with your questions. Come to 922 Campus Center or Call 545-1995

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING HIV TESTING Birth control and Emergency Contraception STI Screening and Treatment Affordable and confidential. Tuesday 27 Pray Street Amherst 548-9932.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

SUMMER SUBLET

Room available June 15th Aug 15th on Amherst Center. Call Noah 413-687-7365

Pulton Village Summer Sublet 2 Bedroom Call 978-870-3661

WANTED

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents come true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more info and to apply, visit our website at www.dearbirthchoices.com or contact Christine at Liz at 781-769-6900

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

COUNTDOWN TO SYRACUSE: 3 Days

UM keeps on rolling

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE — Both the No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team and the Harvard Crimson had a lot of momentum coming out of last weekend. However, all of that came to a screeching halt as the teams entered Jordan Field yesterday afternoon.

The Minutemen (10-2 4-1 ECAC) had just defeated ECAC rival No. 3 Georgetown 13-12 on Saturday, while two hours east, the Crimson (5-6 2-3 Ivy League) dominated Ivy League nemesis, No. 16 Yale, 11-4.

UMass	8
Harvard	5

UMass was able to outlast Harvard 8-5, using a seven-goal run over the second and third periods, but both teams came out of the gates slow and combined for a mere three goals in the first half.

The Maroon and White returns to action this Saturday when it takes on Syracuse at Garber Field at 1 p.m.

Harvard outscored the Minutemen 4-1 over the final 18 minutes of the game, sparked by a man-up goal by Brooks Scholl with 3:04 to go in the third quarter. Senior defender Aaron Paskalis, who was called for slashing, caused the penalty.

The Minutemen had a total of five penalties on the game, with the Crimson capitalizing on two of the man-up opportunities.

"You don't want to be fouling all the time; it gives the other team opportunities," UMass keeper Bill Schell said. "We got a little lackadaisical there, we just needed to calm down and finish the game off."

Penalties, however, ended up contributing to the 7-0 Minutemen run that would prove to be insurmountable.

With 9:18 left in the third quarter, Harvard's Zach Chandis received a 30-second penalty for slashing. On the following possession, Ryan Connolly received a perfect pass from Sean Morris and put the ball past backup goalkeeper Craig Thomas.

Thomas went in with 13:50 to go in the quarter, when starting keeper Evan O'Donnell was injured trying to clear the ball. Thomas was then pulled for Colin Macleod, after giving up four goals in less than eight minutes.

Macleod gave up another two goals over the next 21 minutes, but Thomas was given the loss.

See LACROSSE on page 12

Junior Sean Morris and the UMass lacrosse team fought off Harvard for the team's 10th win yesterday. Morris leads the team in goals (32) and in points (50).

Minutemen avoid a trap

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

CAMBRIDGE — There it was, a strip of turf 110 yards long and 60 yards wide. It was about 100 yards off the bank of the Charles River, just on the other side of Storrow Drive in Cambridge.

It was called Jordan Field, home of the Harvard Crimson (5-6 2-3 Ivy League), who would be eagerly awaiting the arrival of the No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (10-2 4-1 ECAC).

The Minutemen were fresh off a 13-12 survival-test victory over conference rival and third-ranked Georgetown, a game that ended just 72 hours before yesterday's face-off, and a win that gave them first place in the ECAC, plus the chance to win their first conference championship in three years.

UMass was only four days away from taking on No. 7 Syracuse — historically, its biggest rival — at Garber Field, on Senior Day and smack dab in the middle of Spring Weekend.

Yesterday was scheduled to be a cooling off/warming up period for these Minutemen, but when Mother Nature, New England's best friend, unleashed a snow storm in the area on March 9, the originally scheduled date between the Crimson and Gorillas, this game was pushed back, way down toward the bottom of the schedule.

Forty-eight days later, sandwiched between the mighty Hoyas and the powerhouse Orange.

It was an old-fashioned trap game, and for a while, Harvard had UMass a lit-

See TRAP on page 12

Typadis takes UM by storm as rookie

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

It all started with a boys' lacrosse clinic in Medfield. Kathleen Typadis was in fifth grade and went — along with a couple of neighbors — to try it out for a day. She wasn't well prepared, bringing whatever athletic gear she had to get her through the afternoon. There weren't any girls' clinics then, so the boys' clinic was the only ticket in town.

It was only appropriate that it started out this way for Kathleen Typadis, who now owns the UMass rookie scoring record as well as the goals record. She began her freshman year on a torrid pace, scoring hat tricks in her first three games, one coming against the top-10 ranked Boston University Terriers.

After a game against Albany on Mar. 13, just four games into the season, Typadis was named the Atlantic 10's Co-Rookie of the Week. She was officially on the radar screen.

If you looked at the UMass squad in warm ups, Typadis — in her 5' 2" frame — would not stand out. What separates her from the competition is not just her athletic ability, which is what her teammates and the rest of the league would find out.

Typadis plays with a fire that is sometimes overwhelming to the competition, as she has consistently dissected defenses with her own two feet. Her intensity shows through in her personality and her game. When she runs at full speed, there are few on her team or in the conference that can catch her. But Typadis will have none of this talk, being as modest as she is talented.

"These [teammates] have helped me out with everything," Typadis said. "I can't take any credit for it. I have so much more to learn. Everyday I feel overwhelmed with what I need to work on."

The freshman began this year without a clue as to how it would turn out. It was actually a toss up between soccer and lacrosse for Typadis, as to which she would try to play in college. Needless to say, she made the right choice.

"It was between [lacrosse] and soccer." She said. "And I thought I had a better shot at [lacrosse] because it was new, and because it was new to me too."

See TYPADIS on page 11

ANDREW TAMILTNAS/COLLEGIAN

Freshman Kathleen Typadis leads the UMass lacrosse team in goals with 34 on the season and is second in assists with seven.

Cullington sparks softball in comebacks

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

Stacy Cullington got her first career start at shortstop for the Massachusetts softball team yesterday in a doubleheader at home against Harvard. Cullington got the start in the place of one of UMass' best players Hilary Puglia, who injured her shoulder on Sunday.

Any nerves the freshman may have had, however, did not show, as she came up huge in both UMass wins over the Crimson.

Cullington delivered in the first game with a three-run home run in the sixth inning to break a 1-1 tie, and give UMass a 4-1 win. In the second game, Cullington singled with one out in the bottom of the seventh and eventually came around to score the game-winning run in a 4-3 win for UMass.

UMass	4
Harvard	1

"I was so worried about filling in her shoes," Cullington said of stepping in for Puglia. "I just really tried to focus. I came in with almost no experience at shortstop since I've been here, so it was nice to be back there."

UMass (26-14-1 9-3 A-10) will look to carry the momentum from yesterday's games into today's home match-up with Connecticut at 5 p.m.

UMass mounted late-game comebacks in each contest, including a wild play to score the game-winner in the second game.

Locked up in a 3-3 tie in the bottom of the seventh, Cullington chopped a single to leftfield with one out. She advanced to second on a single by Jenna Busa. Following a strikeout, UMass had runners on first and second with two out.

UMass	4
Harvard	3

Amanda Morin then hit a seemingly harmless grounder to short, but the shortstop bobbled the ball and had no play. Cullington caught Harvard offguard by continuing on to home. The throw from the shortstop to the plate was late and Cullington slid in safely under the tag giving UMass the 4-3 win.

"I was sending that runner home because I didn't want to go into extra innings," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "Stacy had a full head of steam so we just went with it because we knew it was going to take a great throw to get her."

UMass dug itself a hole in the first inning of the game, committing two errors that led to two unearned runs.

Harvard (15-19) held the 2-0 lead until the third inning, when Busa helped her own cause at the plate. The junior pitcher led off with a bloop single to right-center and moved to second on a sacrifice bunt by Sarah Hurd. A ground out by Morin advanced Busa to third, and she came in to score on a wild pitch.

This was the second consecutive game in which Busa has batted in addition to her regular pitching duties. She hopes to have solidified a spot in the lineup with a 2-for-3 performance.

"I've been trying to nag coach to let me hit since freshman year, and all I got was one at-bat freshman year," Busa said. "I hit in high school and in summer ball, but Coach just wanted me to focus on pitching. Once I got the mechanics down, coach said she wanted me to hit and I've picked it up really quickly. I feel very confident up at the plate."

While Busa came through at the plate, Sortino was more impressed with how she was able to battle through the shaky defense behind her and keep the game close.

"She pitched a great game for us," Sortino said. "She didn't deserve any of those runs scoring. She could have folded, but she kept her head."

Harvard added to its lead in the sixth inning, scoring a run on a single that followed a two-base error on a dropped fly ball. The run gave Harvard a 3-1 lead, with all three of the runs being unearned.

The Maroon and White responded with two runs in the bottom half of the inning to tie the score. Morin led off with a single, and Molinari followed with a single in the hole between third and short. Both runners

See SOFTBALL on page 12

Quinnipiac outlasts Maroon and White

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Senior outfielder Jason Twomley continued to show off his hot bat by smashing two home runs in a 12-6 loss to Quinnipiac yesterday at Bobcats Field. Twomley has now hit 13 home-runs, which moves him into third place for the UMass single season home runs record.

Quinnipiac	12
UMass	6

The Minutemen return to action today when they travel to Chestnut Hill to take on Boston College in a rematch of last week's Beanpot Classic consolation game. The game is slated to begin at 3 p.m.

Twomley, a Fitchburg native, has hit three homers in his last four games. He finished 2-for-4 with three runs and two runs batted in. His .500 batting performance boosted his season batting average to .398.

The senior outfielder is now six behind Billy Knight, who hit 19 home runs in 1995, and one behind Aaron Braunstein's 14 dingers in 1997.

"[Twomley is] proving that he should be in the top group," said Stone when asked where Twomley ranks among UMass all-time best sluggers. "He sits back on the ball, has good balance, sees the ball well and swings at good pitches. I wish more people would watch what he's doing. He's got a good approach."

Despite Twomley's offensive outburst, the Minutemen made four errors and gave up six earned runs to the Bobcats.

UMass jumped out to an early 1-0 lead when Twomley hit his first homer of the game over the right center wall, in the top of first inning.

The Bobcats came right back with three runs in the bottom of the frame. Following a single and walk, senior designated hitter Brien Magee sent a three-run blast over the right field fence to give Quinnipiac a 3-1 lead. They followed that up with three unearned runs in the bottom of the second inning to take a five run lead after two innings.

"We just didn't do enough. We didn't make the routine plays," Stone said. "We got off to a 1-0 start, then we got into a hole. If you give the opposing more than three innings, instead you give them four or five outs, they start put up runs on you."

UMass cut the lead in half by putting two runs in the top of the third inning. Sophomore Michael Weiner hit a two-RBI single up the middle to score senior outfielders Curt Szado and Twomley.

Weiner went 3-for-4 with four RBI on the day.

"[Weiner] had a good game," Stone said. "The key for him is to keep his front shoulder and head down and extend his arms. That's what makes him hit the ball hard."

Defensively, the Minutemen kept giving in to Quinnipiac to score more runs. After adding a run in the fourth and fifth inning, the Bobcats added four more runs in the sixth, including to two unearned, to give them a comfortable 12-4 lead after six innings.

"It's frustrating," Stone said. "You see the light at the tunnel, then you move backwards. You focus on an area and we move forward in that area, then we move backwards in another. What it comes down is we need to play better defense. People are making errors who shouldn't

See BASEBALL on page 11

ANDREW TAMILTNAS/COLLEGIAN

The UMass baseball team fell to the Quinnipiac Bobcats 12-6 yesterday, despite heavy hitting by the Minutemen.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday, April 28, 2005 dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 126

MEGAN BENNETER/COLLEGIAN

The great debate

Steven Weish, left, David Havelick and Doctor Diggs, right, debate over gay marriage as part of The Pride Alliance's "Gaypril" events.

SGA allocates funds to over 100 RSOs

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Associations Senate heard a new budget plan last night that will be voted on and executed next year — several allocations, however, are contingent upon the implementation of Chancellor John V. Lombardi's Action Plan.

Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee Colin Delargy has spearheaded his committee over the past several months, processing and evaluating the amounts in which student groups, Registered Student Organizations and governing groups will be allocated for the 2006 fiscal year.

"We have been working really hard to grant budget requests," Delargey said, "We have been promoting the agenda of the SGA through these RSOs."

Delargey admitted that although the budget was a tedious project, many of the allocations are contingent upon the Chancellor's plan, which would either eliminate some of the groups, or rather fund the groups under new jurisdiction and not the SGA.

What Delargy described as an "unprecedented occurrence," the SGA may wind up with over $600,000 extra In its finance reserves category.

"The funds are contingent this year," Delargy said, "under certain circumstances and because of the Chancellor's Plan. If the [Chancellor's Plan] goes into effect like we believe it to be, than the SGA will be relieved of funding the Office of African Latino Asian Native American Affairs."

In the budget plan, $181,508 had been allocated to the OAA however, if the aforementioned action plan passes, then that money would go directly back to the finance reserves.

In terms of actual groups that received the money that they had requested, Chair Delargysaid that he and his committee tried to grant everyone what they wanted, however there were a few unforeseen obstacles.

"This was an issue that we weren't prepared to deal with," Delargy said, "but certain groups had less than ten members and according to the [SGA] bylaws, an RSO must maintain no less than ten members. Any group that does not meet that is ineligible for funding."

Delargy said that ten groups were denied funding because their group could not meet requirements, however, over 100 groups were granted funding.

See SGA on page 5

Jolt Gum gives students a caffeinated chew

By Hayden Marx
Collegian Staff

It's only been about a year since the GumRunners Company first introduced their new caffeinated gum, Jolt Gum. Although the idea of caffeinated gum isn't new, GumRunners hopes to succeed where others have failed by marketing the gum through the licensed Jolt Cola name, and by adding substantially more caffeine than other products.

Jolt Gum comes packaged either as a two-piece trial packet that sells for $.0.39 or a twelve piece pack that sells for $1.19. It comes in two traditional gum flavors, spearmint and icy mint. Each piece of gum contains about 45 milligrams of caffeine, the same as in most sodas or half a cup of coffee. GumRunners says it'll take about five minutes of chewing for the full effect of the caffeine to kick in. It's the best deal out there, unless you can find a good cup of coffee for $0.40.

Jolt Gum has quickly become an underground hit with college students at the University of Massachusetts.

Freshman Henry Goldfarb noted its effect saying, "I defiantly felt more alert afterwards when I was skateboarding, I would chew it again."

Junior James Poro had a similar if slightly less positive reaction, "The flavor didn't last long, but it kept me awake."

The sales for Jolt chewing gum are soaring today, but the product has not always seemed so promising.

In 1986, Wet Planet Beverages entered into the very competitive drink market with a highly caffeinated energy drink called Jolt Cola. At the time, major corporations were banking on selling their sodas by catering to a health-conscious market though offering the products with reduced sugar and caffeine.

COURTESY HAYDEN MARX

The logic at Wet Planet Beverages followed that if less is more, then more must be a lot more. The idea caught on as Jolt Cola quickly became a success.

Jolt's name has remained well known, even years later. When GumRunners founders Kevin Gass and Laurence Molloy surveyed one thousand consumers in 2000 they found that 80 percent still knew the jolt slogan ("all the sugar, twice the caffeine.").

"That was, like, the light-bulb flash over our heads," said Gass told the Brendan Koerner of New York Times. "At that point, we came up with putting Jolt in a gum."

The process involved in bringing their idea to life was a hard one. Caffeine has a very bitter taste that's hard to hide. Gass estimated that it took them over two years and four tons of test pieces in order to get the gum ready for the market. The testing process was finally finished thanks to food scientist Mauricio Bobadilla, a man who is known as MM, "Magic Man," at company headquarters, who was able to find the perfect mixture of the six sweeteners that are used in Jolt Gum.

Brendan Koerner of the New York Times wrote that Gass compared Bobadilla's work to that done by acoustic engineers, who use inverse sound waves to block out noise.

However, not all student reviews have been positive.

Freshman Paul Egri said, "While studying at the library, I ended up going through an entire pack just trying to get an effect. In the end, it I ended up getting a slight buzz, but I also felt sick."

Junior Mike Busack also noted a similar feeling from the caffeine buzz, "It is much different than coffee. Coffee drinkers can easily recognize the affects that coffee has on their body as caffeine. With Jolt gum, the buzz it gives you is very unique. It doesn't feel right."

When asked about the effectiveness of their gum, GumRunners representatives point to the fact that the United States Army recently included Jolt Gum in an experimental line of ready-to-eat meals. On the battlefield, soldiers have to stay awake and alert for long periods of time. In these tests, Jolt Gum proved just as effective as coffee, if not better in some respects.

Unlike coffee, gum does not have to be brewed nor does it require bathroom breaks after its usage.

In terms of safety, GumRunners say their product is as safe as coffee or energy drinks. The danger in these products are that their caffeine content can boost the heart rate and blood pressure of the individual, dehydrate the body and prevent sleep. However the risk is considerably low. GumRunners also remind users that Jolt Gum is "not a substitute for sleep".

Three debate how to spend found treasure

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON Simple luck helped Tim Crebase and two friends find a stash of cash buried in his yard. Splitting up the money without damaging their friendship may take more skill.

It was a rainy day that prevented Crebase and friends Barry Billcliff and Matt Ingham go to their roofing job, so they began digging around his Methuen yard to dig up a shrub whose roots were creeping into a nearby set of stairs.

About a foot down, Crebase said, he hit some soft wood. More digging cracked open a can and he saw the cash.

COURTESY HANDOUT/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Tim Crebase, center, holds a handful of vintage bills he found yesterday.

After grabbing it, Crebase said he ran screaming to show Billcliff and Ingham, and they helped him uncover about eight remaining cans. The total stash was about 1,800 bills dating between 1899 and 1929 and piles of gold and silver certificates. Exactly who buried it at the home in Methuen, about 30 miles north of Boston — and why — is unknown.

But at least Crebase and Billcliff disagree about who controls the treasure, estimated to be worth as much as $75,000.

Crebase, 24, says he's the one who made the find and has the final say about the money, though he'll do what's best for everyone.

"I'm the one who found it," Crebase said. "Without my decision, nothing's going to happen."

But Billcliff, 27, said that's not true.

"If one penny is spent, we all have to agree on its use," he told The Associated Press in a separate interview on Wednesday. "The truth was, I handed him the shovel, I told him where to start digging."

Despite the dispute over who controls the money, the friends appear to agree on what they should do with at part of it: putting some of it into Ingham's rock band, called Till We Die. Both say the band, which Crebase described as "aggressive rock," can make it big with some help.

Ex-owners of liquor store seek Bulger's winnings

BOSTON (AP) — Two alleged extortion victims of fugitive mobster James "Whitey" Bulger want a piece of Bulger's $1.9 million share of a winning Massachusetts lottery ticket, but federal officials say most of the lottery payout is gone and it's too late for anyone to stake a claim.

Chief U.S. District Court Judge William G. Young notified the U.S. Marshals Service on Tuesday that Stephen Rakes and his ex-wife Julie Dammers — who allege they were forced at gunpoint to sell their South Boston neighborhood liquor store to Bulger in 1984 — have a $23.5 million claim against Bulger, because he did not appear in court in January to contest their civil lawsuit.

Bulger and his longtime sidekick, Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, fled in advance of their 1995 indictment for federal racketeering and extortion.

COURTESY UNKNOWN/AP

James "Whitey" Bulger

The Marshals service said the money already has been distributed to federal and state authorities.

However an attorney for Dammers believes the government still has some of Bulger's assets.

"We're just seeking what our clients are legally entitled to," said Boston attorney Paul Gannon.

In 1995, federal prosecutors seized Bulger's one-sixth share of a 1991 Mass Millions jackpot totaling $14.3 million, alleging he had paid the real winner $700,000 in cash for his share as part of a money-laundering scheme to give himself a clean source of income.

Bulger collected his annual lottery check of $119,408 for four years until he fled. Since July 1995, the government has been collecting those winnings, which are to be paid out through 2010.

The mothers of two women allegedly killed by Bulger, his brother John and one of his sisters also have made unsuccessful claims for the winnings.

Bulger, 75, is accused of killing Olga Davis' daughter, Debra Davis, in 1981, and Marion Hussey's daughter, Deborah Hussey, in 1985. Flemmi has admitted to his role in those murders and others, and is serving a life sentence in prison.

— Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING
VELVET REVOLVER
The worlds newest supergroup hits Mullins Center.
Page 7

EDITORIAL/OPINION
SAVING THE HOEDOWN
A UMass columnist speaks about his plight to save UMass' favorite hoedown.
Page 6

WEATHER
TODAY Showers, H62°, L39°
TONIGHT Partly Cloudy, H53°, L38°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H64°, L43°

SPORTS
NO PLAYING IN THE RAIN
UMass softball game with UConn was washed out yesterday.
Page 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Matthew Reid
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Promotions Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Artists Charlie Heggins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gatzaris
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1907, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been printed since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500. Business hours 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brinster
COPY EDITOR
Alyson Zillmann
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Nick Belanger
PRODUCTION STAFF
Lauren Egavian, Elliot Chong

Correction, Moment, or Error

Due to a reporting error the Daily Collegian reported that the band Cold Duck Complex would be performing tonight. The band will actually perform Friday, April 29th.

National News

Jesse Jackson calls for Bank of America to give to poor

By Paul Nowell
Associated Press

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — The Rev. Jesse Jackson urged Bank of America Corp. Chairman and CEO Ken Lewis at the bank's annual meeting Wednesday to continue community reinvestment initiatives that his predecessor started.

"This bank is prospering while the middle class and the poor are going down," Jackson told Lewis during the public portion of the otherwise highly scripted meeting. "This bank needs to be the trigger for economic growth and opportunity."

Hugh McColl preceded Lewis as the bank's leader.

In response, Lewis told the civil rights leader he would make members of his management team available to discuss any issues that Jackson wanted to address. The two men met privately Tuesday night, Jackson said.

"I think Ken Lewis is doing a fine job as chairman," Jackson said in an interview before the meeting. "The biggest issue we have with them is that they are a huge institution with a huge responsibility."

Last year, Charlotte-based Bank of America announced plans to make $750 billion in community development lending and investments nationwide over the next decade, beginning this year. At least $100 billion of the goal will be directed to the Northeast, which was formerly served by Fleet, bank spokesman Terry Francisco said. Bank of America also plans to make $1.5 billion in philanthropic grants over the next 10 years.

Jackson, a two-time presidential candidate and founder of the Rainbow-PUSH Coalition, said he was not focusing only on Bank of America with his criticism of corporate America.

"The wealthy are so protected in this country while the poor are off the radar screen," he said, adding that he planned to take his concerns to shareholders of other large companies such as General Motors Corp. and The Coca-Cola Co.

Asked how much Bank of America stock his organization owns, Jackson pointed his finger and said: "Just enough to get in that door."

For the second straight year, attendance was fairly sparse at the bank's annual meeting. The auditorium where it was held was far from full and many of the several hundred attendees were bank employees.

In his remarks, Lewis said 2004 was a year in which the bank pulled off the "seamless integration of Fleet (FleetBoston Financial Corp.)" along with strong internal growth.

Associated Press

The Bank of America Corp. building

Gore blames GOP

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former Vice President Al Gore on Wednesday blamed Republican "lust for one-party domination" for the GOP campaign to change Senate rules on filibustering judicial nominees, and he assailed religious zealots for driving the effort.

Wading into the political fight that has roiled the Senate, the 2000 Democratic presidential candidate and former Tennessee senator warned that altering rules that have served the nation for 230 years would result in a breakdown in the separation of powers.

"What makes it so dangerous for our country is their willingness to do serious damage to our American democracy in order to satisfy their lust for one-party domination of all three branches of government," Gore said of the GOP in a speech. "They seek nothing less than absolute power."

The Senate is bracing for a showdown over Republicans' threat to use their majority to change the parliamentary rules to ban judicial filibusters , a tactic in which opponents can prevent a vote on a nomination with just 41 votes in the 100-member body.

Minority Democrats have used the filibuster to block confirmation votes on 10 of President Bush's appeals court choices, arguing that the nominees are too conservative for lifetime appointments.

Gore bemoaned the "outright threats and intimidations" of judges by some Republicans after recent court rulings, warning that independent judges would cower for fear of retribution.

He also cited recent comments from leaders of two conservative organizations ... the Family Research Council and Focus on the Family — about disenfranchising certain courts or denying them funds.

"This aggressive new strain of right-wing religious zealotry is actually a throwback to the intolerance that led to the creation of America in the first place," Gore said as many in the audience stood and applauded. The speech was sponsored by the liberal group MoveOn's political action committee.

— Associated Press

Bush calls for technology to solve energy issues in U.S.

By H. Josef Hebert
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush called for construction of more nuclear power plants and urged Congress on Wednesday to give tax breaks for fuel-efficient hybrid and clean-diesel cars. He also said he was powerless to bring down high gasoline costs.

Calling the problem one of not having enough energy supplies to keep pace with demand, Bush said technology will provide the answer in the long run by allowing development of more domestic energy sources.

"Technology is the ticket," said Bush, calling today's tight energy markets "a problem that has been years in the making" and will take time to resolve. He said he was determined to spur development of more nuclear power, coal, oil and renewable energy and again called on Congress to provide him with a national energy agenda

"This problem did not develop overnight and it's not going to be fixed overnight. But it's now time to fix it," Bush told a group of small-business owners in his second speech on energy in a week.

The high cost of gasoline, followed by a winner of record heating bills, has begun to have both economic and political fallout and is believed to be pulling down Bush's popularity.

The president said he knows "many people are concerned" about the high gasoline prices that now average more than $2.20 a gallon nationwide, but he lamented that he can't do anything about it.

"I wish I could," he said. "If I could, I would."

In 2000, when he was seeking the Republican nomination for president and oil was nearing $28 a barrel, Bush criticized the Clinton administration for high fuel prices and said the president must "jawbone" oil producing nations and persuade them to drop rates.

Some congressional Democrats have called on Bush to use the government's emergency oil reserves to try to force crude prices down — or at least stop diverting oil into the reserve. The White House repeatedly has rejected such a move, arguing the reserve is only for addressing supply disruptions and should be filled to capacity.

MA employee contracts finalized

By Steve LeBlanc
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Romney administration said Wednesday it had finalized contracts with 32,000 state employees, from clerical professionals to social workers, who have been working without contracts.

Another 7,000 workers remain without a contract including some state police, corrections officers and nurses.

Administration officials said those contracts amounted to less than a 2 percent pay increase per year over a three year period, from July 1, 2003, through the end of June 2006.

Romney budget chief Eric Kriss said the administration wanted to make sure costs remain stable given rising health insurance and the state's still tenuous fiscal condition.

He also repeated the administration's opposition to retroactive pay during contract negotiations for years when workers were without contracts. He called the retroactive pay "insidious."

Kriss said the key to maintaining living conditions for workers is to boost productivity. He pointed to the decision to use global positioning system technology to help track snow plow drivers as an example of the state getting more for its money.

Union leaders said they settled reluctantly when it became clear the administration wouldn't budge. They also criticized the administration for paring back worker benefits.

Michael Grunko, president of the SEIU Local 509, which represents social workers and case managers, said the union had to give up key benefits to settle the contract, which has yet to be ratified by members. Maternity leave, much of it unpaid, was cut from 52 weeks to 14 weeks. Family medical leave was also cut.

new balance
SoccerFest 2005
It's Your Shot, Take It!!
Soccer Showdown
UMass Men's Soccer vs.
2004 Ivy League Champion Dartmouth College
Rudd Field UMass
Friday, April 29th 4:30 PM
$4 for adults $2 for children and students
FREE for UMass Students with ID

Festivities surrounding the Showdown include a halftime "Trunk Kick - Win a Subaru Contest", a mascot game featuring celebrity mascots and a post-game autograph session with the UMass Men's Team

Alumni Association
new balance
The New Mix 93.1 WHYN
Hampshire Mall
Six Flags New England
UMass Food Services
The Zone sports radio 640
Coca-Cola
Kaplan
Subaru

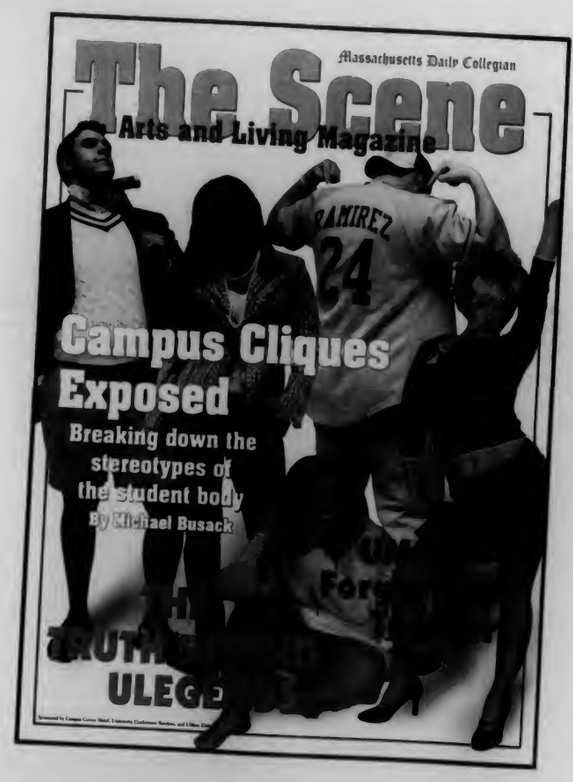
WANT TO MAKE SOMETHING OF YOURSELF?

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is now looking to hire a circulation manager for the 2005-2006 school year.

If you want to work in a friendly, competitive atmosphere, come to the main office to apply. Please bring a copy of your resumé.

Preferrably looking for a freshman or sophomore.

MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
TONIGHT! Dance Music w/ DJ TJ from Lazer 99.3 Hitman Productions
DRINK SPECIALS
$4 Jager Bombs
$2.50 Barrett on Acid
$2 Corona Limited
$1 Patriotic Blowjob
FRIDAY! OLD SKOOL NIGHT
INDOOR PUB CRAWL
5 BARS IN ONE
No Cover!
ONLY 20 minutes from campus!
SATURDAY! Silver and Avalanche
UPCOMING!
Cinco de Mayo 5/05
Wet T-Shirt Contest!
Free pool every Wednesday!
Free chili cheese dogs every Sunday
Free buffet every Friday 5-8
1970 Memorial Drive - Chicopee, MA www.maximumsportsbar.com



Fun games giveaways!

Live bands and DJ

Come celebrate the release of THE SCENE Arts and Living Magazine

Rescheduled To:
Thursday, May 5th
from 11-3

Where:
on the lawn by the campus pond

Scene on the Green with The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

Taylor Rental
Coca-Cola
Elegance Nails
Domino's Pizza
JVC
wmua fm 91

International News

Sri Lankan bus crashes with train while dashing over tracks, killing 35

By Krishan Francis
Associated Press

POLGAHAWELA, Sri Lanka — An intercity passenger train collided with a bus that tried to dash through a railroad crossing in northwestern Sri Lanka on Wednesday, killing 35 people, officials said.

The passenger bus, apparently racing another bus, slipped past a warning gate and tried to cross a railroad track at Polgahawela, a small suburban town surrounded by rice and coconut farming villages some 50 miles northeast of Colombo, the capital.

Police said they arrested the driver of the bus, who was found at a local hospital with minor injuries.

A bus collided with a train in Sri Lanka, killing 35 yesterday.

Hospital and police officials said 35 people died. The bus was reduced to a mangled heap of metal after it caught fire. Open suitcases with passengers' clothes strewn on the track and on the sides.

Sixty people were injured in the incident, area Police Chief Asoka Ratnaweera said.

Most of the injured were taken to nearby hospitals. Thirteen victims suffering serious head and chest injuries were rushed to the National Hospital in Colombo, hospital director Hector Weerasinghe said.

All the victims were aboard the bus, which was dragged by the train for about 100 yards after the collision.

Railway employee E.M. Jayaratna, who was on duty, said the automatic gate had closed as the train was approaching.

"There were other vehicles waiting, but this bus overtook them and came near the gate," he said. "They thought they would manage to speed up and cross, but it did not happen."

World's largest jetliner takes flight

By Laurence Frost
Associated Press

BLAGNAC, France — Cheered by tens of thousands of onlookers, the world's largest jetliner touched down Wednesday with puffs of smoke from its 22 outsize wheels, ending the historic maiden flight for a plane that Airbus hopes will carry it to market dominance.

The A380's four-hour sortie past the snowcapped Pyrenees removed any doubt that the behemoth capable of carrying as many as 840 passengers is airworthy. But it did little to convince skeptics, led by U.S. rival Boeing Co., that the plane will prove profitable.

About 30,000 people watched the takeoff and landing, police said, many from just outside the airport perimeter, where whole families spent the night awaiting European aviation's biggest spectacle since the supersonic Concorde's first flight in 1969.

Applause reverberated across the airfield and adjacent Airbus headquarters in this town outside the southwestern city of Toulouse as test pilots Claude Lelaie and Jacques Rosay emerged from the big white plane with a blue tail, waving happily, with their four fellow crew members.

Officials pose next to the A380 Airbus, the world's largest jetliner, which seats as many as 840 passengers.

Flying the plane was as easy as "riding a bicycle," Rosay said. Engineer Fernando Alonso said the crew enjoyed an "extremely comfortable" flight.

Son of Togo's late dictator wins election

By Bryan Mealer
Associated Press

LOME, Togo — The son of Togo's late dictator won a resounding victory in a presidential election, sending enraged opposition supporters into the streets Tuesday. Protesters built flaming barricades and used machetes and nail-studded clubs to battle police and soldiers, clashes that left more than 100 people injured.

Faure Gnassingbe won 1.3 million votes, or 60 percent, while main opposition candidate Bob Akitani took 841,000, or 38 percent, electoral commission Chairwoman Kissem Tchangai Walla said.

Sunday's balloting in this impoverished West African nation was marred by violence and allegations of vote-tampering.

The military had installed Gnassingbe as president shortly after his father, Gnassingbe Eyadema, died of a heart attack Feb. 5. Eyadema's 38 years in power had made him Africa's longest-ruling dictator. Amid heavy international pressure, the 39-year old son agreed to an election.

After the results were announced, mobs of young men raged across the capital of Lome, setting stacks of tires ablaze and unleashing plumes of smoke that darkened the horizon. Through the afternoon, security forces with tear gas and concussion grenades scattered the protesters.

"Freedom for Togo!" they shouted, taunting police through clouds of tear gas. "Come and take us!"

An Associated Press reporter saw two men who had been shot and saw several soldiers beat a suspected looter with clubs, kicking him in the head once he fell.

The young man's mother ran onto the scene, stripping naked in protest and wailing: "Oh God, they're going to kill him!" As the youth was loaded into a military truck, she screamed, "Please don't take my son!" and the man was later released.

By late Tuesday, more than 100 people injured in the day's clashes had been admitted to Lome's main hospital, said Red Cross official Abram Morel. They included several gunshot victims and people who'd been beaten by protesters and security forces, he said.

Shops belonging to Lebanese merchants were looted and merchandise strewn in the streets. Windows of the Chinese Embassy were smashed in by rocks, and nervous guards peeked through slits in the gate.

Opposition party officials had urged supporters to protest the election results.

"Faure can't win this election and everyone knows it," Jean-Pierre Fabre, secretary general of Akitani's political party, told Radio France Internationale.

"The opposition is calling all its members to react and to stop this from happening," he said, without specifying what actions supporters should take.

Hundreds of opposition supporters rioted Sunday, angry at reports that the ruling party stole ballot boxes or stuffed them with votes for Gnassingbe. A foreign diplomat said three men were shot to death near Lome's airport, but it was unclear by whom.

Akitani went into hiding as the voting took place, saying he feared for his life, and his whereabouts were not known.

The U.S. Embassy had six teams of observers in the field, according to State Department spokesman Adam Erell. There was no immediate word on their findings.

A spokeswoman for the 15-nation Economic Community of West African States, which had 127 observers in Togo, declared the elections fair, saying votes uncounted amid violence Sunday in Lome weren't enough to cause concern.

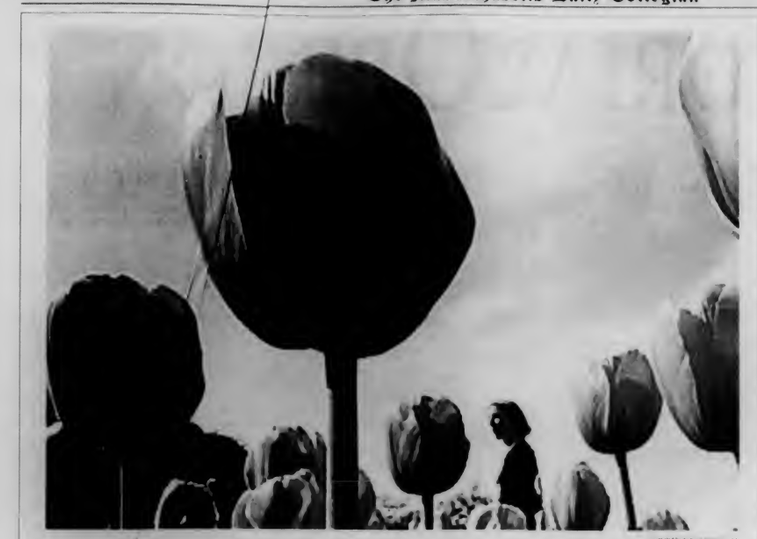
"The polls satisfy the criteria of credibility and international standards," Adrienne Diop, a spokeswoman for the regional body, said Tuesday.

Walla said the results must be certified by Togo's constitutional court in coming weeks but are considered the final tally.

In the opposition ghetto of Be, often the scene of clashes between demonstrators and police, giant trees had been felled to block the roads.

Hundreds of men rallied around burning tires and garbage, raking machetes across the pavement and hurling stones at soldiers with slingshots.

Pregnant?
Would you like to talk?
Information can help clear away the confusion.
We offer free, confidential counseling with caring counselors who understand your concerns. We provide information about your options so you can make the best decisions for your baby and you.
Open Adoption Available: Choose your baby's parents, meet them and stay in touch. Medical and living assistance available.
CALL 1-877-777-7774 toll free/24 hrs
E-mail:info@brightsideadoption.org
www.brightsideadoption.org
Brightside
Adoption Resource Center
212 Riverdale Road • West Springfield
413-272-6113



Commencement Ball
An Evening of Disguise!
Friday, May 20, 2005 • 9:00 pm 1:00 am
Student Union Complex
Student Union Association
Optional Spring Ball $10 SUPPORTED BY: Student Alumni Association • UMass Amherst Alumni Association • Coca-Cola • College of Management & Peer Role • Cultural Enrichment Fund • Auxiliary Services • Housing Services • Isenberg School of Management • Colleges of Natural Sciences & Mathematics • Commonwealth College • College of Natural & Engineering Sciences • Dean of Students Office

rentals@eaglecrestmanagement.com
Need a house or condo for the 2005-2006 school year?
Call or Email today
256-3442
Eagle Crest has just the place for you to call home.
Eagle Crest Property Management

Shear Bliss
Holistic Full Service Salon
Book a fabulous cut and high or low light and get a FREE spa manicure and mini-facial. Expires 5/15/2006
650 West St., Rt. 9, Amherst
shearblissamherst.com
413.253.3332

A LOT OF PHONE. A LITTLE PRICE.
NATIONAL FREE INCOMING PLAN
Free incoming cellular calls
Unlimited Local Direct Connect*
walkie-talkie minutes in home area
Unlimited nights and weekends
Cellular long distance included
300 anytime cellular minutes
Messaging Express
$49.99 per month. Other monthly charges apply. See below.
FREE Accessories with new activation
NEXTEL
Endless Communications
The Hampshire Mall
(413) 584-0117
Located near the Food Court.
Nextel also imposes a Federal Programs Cost Recovery (FPCR) fee of $1.55 or $2.83. The FPCR is not a tax or government required charge. The fee is charged for one or more of the following: E911, number pooling and wireless number portability.
Offer expires May 1, 2005. National Free Incoming Plans: One-year contract required. Additional fees: $200 early termination and $35 setup fee per phone. Monthly bills include fees to cover our costs of complying with federal programs; up to 1.5% per bill & $2.83 per phone. Fees for state & local programs may apply (vary by area), plus government taxes/fees. Cellular: Overage ($0.40/min). Partial minutes charged as full minutes. Rights: (9pm to 7am). Weekends (Fri. 9pm to Mon. 7am). Walkie-talkie: Nationwide walkie-talkie ($0.10/min.) times # of participants. Additional charges: charges vary widely and may vary by market, including state and federal taxes, a Universal Service Assessment of either 1.364% or 1.50%, in some states a Gross Receipt Recovery Fee of 1.4% to 5%, a TRS charge of approx. .09%, and a state-required E911 fee. Other Terms: Nextel reserves the right to modify or terminate these offers at any time. Offers may not be available in all markets. Other conditions may apply. Base service agreement for details. Nextel's Nationwide Network serves 297 of the top 300 markets. ©2005 Nextel Communications Inc. NEXTEL, DIRECT CONNECT, NATIONWIDE DIRECT CONNECT and other marks are service marks and trademarks of Nextel Communications, Inc. MOTOROLA and the Stylized M Logo are registered in the U.S. Patent & Trademark Office. All third party product or service names are the property of their respective owners. All rights reserved.

AMHERST
Open 11AM to 4AM Daily
tel # 256-8911
3 medium 1 topping pizzas only $5 EACH*
Domino's Pizza

Bring on spring

Tulips bloom in the Public Gardens in Boston on Tuesday. Although the Bay State has experienced inclimate weather for the past few days, forecasters are calling for more pleasant weather this coming weekend with partly-cloudy conditions and highs in the upper 60s.

Increase made in Spring Concert funds

SGA from page 1

Specifically, the plan is written to allocate money to these groups based on past usage. Particularly, RSO's this fiscal year spent nearly half of their allocated money, therefore, the committee recognized that with rollover money from this year ($60,000 plus) that RSO's were to receive slightly less this year.

Contradictory to the RSO allocation, the Spring Concert funding increased in the 2006 plan by 25 percent. "This is so they have a little more money to work with to put on more events," Delargy said.

Delargy also urged student group members to recognize the finance reserves fund, where groups can request for emergency funding any time during the year. He emphasized that if the Chancellor's Plan does get implemented, than that reserve fund will be larger than it has ever been.

Delargy urged Senators to come to next week's meeting, as they will be voting to pass the budget for the 2006 fiscal year, citing that "it is really important that everyone be here."

In other orders of business, Senator Brain Long invited Director of Facilities and Campus Planning James Cahill to speak to the Senate about the Capital Plan, its mission and its cost.

Cahill addressed the Senate with diagrams of new construction that will occur on campus beginning in July. Including a new 1,500 bed dormitory, central heating system and science labs.

"There hasn't been this much construction in the 20 years that I have been here," Cahill said, "this is going to affect every person on this campus."

Cahill added that this $544 million project will span over the next several years, and each project, from building, to maintenance, to upkeep will overlap one another. Cahill assured the Senate that this plan has been in the works for several years, and necessary precautions have been evaluated. For instance every year that the project goes on, 1.5 percent of the money spent will be put into a fund that will be on reserve for maintenance purposes only. Cahill said that he thinks that this kind of plan, "will not let something like this happen in the future."

Jackson's ex-wife testifies against popstar

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SANTA MARIA, Calif. — Michael Jackson's ex-wife, the mother of two of his children, testified Wednesday in his child molestation trial that the pop star asked her to make a rebuttal video on his behalf in the aftermath of a damaging television documentary about his life.

Taking the stand with Jackson looking on, Debbie Rowe was asked by prosecutor Ron Zonen how she knew Jackson, and she said, "We've been friends and we were married."

She said she knew Jackson for 20 years before they were married, but when asked if they had ever lived together, she said, "We never shared a home."

Rowe was a nurse for one of Jackson's plastic surgeons when they married in 1996, and they had two children together — 8-year-old Prince Michael and a 7-year-old daughter named Paris. The couple filed for divorce three years later. Jackson has a third child, Prince Michael II, whose mother has remained anonymous.

Jackson is accused of molesting a 13-year-old boy in February or March 2003, giving him alcohol and conspiring to hold the accuser's family captive to get them to rebut the "Living With Michael Jackson" documentary in which the singer tells an interviewer he lets children sleep in his bed, though not in a sexual way.

Prosecutors expect Rowe to testify that she was pressured to praise Jackson in a video made after the documentary aired in order to gain visitation with her children. The mother of Jackson's accuser has claimed a video she recorded, praising Jackson as a father figure to her children, was done from a script.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Saving the Hoedown

Matthew M. Burke

I have been here for four years. It has surprised me that many of my friends have gone to UConn and other nearby schools for their spring weekends. It is pretty sad that most of our students have to go to other schools because they feel that their own cannot provide something as simple as an appropriate release at the end of a long year of classes. It hurts us seniors to go out like this. We pay a lot to be here, and something as simple as a big bash would certainly boost morale and give us something to be proud of. Not to mention it would be fun.

I am almost ashamed that our beloved state school's spring concert cannot compare to other schools' of similar caliber. Academics are unequivocally important, but so is the college experience. This school will have trouble attracting students if they think that candidates do not look at the complete package. I wouldn't recommend UMass to high school seniors now as I did in years past. This all falls on the heels of rumors that the Hoedown has changed it's location this year. The police will almost certainly take issue again.

The problem we have at UMass is that the cops don't respect us and we don't respect them. They break up parties too early, and we irrationally destroy things.

The Hobart Hoedown was, at one point, a UMass institution. My older friends smiled with utter pride and joy when I first got here and they told me of the Hoedown. That first year I went to the best party of my life. I will be talking about it for the rest of my days — as I now must head into the "real world" — but for people like my little sister, who is a sophomore, that party may never come again.

I wanted to find out a legitimate solution, so I asked several people who have frequented UConn's celebrations. What did they feel made it so successful year in and year out? Why were we having problems at UMass? I am not alone in my views that we must save the Hoedown and stop the exodus of UMass students from going to other colleges to have a good time.

For starters, I had to be educated about UConn's famed celebrations. The first person I asked was two-time visitor Noelle Willecke (senior, Psychology major). Willecke gave me the background of UConn's festivities that were once a footnote to those at UMass.

"There is a huge party in lot X. There are about three or four thousand kids there," she said. "Then there is another huge party in an apartment complex called Celeron." She described a scene far different from the tumultuous UMass experience. "The cops were cool. They'd walk around in their riot gear and pose for photos with students. The kids didn't burn things like they do here, they had respect for the cops."

How could our situation be so sour? I was in disbelief until two seniors that went this year backed up Willecke's claims.

"I went to UConn last Thursday," said Eric Atkinson (Economics major) as Dan Borecki (Accounting and Economics major) agreed. When asked if they went to UConn solely for the reason that UMass was lacking in such festivities, all three were unanimous. "Definitely. I would say this one party I went to at UConn destroyed a good 99 percent of the festivities here at UMass," Atkinson said. "I know a lot of UMass people go," Willecke added.

Atkinson would later divulge he met around 15 people from UMass at Celeron that he didn't know beforehand. "Yeah, I know when I go there that you aren't going to get tear gassed or shot with rubber bullets," Borecki quipped. "The cops even set up a medical tent for emergencies."

The problem we have at UMass is that the cops don't respect us and we don't respect them. They break up parties too early, and we irrationally destroy things. Living in close quarters with families and other disgruntled townspeople doesn't help either. "I think the cops overdo it here," Borecki said. "This town thrives off of the business from the students that go here. We shouldn't be arrested every time we want to have a little fun."

The students, myself included, all reiterated that the police are just as much to blame for the destruction as the students, stating that if they weren't so quick to break things up, tensions would be eased. They also said that the police at UConn made arrests and had everything under control, yet they let the students have their fun.

This needs to happen here. Maybe the SGA or a student delegation could improve this part of students' lives. Meet with the police and Hobart and act as an intermediary. Restore the trust and respect. Give us our institution back. Stop the exodus and once again instill pride in UMass. Maybe they could even call in the UConn Police Department to train ours (or at least teach them how to coexist with us).

If Hobart is not willing to host it, then its site should be moved. "I think what's happened in the past has to be blamed for the current situation," Atkinson said. "I think they should relax and let the students have their fun, but control the situation so that it doesn't become out of hand."

I agree, as do most students. This is one senior's last wish, save the Hoedown for future generations. Don't let this wonderful school go down the tubes. Borecki put it best, "If they move it, I will be there." Most of us will also be there, but until things change, the real spring weekends are being held elsewhere for UMass students and its hurting our university.

Matthew M. Burke is a Collegian columnist.

Examining campus diversity

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

Campus diversity is a hot topic on pretty much any given campus in the United States today, since most universities have a self-identified inclusion problem when it comes to racial and ethnic minorities from at home and abroad. Though the problem arises as one of class — minorities disproportionately occupying the lowest rungs of the socioeconomic ladder — it does not detract from the racially exclusionary result.

So why is this such a problem? Well, first and foremost, there's the health and wealth of the university. By reducing the sampling size of students and adjunct teaching staff, universities necessarily deprive themselves of quality minds to learn, teach and generally improve the efficacy of their hallowed halls.

By systematically limiting minority and foreign-born entrants, universities also cut down on the cultural vibrancy of and contributions to campus dialogue. Also, many schools tacitly oppose such interchange and broadening of horizons by not actively promoting diversity integration and by maintaining irresponsibly uncritical, Euro-centric curricula that no longer fit world scholarship and contemporary campus demographics.

Then there's the issue of the mission of the university. Is the purpose of higher education to perpetuate or even deepen society's ills and the gaping deficit between U.S. and foreign thought, or is it to be an institutional force seeking to remedy these shortcomings? Universities, being modernist institutions, are based upon the assumption that human activity can alter the conditions in which humans live for the better.

Now that we've at least begrudgingly accepted that the classist stratification of minorities is resultant of deliberate and often malicious policy, we realize the importance of institutional correction to begin to undo the damage done. Indeed, the purpose of all education is to advance a society toward the ideals of its values. Some would argue that the generally close-minded and exclusionary nature of universities today reflects the idealization of entrenched white values of exclusion and supremacy. I, on the other hand, would like to think that we've just drastically underachieved in our progress toward liberty, equality and justice.

Failure to abridge the racial/ethnic/class divide, whether at the local, state or federal level, is failure of public education to fulfill its mission.

Besides, shouldn't the university experience reflect life beyond the ivory tower?

In public universities, whose principal contributors are tax payers whose demographics and classed experiences go severely underrepresented in the institutions that they support, the responsibility is to the wider community is absolute. Disproportionate extraction of resources from the underprivileged classes and under funding or absence of programs that benefit them is, of course, one of the more notorious deficiencies of capitalism. It is also particularly neoclassical capitalism, but has gone on as long as governments have decided to favor big business over people.

Yet the scope of the public education system is much wider than the classroom: it is a primary social institution and must act accordingly. Failure to abridge the racial/ethnic/class divide, whether at the local, state or federal level, is failure of public education to fulfill its mission.

There is talk amongst conservatives, presumably embittered at the primacy of centrist values and dilapidated half-efforts at diversity on U.S. campuses, of appropriating the diversity argument and skewing it to mean inclusion of more traditional white-folk from the Midwest and elsewhere. Ideological diversity, they claim, is the true shortcoming of the contemporary university: the poor, underrepresented and conservative Right.

They have control of the entire government, almost all university administration and the framing of every public discourse, yet they are under brutal and unwarranted attack from the rising tide of quasi-liberal, underpaid teachers subverting the human mind on isolated islands of "free" thought in certain areas of the country. Oh yes you poor embattled souls, let us God-forsaken "liberals" change our progressive ways and instead embrace pre-1937 as our one true future. United we stand.

Clearly, those among this school of thought are not interested in actual diversity, but simply in forcing the floor to be extended to even more supremacist and socially regressive ideology than our everyday discourse already contains. I really shouldn't be so surprised anymore, but I suppose there is still some shred of naïve innocence somewhere inside of me that is shocked to see this movement gaining ground.

Now, when diversity is addressed on the national level, it is usually regarding a critique of some quota program or other enacted to counteract the long history of racist, classist public policy. The continued prevalence of discrimination and non-diversity is left largely untouched.

At UMass, we have the privilege of vocal minority organizations, and we are fortunate to have greater attention devoted to diversity issues than other places. We are now in the process of deciding the direction and purpose of our university; real diversity, not redhead-from-Iowa diversity, must factor greatly. This is an important matter and our relevancy as an institution depends on it.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

Questioning age restrictions

Jaime Collins

Why, at 18, can we be considered legal adults, though are not considered responsible enough to drink? Why can we fight for our country, die for our country, but not drink a beer? How is it okay to be prosecuted in the court an an adult, but not okay to have a drink at dinner? I know that these are questions that are asked over and over by many college students, especially after running into trouble with underage drinking, though these questions are redundant.

No one knows why this is the situation, and I am pretty sure we will never get an answer to it. I want to explore the drinking age on a different level, and go back to when and why the minimum purchasing age was raised.

The National Minimum Drinking Age Act of 1984 was made to raise the purchasing age in the United States to 21. This law came into place after an excessive amount of drinking and driving cases began to arise. Therefore, in order to reduce this problem, the government made a law to increase the purchasing age to 21.

Though, as Ruth C. Engs, a professor at Indiana University, states, "Research from the early 1980s until the present has shown a continuous decrease in drinking and driving related variables which has paralleled the nation's, and also university students' decrease in per capita consumption. However, these declines started in 1980 before the national 1987 law which mandated states to have 21-year-old alcohol purchase laws."

This information shows that the decrease in drinking and driving began before the drinking age was changed. Why was there this sudden decrease? Was it the actual change of the drinking age, or was it more awareness to what happens when mixing alcohol and getting behind the wheel of a car. As Engs states, this change happened before the increase from 18 to 21-year-old purchase laws. For that reason, I do not believe the boost in drinking age had all too much to do with the decline in drinking and driving incidences.

According to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, "In most countries, the minimum age for driving licensure is older than or equal to the drinking age, unlike the United States, in which all states allow licensure well before drinking is permitted."

This new information was very interesting to me. Why, in the United States, can one begin to drive before they can drink? This did not make sense to me. I then began to question myself, and take the other side of the drinking age argument. By allowing someone to begin driving and also drinking at the age of 18, wouldn't this increase the amounts of drinking and driving incidences?

MADD, a program for Mothers Against Drunk Driving, shows the statistic that, "In 2002, an estimated 17,419 people died in alcohol-related traffic crashes; an average of one every 30 minutes. These deaths constitute 41 percent of the 42,815 total traffic fatalities."

In France, in 1993, there were an estimated 8,005 fatal car accidents which were alcohol related. My point is, in France the legal drinking age is 16. Furthermore, the legal driving age is 18. How come the fatality rate due to drinking in driving in France is so much lower than ours in the United States? Should we change our rules like many other countries?

I think that we are doing something wrong, and we should pinpoint it, and change it. As far as I can see, our alcohol consumption/purchasing ages and our minimum driving ages are backwards.

Jaime Collins is a UMass student.

Making UMass your home

Rail Maharramov

It was bitter enough I didn't understand this to the fullest extent until I left my sweet home for studies at UMass. Since then, logistics, including housing, turned out to be my biggest nightmare. Soon enough, I came to realize that studying was the easy part of the student life. Finding a "good" or "acceptable" apartment, in a good location with good people turned out to be the most difficult exam in my life. Not surprisingly, until now, I have managed to score a maximum C on all my housing exams and still fight or suffer from the consequences of incomplete decisions regarding housing.

It has been said that necessity is the mother of innovation. After several painful tenancy experiences, I have started to think more and more about the real nature of tenancy and housing. A long time spent thinking, coupled with my increasing knowledge about market failures, helped me to get a better grasp of the issue. Soon, I realized that the housing market and especially the tenancy market are dominated by information asymmetry.

Information asymmetry is a condition when the lack of the full information about the quality and nature of goods and services causes a suboptimal level of production and consumption of those services and goods. Information asymmetry in the tenancy market exists both for landlords and for students. However, it seems that landlords with more control over their apartments and better access to resources, have solved this problem for themselves. They have invented very complex lease contracts, requiring a deposit equal to the one-month's rent of the house and the first and last month's rents in advance.

The mechanism that equips landlords with all the power to control tenants and the market is very well designed. The advantage landlords have over the tenancy market does not end with this. They have also an advantage in selection of tenants. They are the people who make the last decision about who will stay in their apartments and for how long. References from the faculty, if a student is new to the area, or from past landlords, significantly ease the landlord's decision-making.

However, when we look at the student side of the coin, we clearly do not see even the little resemblance of the power that landlords enjoy. Indeed, students are severely disadvantaged, and can be considered as silent victims of the inefficient tenancy market. Students do not stay in the area as long as landlords do. They have no way to leave the valuable information they have collected to new or existing students. This might be because, simply, they do not have time. Secondly, nobody asks them for this.

One may point out to the Commuter Services and Housing Resource Services the effectiveness of their work, which is at least debatable. My personal experience with them is that they are helpful, but only to a limited extent. They usually provide good information about the list of apartment complexes in the area, real estate companies and the less than helpful map of the city. Second, students need to suffice with the information that their landlords provide to them. You would bet that usually this information doesn't cover the entire story of the apartment, and certainly contains little if any information about possible defects, the way landlords would approach possible conflicts or differences in interpretation of the contract, etc.

Despite this, provisions of reference letters from past tenants could address this particular type of information asymmetry problem. However, upon hearing them, most people would only laugh at its absurdity. The way things worked has always been from landlords to students. It is landlords who ask for references from previous landlords; they are the ones who dictate their terms of the contract. Reference letters from past tenants would seem too much of a change to introduce into the life of tenants and landlords.

This is especially unrealistic when we have a shortage of good housing in the area. Students also do not have the opportunity to "vote with their feet" amid studies. This is very true when s/he is a couple months away from finishing the academic year. So it is not hard to see that students are amid an important impasse. The sad thing of the story is that, currently, several student organizations have paid almost no attention to this very important problem that concerns almost all students.

Certainly the problem needs more in-depth research and analysis. As it is seen, the major problem emerges with information asymmetry and the lack of enough information that would enable students to make right decisions about housing that really meets their needs and expectations.

My proposal for addressing this problem may seem too simple or unacceptable to many. But I think that with careful design, it can significantly address large portions of the problem. What I propose as the solution is the addition of a separate Web page called "Review of Apartments" to the Web site of the Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center.

This site would be designed to provide students with an opportunity to share their feedback about apartments they rented, type of problems they faced during their tenancy, as well as pluses and minuses of the apartment. This would enable new and existing students to check reviews left by previous student residents to learn real qualities of the apartment they intend to rent and to make well-informed decisions. This is a win-win situation. The only losers are landlords interested to hide something from prospective tenants.

The solution of the above mentioned problem not only would make the student life more interesting and satisfactory, but it also has potential to attract more students to UMass and raise the profile of student life in the area in the long run. Making UMass a sweet home is certainly within reach.

Rail Maharramov is a UMass graduate student.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Matt Pond PA plays to 'Winter'

By Ian Jones
Collegian Staff

For those not familiar with Matt Pond PA, there are just a few things you should know about them. First, they are fronted by singer and guitarist, Matt Pond. Second, they are from Pennsylvania. Third, and probably most important, they have spent the last seven years or so winning praise for their "chamber-pop" sound, a combination of Pond's somber songwriting and the band's sweeping string arrangements.

Their latest effort, "Winter Songs," is a seven song EP. Taking a quick glance at the liner notes, the concept seems a bit gimmicky. "In the height of summer, these were some songs that reminded us of winter. We only want what we can't have." At least the title makes sense.

The first song, "Snow Day," is a saccharine indie-pop song laden with bright guitars, strings and Pond's wistful vocals. I suppose it's very appropriate to begin a record about longing for winter with a song about a snow day, and it sets the mood of the record nicely. It's also the only song on the record featuring lyrics written by Matt Pond, a somewhat unusual fact, considering the praise he has received for his songwriting.

The second and fourth songs on the record, "Fall Two" and "Winter One," are somewhat boring instrumental tracks. "Fall Two" is essentially Matt playing guitar for a minute-and-a-half with strings behind him. "Winter One" is a slower version of the same thing, but with a nice organ in the foreground. Both seem an awful lot like filler, especially on a record that only has seven songs to begin with, but they aren't bad.

The other four songs on the albums are covers, starting with the third track, Neil Young's "Winterlong." Matt Pond PA actually do the original a lot of justice, although it sounds a lot like one would expect it to. Besides the dreamy surf guitar solo in the middle of the song, the song is lot like the original, which isn't a bad thing.

Richard and Linda Thompson's "I Want to See the Bright Lights Tonight" gets the same treatment as "Winterlong." It sounds good, and certainly does justice to the original, but it's basically the same thing, especially with the strings mimicking the original song's horns. If anything, this track sounds even closer to its original version than "Winterlong" does.

The most interesting song on the record is probably Lindsey Buckingham's "Holiday Road." It was originally on the soundtrack to National Lampoon's Vacation, and was a rather goofy track designed to compliment the movie. Matt Pond PA make it dreamy and folksy, with a strong background of organ and strings, and plucked acoustic mixed with echoing sound of the slide guitar. Matt's soft tenor adds depth to the song's airy feel, and the band manages, more than on any other track, to effectively make this song their own.

The final song is a cover of Neutral Milk Hotel's "In an Aeroplane Over the Sea," and although it parts with the Lo-Fi charm of the original, it more than makes up for that with strings filling in for the various instrumental parts and the same washed-out surf guitar replacing the original's acoustic strumming. Matt's voice seems as suited to the song as Jeff Mangum's did when I first heard NMH's version, and he gives it a sense of longing that Mangum never did.

All things considered, this record is definitely not as strong as the band's full-length releases. There are a few standout tracks —"Holiday Road" and "In an Aeroplane Over the Sea"—but unless the concept sounds very interesting, this probably isn't a worthwhile purchase for anyone but a devoted Matt Pond PA fan.

Matt Pond PA recently released a seven track EP, a compilation full of songs that are reminiscent of wintertime, like "Holiday Road" by Lindsay Buckingham and Neil Young's "Winterlong."

Ibarra brings the Kulintang

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

You can tell a lot about a person just by lookin' at 'em. You, for instance. You've been jonesin' for some live Filipino trip-hop all week. You just didn't know where to find it.

Consider it found. Tonight at 8 p.m., avant-garde percussionist and composer Susie Ibarra will hit Bezanson Recital Hall's cozy stage with her "Electric Kulintang" project, and you'll be sorry if you miss it.

Plus, you'll have to apologize to Ibarra's sparring partner in the Kulintang, percussionist Roberto Rodriguez. And you don't want to have to say you're sorry to a cat who's played with rock legends like Paul Simon and Joe Jackson, and Downtown figures like Marc Ribot and John Zorn (and Miami Sound Machine... go figure).

Oh yeah, and he plays with Ibarra, no small credential in itself. Modern Drummer magazine called her "absolutely explosive behind the drumset," and Downbeat magazine called her "one of the best and brightest young drummers to come out of New York (or anywhere) in the last few years."

Lots of other people call her, too. Infamous jazzers like Dave Douglas and William Parker, Derek Baily and the aforementioned Zorn. She's even toured with indie-rockers Yo La Tengo.

She's appeared on over sixty recordings since 1994, both as a leader and as a sidewoman.

So what can't she do? Well, she can't stay in one place very long. If she's not gettin' it on with her Kulintang duo, she might be performing with the Susie Ibarra Trio (featuring violinist Jennifer Choi and pianist Craig Taborn), Mephista (her band with pianist Sylvie Courvoisier and laptop-ist Ikue Mori), rockin' out with bassist Mark Dresser or gigging solo. She might even be teaching at esteemed places like Mills College, Bard College and the Walker Art Center.

Or, she might be playing the Kulintang (and it's time you folks at home knew what that was!). Hailing from the Philippines, the Kulintang is a percussion instrument characterized by seven or eight gongs which is an essential part of Filipino culture.

It should also be an essential part of tonight's performance, the final installment in this season's Magic Triangle Jazz Series, the spring counterpart to the fall's "Solos and Duos Series"). So come check out Susie Ibarra's Electric Kulintang (featuring Roberto Rodriguez) tonight at 8 p.m., at the Fine Art Center's Bezanson Recital Hall. There's no reason not to: tickets are only $7 for students ($12 for the public) plus, you need some Filipino trip-hop in your life. You really do.

Susie Ibarra hits Bezanson tonight. Though known for her versatility with percussion, she will be showcasing her skills on the Kulintang.

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST

HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS

Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students

Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes

CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Eve goes adult with Peter Pan

Original Sin
Eve

I nicknamed him Peter Pan the moment I realized he will never let himself grow up.

I find it refreshing to watch a man in his late twenties act like a college student, especially while dealing with the aches and pains of a nine-to-five job, a majority of his friends already married and divorced, and a salary that most men in their late 40s would envy. I rarely question why he finds it exciting to hang out with me, because I know that somehow he must find our connection just as refreshing.

In other ways he serves as a mentor, someone who is wiser than me but values our friendship regardless of age. However, it is inevitable that he leads two separate lives: one of responsibilities that most adults must succumb to, and the other, the life of a typical 18 year-old. A few weekends ago, he decided to put two and two together, and it failed to even out.

"Hey, will you be my date for an event my office is putting together," he asked.

He sounded in need of some company other than his co-workers, so I agreed without second thought. I wore my most sophisticated outfit, conservative and sleek, and made my way over to his apartment. I couldn't help but smile when he greeted me in an untucked button-down shirt and jeans.

"Come on, let's get drunk! It's an open bar tonight!" He took my arm and we walked to his car.

"Don't you have to dress up or something," I asked, knowing that he was trying desperately to prove a point. "Yeah, whatever. No one cares." He laughed my comment off and started his car. When we arrived, I noticed this was a black-tie event with a fifty dollar cover. My eyes widened when he pulled out two tickets, and parked his car in front of a fire hydrant.

"Let's go, this party needs us!" He leapt out of the car and we made our entrance into the main hall.

I looked around, startled to find that for once, I looked incredibly young. Everyone was way over 30, filthy rich, and balding. The women looked worn out, years of drinking and smoking had damaged their skin, a life time of eating stuck to their thighs and bellies, and too many highlights and hair straightening left little signs of innocence to what was left of their beauty.

"Am I going to look like this in ten years?" I sadly asked Peter Pan. He looked at me and smiled, "Yup, probably. Just keep going to the gym, it might help a little."

He pulled me past the masses of grown-ups, all of which turned to stare as we walked past. Women of all ages shook their heads; men raised their eyebrows and gave Peter Pan the "nice catch" head nod. I had never been more uncomfortable, but I sucked it up and kept walking.

"Hey, I want you to meet my boss. He's really rich you know, and he loves blondes!" He elbowed me as if I have a history with old rich men—which, by the way, I don't—and pulled me closer to his idea of an adult good time.

We reached the bar, surrounded by post-college alcoholics, dirty rich men that sat to the side, and his boss, a middle-aged single man, who likes women of all ages.

"And who is this young woman?"

He smiled provocatively as he took my hand into his own.

"This is my very good friend. She loves to dance. Hey, you should take her Salsa dancing sometime!" He nudged me closer to his boss.

"Ooh, do you like nice Italian restaurants also my dear?" His boss winked at me and waited for my response.

"Um, no thank you. I, um, I, go to school far, far away, but thank you for offering." I looked over to Peter Pan furiously, and excused myself from the conversation. He ran after me, completely oblivious as to why I would be upset. "How could you do that? This is not a matchmaking party! I am not here to be auctioned off to some nasty old man!"

He looked at me and put his hand on my shoulder.

"Don't you think it's time to get into a serious relationship again? You're graduating soon, and you need to start worrying about the future. I mean, you can't be single forever!" I couldn't believe the words had come out of his mouth. Especially his mouth.

He has been single for years, anti-monogamist, and in denial since he graduated college seven years ago.

"I mean, I'm a guy. It's okay for me, but you don't want to turn out like these women. Soon you will realize how old you really are and get scared that you are alone. I'm just looking out for you."

My face was boiling red and I clenched my jaw to stop myself from saying something I might regret.

"Thank you for your concern, but I'm fine. And I'll be fine. I have years before I need to worry about that. And stop projecting your insecurities onto me!"

There. I said it. He stopped short and looked at me in surprise. We left the party in silence that night. Not angry, just equally terrified with the reality of our situation.

Eve is a Collegian Columnist

$$$$$$
We're looking for an Assistant Editor
Are you the one?
Call:
545-1361
$$$$$$

VELVET REVOLVER
ELECTRIC WONDERLAND SHOW™

SPECIAL GUEST
hoobastank
Photo: Ross Halfin

Tuesday, May 3 at 8pm

Joe Fletcher Presents
MULLINS CENTER
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

Present your Student ID at the Arena Box Office this week, and get $10 off the regular ticket price!

NEW ALBUM CONTRABAND

FOR VIP TICKET PACKAGES AND MORE GO TO VELVETREVOLVER.COM

GET IT NOW

Attention Seniors!
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Congratulations to the Class of 2005 from your Alumni Association!

Visit the Alumni Association Table at Cap and Gown May 2-20 in the Textbook Annex. Get your FREE Young Alumni Guide and enter to win $1,000!

Join the Alumni Association for only $20 - Get two chances to win $1,000 and 1/2 off your Commencement Ball ticket!

UMassAlumni.com
You were. You are. UMASS.

FOUR Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 4/28/05 - 5/4/05
not responsible for typographical errors.

Beer

Wine		Liquor
Dom Perignon 750 ml	$99.99	Hennessey Cognac X.O. 750 ml	$109.99
Moet & Chandon Nectar 750 ml	$34.99	Hennessey Cognac V.S.O.P. 750 ml	$38.99
Moet & Chandon White Star 750 ml	$29.99	Grand Marnier 750 ml	$29.99
Chandon California Sparkling Brut 750 ml	$15.99	Belvedere Vodka 750 ml	$24.99
Greenpoint 750 ml Australian Chardonnay, Shiraz	$15.99	Chopin Vodka 750 ml	$24.99
B.V. Century Cellars 1.5 lt Cabernet, Chardonnay, Merlot	$11.99	Hennessey Cognac V.S. 750 ml	$24.99
Stonegate Napa Valley 750 ml	$15.99	Belvedere Pomaranzca Vodka 375 ml	$13.99
Cabernet Sauvignon, Merlot		Belvedere Cytrus Vodka 375 ml	$13.99
Barton & Guestier 750 ml	2 for $10.00	Dr. McGillicuddy's Schnapps 750 ml	$10.99
Chardonnay, Cabernet, Merlot		UV Flavored Vodka 1 Liter	$10.99
Casa Lapostolle 750 ml	$12.99	Emmets Irish Cream 750 ml	$9.99
Cuvee Alexander Chardonnay
Principato Pinot Grigiot 1.5 lt	$8.99

Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

No jalopies for these students, first class rides all the way

By Leslie Brody
The Record

HACKENSACK, N.J. — Alex Tsaur loves his sporty black Audi S4. It has soft leather seats, satellite radio, all-wheel drive and a moon roof. When leased last fall, it was worth more than $50,000. Tsaur says he earned it, by pleasing his parents with A's and B's in school.

In the wealthy enclaves of North Jersey, 18-year-old Tsaur is hardly unusual driving a prestige car at a tender age. His beloved Audi has good company in the seniors' parking lot at Tenafly High School. One recent afternoon, the 122 cars sparkling in the sun included 13 BMWs, eight Mercedes-Benzes, seven Lexuses and six fellow Audis, plus a sampling of Volvos and beefy sport-utility vehicles.

"It's Tenafly," Tsaur says with a shrug. "It's one of those towns where you're pressured, kind of obligated to get a nice car. Your friends have a nice car, you have a nice car. It's a social thing.

"Girls see you more," he adds. "They see you have a nice car, they know you're rich."

And fast. As Tsaur squeals out of his parking spot, he swerves to avoid a car backing up. The noisy scene is commonplace after the last bell rings at affluent local high schools, where students often boast more expensive rides than their teachers.

Across the country, the number of cars sold to teens has zoomed, from 4.76 million in 1985 to 7.78 million in 2003, according to CNW Marketing Research, which tracks auto sales. So has the share of parents footing the bill. Twenty years ago, parents fully paid for 19.5 percent of teens' cars. By 2003, that had risen to 38 percent.

Yet only a tiny slice of all those motoring American teens are driving prestige or luxury cars, just one in 100, according to CNW. That would seem to indicate North Jersey's youth are especially well-wheeled.

The parents who are willing to sign the leases or sales contracts say they are seeking safe cars for their kids, but others say such reasoning is misguided.

Side airbags, anti-lock brakes and other safety features are easy to find on moderately priced cars, notes Phil Reed, a senior editor at Edmunds.com, a car rating service. He says he's frequently "stunned" by the high-end cars parents are buying for children.

"There seems to be a tendency, especially for dads, to want to buy cars they think will make their sons or daughters popular," he says. "I think it's a huge mistake, but the whole concept of buying a car that will make you happy is deep in the American psyche."

Reed also warns against giving teens sports cars: "If you buy a teenager a performance car, he'll drive it like a performance car. That's the last thing you want."

Andrew Troyano, a senior at Northern Valley Regional High School at Old Tappan, N.J., has an inkling. He got a ticket for driving his black BMW Z3 convertible at 39 mph in a 25 mph zone.

"Cops always follow me as soon as they see me," he says.

Others confess, with a hint of pride, that they often speed.

Some students work for their wheels. John Swierkocki of Wayne, N.J., paid $6,000 toward the 1999 Land Rover his parents bought last month for his 17th birthday, paying $20,000 secondhand. He made $4,000 as a golf caddie last summer and plans to earn more to put in a sound system. "I'm half spoiled," he says with a smile.

Scott Covitz, 18, juggles two jobs, one at a gas station, the other at a telemarketing firm, to cover the insurance and $320 lease payments on his 2004 Infiniti G35, which cost roughly $40,000. His teachers at Northern Valley "assume I'm a spoiled rich kid, but my dad makes me pay for it," he says. "I take pride in paying for it myself."

Others treasure nearly new hand-me-downs from parents or siblings. Sarah Brennan, a 17-year-old at Northern Valley, is thrilled to have her brother's black 2001 BMW 330Ci while he's at college.

"I'm really lucky," she says. "It's every teenager's dream." The sense that passers-by might judge them harshly, or that jealous students might "key" their cars, upsets some of the young drivers; they say they study hard and help their parents by chauffeuring siblings around.

Some families aren't comfortable talking about these cars at all. Several parents never responded to a reporter's query about the high-end cars they had given their teenagers. Four who did call back declined to discuss their choices. As one father tartly put it, "What I do for my kids is nobody's business."

And some students admit feeling sheepish when they pass teachers in cheaper cars.

"I kind of feel a little awkward," says Nima Zahedi, a 17-year-old Tenafly junior who switches between his parents' two Mercedes. "They probably think, why does a junior have this kind of car?"

But another Tenafly student, who owns a BMW, and whose mother insisted that he not be identified, has no such qualms. "They chose to be a teacher and knew what kind of salary they were choosing," he says. "I know teachers who drive BMWs, too."

Brook Zelcer, an English teacher at Northern Valley, drives a 1999 Toyota RAV4. Growing up in Fair Lawn, N.J., he says, he was happy to use his family's clunker, a Buick Skylark. Now, he says, it's disturbingly common to hear students say, "I got in an accident in my BMW, so my dad bought me another one."

Zelcer says lessons about the value of saving and charity, and the downside of buying more than you need, are often ignored.

"Their parents' voices speak through them. They say if you work hard for your money, why can't you spend it the way you want? All kinds of rationalizations to justify selfish behavior and indulgence," he says.

Indeed, for these families, the ritual of buying a first car may be one of the rare areas where teens and parents are thinking alike.

Students argue their parents are "wrong about everything," Zelcer says, "except when it comes to politics or ways to spend money. Then it's 'my father or mother knows everything.'"

Alex Tsaur, 18, stands outside his New Jersey home with his 2004 Audi S4. He reflects a growing trend among parents that buy their teenage sons or daughters high end cars.

ALL FIRED UP!
creative FOOD & BEVERAGE

'FEATURING' MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS

STUDENT SPECIAL
ALL YOU CAN EAT SUNDAY BRUNCH
$9.95
(Regularly $13.95)

48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM

BEN & JERRY'S

NEW ENGLAND'S FAVORITE ICE CREAM WILL BE SERVED

Thursday, April 28, 2005
from 5:00–8:00pm

Choose from your favorite flavors!

Restaurant Night

Monday, May 2
from 5-8pm

DINING SERVICES

HAMPSHIRE DC presents:
The Delivery House

Menu features:

Chilled Strawberry Soup
Crab Cakes
Sweet Slaw
Tenderloin of Beef topped w/spinach, red peppers, mushrooms, with Beaujolais sauce
Potato Lasagna (vegetarian)
Penne Mediterranean (vegan)
Savannah Bell Salad
Walnut Vinaigrette
Balsamic Glaze
Spiced Nuts

BERKSHIRE DC presents:
Great Wall chinese restaurant

Menu features:

Grilled Pot Stickers
Mandarin Chicken
Shrimp Stir Fry
Spare Ribs
Spring Rolls
Vegetable Fried Rice
Pork Fried Rice
Mandarin Salad
Fortune Cookies
Almond Cookies
Rice Pudding

NOW LEASING FOR SUMMER & FALL!

SUGARLOAF ESTATES
28 RIVER ROAD, SUNDERLAND, MA 01375
PH: 413-665-3856/FAX: 413-665-3599
E-MAIL: SUGARLOAF_ESTATES@ASPENSQUARE.COM
VISIT US AT: WWW.SUGARLOAFESTATES.COM

- DELUXE 2 BEDROOM APARTMENT HOMES
- FREE HEAT & HOT WATER
- WASHERS/DRYERS IN SELECTED STYLES
- FREE high-speed internet and FREE basic and extended cable
- PLENTY OF FREE ON-SITE PARKING
- POOL, VOLLEYBALL, BASKETBALL PICNIC AREAS
- ON-SITE STORAGE FACILITIES
- MINUTES FROM UMASS-ON FREE BUSLINE

Going on SAVINGS NOW!!!

Aspen Chase
Alpine Commons
APARTMENT HOMES
133 Belchertown Road, Rte. 9, Amherst, MA 01002
Ph: 413-256-0741/Fax: 413-256-3065
E-mail: alpine_commons@aspensquare.com/aspen_chase@aspensquare.com
Visit us at: www.alpinecommons.com/aspenchaseapartments.com

Aspen Chase
ONE EASY PAYMENT PER MONTH
- Featuring 1 & 2 bedroom apartment homes
- Spacious floorplans
- Wall to wall carpeting
- Redesigned kitchens & bathrooms
- All utilities included (heat, hot water & electric)
- All extras included (High Speed Internet Access & Cable)

Alpine Commons
- Spacious 4 bedroom apartment homes
- Two full baths
- New fully appliances kitchens
- Wall to Wall Carpeting
- All utilities included (heat, hot water, electric & central AC)

Most nurses spend their entire careers in the same hospital. In the United States Air Force, it's unlikely you'll even spend it in the same state or country. You'll have the opportunity to practice nursing in as many as 20 different fields in a variety of nursing environments. And you'll feel a greater sense of shared responsibility when you have the opportunity to actually lead your team. Sound like the kind of career you'd like to have? Then call 1-800-588-5260.
AIRFORCE.COM/healthcare • 1-800-588-5260

Heading Home for the Summer?

Local ~ One Way ~ Do-It-Yourself Moves
We'll Take You Where You Want To Go
PENSKE Truck Leasing
* Low Rates
* Full Line of Moving Accessories
* Free Unlimited Mileage on One-Way Truck Rentals
* Full Range of Clean, Fuel-Efficient Trucks
* 24-hour Emergency Road Service
* Automatic Transmission and Air Conditioning Available
10% student discount with coupon below.
Receive a 10% discount WITH THIS COUPON on your next Local or One-Way truck Rental
Call (413) 549-1644
10% Discount PENSKE Truck Leasing 10% Discount
Affordable, new, clean trucks at convenient rental locations
This coupon is not valid with any other offer. One per truck rental and subject to availability. A "One-Way rental" means your Penske truck is rented in one city and returned to another.
For Reservations Call 549-1644

Indiana must struggle through injury bug

PACERS from page 14

some irritation there," coach Rick Carlisle said. "He really didn't do anything in practice today, including walk-through stuff, so it's going to be a day-to-day deal."

The Celtics, who won the first game by 20 points, plan to keep pushing the ball up the court to force Indiana into a faster tempo.

"We're a running team. They're not," Boston's Gary Payton said. "If we run the basketball, that's an advantage for us."

It's also been the Celtics' game plan to double-team O'Neal, who missed 22 games late in the regular season with a sprained right shoulder and has averaged 10 points on 33 percent shooting in the playoffs, far below his season average of 24.3 points a game. But that's also given Reggie Miller and Anthony Johnson more opportunities to shoot.

"I'm under tough circumstances right now and I have to find a way to be a good decoy," O'Neal said. "If they're going to put two guys on me, I've got to find the open guys and make sure those guys get the ball. If I'm in the paint, I've got to block shots, rebound, be a presence. That's how I see myself in this series."

Miller, held to seven points in the series opener, scored 28 points in Monday night's game.

"You just keep chasing him," Boston coach Doc Rivers said of the 39-year-old Miller, who plans to retire at the end of the playoffs.

"You hope the officials don't keep falling for the flops, the grabs, the holds, the kicks. Reggie's a good player, but it's amazing what he gets away with," Rivers said. "That's a concern for us. He's on a farewell tour and you're worried about the sympathy calls."

It wasn't sympathy, just a patented Miller move, that got Indiana the clinching basket in the final seconds Monday night. He saw Ricky Davis come at him, so he pulled up short, dribbled past him and put up a shot on the run to give the Pacers their final points.

"He did what he's supposed to. He's a shooter. You get wide open looks like that, that's what he's going to do," Payton said.

Carlisle said with all the injuries, the Pacers need to generate easy baskets.

"The other night, we had 16 fast-break points. A lot of them were early, in transition. We still have to look for those opportunities," he said. "The tempo's important, but we must still look for opportunities to be aggressive as long as we play with the right kind of efficiency."

O'Neal said Indiana's defense will determine the winner.

"If we score 82, and they score 81, we win," he said. "Defense is where we've got to rest our hats. We just can't get into an open-court scorefest, because we're not that type of team. We don't have that weapon now because guys are banged up."

BCS looking for a shake-up

By Bob Baum
Associated Press

PHOENIX — The Bowl Championship Series is looking for a few good men and women who know something about college football.

The purpose: To establish a new poll to help determine the teams that will play for the national championship.

BCS member athletic directors made it clear at their meeting Tuesday that they prefer starting a new poll to replace the Associated Press rankings, rather than making radical changes to their formula, BCS coordinator Kevin Weiberg said.

"We continue to look at a poll that would potentially include a panel of voters that would be comprised of individuals who have had experience with the sport, either as administrators, coaches, perhaps former players, things of that kind. That's where we're putting most of our focus at this point," said Weiberg, the Big 12 commissioner.

Also on Tuesday, the Fiesta Bowl organization was awarded the first national college football championship game under the new, expanded Bowl Championship Series format.

Beginning in the 2006 season, there will be a new game to determine the BCS national champion, a contest separate from the four existing BCS bowls — the Fiesta, Orange, Sugar and Rose. In essence, it means that two more schools will qualify for a BCS contest.

As is the case under the current system, the teams that finish first and second in the BCS rankings will play for the championship.

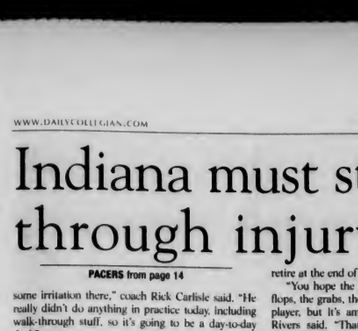
The first title game under the new format will be played Jan. 8, 2007, at the Arizona Cardinals' new stadium set to open in the fall of 2006 in Glendale, Ariz. The Fiesta Bowl will be played in the same stadium a week earlier, on Jan. 1. The stadium also will be the site of the 2008 Super Bowl.

The formal announcement of the Fiesta selection came only hours after Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano signed legislation that would require the stadium authority to grant use of the new facility for college football. The bill also turns sales tax revenue from ticket sales and other transactions of the BCS games over to the Fiesta Bowl.

The provisions will mean about $1.75 million in revenue, Fiesta Bowl executive director John Junker said.

Weiberg stopped short of saying the Fiesta would have been bypassed had the bill not become law.

"But clearly we would have some questions that would have to be answered about the financial commitments the Fiesta Bowl had made to us," Weiberg said.



The announcement means the sites for the championship game will continue in their current rotation — Fiesta, Sugar, Orange and Rose. In all cases, the sites will host the national title game a week after their regular bowl games.

The second of the three days of BCS meetings centered on finding a replacement for The Associated Press poll as part of the formula to determine the two teams that play for the championship. Weiberg said that while other more radical changes aren't off the table, simply replacing the AP poll seems to be the preferred alternative of the BCS schools.

After last season, the AP asked the BCS to stop using its poll. That left the ESPN-USA Today coaches' poll as the lone human-voting poll in the BCS calculations.

BCS officials have rejected any suggestion that the coaches' poll and the computer rankings are enough. They want another poll.

The BCS has promised a decision on the new formula by July 15, but Weiberg said it could be done sooner. Discussions will be held during the next two weeks to try to resolve the poll issues.

DAVID PURDY/NEWS SUN/HERALD

Auburn running back Ronnie Brown drives through Tre Smith (22) and Vincent Fuller of Virginia Tech in the Sugar Bowl on Jan. 3.

Congress talks 'roids with NFL

NFL from page 14

"Some people might think that this is a fairly weak policy," said Rep. Bernie Sanders, I-Vt.

While boosting strength, steroids can lead to heart attacks, strokes, cancer, sterility and mood swings; using most steroids without a doctor's prescription for medical purposes has been illegal since 1991.

The NFL began testing in 1987, added suspensions in 1989, and instituted year-round random testing in 1990. Fifty-four players have been suspended.

"The percentage of NFL players who test positive for steroids is very low," Waxman said. "Is this because the policy is working or is this because players have figured out how to avoid detection?"

Tagliabue and Upshaw were among 10 witnesses scheduled to appear, including two doctors who supervise the NFL's testing, and two high school football coaches, one of whom suspended 10 of his players for using steroids.

Gary Wadler, a member of the World Anti-Doping Agency that oversees Olympic drug testing and penalties, knocked the NFL policy for leaving out amphetamines, and he urged the league to adopt blood testing to detect Human Growth Hormone.

In contrast to the March 17 baseball hearing, when several active or retired stars were subpoenaed to testify to much fanfare, only one former player was invited Wednesday: Steve Courson, an offensive lineman for the Pittsburgh Steelers and Tampa Bay Buccaneers from 1978-85. He has admitted using steroids and blames that for a heart condition.

Courson delivered his statement to dozens of empty chairs: Only one member of the committee was present, because others left for a floor vote. Later, when asked by Waxman what percentage of pro football players use steroids today, Courson said: "That would be very hard for me to determine. I've been out of the game for 20 years."

Baseball banned steroids in September 2002 and instituted mandatory 10-day suspensions this season. The National Hockey League does not test players for performance-enhancing drugs, while first-time offenders are suspended for five games in the National Basketball Association.

In the NFL, a first positive test draws a four-game ban — a quarter of the season — and a second gets a six-game suspension. Only two players failed tests twice, and they both retired.

Bettman meets with Bertuzzi

By Ira Podell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Todd Bertuzzi and Steve Moore were in the same room, but nowhere near each other — and not at all close to a return to the NHL.

Bertuzzi needs permission from commissioner Gary Bettman to resume his hockey career. Moore needs a much better medical report because he's still feeling the effects of Bertuzzi's blindside punch to his head nearly 14 months ago.

Moore might never play again because of the vicious hit Bertuzzi dealt him during a game in Vancouver on March 8, 2004.

Both players came to New York on Tuesday — Bertuzzi to plead his case for reinstatement, Moore to detail why he feels Bertuzzi should not be allowed back in the NHL yet.

They didn't cross paths.

The NHL waited a long time to have this reinstatement hearing, and the league isn't going to rush into a decision on whether to let the Canucks forward back on the ice.

Bertuzzi was suspended indefinitely following the hit. Moore, who was playing with the Colorado Avalanche, was left with a broken neck, a concussion and no guarantee that he'll still be a professional hockey player.

"Because we think that Steve's recovery and rehabilitation is a very important factor in the commissioner's consideration, we've made it clear that unfortunately Steve is not where he would like to be medically," Moore's lawyer, Tim Danson, said outside the NHL offices. "We have some serious obstacles ahead, and as a consequence it's our view that reinstatement at this time would be premature."

Moore stood by Danson but declined to answer any questions because the hearing is still unsettled — as is a civil case he filed in Denver against Bertuzzi, the Canucks and several others involved with the team.

Bertuzzi and his agent, Pat Morris, eluded reporters before and after the hearing, which lasted more than seven hours.

Morris didn't immediately return calls to The Associated Press.

The NHL had two doctors present at the hearing, as well as chief legal officer Bill Daly and league disciplinarian Colin Campbell.

Bertuzzi went into the hearing first, followed by Moore, and then a return by Bertuzzi.

"At the conclusion ... Commissioner Bettman took the matter under advisement," Daly said in a statement. "There is no immediate timetable for a decision."

The players' association monitored the hearing by conference call for procedural and fairness perspectives and didn't have a role on behalf of either player.

"It was a very good and thorough hearing," Danson said. "It was a very serious hearing and we are very pleased by the process."

With the Avalanche ahead 8-2 in the game that would turn uglier, Bertuzzi grabbed Moore from behind, punched him on the side of his head and then landed on top of Moore, driving his head into the ice. The bloodied Colorado player was removed on a stretcher.

The attack was seen as retaliation for a hit Moore put on Vancouver star Markus Naslund that left the Canucks captain with a concussion and sidelined him for three games.

Bertuzzi missed 13 regular-season games and seven others in the 2004 playoffs while losing nearly $502,000 in salary. He also was barred from playing in Europe by the International Ice Hockey Federation.

His return to the NHL is predicated on him being cleared by the commissioner. If not for the lockout that wiped out the entire 2004-05 season, this meeting with Bettman likely would've taken place long ago.

Graduating Seniors— Considering Law School?
Paralegal Boot Camp—June 1–15, 9 a.m. – 4 p.m.
This intensive paralegal class is designed for recent college graduates considering law school. Upon completion of this two week course you will receive a certificate in paralegal studies from Boston University.
BY WORKING AS A PARALEGAL YOU CAN:
• Enhance your credentials for law school
• Gain exposure to the legal work environment
• Confirm your decision to pursue a legal career
LEARN MORE AT AN OPEN HOUSE: MAY 3, 4–6 PM
SCHOOL OF MANAGEMENT 595 COMMONWEALTH AVE., ROOM 315
RSVP:
Call: 617-353-4497
E-mail: cpe@bu.edu
Visit: www.bu.edu/professional
BOSTON UNIVERSITY
CENTER FOR PROFESSIONAL EDUCATION

Do you dream of the highest quality, craftsmanship & comfort in your mattress?
THE YANKEE Mattress Factory
ZZZz Luxurious, hand crafted sleep sets
ZZZz Custom-made sizes, antiques, RV mattresses and waterbed inserts
ZZZz Locally owned with 14 years of providing affordable, superior mattresses for a great night's sleep
Now conveniently located in Amherst Center!
220 North Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002
413-658-0013

Rent One of Ours
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
No additional fee for 21–25 year old drivers
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTALS
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
79 Sunderland Road, North Amherst, MA 01059
www.northamherstmotors.com
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

Panda East
Fine Chinese & Japanese Cuisine
Enjoy our fine Chinese and Japanese cuisine while helping aid the Tsunami fund.
Thank you for dining at Panda East.
With this coupon, $1 of your bill will be donated to the Tsunami fund.
Thank you for your support.
www.pandaeastamherst.com
103 No. Pleasant St., Amherst
256-8923 • 256 8924
Delivery Hotline: 549-0077

STUDENTTRAVEL
Discover Europe!
Perfect trips for your European Adventure
The Big 3 — From $491
Mediterranean Explorer — From $551
UK & Beyond — From $561
Eastern Europe Experience — From $327
These packages do not include airfare. Taxes and other applicable fees are not included.
STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com
(413) 256.1261

Now appearing at Zanna.
Spring
featuring:
Seven Jeans
Free People
Steve Madden
ZANNA
downtown Amherst

Alex Smith ready for work in San Francisco

By Daniel Brown
Knight Ridder

SANTA CLARA, Calif. — About five minutes before NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue announced the San Francisco 49ers' decision to the rest of the football world, Coach Mike Nolan placed a long-distance phone call to Alex Smith in New York.

"Are you ready to go to work?" Nolan asked.

"I'm ready to go to work," Smith replied.

With that, Smith essentially punched in as a 49ers employee. His job duties include nothing less than reversing the course of a plummeting franchise.

Nolan selected the Utah player Saturday with the No. 1 pick in the draft, making Smith the fifth consecutive quarterback chosen in the top spot. The 20-year-old is accustomed to winning, having gone 21-1 as a starter over the past two seasons.

Is he ready to go to work? Nolan learned the answer earlier this month, during Smith's private workout in Salt Lake City. As the quarterback finished his warm-up tosses and was getting ready to show off his arm, the 49ers asked him to jump rope, make figure eights with the ball and perform a number of similarly preposterous drills.

Not once did Smith ask why. Not once did he cock an eyebrow or shake his head. He simply did what he was told.

Nolan likened it to asking his kids to take out the garbage or make their beds. He does not want to have to explain. "I don't want you to ask questions," he said. "I want you to go do it."

After Smith performed dutifully, Nolan concluded that this was 6-feet-4 inches and 217 pounds of clay he could shape as he remakes the 49ers.

Is he ready to go to work? In the weeks leading up to the draft, the 49ers analyzed a studio's worth of game film. They identified four attributes that separated Smith from the rest of the pack: decision-making, athletic ability, accuracy and anticipation.

A few hours after Smith was chosen Saturday, 49ers offensive coordinator Mike McCarthy stood in a darkened film room and aired highlights of his newest pupil. On one play, two of Smith's receivers bolted toward an opposing cornerback. As soon as the defender turned his hips toward one receiver — it happened in a fraction of a second — Smith launched the ball to the other, hitting him in stride for a huge gain.

"Most young quarterbacks would have to wait for the receiver to get open," McCarthy said. "With Smith, you're talking about a guy who can make good decisions, even under duress."

With Smith, people tend to talk more about his brain than they do his arm. Smith's dad, Doug, is the principal at Helix High School near San Diego. His mom, Pam, is a public-service worker. Alex grew up in a home that emphasized education. He amassed so many advanced-placement credits in high school that he was able to graduate from Utah with a degree in economics in two years. His grade-point average was 3.74.

And then there was football. Smith was as much a part of Utah's film room as the rewind button. Dan Mullen, then the Utes' quarterbacks coach, so trusted Smith's understanding of the offense that he would give him approval of game plans.

"There are a lot of people whose intelligence in the classroom doesn't translate to the football field, but with him it does," said Mullen, now at Florida. "He can get to his second and third reads quickly because he's so analytical that he knows what's going to happen."

Sometimes, instead of watching game films, they would flip on an NFL game.

"Alex would say, 'I've got a stronger arm that most of these guys,'" Mullen recalled. "His arm strength was already above average when he got to us, but it's gone through the roof. He's only 20 and he's put on 20 more pounds over the past two years. He has as strong an arm as anyone I've been around."

DAN HONDA/CONTRA COSTA TIMES

New San Francisco 49ers quarterback Alex Smith poses with 49ers coach Mike Nolan (left) and owner John York after being selected as the first overall pick in the National Football League Draft on Saturday.

As Nolan considered the No. 1 pick last week, arm strength was about the only advantage that Cal quarterback Aaron Rodgers held over Smith. The Utah player had the edge in mobility, upside and what Nolan called intangibles.

It helps that Smith has football in his blood. Doug Smith played football at Weber State in Ogden, Utah. Smith's uncle, John L. Smith, is the head coach at Michigan State.

"You have to be proud," John L. Smith said. "You've seen how he's developed and you know how he is. But he's still Alex. None of this has gone to his head. He's just a good, hard-nosed kid who can handle a kick in the butt. He's built himself a heck of a resume."

At Utah, Smith once threw 180 consecutive passes without an interception. Overall, he completed 66.3 percent of his attempts, with 47 touchdowns against eight interceptions. He also rushed for 1,072 yards and 15 touchdowns.

It was his performance in a game against North Carolina last season that convinced Kyle Whittingham, then Utah's defensive coordinator, that Smith was something special. At the end of the first half Smith got a rare chance to operate under the two-minute drill, and he led a 10-play, 99-yard touchdown drive that took 1 minute, 53 seconds.

"That right there was a thing of beauty," Whittingham, now Utah's head coach, said.

Nolan envisions Smith doing the same thing for the 49ers, perhaps soon. He said Smith would enter training camp with a chance to wrest the starting job from Tim Rattay. The rookie, for his part, is ready to go.

"If I had it my way, I would start," Smith said. "When and where is going to depend on a lot of things: first of all me and how I adapt; how I take the coaching; how fast I learn the system; and how fast I develop. I think Coach Nolan is smart. He's not going to throw me into the line when it's a bad situation for me. He's going to get me in at the right time and really let me grow."

Smith seems to embrace the spotlight. He had only taken a handful of snaps for Utah when he inherited the starting job because of an injury to the incumbent, Brett Elliott. Smith's first start was in a game against Cal on ESPN.

When his mother mentioned that the game would be nationally televised, wondering if her son would be nervous, Alex hardly sounded rattled. "Oh, good, Uncle John will get to see it," he said.

Smith directed two fourth-quarter scoring drives to lead the Utes to a 31-24 victory. It marked the first time he came out in front of Rodgers. On Saturday, it happened again.

Lopez family no stranger to Olympics

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — When they were kids, they used to hang posters to hide all the holes and dents they had kicked into the walls of their garage.

These days, the Lopez family walls are adorned with gold medals, including a new batch they won earlier this month at the taekwondo world championships when all three siblings, Steven, Mark and Diana, won titles on the same day.

"I cried. I didn't cry for my victory, but I cried when my sister did it," Steven said. "I saw history being made before my very eyes."

Researchers at the U.S. Olympic Committee believe the Lopezes are the first three siblings to be crowned as world champions at the same time.

Steven, 26, has the best resume. He won the welterweight title in Madrid on April 15, and that goes with two Olympic gold medals and two other world championships.

Diana, 21, and Mark, 22, each won their championships two days after Steven — Diana in the women's featherweight division and Mark in the very next bout for the men's featherweight title.

"I saw her on the medal stand and it looked like she was about to cry on the medal stand," Mark said. "I got emotional. That was funny, because here I am, ready to fight and getting teary-eyed. I got in the ring, controlled myself, did what I needed to do and got the result I wanted."

They are coached — surprise, surprise — by their 31-year-old brother, Jean, a 1995 silver medalist at world championships who got into the sport first and was the one the three younger Lopezes followed.

Their parents, Julio and Ondina, came from Nicaragua to the suburbs of Houston, which is where the kids learned their martial arts skill.

Jean's success lured Steven into the sport. Steven's success sucked in Mark and, in turn, his success got Diana interested.

Diana remembers being left behind with her mother while her dad took the boys on trips to big tournaments all around the world.

"We'd get phone calls at 2 a.m. saying, 'We won,'" Diana recalled. "After the phone calls, I was always telling my mom, 'That's what I'm going to do. I'm going to call you some day and tell you I won.'

"They always pushed me to do other sports, like volleyball and swimming, but I wanted to do what my brothers did."

She did, and now all three are aiming to take their historic act to the Beijing Olympics, three years away.

"As long as we stay on the right path, stay committed, I think all of us could make the Olympic team in 2008 and hopefully be as successful as we were at these world championships," Steven said.

Often they are asked what their parents fed them growing up.

In reality, there was much more to it than that.

"Our parents instilled a work ethic," Steven said. "It was about working together and being strong together and trying to do the best we could in whatever we do."

The Lopezes enrolled their kids in taekwondo not knowing it would be an Olympic sport, "but for the martial arts part of it," Steven said, "being able to defend ourselves. It was something we did together."

When they showed talent, they started going to big regional tournaments, then the junior Olympics, and on and on. Jean's success was the first inkling of history in the making.

"We had the same genetic makeup," Steven said. "So, I knew if I did what he did, I could stand on his shoulders and my brother and sister could stand on my shoulders and be able to achieve greater success in a shorter and quicker time."

If there was one drawback, it's that taekwondo isn't, well, a very docile sport. Often, those practice kicks and bouts in the garage would lead to damage — damage the kids tried their hardest to cover up.

"My parents spent a lot of money fixing walls that got kicked into," Jean said.

Years later, it seems as if the patch-up work was worth it.

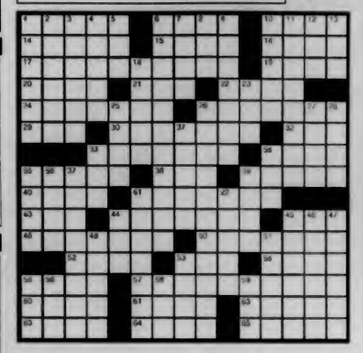
UMASS Student Open House
Sponsored By: The Harp Irish Pub
Come Check Out
Cherry Hill Golf Course
413.256.4071
Mon. May 2nd
$10 Gets You...
• 9 holes of golf
• Free Food
• Instant raffles
• Giveaways and prizes galore!
10 am to close - No Tee times needed
Last Tee Off 4 pm
no outside food or beverage allowed on course!
The Harp · Cherry Hill Golf Course · Rt. 63 · Townhouses · Hobart

EASTERN MOUNTAIN SPORTS
Upgrade Your Gear SALE!
20% OFF
Everything in the Store.
April 29-30
Special Club Member Shopping Hours
April 28 4PM to Close
We're giving you a break on everything we've got. That means all kinds of upgrade options. Bring the right tools to the wilderness. Don't go out there without prime gear.
Go to www.ems.com for the store nearest you.

No Calls · Last Call anti-hangover & nutritional drink · No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

YOU CAN GO HOME EARLY WHEN YOU'RE MARRIED
comedy CONNECTION HUKELAU
Caffeine Ginseng and Guarana
BEER REMIXED
PRESENTS
Pablo Francisco
Saturday, May 14th
at The Comedy Connection Hukelau in Chicopee
One show only at 7PM
Pablo has appeared on
• "Comedy Central Presents...Pablo Francisco"
• FOX-TV's "The Family Guy"
• NBC's "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno"
For tickets call (413) 593-5222
or order on-line at www.hukelau.com

Spring Specials
$5 OFF $15 OFF *With Andrea Only
Style Haircut Any Foil Highlite
Starting at $30
FREE Eyebrow Waxing
With any other salon service
Exclusively at: 549.5610
Styles by Deborah
65 University Drive, Amherst (413) 549-5610
Now also featuring hairstyling, manicures, pedicures and body waxing.



Quote of the Day

"A caricature is putting the face of a joke on the body of a truth."

—Joseph Conrad

ACROSS
1 Movie award
8 Insert ammo
10 Indication of hearing
14 Santa __, CA
15 Opposing
16 Strike a silence
17 Amtrak schedules
19 Toss out
20 Aboveboard
21 Actress Myrna
22 Good points
24 "Lilies of the Field" star
26 Springs and sprees
29 Wayside stopover
30 Most perceptive
32 Popeye's Olive
33 Trap
34 Tackle-box item
35 Chilean range
36 "Monsters, __"
38 Pelleted
40 Web-footed diver
41 Curdled milk snacks
43 Get automobile
44 David of "The Fugitive"
45 Lode load
48 Detectors
50 More sordid
52 Lean-to
53 Bridge action
54 Soprano Gluck
55 Louisville's river
57 Pet peeves
60 Weekend cowboy
61 Colorful mount
62 Lads or Lans
63 Exploit
64 Med scans
65 Uses emery
DOWN
1 Couple with 18 arms?
2 Easily donned garment
3 Entered
4 __ you the clever one!
5 Squeeze
6 Organized workers
7 Just
8 Had lunch
9 Arrange
10 Stirring device
11 North African dish
12 Nervy hammer
13 Play the horses
18 Baldwin and Guinness
23 Deep track
25 Horn and Hunter
26 Noisy collisions
27 Bronte's Jane
28 Winner coaster
31 Sharp tastes
33 Post-dusk period
34 Pajmas
35 Priests' robes
36 Iditarod finish
37 Negative aspect
39 Sicilian tourist site
41 Square-sail support
42 Full of rushes
44 DiMaggio or Montana
45 Tin Man's need
46 Repair again
47 Expunges
49 Furnished with footwear
51 Hysteria
53 Bath
55 Offbeat
56 Color property
58 Here-there link
59 Spots on TV
Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove
Papa.
Do not shed on me.
Your ruins've left thare dust on me.
I want to be clean of it.
Go head own me if that's apleasin to ya.
I am yours & yours.
Anyway.
Tickle my buds & I'll come to you thoroughly.
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

On Campus, Downtown, and on the web
Rao's Coffee
Masters of Your Caffeinated Destiny

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Today you'll share a luxurious moment with your new love interest.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Right now, you're babbling incoherently. It might be best if you just stopped.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Wow. You now know even more useless trivia.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Today you should avoid getting into any political discussions with your friends.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
It's sad when your favorite pair of jeans gets a hole right in the crotch.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Today you should proudly eat two desserts.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Your nickname from home is very appropriate. You'll never be free from it.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Today you're going to find yourself taking lots of shortcuts.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You are not allowed any more all-nighters this week.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You need to start doing everything you do a lot faster.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Yesterday, you stared blankly into space for a good five minutes.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Ignore that annoying person getting all up in your grille.

$$$ Build your business with our business. $$$
Place your ad here, in The Collegian.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-2020

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 19. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449

Holyoke 5 1/2 spacious rooms great Location $800 includes heat Jeanne 538-8894

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@winn.com Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

Apartment for Rent

1 Bedroom w/in 2 bedroom condo in North Amherst Clean, Washer/dryer in condo $425 includes heat & electric. Summer rentals considered. On bus route, 1 mile to UMass, female student preferred. Call Liz 508-367-8693.

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SIGNING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstliving.dnreality.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

2001 Toyota Corolla 5 Speed 59K asking $6900 Call Terry 413-256-8737

1993 Nissan Maxima SE V6, 5 speed stick, loaded, $3500 Elainew@ecbc.umass.edu

Employment

ACTIVISM Summer Jobs Environment

Employment

Smart. Fun. Motivated. Entertaining. (Put enough about us.) EATS Magazine needs 2 bright, persuasive, entrepreneurial individuals to head up sales for our UMASS Off Campus Guide. UMass Alum Dave Swift is looking for several motivated sales reps, to work to build new relationships with many of Amherst's most popular establishments. There will be a HIGH-incentive commission structure for those selected... and lots of free food. Send a cover letter to info@eatsmagazine.com telling us why you are the perfect candidate!

Camp Counselors – Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a life time. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pineforestcamp.com

Spring Break 2006 with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator. Hiring Campus reps. Call for group discounts. Info/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Employment

Painters 2-3 years experience Must have a vehicle part-time, full-time Call Michael 367-9810

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 35-40 hours per week, June 22 August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

Employment

Live in Babysitter needed for two girls this summer in Wellfleet on Cape Cod. Salary, Room, and Board. Please Call 508-349-6392

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives CampusFundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPrinting.com Call Dan 413-682-0020

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail-oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe, 60 Masons St. Northampton

Employment

Moving: Local moving company looking for self-motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitude a must. Call (413) 584-4746

SUMMER ADVERTISING INTERNSHIP Excellent Advertising Sales and Marketing opportunity. Earn $3,000-$8,000 and gain valuable business EXPERIENCE developing the UMASS Official Campus Telephone Directory. GREAT RESUME BOOSTER! Call Jen at College Directory Publishing Inc. 1-800-466-2221 ext 224 www.campusdirectory.com

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until late Spring. Then Full Time thru late August. Call: 367-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Employment

SUMMER IN MAINE Males and females. Meet new friends. Travel! Teach your favorite activity. Tennis, Swim, Theatre Tech, Canoe, Water-ski, Kayak, Gymnastics, Sailing, Lacrosse, Archery, Theatre Costumer, Copper Enameling, English Riding, and more. TRIPP LAKE CAMP Be a Camp Counselor! 800-997-4347 www.tripplake.camp.com

For Sale

Full Size Bed for sale 11 1/2 years old Excellent condition $200 & footer must pick up (443) 304-0544

House for Rent

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 bedroom Newer home Laundry, Hookups, Large yard 549-4276

House Hadley Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage 1 3/4 miles to UMass, $2750 plus utilities. Lyndes Real Estate 253-7879

Miscellaneous

www.hatchbats.com Just Look Stupid

Roommate Wanted

Need two roommates! An apartment in 85 Puffton Please contact Pete immediately at 978-808-3663

Roommate Wanted in House, $325 c/ll 413-687-4976

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception STI Screening and Treatment Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 549-0992

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Sublet

Room available June 10th Aug 31st in Amherst Center Call Noah 413-687-2365

Puffton Village Summer Sublet 2 bedroom Call 978-830-3961

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

SYRACUSE: 2 Days

THURSDAY, APRIL 28, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass washed out

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

As a result of rain that drenched the UMass Softball Complex yesterday, the Massachusetts softball team's (26-14-1 9-3 Atlantic 10) scheduled game against the Connecticut Huskies (18-24 6-10) was postponed to a later date that will be announced in the near future.

With the weather improving, the Minutewomen will take action tomorrow at home against A-10 foe La Salle at 3 p.m.

The game against UConn was a rematch of the comeback thriller that took place on Apr. 12, in Storrs, Conn. In this 10-inning decision, junior KJ Kelley cranked two home runs, with the first coming in the opening inning, and the second occurring in the sixth.

Freshman Lauren Proctor and sophomore Amanda Morin hit back-to-back homers in the seventh, which consequently sent the game into extra innings. The game came to a halt in the 10th when senior clutch hitter Denise Denis flied out and drove in sophomore Candice Molinari, giving the Maroon and White the edge, 7-6.

After the close call against UConn, UMass went on to win 11 out of their next 14 games and increased its team statistics.

Junior KJ Kelley now leads the team in three categories: home-runs (9), runs batted in (30) and overall batting average (.376). Her RBI numbers and batting average also lead the A-10.

As of late, Morin has been stepping up on the offensive side, and she has accumulated four home runs and 11 RBIs, with the majority of them coming during the past 15 games.

ANDY TASKER/DAILY COLLEGIAN

UMass sophomore Candice Molinari eludes the tag while sliding into second base. Molinari has batted .297 with 6 RBIs and 28 runs scored.

Another young contributor is Proctor, who has started all 41 games for the Minutewomen this season. During that time, she has put up 24 RBIs and 39 hits.

Defensively, it has been the team's pair of pitchers who have split time on the mound. Senior Barb LaFogg leads the A-10 in strikeouts with 176 and has an ERA of 2.09. LaFogg was recently named the A-10 Co-Pitcher of the Week for her performance during three games last week. In those games, LaFogg went 2-1 and held an ERA of 0.78.

The other half is junior Jenna Busa, who is 10-5 on the season. Busa has a tally of 98 strikeouts in 2005 and has an ERA of 2.42.

With only seven games left in the season, the Minutewomen are beginning to prep for the A-10 championships , which begin on May 12. UMass stands at second place in the conference, with Fordham at the first-place slot.

Minutewomen out of running for Atlantic 10 tournament

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (5-10 1-4 A-10) is winding down the 2005 season, as Sunday's loss to the George Washington Colonials (13-3 5-1 A-10) mathematically eliminated the Minutewomen from the Atlantic 10 tournament. UMass has two games this weekend, the first against the Temple Owls on Friday, and the second on Sunday against Richmond.

Playoff picture

After ending UMass' playoff aspirations on Sunday, the Colonials have clinched a postseason appearance for the first time in the program's short history, while staying anchored in first place in the A-10. Duquesne, Temple and Richmond have also clinched spots in the A-10 tournament.

Duquesne (10-3 4-1 A-10) follows the Colonials in the second spot, also posting double digits in the overall wins column with 10.

Temple is in third with an 8-6 overall record and a 4-1 in conference record, followed by Richmond in the fourth and final playoff spot with a 6-7 overall record, but going 4-2 against A-10 opponents.

Respect your elders

On Sunday at Garber Field the Minutewomen will celebrate the team's upperclassmen on Senior Day, as defender Kristin St. Hilaire, goalkeeper Joey Rubin and defender Judy Kestner will all be moving on.

These are the only three seniors on a roster chalk-full of underclassmen, and leadership has been essential for the growth of this young squad.

St. Hilaire is second on the team in ground balls with 42, behind junior Jackie Nesbitt with 51. The senior captain also energized the team with her offensive play on Sunday against George Washington as she scored the first goal of her career on a free position shot.

Spreading the wealth

A total of 14 Minutewomen have put the ball in the net for UMass this season, including a couple of players who made the stat sheet last weekend.

Freshman Alana Jakas scored her first goal of the season last Friday against Longwood and St. Hilaire notched her first goal against the Colonials on Sunday. Freshman Jeanette Villapiano has scored four goals in the last three games to make it six on the season. She has also taken over draw control duty for the Minutewomen and performed well in the role.

Freshman Katie Bottini made her third career start on Sunday against George Washington as playing time for role players has increased for coach Carrie Bolduc of late, leading to a more spread out attack.

Sister, Sister

UMass has been on the recruiting trail for next year as it has looked to its assistant coach to bring in the new talent. Former All-American-turned-assistant-coach Tracey Drown played for UMass last year before making the move to the sideline. Holly Drown, her little sister and high school All-American, signed a National Letter of Intent to play at UMass next year.

She will wear number 22 after her sister. The younger Drown was the 2004 New Hampshire Telegraph Player of the Year and a two-time All-New Hampshire selection. UMass also signed high school All-American Kaytlin McCormick and two Massachusetts natives, Julie Pasquantonio and Jamie Whiteway.

Schilling the next to join DL

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox starting rotation took another hit Wednesday when the team said ace Curt Schilling would be out at least two weeks with a bruise on his right ankle.

General Manager Theo Epstein called the injury a "mild bone bruise" on the same ankle he had surgically repaired during the off-season, but Epstein said the bruising was higher on that ankle. Still, team doctors believe the injuries are "indirectly related."

"That general area has been through a lot," Epstein said.

Schilling, 1-2 with a 7.13 ERA this season, said he felt a sharp pain when he threw a pitch to Travis Lee during the sixth inning of Saturday's loss at Tampa Bay.

"I knew when I threw the pitch I had done something," he said. "I think it was the hardest pitch I've thrown all year."

At first, he thought the pain was caused by the breakup of scar tissue from the surgery, so he didn't immediately tell anyone. But it didn't feel any better the next day, or when he tried to throw during his regular off-day workout on Monday. Team doctors did a bone scan on the ankle Monday night and found the bruise, Schilling said.

"It's not part of the surgery," he said. "The ankle bone was just not ready to take the force I put on it the other day."

Doctors told him that if he continued pitching on the ankle "there was a very legitimate possibility that we could break the bone and the season would be done," Schilling said.

The announcement came less than 24 hours after the team said left-hander David Wells would miss at least a month because of a sprained right foot. Left-hander John Halama replaced Wells in the starting rotation.

"Having them both go down in 24 hours makes it dramatic," Epstein said. "But we can withstand that. ... It's that type of adversity that really defines a team."

Schilling will wear a removable boot on the ankle. The team did not say who would fill his spot in the rotation.

Schilling injured the ankle toward the end of last season, leading to his now-famous "bloody sock" performances during the team's World Series run last year. He had surgery after the season to repair a ruptured tendon sheath.

Epstein said he didn't think Schilling rushed through his rehabilitation.

"His ankle felt fantastic (during spring training)," the GM said. "His ankle felt 100 percent. This was unforeseen."

The loss of Schilling and Wells leaves the Red Sox with just three members of their season-opening starting rotation — Matt Clement, Tim Wakefield and Bronson Arroyo.

Wade Miller, who is working his way back from a frayed rotator cuff, was scheduled to make a rehabilitation start for Triple-A Pawtucket on Thursday. But he's not expected to return to Boston's rotation until mid-May, Epstein said.

ROBERT CABRERA/BOSTON HERALD DISPATCH

Curt Schilling was placed on the disabled list yesterday because of a bruise on his right ankle, the same ankle he injured last year.

Rivers angry with 'sympathy'

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

WALTHAM — Celtics coach Doc Rivers is kicking up a fit about Reggie Miller.

During Boston's first-round playoff series against the Indiana Pacers, Rivers has been campaigning for the referees to be on the lookout for Miller's attempts to draw foul calls. On Wednesday, Rivers said he is worried that officials will give Miller "sympathy calls" as he heads into retirement.

"You hope the officials don't keep falling for the flops, the grabs, the holds, the kicks," Rivers said after practice for Game 3, which is Thursday night in Indianapolis. "Reggie's a good player, but it's amazing what he gets away with. That's a concern for us. He's on a farewell tour and you're worried about the sympathy calls."

One of Rivers' complaints is that Miller goes up for a shot and kicks his legs out to ward off a defender and draw a foul. The move has been illegal since Rivers' playing days, he said, when Spud Webb used to try it.

But it's not for everybody.

"It's a great move if you can get away with it," Rivers said. "Most guys would fall over backwards when they try to kick."

Miller has announced that he will retire after the season, his 18th in the NBA. He has scored more than 25,000 points, with an NBA record for 3-pointers and a reputation as one of the best clutch performers in league history.

Before the series started, Rivers practically begged reporters to write about Miller's "acting" in the hopes that the officials would read his comments and be ready. It hasn't worked.

CHARLES KRUPA/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Indiana Pacers guard Reggie Miller has built a reputation throughout the NBA as a player who gets away with playing dirty.

Pacers must battle through injuries back at home tonight

By Steve Herman
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — The Indiana Pacers just can't seem to stay healthy.

Jermaine O'Neal is still bothered by a shoulder sprain. Jamaal Tinsley is sidelined with a bruised foot. And now Stephen Jackson is smarting.

Jackson, Indiana's top scorer against the Celtics, twisted a knee as Indiana tied the best-of-seven series with an 82-79 victory in Game 2 and isn't sure how effective he can be in Game 3 on Thursday night.

"This is my first day trying to run. I couldn't really do anything, but I'm going to push myself to play," Jackson said after practice Wednesday. "But this is part of the game. If you're able to play with the injuries, then do it."

Jackson, averaging 22.5 points in the two games, hyperextended his left knee when he came down awkwardly after a dunk in Monday night's 82-79 win at Boston, a victory that evened the best-of-seven series at one game apiece. He had an MRI, which showed no structural damage to the knee, so he plans to play on Thursday and, if he can, in Game 4 on Saturday night.

"It's going to be treated symptomatically, and he's going to have some pain because there's

See PACERS on page 11

JUSTIN MAMIS/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Pacers forward Jermaine O'Neal, seen lying on the ground beneath Paul Pierce, has been battling a shoulder sprain lately.

NFL meets Congress

By Howard Fendrich
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The NFL's steroids policy is tough, "but it's not perfect," the head of a congressional committee said Wednesday, adding that he plans to introduce a bill governing drug testing across the spectrum of U.S. sports.

Rep. Tom Davis opened the House Government Reform Committee's second hearing on steroids by saying the NFL had been more cooperative than Major League Baseball was when its drug program was examined publicly by the panel last month.

But saying that all sports leagues must "acknowledge that their testing programs need improvement," the Virginia Republican added that he and ranking Democrat Henry Waxman of California, along with Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., are working on legislation to create uniform policies for major sports.

Such an effort would face obstacles in Congress, which has been reluctant to legislate professional sports policy over the years.

In prepared testimony submitted to the committee, NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue and NFL Players Association chief executive Gene Upshaw said the league is tripling from two to six the number of random offseason tests that players can face.

They also said the league and union recently agreed to add new substances to the list of banned performance enhancers; to put in writing previously agreed-to policies to test for designer steroids; and to lower the testosterone ratio threshold.

"There are numerous issues on which management and labor disagree. ... But there is complete agreement on this: Steroids and other performance-enhancing substances have no place in our game, or anywhere in sports," Upshaw said.

He and Tagliabue sat next to each other and each occasionally jotted notes while some lawmakers criticized the NFL's penalties as too lenient and raised questions about whether amphetamines should be banned.

See NFL on page 11

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXV ISSUE 127

Gargano addresses diversity issues after receiving criticism from students, faculty

By Casey Novak
Collegian Staff

A crowd much larger than normal gathered on Thursday to hear Michael Gargano Jr., Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, address the Faculty Senate regarding a variety of issues at the 641 Regular Meeting of the Faculty Senate.

Gargano began by discussing an increase in the number of applications the University of Massachusetts received this year as well as the higher number of visitors that have shown interest in the campus.

According to Gargano, the 20,500 applications that were received is a 10 percent increase from last year, and the number of on-campus visitors has gone up by 29 percent.

"This really complements the university, it's a complement to the faculty, to the staff and particularly to our student body," he said. "I think what all of these families are really saying is that they place a lot of value at this university and it is a place they would love to have their sons or daughters go to continue their education."

There will be a freshman class of 4,200 students for the fall, Gargano added.

However, when the floor was open for discussion, one graduate student pointed out that this number could pose a problem since the increase in freshman means a decrease in housing availability.

"For the past four or five years we have had a major problem with on-campus housing," the School of Education graduate student said. "So why do you continue to bring more students on campus than we have the space for?"

JAMIE LAUX/COLLEGIAN

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano.

Gargano answered by saying that these decisions were not made in isolation.

"Our state inventory tells us that we can easily accommodate 4,200 students in our residence halls. History also shares with us that we have a number of juniors and seniors who prefer to live off campus, which will provide more space for us as well," he said.

Putting the housing subject aside, Sara Lennox, a professor of Germanic Languages and Literature, pointed out that most of the students in attendance were there because they welcomed the opportunity to discuss with Gargano his proposals as part of the diversity initiative.

"Particularly the students are concerned because the Chancellor seems to have removed authority from the Student Government Association and placed all responsibilities under Gargano even though the SGA passed a vote of no confidence in the Vice Chancellor," Lennox said.

Gargano responded by saying that Chancellor Lombardi has posted the first and second plans on improving campus diversity.

"We will sit tight until the Chancellor posts the final plan tomorrow and then we will go from there," he added.

When Eduardo Bustamante, former president of the Student Government Association, questioned Gargano's respect for the SGA, he replied by extending great respect from the Vice Chancellor's office to the student body as well as the student government.

"We have been true to our plan," Gargano said. "What we said we would do was have open commentaries, which has happened. And we will be posting our final plan tomorrow."

And it was not a surprise when last semester's incident concerning the "KKK-nine" was raised.

Yousef Munayyer asked Gargano about his reaction regarding the incident and if he was considering resignation.

"No, I am not resigning," Gargano answered.

Christina Lin, a student who transferred to UMass last semester said she had heard a lot of negative things about the "KKK-nine" and asked Gargano to tell her how he has influenced diversity on campus.

Gargano responded by saying that he has done an assortment of things.

"I've worked with this entire student body and dedicate myself to recruiting a diverse student body," he said. "I work with a variety of multi-cultural student groups. I provide funding for multi-culture student groups. I've worked in a whole variety of different constituencies on campus.

"I've written letters recommendation for students, helped students get into graduate school. I've helped students in any number of different ways to help to promote academic success and promote their careers."

Wiffle ball team heads to Fenway Park

By Danny Picard
Collegian Correspondent

A group of Univeristy of Massachusettss students earned the right to play wiffle ball at Fenway Park Monday by winning the "Wiffle Your Way To Fenway" tournament.

"The '86 Celts," crowned UMass Amherst Wiffle Ball Champions Saturday April 16, will advance to the home of the Boston Red Sox in a tournament of champions from multiple colleges in New England.

"The '86 Celts" went 4-0, letting up only three runs and scoring 28. They moved through the first two rounds easily, winning by scores of 8-1 and 10-0. But the team ran into trouble early in the semi-finals when senior Adam Bernazzani let up a rare leadoff home run. Senior Jimmy Brooks answered with a two-run homer of his own in the bottom of the first inning to give the Celts a 2-1 lead. Brooks' home run proved to be the game winner and "The '86 Celts" advanced to the finals.

DANNY PICARD/COLLEGIAN

From left to right, Lee Goodman, Adam Bernazzani, Alex Haney, Jimmy Brooks and Tom Holmes sit in front of their celebratory banner.

The players said the semi-final game was the turning point in the tournament.

"It was the most intense wiffle ball game I've ever played," junior Lee Goodman said. "The turning point was definitely the semi-finals."

"The 86 Celts" went on to win the final game by a score of 8-1 and will move on to play at Fenway Park on Monday.

The tournament fielded eight teams, consisting of five players on each team. The champs include five UMass students: Captain Alex Haney, Lee Goodman, Jimmy Brooks, Adam Bernazzani and Tom Holmes, all thrilled at the thought of playing at Fenway.

"I'm excited," senior Jimmy Brooks said. "I went to many Red Sox games as a kid, and now I get to play there. I'm on the big stage now. I feel like I've come a long way. I'm looking forward to putting a home run on Lansdowne."

While a wiffle ball hit over the Green Monster remains to be seen, other members of "The '86 Celts" said they're delighted at the chance to play at Fenway Park.

"Our childhood dream is coming true," Goodman said. "We all grew up playing wiffle ball in the streets of Boston. We're playing in Fenway. We finally made it."

Star pitcher Adam Bernazzani said his childhood aspirations came true when he recorded the final out that completed their journey to Yawkey Way. The Roslindale native said, "It's a dream come true to be able to play at Fenway."

Bernazzani pitched four solid games in the eight-team tournament sponsored by Coca-Cola that decided who would represent UMass-Amherst at Fenway Park. The junior went 4-0 with one shutout, and let up only three runs the whole tournament.

"I had everything working," Bernazzani said, referring to his two best pitches: the "Turny Bernie" and the "Sweet Adam." The "Turny Bernie" is a slider and the "Sweet Adam" is a sweeping curve ball that Bernazzani uses as his finishing pitch.

Bernazzani had some solid

See WIFFLE BALL on page 2

Hoedown may be moved to Main St.

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

A University of Massachusetts tradition — the Hobart Hoedown — may move locations, however authorities are well aware and are prepared.

The Hobart Hoedown has occurred at Hobart Lane, an off-campus residence, for over 20 years. A party that typically occurs when the weather is warmer, the Hoedown is usually on the weekend of the spring concert.

Various member of the University of Massachusetts community have spoken out against any violence that has ensured in past years, but they have not said that they oppose the event.

"We want students at the university to enjoy themselves as the weather warms up," said Ed Blaguszewski, the Director of News and Information at the University.

"Everyone has to do this responsibly," he said. "Partying is a part of campus life."

The Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life, Michael Gargano, agreed with Blaguszewski.

"I'd like to see students have a good time," he said.

Gagano, like Blaguszewski, said that with a good time also comes responsibility.

"We want to see civility," he said. Gargano added that he wants people to be respectful of many things, including themselves and the property around them. He said he would not like students to start fights, set fires or drunk drive.

"If they can do that, they will have a good time," he said.

Gargano said that he has heard rumors about the Hoedown being moved to Main Street, but would not "speculate on rumors."

Flyers have been sent out by various apartment complexes around town, including those owned by Eagle Crest Property Management, a realtor who owns Salem Place, an apartment complex on Main Street.

"Please remember that gatherings such as the ones that are held on the Hoedown weekend are a violation of the Association Bylaws. Anyone found in violation of the bylaws will be immediately turned into the police and the university," Sharleen Roman, Property Manager of Salem Place said in the flyer.

"We will not tolerate any such activities and will notify any and all parties associated with the lease," she said, adding that towing will be "in full force."

Both Gargano and Blaguszewski said that they hope this year's Hoedown resembles last year's and not the one in 2003.

Last year's Hoedown was not as out of control as previous years. There were police cars and vans near and on Hobart Lane, and the number of incidents was small.

"The police were prominent in their presence [last year] and will be again this year," he said, adding that the Amherst Police Department, UMass Police Department, and state troopers were on the scene.

At the Hoedown the year before, many students clashed with police throughout the night, forcing the Amherst Police to use tear gas as well as other methods of crowd dispersal.

According to Blaguszewski, even students who live off campus are subject to the Student Code of Conduct, a set of bylaws that all university students must abide by.

"If you get arrested, you face consequences with the University and the law," he said.

JAMIE LAUX/COLLEGIAN

Main St. is the rumored site for this year's Hobart Hoedown.

Professor presents workshop

By Prateeti Ballal and Robert Reginio
Collegian Correspondents

On Sunday, the Postcolonial Studies Reading Group organized its inaugural workshop titled "Theory in an Uneven World."

The workshop explored the problems and possibilities presented by Professor R. Radhakrishnan's recent book "Theory in an Uneven World." Radhakrishnan, who taught in the Department of English at UMass for twenty years, returned to the Amherst campus to listen to papers presented by former students and colleagues.

He participated in a roundtable discussion and presented a keynote address titled "Globalization, or the Ontology of Capital." Returning to UMass, Radhakrishnan noted, brought back to him his "profound love, deep admiration and even deeper respect" for his students past and present.

Now a Professor of English and Comparative Literature, and Chair of the Department of Asian American Studies at the University of California, Irvine, Radhakrishnan has always been concerned with the way people from different parts of the world, experiencing the same historical events in different places, think about those differences in an attempt to foster cultural, political and personal dialogues across literal and figurative borders.

His work crosses the fields of literary studies, postcolonial studies, feminism and current political thought. During his tenure at UMass, Professor Radhakrishnan fostered a lively intellectual climate—his classes, both graduate and undergraduate, were attended by students from several majors across the campus, from Afro-American Studies and Political Science, to English, History, Anthropology, Comparative Literature and Communications. Within those classes, students read novels like Dostoyevsky's "Notes from Underground," Virginia Woolf's "Mrs. Dalloway," and Maxine Hong Kingston's "Woman Warrior;" philosophers like Michel Foucault and Jacques Derrida; and current scholars and thinkers like Gayatri Spivak, Edward Said and Homi Bhabha.

A brief glance at the workshop program showed the diversity of departments from which the presenters came and as Stephen Clingman, professor of English at UMass, pointed out, the "generative" nature of Radhakrishnan's work. Clingman introduced Radhakrishnan along these lines noting how the "democratic nature of Radhakrishnan's classes" lay in his belief that "everybody had a right to be there" and this signaled the "true joy of collaborative endeavor."

The sessions held this Sunday expressed such joy as well. In fact, one of the goals in organizing this interdisciplinary workshop was to foster dialogue and connections among graduate students working in different departments across the university.

The Postcolonial Studies Reading Group, which organized this workshop, began as the initiative of a group of graduate students from several departments who came together once a month over the last year for readings and discussion.

Drawing on Radhakrishnan's

See ENGLISH on page 2

Grad student emphasizes that a PhD is not enough anymore

By Ashish K. Sahu
Collegian Staff

"Career planning, leadership skills, networking and management training are not included in graduate education; these skills and others are necessary for a rewarding and productive career after graduate school," said Ticora Jones, a fourth year graduate student in the Department of Polymer Science & Engineering and co-organizer of the event "A PhD Is Not Enough!"

This event will take place at the Campus Center Auditorium at the University of Massachusetts on Tuesday. This day-long event is geared towards graduate students in the Science, Technology, Engineering and Mathematics disciplines and is organized by graduate students. So far about 220 graduate students and 35 faculty members have registered for this event.

Graduate Dean John Mullin will give the opening remarks.

The event includes two discussion-based workshops facilitated by Dr. Peter Feibelman.

Feibelman is a Senior Research Scientist at Sandia National Laboratories. He has authored the book "A Ph.D. Is Not Enough: A Guide To Survival in Science." The book can be used as a pocket mentor for young scientists beginning their careers.

This event will offer networking opportunities for STEM students to interact in a social environment, a lunch to discuss issues of graduate education at UMass, a faculty lunch with the speaker, and a final lecture "Junior Scientist Survival Training."

"We wanted to raise awareness about the issues related to graduate education and career development for scientist and engineers. Networking with other students and faculty is important especially as research becomes interdisciplinary," says Jessica McCoy a third year student in Polymer Science & Engineering, the President of the PS&E club and event co-organizer.

Caryl Becerra, a first year graduate student from microbiology, is one of the attendees and when asked why she was so interested in attending, she said "being a first year student, I am excited about this event because I hope to gain not just survival skills but other skills to become highly successful in my graduate school career." She would like to network by meeting other STEM graduate students.

Another fourth year Ph.D. student who will be graduating soon from the Department of Polymer Science & Engineering, Julie Leiston-Belanger, said "this event should be an excellent opportunity to discuss concerns and questions about my plans as a scientist."

Senior and junior undergraduate students in the STEM disciplines are also encouraged to attend the closing lecture by Feibelman, "Junior Scientist Survival Training," which is at 5 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. More information about the event can be found at www.apine-event.org.

ARTS & LIVING
Transition and transformation
Indian artists explore boundaries with university gallary installation.
Page 5

EDITORIAL/OPINION
Tabloid nation
Is celebrity gossip becoming more important than our own lives?
Page 4

WEATHER
Friday Sunny, H64°, L41°
Saturday Rain, H65°, L45°
Sunday Partly Cloudy, H66°, L39°

SPORTS
The orange are coming
UMass Men's lacrosse will host Syracuse tomorrow at 1 p.m.
Page 10

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Matthew Reid
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Riggins
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Promotions Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Matt Elder
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Matthew Reid
COPY EDITOR
Monique Jemmott
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Alyson Zillmann
PRODUCTION STAFF
Amanda Allen, Tiffany VanLangen

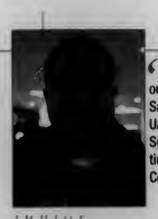
Campus Perspectives

By Jamie Lau

Will you be partaking in Spring weekend events?

"Heck yes! Dropkicks rule!"

Cait Rapopoit
junior
Theater major



"Besides my own White Trash Bash, I am at the Bluewall for some Annual Fund Karaoke. Holla!"

Vincenzo Caracciolo
senior
Political Science major

"I am planning on going to the Spring Concert and the Southwest week events."

Lauren Sauoy
sophomore
Women's Studies major

"I will be helping out in the CSA on Saturday, and in the UALRL Graduation on Sunday, then I'm hitting up the Spring Concert."

Nguyen Chau
junior
Political Science major

"I'll probably be going to the Spring Concert to see the Dropkick Murphy's and I'll be going to Southwest week."

Christine Wallau
sophomore
English and Psychology major

"Nope, I am not interested in seeing Nas or Fabulous at the Spring Concert."

Thom Dedecko
senior
Geology major

English dept. hosts workshop

ENGLISH from page 1

deep and incisive work on post-colonial studies, papers in the workshop touched on a range of topics from nationalism, the state, globalization, the media and current political events, to literary and cultural production from Latin America, Haiti, Africa, the middle East, Eastern Europe, India, Britain and the US.

Before Radhakrishnan's keynote address on globalization, Clingman noted in his introduction that Radhakrishnan brought to the UMass English Department "theory at its most advanced and at its highest levels," stressing that colleagues and students alike find it exciting to follow the dazzle of his mind "work[ing] at warp speed."

The keynote address was eloquent and direct. Silhouetted by the light of the setting sun entering the conference room, Radhakrishnan captivated his audience, drawing out a thoroughgoing and intelligent critique of globalization from the central concept of his recent book: "unevenness."

For example, he located the problems of globalization, where economic unevenness is becoming normalized, in Bangalore, India, where telephone workers answer American consumers' questions about their computers, trained to hide their own accents in English and working to American time.

He noted that in political terms these workers "are their work and nothing else besides. Bangalore is both in India and not in India. The houses and homes these workers live in belong to India square and proper" but their being as workers belongs "elsewhere."

The ironic result for these workers is that "their high tech expertise ensures their second-class citizenship in the world of high-tech." As he summed up the problem, within a new "globalized" world, "global-Indian carries no punch," as being a global-American does.

UMass Wiffle ball team to play Fenway

WIFFLE BALL from page 1

defense behind him that helped contribute to his impressive numbers. "A couple times when I was struggling, they helped me out with some good defense," he said. In the semi-finals, Jimmy Brooks made a game saving catch in the top of the fifth inning, robbing the opposing team of the tying home run, and clinching a victory.

South Boston native Jimmy Brooks described Bernazzani's pitching performance as "outstanding" and "perfect. He should have been the MVP," Brooks said.

Although there was no official MVP, Goodman compared his pitcher's performance to that of a Boston Red Sox star.

"His performance was Schilling-esque," the Jamaica Plain native said. "He was like a young Curt Schilling."

While the pitching and defense had been superb, "The '86 Celts" were an offensive threat as well.

They scored 28 runs in four games, helping the team go 4-0 and becoming UMass Amherst champions. Leading the way for this offense all tournament was senior Jimmy Brooks. Brooks was the cleanup hitter and led the team with four home runs.

"I felt good out there," Brooks said. "I was happy to contribute to the team. Chicks dig the long ball."

Brooks, however, did not want to take all of the credit, as he said junior Lee Goodman was the leader of the team. "I was swinging the bat well," Brooks said. "But Lee was our emotional leader."

"Emotional leader" Goodman said, "We were all slapping the ball around," but he said that Brooks is the best hitter on the team.

"Brooksy is a power hitter," Goodman said. "He hits the ball harder than most normal wiffle ball players."

With four home runs, Brooks established himself as one of the better power hitters in the tournament, but that doesn't mean he can take credit for giving the team its name.

Bernazzani came up with the name "The '86 Celts," referring to the 1986 World Champion Boston Celtics. Brooks said the rest of the team agreed to the name because the 1986 Boston Celtics were "the greatest team in sports history." "Who better to follow than them?," Brooks asked.

While looking up to their heroes in a different sport, "The '86 Celts" posted an impressive victory at Totman Field, and now they say they're set to win it all.

"I'm in it to win it," Brooks said. "With the way we're hitting, and the pitching we have, we're gonna win."

The "UMass-Amherst Wiffle Ball Champions" banner now hangs on the front of their house on Hobart Lane. On Monday at Fenway Park, "The '86 Celts" say they'll bring another banner home.

"It's either win or nothing," Goodman said. "We are going to take the title back to UMass."

Shear Bliss
Holistic Full Service Salon
Metro Men's Special Package
Body Sugaring (Waxing)
$10 off
also specials: cuts, colors, men's pedis, manis, & massages offer expires June 12th
440 West St. Ste. Amherst
253-3838

WANT TO MAKE SOMETHING OF YOURSELF?

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is now looking to hire a circulation manager for the 2005-2006 school year.

If you want to work in a friendly, competitive atmosphere, come to the main office to apply. Please bring a copy of your resumé.

Preferrably looking for a freshman or sophomore.

National and International News

Fiance searches for his bride

By Kristen Wyatt
Associated Press

DULUTH, Ga. — A 32-year-old woman disappeared just days before she was to be married, and authorities said Thursday they were expanding their search for her.

Jennifer Wilbanks' fiance told authorities she left home Tuesday night to go jogging. When she did not return in a couple of hours, he began looking for her, then notified police.

On Wednesday, more than 250 people searched for Wilbanks, including volunteers and police using helicopters and tracking dogs. Authorities called off the volunteer search but continued canvassing door-to-door for clues in this northeastern Atlanta suburb. They were treating the disappearance as a criminal investigation but did not elaborate.

"It's a very real possibility she did get cold feet. I mean, how many husbands have gone out for a pack of cigarettes and not come back," Duluth Police Chief Randy Belcher said.

Earlier, police Maj. Don Woodruff said friends and family believed "this is totally uncharacteristic of her. We don't believe it was a case of premarital jitters."

On Thursday, about 100 police officers expanded their search a quarter-mile deeper into woods near her home. Police had not asked anyone to take a polygraph test, but her fiance has volunteered to do so, Belcher said.

Friends and relatives have told police Wilbanks seemed happy and was looking forward to her wedding Saturday. Her keys, cash, credit cards and identification were found in her home.

"She left out of here with just a radio and the clothes she has on," said Wilbanks' fiance, John Mason. "Everything she owns is in the home. If this is cold feet, it is the weirdest case of cold feet I have ever seen."

One of hundreds of signs for missing woman, Jennifer Wilbanks hangs near her hometown in GA. Wilbanks is supposed to get married Saturday.

Putin speaks on visit to Israel denying he is affecting power

By Steve Gutterman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Russian President Vladimir Putin faced down Israeli criticism Thursday, saying Russia's planned sale of anti-aircraft missiles to Syria and supply of nuclear components to Iran does not threaten Israel's security.

Putin spoke on the second day of his historic visit to Israel — the first trip here by a Kremlin leader — before going into a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Addressing Israeli fears that he's affecting the region's balance of power, Putin urged Iran to do more to show the world that it's not trying to build a nuclear weapon.

He also pledged to tackle the growing problem of anti-Semitism in his country, saying "there can be no place for xenophobia, anti-Semitism or other forms of racial or religious intolerance" in the 21st century.

Putin was greeted Thursday morning by the pomp of an official welcoming ceremony, complete with a military honor guard and Jewish, Muslim and Christian religious leaders.

Sharon, whose parents were born in Russia, greeted Putin in Russian and told the visitor he should "feel among brothers," Israel Radio said.

The trip was intended to cement Russia's rapprochement with the Jewish state and boost its profile in the international arena.

But it was shadowed by disagreements with Israel over Russia's aid to Syria and Iran, two of Israel's staunchest enemies. Russia has provided assistance for Iran's nuclear program and has agreed to sell anti-aircraft missiles to Syria. Sharon repeatedly has said the missiles pose a danger to Israel and wants Putin to halt the deal.

Israeli Vice Premier Ehud Olmert said Thursday that Russia is selling Iran components that can be used to make non-conventional weapons, and that Russia's assistance to Iran is a cause of concern.

Israel accuses Iran of pursuing nuclear weapons, though Tehran says its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only. On Thursday, Iranian Foreign Minister Kamal Kharrazi said in the Hague, Netherlands, that his country will resume its uranium enrichment program — temporarily suspended in November — if talks with European nations this week fail.

The United States announced Wednesday it had authorized the sale of as many as 100 large bunker-buster bombs to Israel, which experts saw as a warning to Iran about its nuclear ambitions.

Putin defended the moves in talks with Israeli President Moshe Katsav, who holds a largely ceremonial role, saying that Russia was sensitive to Israel's security concerns. "Regarding Iran, we are working to make sure their nuclear ability is used for peaceful means."

The agreement with Iran requires it to return all its spent nuclear fuel to Russia so it cannot be used for military purposes, Putin said. "I agree that these steps are not enough and we have to get Iran to agree to nuclear inspections," he said at a joint news conference in Jerusalem with Katsav.

"It is necessary for our Iranian partners to reject the creation of nuclear cycle technology and not hinder placing all its nuclear program under complete international control," he said.

Putin also sought to allay concerns about the Syrian arms deal, saying the missiles should pose no threat to Israel. "The missiles we are providing to Syria are short-range anti-aircraft missiles that cannot reach Israeli territory," he said.

Israeli warplanes bombed alleged militant training bases outside Damascus on Oct. 5, 2003, and have buzzed one of Syrian President Bashar Assad's palaces.

Putin, whose country has traditionally supported the Arabs in their conflict with Israel, said he had personally vetoed the sale of longer-range missiles to Syria out of concern for Israel's safety.

Officials who briefed reporters on the Putin-Katzav meeting said Russia already had signed a deal with Syria for missiles with a range of 185 miles. According to the officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity, Putin told Katsav "then I checked and my experts told me that Israel has no way to intercept these missiles so I canceled the deal."

Russian President Putin faces down criticism about Russia's planned sale of anti-aircraft missiles to Syria.

New medication helps free addicts from heroin cravings

By Michael Rubinkam
Associated Press

WILKES-BARRE, Pa. — Krystal began using heroin when she was 14, and soon hit bottom. But at 18, she says she is drug-free, holds down a job, attends beauty school and cares for her toddler son. She credits a relatively new medication called buprenorphine with freeing her from heroin's grip.

"Amazing," "incredible" and "lifesaving" are a few of the words addicts use to describe buprenorphine, a pill that blocks heroin cravings.

The problem, some say, is that Congress has made it hard to get the drug, and health professionals are pressuring the government to expand access.

Available in this country since 2002, buprenorphine is an alternative to methadone, which has been used to treat heroin addiction since the 1960s. Buprenorphine is also used to treat addictions to prescription painkillers like OxyContin, Percocet and Vicodin.

"It has been extraordinarily effective in the patients we have given it to," said psychiatrist Dr. Herbert Kleber of Columbia University.

Doctors say buprenorphine is longer-acting than methadone, more difficult to overdose on and easier to withdraw from. Addicts say "bupe" gives them a feeling of clearheadedness they do not get with methadone. Also, they can be treated in the privacy of a doctor's office; methadone, under federal law, is available only at public clinics.

But federal law says individual doctors and medical practices can prescribe buprenorphine to no more than 30 patients at a time — a provision aimed at preventing "prescription mills," where drugs are doled out indiscriminately by doctors trying to make a fast buck.

Krystal's doctor, I. Charles Lentini, said he has a waiting list of 185 addicts — many of whom are continuing to abuse drugs while they wait.

Even more problematic is the restriction on large medical practices. For example, Kaiser Permanente, the nation's largest not-for-profit health maintenance organization with 8.2 million members, operates eight medical groups around the country, meaning it can treat only 240 patients at any one time nationwide.

Bills pending in Congress would eliminate the 30-patient restriction for group medical practices while retaining it for individual doctors. The Senate passed similar legislation last year, but it died in the House.

"It clearly was not our intention" that addicts have less access to buprenorphine because they go to a group practice, said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., co-author of the 2000 law that paved the way for doctors to prescribe buprenorphine but also established the 30-patient limit. Levin introduced the bill now pending.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration is working on a regulatory fix to expand access to buprenorphine. "The group practice issue we see very much as a critical barrier," said Robert Lubran, the agency's director of pharmacologic therapies.

Krystal said she spent eight agonizing months on Lentini's waiting list before finally getting her buprenorphine prescription last month. She entered detox two or three times while she waited, and returned to heroin each time she was discharged.

"It was torture," she said. "I just wanted to feel normal again."

Interested in writing for news?
apply for assistant news editor!
call 413-545-1809
or e-mail:
news@dailycollegian.com

Boston Bartenders School of America
WANT A HOT JOB?
Learn to be a Professional Bartender!
Classes Starting Now!
Boston Bartenders School
218 Memorial Avenue • West Springfield
1-800-357-3210
www.bostonbartender.com

ALL FIRED UP!
creative food & beverage
FEATURING
MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE
ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS

STUDENT SPECIAL
ALL YOU CAN EAT
SUNDAY BRUNCH
$9.95
(Regularly $13.95)
48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
www.allfireduphadley.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Tabloid obsession gone too far

Katelyn Harding

Britney is pregnant. Ben finally proposed to Jen. Brad and the other Jen are officially split up and Jessica and Nick are continuing to have problems. Are these my friends I am talking about? Nope. I left out the last names purposely, because I bet a lot of you know exactly whom I am referring to. For those of you that don't, you obviously haven't been reading your weekly "Star" magazine.

In the past couple years I have seen magazines such as "Us Weekly" and "Star" increasingly grace the magazine racks in stores. For an assignment in one of my classes, I had to buy "Time" and "Newsweek." The store I went to downtown didn't have these magazines, but they had enough issues of tabloid magazines to satiate a group of 12-year-old girls for at least an hour. The plethora of crap magazines got me to thinking, why are we so obsessed with celebrities?

If you are even slightly famous, say, you have a famous sister who had sold millions of albums and has a hit television show on MTV with her newlywed husband, you can be famous, too. Talented musicians need not apply.

Even VH1 knows the appeal of celebrities to the masses. They have created numerous television programs featuring them, has-beens and all. One perfect example is "The Surreal Life." This program showcases about six or seven has-been actors, models and/or musicians and puts them in a house for a couple of weeks to live together. Of course, hilarity and the unexpected ensue. VH1 knows how funny it is to watch famous people make fools out of themselves.

When people see a magazine cover screaming "Hot, Un-Talented Actor Cheated On His Airbrushed Model Girlfriend, Details Inside" they can't help but be intrigued by the audacity of this man. How could he cheat on his gorgeous girlfriend? Hopefully, for the sake of the Hollywood world, she bounces back and makes a couple of bad movies to soften the blow of having her relationship splattered all over magazines for the entire nation to gobble up.

This is what is really important, knowing how she is going to cope with her situation. Please. Is this really detrimental to your life? No. Has your life changed one iota since Hilary Duff has had another box office bomb or J. Lo has moved onto husband number who cares? Hopefully not. But we still continue to read about these people as if they were our best friends, as if their lives somehow affect us. I guess in a way they do, since these magazines sell, and even "USA Today," a very tabloid-like newspaper is one of the top selling in the nation. Or how the "National Enquirer" is the top selling "newspaper" in America.

In addition to this, you have what I like to call the bane of my existence, reality television programs. Honestly, whoever thought of these shows need to be forced to actually watch them. If you are even slightly famous, say, you have a famous sister who had sold millions of albums and has a hit television show on MTV with her newlywed husband, you can be famous, too. Talented musicians need not apply.

If you don't know whom I am referring to, it's the Saturday Night Live embarrassment, Ashlee Simpson. These days, as long as you are related to someone famous, you can be famous yourself. And American audiences love it. They don't care that you're not talented, as long as you look pretty, they will love you. This obsession is something that I just can't understand.

With all these shows and magazines available to us, we have to make a decision. We can either get lost in information about people that we will never meet, and could probably care less about us, or we could inform ourselves with information that really matters, that could actually get us ahead in life.

We need to extricate ourselves from the overrated, false world of the Hollywood stars. There are a lot more important things going on in our world today. If all you know is whom Paris Hilton is currently dating, not about the deadliest commuter train wreck in western Japan in four decades that took the lives of 73 people, and injured more than 440 others, something is seriously wrong. Put down your "Star" magazine immediately and go get informed about events that really matter. Put on the news and if you really can't deal without your daily dosage of tabloids, there is always Fox News.

Katelyn Harding is a Collegian columnist

Birthdays failing to deliver

Michael Anmuth

I woke up on Tuesday and realized that I was old; it was my 22nd birthday. While I've been in my 20s now for two years, last year's birthday was more exciting and more meaningful, just because after one turns 18, they strive to reach 21 to be able to do things legally, like buy stocks and oh yeah, drink. But, after spending a year celebrating 21, the next birthday happened on a whim, between assignments that were due for my classes and in the midst of beginning to think about finals for this semester.

These in-between birthdays, ones like 17, 19 and 22, are still days of celebration but they lack something that other birthdays represent. You can drive in a good number of states at 16, you become an adult (even if you're still in high school at the time) at 18 and 21. The space between, however, the innocuous years are just getting older, not necessarily a momentous occasion in their own right. Perhaps if there was a landmark for ages like 22 or 17 or 47, we would look forward to these birthdays, but they are just numbers and hatch marks on the doorway of life.

Similarly to when the calendar year changes and you continue to write the old year for at least the first few days, I continue to tell people that I'm 21, unintentionally. Whenever you tell people that you have a birthday coming up, they automatically ask how old you are. I answered correctly but now that the day has passed, I find myself answering the wrong year. I don't think that I want to grow down (as opposed to growing up), I just think that it will take some time for me to get used to saying 22 as opposed to 21, since I've gotten comfortable being 21 for at least 365 days. When I do get used to 22, it will probably be somewhere close to turning 23, thus confusing me for another year at that point in time.

Besides "in-between" birthdays, friends of mine have told me that holidays are not exciting them, either. Maybe the appeal is lost as we get older, but in recent years many people have told me that in December they feel the same as they do during the rest of the year. In December, we are focused on our final exams, a reason why I put my birthday down on my calendar next to study review sessions and reading assignments, and why buying Christmas gifts tend to have a priority over academics. Plus, when we get to college age, many people have as much fun buying gifts for others as receiving gifts, an experience that I have had myself in recent years.

... I use the nomenclature of 'guy' because while I am definitely not a kid anymore, I still do not see myself as a grown person at all.

I am thankful for the gifts I have received for my birthday; I do not wish to downplay the appreciation for the congratulatory phone calls that were from well-wishing friends. I definitely think that birthdays are important, and I was glad that people recognized mine, even if it just seemed like another day to me. The most important people in your life always tend to recognize things like birthdays, and this was no exception. It makes you appreciate life in general when good people surround you on holidays that make you feel appreciated.

Waking up as 22, I still don't consider myself a "man," although society I'm sure would consider me as such. Instead, I use the nomenclature of "guy" because while I am definitely not a kid anymore, I still do not see myself as a grown person at all. Although people my age and younger are in the workforce, and a career seems to be the tunnel to adulthood, my days spent in college at age 22 are less compulsory to growing up than, say, having a morning commute and wearing a suit and tie each day. Possibly next year, I will change the nomenclature, but as I accidentally continue to tell people the wrong age, being a "guy" is fine for me.

Each year, we have birthdays, some more exciting than others. At 22, I feel neither old nor young, neither extremely excited for the day nor apathetic about it. I identify myself as a year older but feel the exact same as when I was a year younger, last week. Overall, I woke up on Tuesday to feel 22, but I may not experience it for some time, or I may turn 23 while still waiting for the experience to happen.

Michael Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

No freedom for right-wingers

Ben Duffy

Academic freedom is the freedom of teachers and students to pursue their ideas at an institution of higher learning. Ideally, nothing is taboo at a university. It is a place where competing ideas clash, where scholars blaze new trails of knowledge. Sometimes blazing new trails makes people uncomfortable, even furious.

And so be it. That's how academic freedom works. There have been plenty of ideas that were scoffed at in their day, and some people worked very hard to make sure that those new ideas died in the cradle. Think of Copernicus, Galileo and Martin Luther King Jr.

Radical professor Ward Churchill made headlines in February when his 2001 work "Some People Push Back: On the Justice of Roosting Chickens" was uncovered. In it, he referenced the victims of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, saying, "If there was a better, more effective, or in fact any other way of visiting some penalty befitting their participation upon the little Eichmanns inhabiting the sterile sanctuary of the twin towers, I'd really be interested in hearing about it."

It's that I don't believe that the AAUP really believes what it is saying, nor do I believe that I have found real academic freedom at this university.

People were understandably upset, especially in New York, where Churchill was scheduled to speak. A firestorm of criticism befell the University of Colorado, and Churchill stepped down as the head of the Ethnic Studies department. He still retained his job as a professor.

The American Association of University Professors stood up for Churchill. They didn't defend what he said but his right to say it. "Freedom of faculty members to express views, however unpopular or distasteful, is an essential condition of an institution of higher learning that is truly free," wrote the AAUP in its statement on Ward Churchill.

I had a hard time keeping a straight face while reading that passage. It's not that I disagree with them. It's that I don't believe that the AAUP really believes what it is saying, nor do I believe that I have found real academic freedom at this university. Threats to academic freedom don't come exclusively from the Right. In fact, they don't even mostly come from the Right.

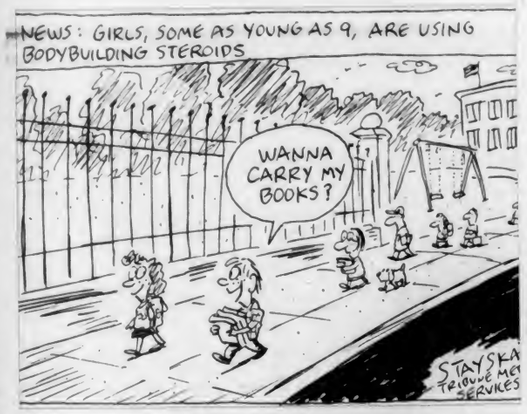
To use a cliché, Amherst is a politically correct atmosphere much like Boulder, Berkley and Ithaca. Such an atmosphere suffocates scholarship. It's a systemic problem, and it didn't start with Ward Churchill.

Take for example, Richard Lamm, who teaches in the same Colorado public university system as Ward Churchill. Lamm happens to be the former governor of the state, a former civil rights attorney and a generally liberal democrat. But despite his clout, Lamm could not manage to get a "controversial" essay published in the campus's faculty publication.

What was so controversial about it? Well, he committed a cardinal sin of Leftism, saying, "We must recognize that all the civil rights laws in the world are not going to solve the problem of minority failure. Ultimately Blacks and Hispanics are going to have to see that the solution is largely in their own hands." To sum up the article, Lamm presents the metaphor of two magical wands. By waving the first wand, he could erase all racism and discrimination. By waving the second, he could infuse Black and Hispanic neighborhoods with "Japanese or Jewish values," that emphasize education, responsibility and hard work. Lamm contends that he would choose the second wand, if he had the choice of only one.

After Lamm's essay was rejected, he appealed through the layers of university bureaucracy. It was futile. Everyone agreed that the essay was just too controversial. The AAUP was nowhere to be found. The faculty who came to Ward Churchill's defense was absent without leave. The guys who love to cry "McCarthyism" were silent.

My first thought was that the University of Denver should at least concede that Lamm really had the best interests of minorities in mind when he wrote his essay, given his history as a former civil rights attorney and liberal democrat. My second thought was that these ideas were not really all that controversial, outside of the ivory university towers.



But that's baloney. A professor shouldn't need an impressive list of left-wing credentials in order to say what he/she believes. Nor does it matter if his/her ideas are controversial or not. Moderate or fringe, with or without his history in civil rights, Lamm has a right to pursue his ideas.

So do we all. Ward Churchill makes me sick and do some of my own teachers. Reading the essay that got Churchill into so much trouble, I can't help but grind my teeth in anger, but I support academic freedom on principle. I agreed with the AAUP when it said, "... we reject the notion that some viewpoints are so offensive or disturbing that the academic community should not allow them to be heard and debated."

Academia, however, is probably one of the most restrictive places in the world if you dissent from the Leftist orthodoxy. Sometimes I ask myself why I continue to believe in the concept of academic freedom, when I know that it doesn't apply to ideas falling to the right of center.

The solution to this problem isn't to gag Churchill or any of his twins on campuses across the nation. We need real academic freedom. It means an end to the browbeating of conservative students, the discriminatory practices that ensure that conservatives aren't hired, and the knee-jerk reactions to conservative or right wing ideas.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

QUESTIONING YOUR FAITH

Wednesday's column, "I Don't Believe in Fairy Tales" is a well thought out essay on the complicated subject of religion. Ryan Welsh has raised some strong reasons for his agnosticism, reasons that many people struggle with today. In response to this essay, I would like to comment on each point: cosmos, human stupidity, inherited beliefs and church practices.

The probability of other planets like earth existing somewhere out there is not the same as the "overwhelming reality" that they exist. There is no doubt the universe is infinitely large, which increases the probability that life exists somewhere out there. I would argue that such a probability does not challenge all religions, most of which adopt "intelligent design," to a great extent because science has yet to explain convincingly the origins of matter and life.

If the big bang made intelligent design obsolete, why do people still believe in a Creator at all? It would seem that more than a hundred years of "scientifically explained" universe origins being taught in schools across the country in the place of intelligent design would have convinced most people that intelligent design is impossible.

Eternity in paradise with a forgiving, benevolent God is nicer to believe, but not all religions espouse this belief. Furthermore, since science can only explain so much, and so far has not enough evidence to support the big-bang theory, macroevolution and other theories that discredit creationism, is not belief in solely scientific explanations for the origin of the universe a religion in itself?

Religious people do not deny science; they believe it is helpful for understanding the natural world. Some even believe God used a "scientifically sound" method to create the universe, as we know it today. The point is we all worship something; though we may not call it worship specifically. Who or what is your god? Is it the sports page, food, stars, science, yourself?

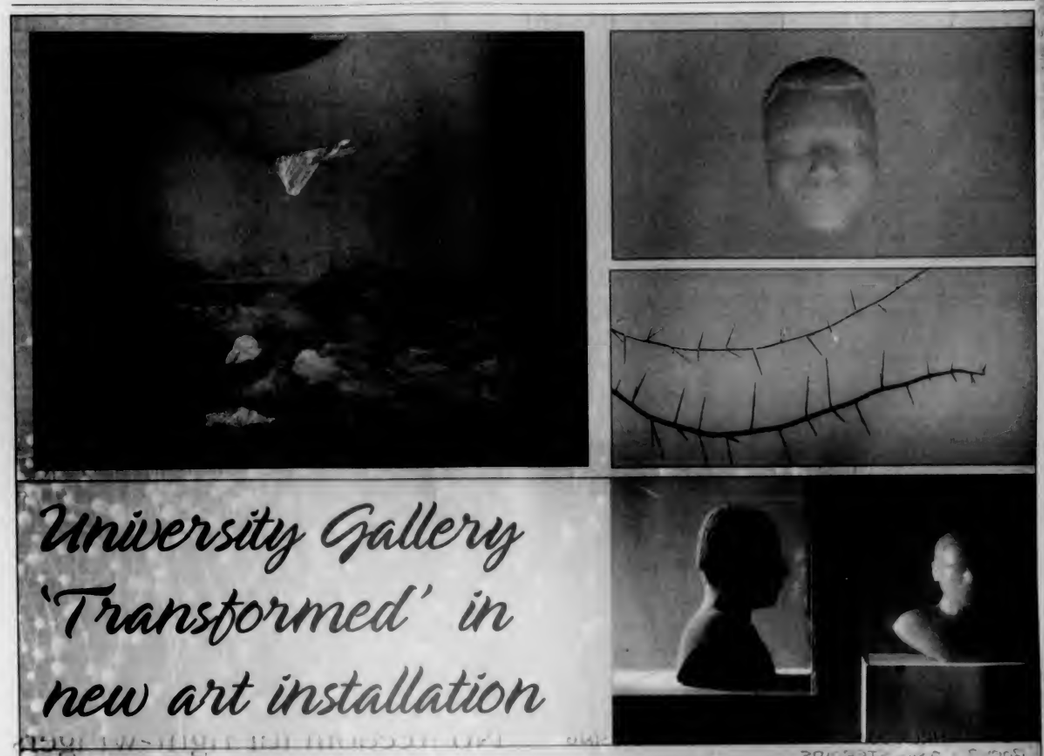
Our family, friends, society, experiences and education shape our worldview. It is a way of seeing the world based on things one believes to be true. It is important to understand that that worldviews get twisted and used for the wrong ends. The humanistic ideologies of Stalin, Hitler and Mao Tze Dong resulted in at least 40 million deaths for which they were directly responsible.

There is no doubt the Church has done some abominable things in the past and not everyone agrees with its current practices. What must be asked is not, "When can we get rid of religion?" but "What caused religion to do this or that and what can we learn from it?" The Crusades, Inquisition, Islamic Jihad, etc. are inconsistent with the core message of their beliefs. When religions like Christianity refer back to their core message, love and peace shines from it.

If anyone inherits the gospel message, let us hope it is not twisted. If, as Welsh says, "people will believe what they are raised to believe" and that it is unreasonable to question these beliefs, how is he able to question his Catholic upbringing? And how is it that agnostics become true believers? I suppose Welsh has found the answers. One of the beauties of Christianity is that its followers don't claim to have all the answers. This is why submitting to the all knowing, all powerful Creator is possible.

The Apostle Paul reasoned the gospel message with the intellectuals of Athens. He didn't need to find which of the 31 gospels to use. Rather, he explained boldly what he knew had changed his life. Some of the Athenians sneered, others wanted to hear more and some became followers. This is the way with people today. God has given us a choice to believe in him or to reject him. He doesn't want people inhering the Kingdom of Heaven who have chosen not to follow him.

Jamison Shipley
UMass student



INTERESTED IN READING ABOUT SPECIFIC TOPICS?? SUBMIT YOUR COLUMN IDEAS TO EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, 2005

ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

University Gallery 'Transformed' in new art installation

By Amanda Smith
Collegian Correspondent

"Transition and Transformation" is an exhibition at the University Gallery of Indian artists A. Balasubramaniam and Ranjani Shettar. Although the two artists have never shown together they seem to identify with many similar themes. They both represent an intermediary or transitional state in their works, and both artists display works that comment on life and death. This theme is exemplified by the fact that both have works that are on-site installation pieces. Essentially, their works are conceived within the University Gallery and will ultimately "die" once they are inevitably removed from that site.

There were two works that were especially striking. The first piece, by Balasubramaniam, is entitled "Golden Thorn." "Golden Thorn" is an actual thorn branch gilded in 20 karat gold. In our materially motivated world, this image is simultaneously desirable and unpleasant. It is sustained in this transitional state that so many of Balasubramaniam's other works also represent, and contains both the psychological temptation of the possession of a golden item and the bodily rejection that one may feel at the thought of grabbing the sharp thorns. The delicate thorn branch is placed in a shadow box, and the shadow of the thorn becomes an equally important part of the image. This projection of the golden thorn is black and resembles the image we would normally see; it is now unwanted. Yet, in a sense, it simultaneously becomes more stable: the lack of its golden covering removes its preciousness and creates a harder visual experience, although, conversely, it is now a mere shadow. This piece seems to say a lot about Balasubramaniam's feelings towards the more commercialized, corporate, and technological society that India is steadily moving towards. Are we striving for the unobtainable or are we reaching for what looks appealing but is, in truth, harmful? Through the use of optical illusion in his pieces, Balasubramaniam seems to struggle with questions of reality, transience, transformation and the immaterial.

'Transition and Transformation'
University Gallery
Fine Arts Center
Tues.-Fri.
11 a.m.-4:30 p.m.
Sat.-Sun.
2-5 p.m.
Now through May 15

One piece in particular from Ranjani's series, "Container and Content," echoed many of the ideas that Balasubramaniam presented to his audience, but took a completely different route. A coconut tree boat suspended from the ceiling floated over roughly fifty pieces of pumpkin seed shaped butter paper that have been spread beneath. The title itself seems to intimate shelter, home, or perhaps even the human body as a vessel. The hard, dark coconut boat seems to have once held all of the delicate paper seeds that have been dispersed across the floor. The butter paper seeds resemble a woman's uterus, a place where the human seed is kept, or contained within the body. The organic materials used here reinforce this idea of life, reproduction, and its conquest against the manufactured and synthetic elements that continue to overtake our realities. Ranjani gives a sense of the fragility of natural life, reproduction and perseverance through the use of these insubstantial — even translucent — seeds.

Using the direct representation of a body part, or by suggestion the body's reaction to pain, these two artists are able to convey their messages on broader issues within their societies to their audience. Balasubramaniam and Ranjani portray the discomfort, or the instability, at least, of being in an in-between place. Neither here nor there, these artists comment on their battle, reconciling the contradictory possibilities of institution and modernity; the natural and the synthetic, the technological and the rural.

Woman challenges the boys with motorcycle business

By M. Daniel Gibbard
Chicago Tribune

HERRIN, Ill. — Christine Vaughn hits the starter on the low-slung chopper she designed and built, and as the pipes spit unmuffled thunder from a big chrome engine, she changes.

The self-described "good girl" and mother disappears, shoved aside by the outlaw biker chick from Alaska who created Wicked Women Choppers, the company she bills as the first run by women to design and produce bikes for other women.

Hear her roar? No, hear her rumble.

"We want it to be just as mean, just as bad as a guy's bike. We want to make it look like we're going to get off and take the boots to you," said Vaughn, 35, who has long blond hair, a husky smoker's laugh and a quick sense of humor thoroughly devoid of political correctness.

Her company's slogan, and philosophy of life, is borrowed from a Harvard professor: "Well-behaved women seldom make history."

The difference in the bikes, barely noticeable, is size. Vaughn, who is 5 foot 6, designs her motorcycles with narrower handlebars and a lower frame and seat that create a lower center of gravity and an easier reach.

"A wrong-size bike is not only uncomfortable, it's unsafe," she said.

Vaughn's vision has struck a chord with riders. She and her year-old company have been profiled in newspapers and magazines. A PBS station is recording the process as she and her team create a bike from the frame up, and an independent production company plans a reality show pilot.

Suppliers quickly jumped on board: Tool companies sent new gear to use in her shop, and dozens of dealers have asked about selling her lines, she said. She has received inquiries from prospective buyers in Japan and India.

This despite that she just got her first firm order last week and has not yet begun production.

The attention has been a little overwhelming, she said.

"I knew what the niche was," she said, but "I just had never anticipated the reaction. I wanted to just build a couple of bikes a year."

Instead, she said, she will probably end up producing about 50 annually once production is up to full speed, perhaps by late summer. To make many more than that would mean moving from her new 1,500-square-foot shop in this small town in southern Illinois.

"My only battle is to stay small," said Vaughn, who also customizes motorcycles for clients. "We've had people who wanted to come in as a partnership, but we want to keep it manageable."

One reason for all the attention is the rapid growth in women owning and riding motorcycles.

From 1998 to 2003, the estimated number of female owners jumped 36 percent, from 467,000 to 633,000, according to a survey by the Motorcycle Industry Council. Ridership increased similarly, and there are now more than 4 million women operators, the

See BIKER on page 6

COURTESY MICHAEL TERCHA

Bike-builder Christine Vaughn rides the brightly colored Shady Lady, her company's first model.

Woman takes on the boys

BIKER from page 5

trade group says.

"We got tired of looking at the back of someone's helmet," said Lois Wyatt, a trustee with Women on Wheels, a riders club with more than 100 chapters.

Wicked Women's first model is the Shady Lady. It is lower to the ground than most men's bikes, with narrower handlebars and seat, among other female-friendly features.

The prototype sports a 90 cubic inch, 1,000 cubic centimeters, S&S motor, pipes that Vaughn designed and enough chrome to cause blindness.

On the other hand, its heart-shaped flames are painted fingernail-polish pink.

"It's a bike every man would be proud to ride, except for the pink," said Vaughn, adding that she chose the color to show up in photographs.

"Women want to be macho," she said. "We want the loud pipes, the power, all the stuff that makes you feel you know what testosterone is all about."

With all the trimmings, the bike lists for $34,500, which she says is competitive with a similar Harley. She also plans a downscale version, the Vixen, and a hardtail (no rear suspension) model called the Black Mariah.

A seventh-generation Alaskan from the rough and ready island town of Ketchikan, Vaughn credits frontier roots for her independence.

Wicked Women Choppers' name comes from the Old West, Vaughn said, and refers to any woman who defied the conventions of the day.

The company motto is a quote from Laurel Thatcher Ulrich that Vaughn came across in a magazine about quilting, of all things.

"It's about women who are independent and live their own lives despite what society says," Vaughn said.

She got her first motorcycle when she was 10, a dirt bike from her father. When she began doing stunts on it, he decided she should channel her efforts into something slightly safer like racing.

Sometimes she competed against girls; other times she would enter boys' races as "Chris." When she finished in the top three, she would take off her helmet during the trophy ceremony and shake out her long blond hair.

That, she said, did not always go over well in conservative Alaska, though her father used to sit back and smile at the reactions.

Her brother, Dan Diamond, also raced, and she would watch as he tinkered with the machinery.

"It looked important, so I tried to do the same thing," she said. Unfortunately, "I usually ended up with a lot of parts left over."

Her dad and brother just laughed, so she taught herself how to fix her own bike.

In her teens, she would "borrow" her brother's street bike, usually dumping it, which is when she realized that the taller, top-heavy cycles were not made for someone her size.

She began to customize Harley-Davidsons to fit, but she couldn't keep them long before someone offered her too much money to refuse. Clearly, there was a market.

But Wicked Women Choppers is not really about commerce, she said. One of Vaughn's main goals is to blast open a traditionally male bastion.

"It's important not only to break open the industry, but also to show (other women) they can do this," she said. "There are a lot of very talented women out there."

Vaughn has two machinist/metal fabricators on board already, Shara Peyton, 28, and Rhonda Heifner, 24.

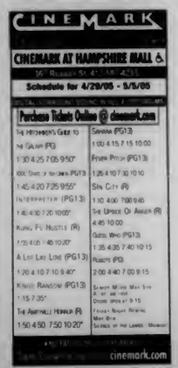
"This is a man's job, and we're doing it," said Heifner, whose dark hair is partly dyed pinkish-purple. "There ain't a lot about me that's feminine."

Vaughn also hopes to start an internship program with local schools, offering girls in shop classes the chance at hands-on experience in a comfortable environment.

Amid this swirl of femaledom is Vaughn's husband, a biker who said he's happy to ride in the figurative sidecar.

A Vietnam War veteran, Dan Vaughn worked in the telecommunications industry in the Caribbean, Hungary and Siberia before retiring to southern Illinois a few years ago. The Vaughns have a teenage son.

"It's been fairly easy for a husband," Dan Vaughn said. "She followed me all over the world and has always been there to support me. To take a back seat to someone so talented is not a problem for me at all."



COURTESY MTV.COM

Grammy Award-winners 'come around' again

Green Day's "American Idiot" tour lands at the Mullins Center this Saturday night. The trio is supported by New Jersey-based punk band My Chemical Romance.

Looking for a job?
Why not apply to become an Assistant Arts Editor?
Call 545-1361

New York, New York

The Mix Tape

Matt O'Rourke

New York, regardless of whether you hate or love the city, has been one of the most written about cities in music, at least over the past few generations, and some of the most recognized artists, both new and old, are from the city. This week's tape takes a sampling of artists from New York and those who have written about it.

"New York City" – The Golden Republic (3:02)

Who better to write about New York City than … a band from Kansas City? That's right, Missouri rockers The Golden Republic use electronic synthesizers and organ to create a highly danceable rhythm, all in the name of the Big Apple. Simplicity can be brilliance, even lyrically, and that's just what lead singer Ben Grimes set out to do. The track seems almost as if it is attempting to create the club scene of the city, especially with the synthesizers. Fans of glam-rock and mid-80s music will no doubt enjoy this song.
(Astralwerks, 2005)

"NYC" – Interpol (4:20)

Perhaps the band that single-handedly revived the New Order/Joy Division sound, Interpol, hails from the New York underground rock scene. Although "NYC" is considered an indie hit off of their first album, "Turn On the Bright Lights," Interpol has managed to leak into the mainstream with their latest album "Antics," on Matador Records. A very dark tone, echoing Radiohead-esque guitars, and a sort of cadence based on the drum set all come together to create a well-layered piece of music, with much replayability. Paul Banks sings of identity, and the theme fits well into the idea of such a large place — "It's up to me now turn on the bright lights/New York Cares (got to be some more change in my life)." The idea of finding one's way in life couldn't fit much better than in a place like New York.
(Matador Records, 2002)

"City of Blinding Lights" – U2 (5:47)

Depending on how you feel about U2, "City of Blinding Lights" is either the best song since "Where the Streets Have No Name" or simply a clone of its precursor. Regardless, the song (and the album, for that matter) has the energy that fans of U2 have come to love. Bright piano and the Edge's guitar combined with a mandolin sound bring a diversity of culture and music together in one track. Throughout the song's duration, there is so much going on between effects, vocals and musicians, which is excellent for those who love to play songs again and again. Typical of many songs in U2's catalog, the track is about love, inner beauty, etc, etc.
(Interscope, 2004)

"Ch-Check It Out" – The Beastie Boys (3:13)

It seems to be a near-art form to be able to decipher the Beastie Boys on any of their tracks through a first listen. Their singe, "Ch-Check It Out," is off of their latest studio effort, "To the Five Boroughs." For better or worse, after reading through the lyrics several times, it's still unclear to me what the lyrics are actually about. However, the Beastie Boys (as usual) are at a high with their antics and, of course, emceeing. They keep it old school with their beats- bass is heavy, and a clearly looped horn blast is repeated constantly. Much of their album, though, is autobiographical— giving thanks to the city where they found their start, and even taking styles from previous rappers in a sort of tribute. A great listen, even if hip-hop isn't quite your thing.
(Capitol, 2004)

"The Only Living Boy in New York" – Simon and Garfunkel (3:59)

It's somewhat ironic that "The Only Living Boy in New York" ended up on Zach Braff's own mixtape for his film, that is, the "Garden State" soundtrack. I'd like to consider this song to be the exact opposite of Interpol's "NYC," in that this track features the bright side of loneliness in a big place. "Half of the time we're gone but we don't know where, we don't know where," the duo sings together. The strung percussion, which echoes on occasion in this song, adds to the feeling of being alone, as one can hear it fading into the background. The same goes for Garfunkel's singing of "here I am" as it, too, fades away. This track is perfect no matter what your mood is, and suits many emotions.
(Columbia, 1970)

"New York State of Mind" – Billy Joel (6:05)

Probably the best track is where a famous artist explains his need to go back home again to the usual. Billy Joel does just that. He samples some piano riffs from his own music before he begins to tell his story. "Some folks like to get away/Take a holiday from the neighborhood/Hop a flight to Miami Beach/Or to Hollywood/But I'm talking a Greyhound/On the Hudson River Line/I'm in a New York state of mind," Joel sings, introducing us to his dilemma as he has in so much of his music. A masterful storyteller, Billy Joel always connects with his roots and delivers, no matter how big he has become. The jazz sax and occasional loud hits provide strength where the song is otherwise quiet and laidback, as if you were taking a late night walk through the city. Joel incorporates all the elements of New York in just over six minutes, and that's no small feat.
(Columbia, 1976)

"New York, New York" – Frank Sinatra (3:26)

Old Blue Eyes' timeless hit has been featured in everything from commercials to movie advertisements, and even a "Simpson's" episode. This big-band classic, "New York, New York," chronicles the singer's wish "to be a part of it," that is, the city that never sleeps. Jubilant singing with that big-band sound makes the track have a distinctive Broadway sound, almost as though it were part of the "42nd Street" soundtrack. As simple as it sounds, that may be the best tribute of all- singing a song in such a grand fashion that the city is known for. A song for all those who aspire to climb to the top, its hard to beat "New York, New York."
(Reprise, 1961)
Total Running Time (29:48)

UM future is bright

W. LACROSSE from page 10

some good things could happen," Bolduc explained. "As you know, our first halves tend to be very strong and in the second we tend to struggle, so we want to see if we can do something different to overcome the hump that we've been struggling with."

Despite a sub par season, there is no question that beating a top team in Temple for the first time under coach Bolduc, and going out with a win on senior day would make the end of the season very memorable.

UMass won't get the chance to play spoiler as both Richmond and Temple have a spot in the post season locked up, but two wins would be a great stepping stone for a team that only loses three seniors; Kristin St. Hilaire being the only starter.

"I don't think that they'll play better [without the pressure]. I think it's a nice way to finish the season knowing that we can just go out there and play, and know that it doesn't mean anything towards the Atlantic 10 anymore, except for of course final standings," Bolduc said. "Ultimately it's a good exercise game to see how they play not having to deal with pressure to come up with a win."

The year has been full of ups and downs, frustration and excitement. This weekend is the last chance for the feisty Minutewomen to make a mark on the Atlantic 10 and let it know that they are a team to watch out for in the upcoming seasons.

ANDY TAMES/KASCOLLEGIAN

The UMass women's lacrosse team failed to make the A-10 tournament this season. They are scheduled to play Temple today.

Hudson and Mulder reunite

By Charles Odum
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Former partners in pranks as Oakland teammates, Tim Hudson and Mark Mulder may feel as if the joke is on them when they face each other Friday night.

Teammates in Oakland the last five years as two of the starting jokesters — with Barry Zito — in the Big Three pitching rotation, Hudson was traded to Atlanta and Mulder was sent to St. Louis after the 2004 season.

Friday night, in the opening game of the Braves-Cardinals series, Hudson and Mulder will meet for the first time as opposing pitchers.

Since they're now in the National League, they also hit. They say that sets up the most intriguing — and potentially hilarious — part of the matchup.

The two talked on the phone Monday.

"We laughed about it and said how this figures," Mulder said. "Who's going to be able to keep a straight face? That might be the hardest part. I know I'm going to start laughing. What are you going to do?"

Hudson and Mulder were lead players in the frat-house atmosphere of the Athletics' clubhouse. The two were almost as well-known in Oakland for their kidding as for their winning.

Once Hudson and Mulder put white shoe polish around the perimeter of a sunflower seed bucket that former A's pitching coach Rick Peterson liked to use as a stool. Hudson and Mulder then laughed while Peterson walked around with a white ring on his gray uniform pants.

Oakland players also were known to race remote-controlled cars around the clubhouse.

It may be difficult for Hudson or Mulder to keep from laughing when looking down from the Turner Field mound at the other standing in the batter's box.

Hudson said he and Mulder talked about the possibility of facing each other even before they left Oakland.

"We were just joking about if we got traded," said a smiling Hudson. "I told him, just laughing, whatever you throw at me, I'm going to throw at you. If he starts breaking out his nasty stuff early, I'm going to have to do the same."

Added Hudson, still smiling: "Obviously, if guys are on base, that's one thing. But if I come up with nobody on, two out and he starts breaking all this stuff on me, I'm going to do the same."

Because they know each other so well, each respects the other's hitting ability. Hudson was the Southeastern Conference's Most Valuable Player at Auburn University for his hitting and pitching. Mulder also was a strong hitter at Michigan State.

"Oh, yeah, he can hit," Hudson said. "He's a real good hitter. He hit cleanup for his college team. I know he can swing the bat. Yeah, man, I'm going to have to pitch him."

Mulder didn't reveal the specifics of what he said are many side bets with Hudson, but neither wants to give up a hit to the other.

"It'll be fun," Mulder said. "It should be. I hope so... We'll total it up at the end. There's no point in worrying about it now."

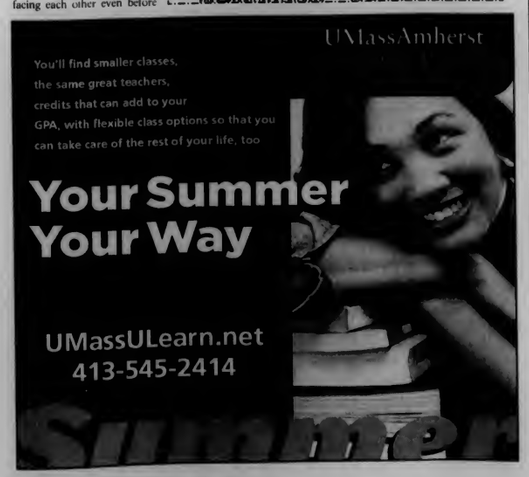
Even if they were not good friends and former teammates, this would be a matchup to watch.

Mulder is 2-1 with a 3.10 ERA after pitching a 10-hit shutout to beat Roger Clemens and the Houston Astros 1-0 Saturday. He was picked as the NL Player of the Week.

Hudson also has been as good as promised, going 2-0 with a 0.96 ERA in his first four starts with the Braves.

Mulder averaged 18 wins the last four years, including a 21-8 mark in 2001.

Even with a dip to a 12-6 record last season, Hudson averaged 16 wins the last five years. He left as Oakland's career leader with a .702 winning percentage, and he has never lost more than nine games in a season.



Braves first baseman Adam LaRoche said Hudson has brought a relaxed presence to Atlanta's clubhouse, where Bobby Cox's players have been known for being low-key but businesslike.

"He's so relaxed and laid back. He's a pitcher that on the day he's pitching, you can joke around with him," said LaRoche. Hudson's clubhouse neighbor. "He's not sitting there sweating, thinking about what he did the game before."

LaRoche said Hudson "is also incredibly competitive, I don't care who he's facing."

Even if Hudson cracks a smile when facing Mulder the hitter, LaRoche said Hudson will be focused on winning.

Pregnant?
Would you like to talk?
Information can help clear away the confusion.
We offer free, confidential counseling with caring counselors who understand your concerns. We provide information about your options so you can make the best decisions for your baby and you.
Open Adoption Available: Choose your baby's parents, meet them and stay in touch. Medical and living assistance available.
CALL 1-877-777-7774 toll free/24 hrs
E-mail: info@brightsideadoption.org
www.brightsideadoption.org
Brightside Adoption Resource Center
2112 Riverdale Road • West Springfield
413-827-4115

UMass pull through with win

BASEBALL from page 10

Doherty, to preserve the UMass lead.

Doherty pitched 1.1 innings and faced four hitters in his first save opportunity of the season. The Quincy native got the last out of the eighth to foil out Garrity. Doherty then struck out the side in the top of the ninth. He did not allow a hit.

"It's great for him," said Stone of Doherty's performance. "He got us out of a jam by striking out the last three guys. He needs that, because that will hopefully get him on the right path for a good weekend, too."

Szado went 4-for-5 in the game, with two RBIs and a run. Szado had a slow start to the season, but lately has been turning it on at the plate. He came through with two clutch hits, an RBI-single in the first inning and another RBI-single in the sixth.

The senior left fielder has boosted his batting average to a mark of .320.

Sophomore right fielder Bill Rankin had a three-RBI performance, while going 2-for-5 with a run. Rankin started the second UMass rally in the sixth, when he sliced an inside fastball into the left center gap to score the first run of the rally.

"[Rankin] came up with a big hit and that was the turning point of the ballgame," Stone said. "Runners of second and third with two outs, he drove the ball into the gap. So, that was great."

Congress continues with roids

By Howard Fendrich
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — First, Major League Baseball was summoned by Congress and chastised for a steroids policy that the sport promptly altered. Next up was the NFL, which strengthened its drug program on the eve of a trip to Capitol Hill.

Now it's the NBA's turn to face lawmakers, and commissioner David Stern already is talking about getting tougher testing into a new deal with his players' union.

Even as the House Government Reform Committee moves closer to offering legislation establishing uniform steroid rules for major U.S. sports, the leagues themselves are changing their programs.

"I don't know how the public feels about this, but I think members are pretty united on this. It's a huge issue, and it needs to be taken care of," chairman Tom Davis, R-Va., said after Wednesday's five-hour session on football.

"That's why it's important consulting with the NFL, Major League Baseball — we'll be doing the NBA next — talking about what their policies are so we don't do something stupid as we implement it."

Worried that steroid use among pro athletes encourages youths to try the drugs, the committee is examining the testing policies of more than a half-dozen sports.

"How is the average American supposed to look at the size, strength and speed of today's NFL linebackers and not conclude that they might be taking performance-enhancing drugs?" Davis asked NFL commissioner Paul Tagliabue.

Said Tagliabue: "We don't feel that there is rampant cheating in our sport."

The proceedings were not nearly as contentious as on March 17, when Mark McGwire, Sammy Sosa and other current and former baseball stars were compelled to appear and faced direct questions about whether they and other players used steroids. Baseball commissioner Bud Selig, also a witness, was roundly criticized for his sport's policy, which lawmakers said was too lenient.

More than once Wednesday, congressmen prefaced remarks or questions by calling the NFL's appearance a "breath of fresh air."

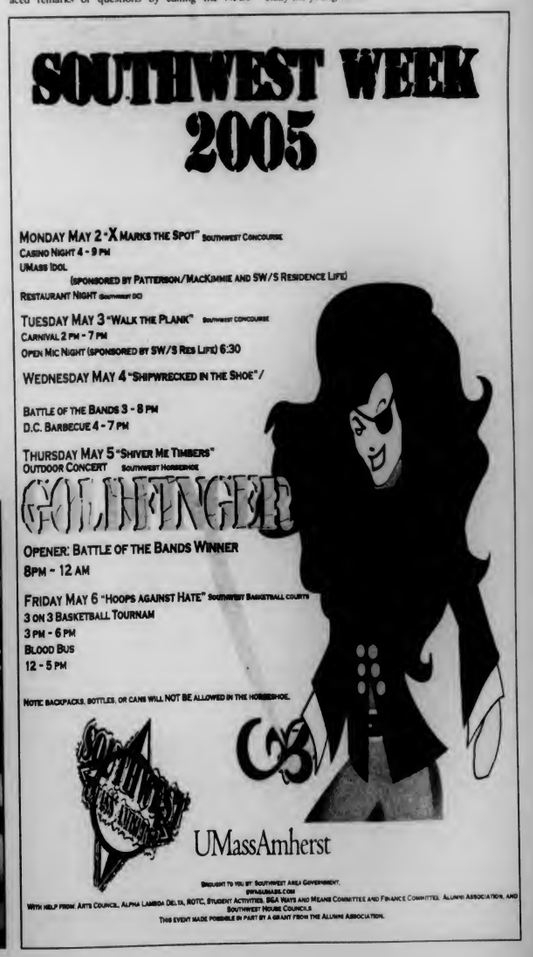
"With all due respect, the commissioner of baseball hadn't even read the document that he had given us," Connecticut Republican Christopher Shays said. "I kind of love you guys, and yet I shouldn't because I still have problems."

In particular, he asked why a player would have to fail four tests before getting banned for life. Some lawmakers asked the 10 witnesses whether the size of today's NFL players is evidence of steroid use. Others asked whether amphetamines should be banned and when growth hormone will be checked for (Tagliabue said there's no credible test yet).

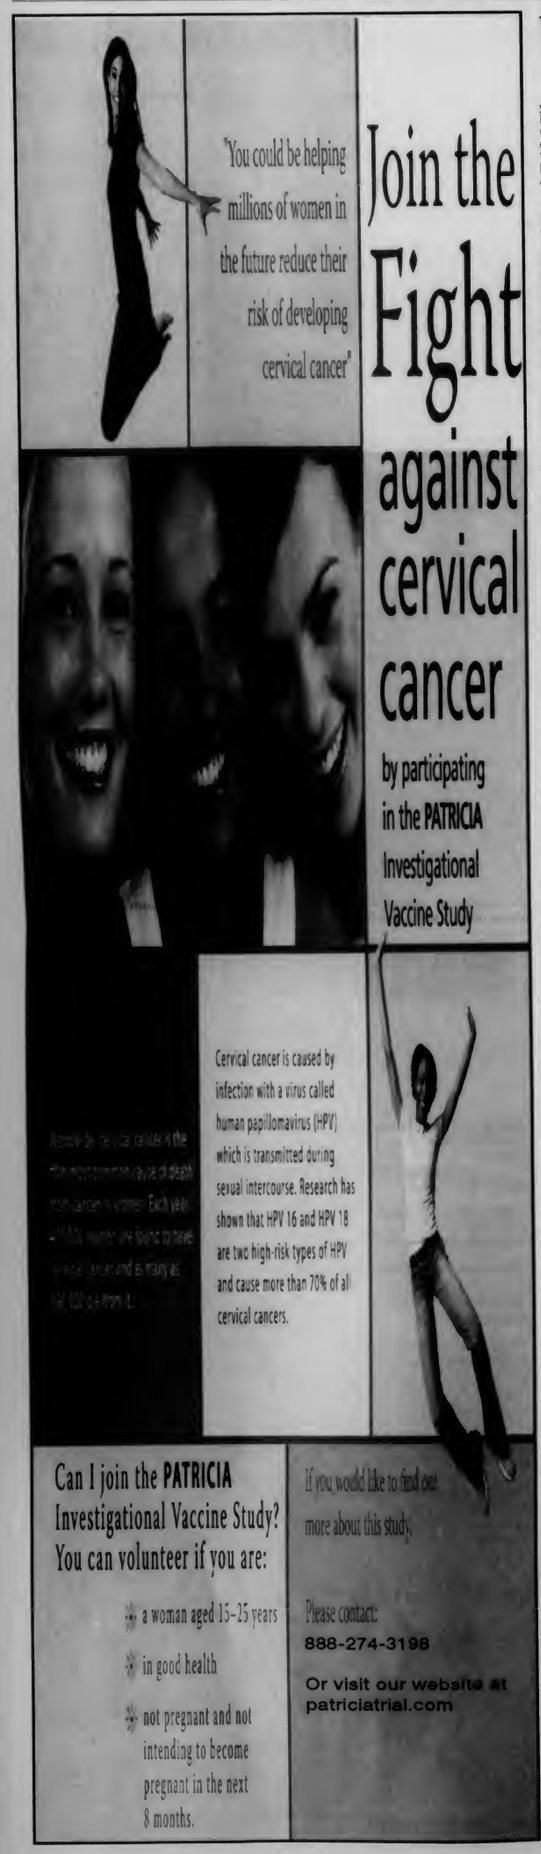
The NFL announced Tuesday that it's tripling from two to six the number of random offseason tests that players can face. The league is also adding to its list of banned performance-enhancers.

The NFL began testing for steroids in 1987, added suspensions in 1989, and instituted year-round random testing in 1990. Fifty-four players have been suspended, and Tagliabue said an additional 57 retired after testing positive. A first offense carries a four-game ban.

"We would be naive to not be aware that there are people out there who are trying to stay ahead of the curve," NFL Players Association chief executive Gene Upshaw said. "As soon as we find out about something, we do something about it."



Baseball banned steroids in September 2002, instituted mandatory 10-day suspensions this season, and only eliminated a provision allowing for fines instead of bans after facing the committee.



The NHL does not test players for performance-enhancing drugs, while the NBA suspends first-time offenders for five games.

Stern, attending a playoff game in Chicago, said league officials "absolutely" would testify if asked, although he noted there are time constraints right now, including the postseason and labor negotiations.

Those talks include the possibility of expanded testing for performance-enhancing drugs.

"It's incumbent upon every sport to just have rules that demonstrate to their fans that, if you're in the NBA, you submit to a certain amount of testing," Stern said. "It's really a covenant with the fans, especially the young ones."

UM looking for win

LACROSSE from page 10

you still have to play the next game. Regardless of what you've done in the past, it doesn't mean much come Saturday," Cannella said. "Syracuse is still going to come in here prepared, and ready to play and we have to do the same."

Over the course of the season, the UMass and the Orange have played five similar opponents. Both teams have faced, Georgetown, Hobart, Loyola, Brown, and Albany on the year. Syracuse also played Rutgers on May 16, but the Minutemen won't play the Scarlet Knights until next weekend.

Both teams hold a 4-1 record against these opponents, with Syracuse losing to Georgetown 10-7 on March 12 and the Minutemen dropping a 10-9 game to Albany three days later.

With the similarities in schedule, Cannella and his staff have been inadvertently scouting the Orange throughout the season. Cannella, however, mentioned that he wasn't paying full attention to the Orange while scouting for other games.

"You can't focus on a team while your scouting, but when you see enough tape you familiarize yourself with anybody you watch," Cannella said.

The most personal case study was done when UMass assistant coaches Jason Miller and Chris Gabrielle traveled to see Syracuse's game against Hobart on March 29, the Orange won 13-12.

One thing both coaches noticed was the tenacious offense the Orange exhibited throughout the game. Syracuse has three players with 20 or more goals and have five players that have combined for more than 20 points.

The biggest weapon for Syracuse this year has been its efficient shooting Cannella mentioned that, aside from solid defending, UMass goalie Bill Schell will need to remain consistent and make some saves.

"Coach Miller and coach Gabrielle went down there to watch the game and watch both teams," Cannella said. "Gabrielle watched them warm up and said, 'man these guys can really shoot.'"

Schell appears to be up for the occasion on paper, as he is currently third in the nation in GAA (goals against average), allowing just 6.95 a game.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

The UMass lacrosse team will play its final home game of the season tomorrow against the defending national champion Syracuse.

Brian Crockett has led the way for the Orange, scoring 28 goals and dishing seven assists. Mike Leveille and Greg Rommel both have over 20 goals on the year for the Orange with 27 and 21, respectively.

Mike's brother, Kevin, was a standout midfielder for the Minutemen and currently plays professional lacrosse for the Boston Cannons.

The Orange like to attack the cage the same way Georgetown has over the course of the season. On Tuesday against Harvard, the Minutemen tried to force the offense to the middle of the field in order to cut down shooting lanes and give Schell better vision of the field.

Cannella, however, is taking a different defensive approach against Syracuse and will challenge his team to go man to man against one of the most athletic offenses in the country.

"You have to play great one on one defense when you play Syracuse, because any one of their guys can beat you," Cannella said. "I think that and making saves is going to be big. One thing that we noticed about Syracuse is that they are athletic and can shoot."

UMass will try to utilize its own athleticism in Jack Reid, Matt Garcia, and Aaron Paskalis, who are the long stick anchors of the defense. The UMass defense has allowed 7.25 goals per game thus far, good for eighth in the nation.

Regardless of what it says on paper, Cannella has a definitive respect for the orange uniforms that will come through the gates of Garber Field tomorrow. In his mind, they are still national champions until proven otherwise.

"They're explosive, as always, on offense. Their goalie is seasoned, their defense is seasoned, they're returning starters from last year's team, a national championship team," Cannella said. "There's a lot of composure on the field and a lot of talent. They're still national champs until someone knocks them off in the playoffs."

UMass begins a new chapter

HOWE from page 10

bring a pair of kegs to the game, and they set up shop on the hill adjacent to the field.

They were the most popular fans at the game that day.

This game is such a big event, there was once a student protest planned during halftime on the actual field. It had nothing to do with lacrosse. It had everything to do with the audience they would reach. Nothing ended up coming out of the rumors, though.

Tomorrow on Senior Day, during Spring Weekend, Garber Field is expected to be packed, and the mayhem is assumed to continue.

Out of the last seven times these two teams have met up in Amherst, five of the games drew more than 4,000 fans. In 1991, when the game was played at McGuirk Stadium, a record 12,143 people witnessed the famed matchup.

"It's kind of like our own version of Yankees-Red Sox in this area," UMass defenseman Jack Reid said. "It's a big deal. They're the best program in lacrosse so anytime you get to play them, it's just a big experience for us."

Although some may say that for a rivalry to exist, there should be a fairly even level of competition between the two participants. UMass coach Greg Cannella is one of those people.

"In order for there to be a rivalry, it can't be as one-sided as it has been, so it's more of a hyped affair because Syracuse is such a strong program and a perennial top-five power," Cannella said. "This game receives a lot of attention... I wouldn't exactly call it a rivalry."

Well, that seems fair.

These two teams have met 30 times, once every year since 1976. Syracuse has been on the friendly side of the score box on 25 of those occasions. And from 1982 all the way up to 2002 — a span of 22 games — the Minutemen failed to host a single victory party.

That all changed two years ago.

Knotted at 13 in overtime on the Garber turf, Jeff Zywicki, who scored 41 goals in 2003, found the back of the net with his only goal of the game to end the long losing streak.

"It was unbelievable," Reid said. "To be the first team from UMass to do that in a long time was a great feeling. The senior class was wonderful that year, so it was great that we were able to do that for them. It was a big win for the program."

And a big reason why the rivalry talk has returned to the Valley.

While everyone who surrounds themselves with UMass lacrosse has been staring at this date for some time now, the Minutemen, who will never look past their next opponent, can finally concentrate on the Orange.

"Once the Harvard game was over, the team felt really relieved that we could finally buckle down and start to think about Syracuse," Reid said. "Right when that whistle blows, it's like, 'Alright, we've done some damage. We've won another New England title, which was big for us, but there is a lot more damage for us to do. There is a lot more damage that we can cause, and it's 'Cuse this weekend'."

Yeah, another Syracuse weekend, another meeting between two intense rivals and another giant outdoor party in the center of campus.

"I've seen the fans throw oranges, which was pretty crazy," Reid said. "Hopefully, we can avoid that this weekend because we don't need that penalty... People just get nutty. They have a good time."

They've been waiting a long while to have a good time, too. And that time is nearing as each minute passes.

Tomorrow, at 1 p.m., chapter 31 of this storied rivalry will be written.

With so much anticipation leading up to tomorrow, though, the Minutemen will have to do something to clear their heads tonight.

"We'll go out and have a good dinner, probably play some Halo, and then we'll go to bed and try to get some sleep," Reid said.

"We relax, hang out with each other and just lay low," UMass attackman Sean Morris said. "It's the quiet before the storm."

Enough said.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at JeffHowe@DailyCollegian.com.

Softball prepares for home game

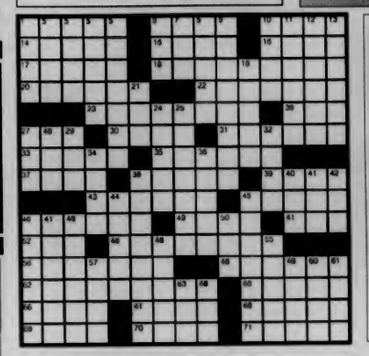
SOFTBALL from page 10

(26 stolen bases). Senior Denise Denis is tied with Puglia on the season with 29 RBI and has the third highest slugging percentage at .544. Sophomore Amanda Morin has stepped up her game during the second portion of the season, and now has four homeruns and 11 RBI.

Substitution is a major factor of Sortino's game plan this season, as freshman Maggie Fiex, sophomore Michea Holness, sophomore Amanda Acampora and junior Lesley Ferrara have all come off of the bench at critical moments in 2005. All in all, the starters, as well as the backups have produced throughout the season.

"I'm very pleased, I'm pleased with the fact that I said a long time ago that we could hit [in the lineup] 1-9," Sortino said. "There's also kids on the bench, 10, 11, 12, 13 that are capable on the offense for us too."

Write for Sports. Call 545-0719



Quote of the Day

"The chief danger in life is that you may take too many precautions."

—Alfred Adler

ACROSS
1 Avoid work
6 Large amount
10 Historic times
14 Blender setting
15 Curly cabbage
16 Big name in computers
17 Extreme suffering
18 Very easily angered
20 Lessee
22 Receptacle of a tenon
23 Escape clause
26 Court call
27 Use a calculator
30 Raced
31 Grownups
33 Wake up
35 Prepared speaker
37 Be certain
38 Deerlike creature
39 Sound shocked
43 Leisurely, musically
45 Choir voice
46 Perpetrate
49 Rubik's object
51 A pair
52 Mathematician Byron
53 Old-time movie feature
56 Bureaucratic snags
58 Pit to eat
62 Salad greens
65 DJ's cue
66 Jacob's twin
67 Town near Caen
68 Enrico the physicist
69 Absorbed
70 Clucking sounds
71 Mutation
DOWN
1 Till
2 Gargantuan
3 Skillet material
4 Of the kidneys
5 Prime theme
6 Travel on snow
7 Pullman or sleeper
8 San Antonio landmark
9 Devoid of inhabitants
10 Prepare for printing
11 Send an overdue notice
12 Prepared
13 Ice fails
19 Philosophy
21 As well
24 Plug projection
25 Brave deeds
27 Geneva craft
28 Adams or Knotts
29 Tarsioma
32 Give a little push
34 Dogpaddled
36 Love affair
38 Fence terminus
40 Social insect
41 Spread seeds
42 Lion, Tiger or Bear
44 Kuwaiti currency
45 Really angry
46 Chosen pursuit
47 Black Sea port
48 Fairy
50 Hive dweller
54 Lash marks
55 Cruise ship
57 Like a tightrope
59 Naked
60 Capital of Peru
61 Fellada of "CHiPs"
63 Wapiti
64 Mayday letters
Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

The school year is almost over...
But there is still time to submit a comic!
Send your work to Aly
collegiancomics@yahoo.com
Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?
Advertise with The Daily Collegian
and watch your profits grow.
Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Today you'll be walking with a little extra bounce in your step.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't get too attached to those CDs. 8-Tracks are coming back.

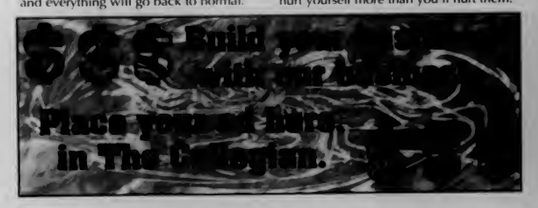
aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You shouldn't be such a chicken about making phone calls. Just do it.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Be kind, please rewind.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Don't lie just because you want to look cool.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Today you and your friend will make up, and everything will go back to normal.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
One of these days, your chair is just going to fall to pieces.



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Today you and your friend will make up, and everything will go back to normal.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Enough with the sarcasm already. Its getting annoying.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Too many energy drinks will give you one pounding headache.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Get your hair cut already. You've been talking about it long enough.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Don't wrestle with your friend. You'll hurt yourself more than you'll hurt them.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@verizon.net Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-1856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

1 Bedroom w/in 2 bedroom condo in North Amherst. Clean, Washer/dryer in condo $425 includes heat & electric Summer rentals considered. On bus route, 1 mile to UMass, female student preferred. Call Liz 508-367-8893.

Apartment for Rent

Center of town, 1, 2, 3 bedrooms, hardwood floors. NOW SIGNING for JUNE and SEPTEMBER. NO FEES. www.amherstlincolnrealty.com 253-7879

Auto for Sale

2001 Toyota Corolla 5 Speed 59K asking $6900 Call Terry 413-256-8737

1993 Nissan Maxima SE V6, 5 speed stick, loaded, $1500. Elsinew@echc.umass.edu

Employment

NOW HIRING CAMPUS MANAGERS Ready for the UReps challenge? UReps is looking for the most outgoing, enthusiastic leaders for our Campus Managers position for the Fall, 2005 semester! Work 10 hours per week, gain valuable business experience, and earn while you build your resume. $100 weekly salary plus bonuses. To learn more, and apply visit www.UReps.com

Spring Break 2006 with STS, America's #1 Student Tour Operator. Hiring Campus reps. Call for group discounts. Info/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Employment

Camp Counselors – Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pinetreecamp.com

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nece. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/mktg.asp to apply.

SUMMER ADVERTISING INTERNSHIP Excellent Advertising Sales and Marketing opportunity. Earn $3,000-$8,000 and gain valuable business EXPERIENCE developing the UMASS Official Campus Telephone Directory. GREAT RESUME BOOSTER! Call Jen at College Directory Publishing, Inc. 1-800-466-2221 ext.724 www.campusdirectory.com

Employment

Help Wanted – Cutting edge agricultural facility on 116 in Amherst seeks quality motivated, detail oriented help. Flexible shifts, relaxed atmosphere, on bus route. 15-40 hours weekly, mornings a must. Please e-mail inquiries to peter@bsshelters.com

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps
The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Part camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer

Employment

Summer Jobs For The Environment
*$275 $475 / Week
*Stop Global Warming
*Protect the Environment
Make a difference Work with MASSPIRG on a campaign to stop global warming. Career opportunities and benefits. Call Chris 413-256-6443 Painters 2-3 years experience Must have a vehicle part-time, full-time Call Michael 367-9810

Live in Babysitter needed for two girls this summer in Wellfleet on Cape Cod. Salary, Room, and board. Please Call 508-349-6392

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetYerPrinting.com - Call Dan 413-682-2020

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Café. 60 Masonic St. Northampton.

Employment

Moving. Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

MAKE EXTRA CASH!!! Make your own hours! Sell T-Shirts to Sororities, clubs, and groups & make a commission on every sale. Guaranteed!!! Very easy. Bonus's Too! 413-586-7133 or print@sunrisemc.com

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until Late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

For Sale

Full Size bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition $200 & buyer must pick up (443) 904-6844

House for Rent

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 bedroom Newer home Laundry Hook-ups. Large yard 549-4270

House for Rent

4 Bedroom, Northampton for June. Double living room, enclosed side porch $1300/month +utilities. Shiftski Realtors 586-1827

House Hadley Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage, 1 1/4 miles to UMass, $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879.

Miscellaneous

www.butchbats.com

Just Look Stupid

Your Opinion Could Get You a Sony PSP. Have you taken Kaplan or another SAT/GMAT/GRE exam review course? How about a college course? Education site researching course providers want to hear from you. Students who submit course reviews are automatically entered in a drawing to win Sony's new PSP. For details, visit www.coursedrive.com

Roommate Wanted

Need two roommates! An apartment in 85 Puffton. Please contact Pete immediately at 978-808-3683

Roommate Wanted

Roommate Wanted in House, $325 Call 413-687-4976

Services

Need help filling out immigration forms? Want advice on arranging documents for filing with INS? Contact the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 for help with immigration forms.

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 548-9992

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Sublet

Room available June 10th – Aug 31st in Amherst Center. Call Noah 413-687-2365

Puffton Village Summer Sublet 2 bedroom Call 978-500-3981

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

COUNTDOWN TO SYRACUSE: 1 Day

FRIDAY, APRIL 29, 2005

SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The champs are coming to town

UMass gears up for 'Cuse

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

As the University of Massachusetts prepares for a weekend of music and spirits during its annual Spring Weekend, the No. 8 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team is looking to put on the best show in town.

Tomorrow at 1 p.m., the Minutemen (10-2 4-1 ECAC) will face longtime rival and defending national champion No. 7 Syracuse (7-4) at Garber Field in their last home game of the season.

"I can remember playing on Spring Weekend here and it was a big deal. If people want to come out and see what I think are two of the top teams in lacrosse right now, it should be a pretty good show, we hope," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

The last time the Maroon and White faced off against Syracuse was May 1 of last year at the Carrier Dome, when the Orange up-handed the Minutemen 17-10.

The Minutemen won the meeting a year before at Garber Field when they defeated the Orange 14-13 in overtime. It was UMass' first victory over Syracuse in 20 years.

UMass has been one of the most consistent teams in the country over the last month and has yet to lose during April, tallying five-straight wins. The Minutemen defeated four-straight ECAC opponents (Penn State, St. Johns, Hobart, and Georgetown, respectively) after losing its only conference game to Loyola on March 26.

Cannella, however, knows that the Orange have the upper hand in this one-sided semi-rivalry fight and is reluctant to change his approach as his team continues its search for its cohesive consistency.

"There's momentum every time you win, but,

See LACROSSE on page 8

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Junior Sean Morris and the UMass lacrosse team will meet up with Syracuse tomorrow at 1 p.m. at Garber Field. Morris has been a factor this season and leads the team with 32 goals and 50 points.

Game is a big deal

Jeff Howe

Whenever the defending national champions come to town, it's a big deal. Whenever the No. 7 team in the country plays the No. 8 team in the country, it's a big deal.

Whenever the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team hosts the Syracuse Orange, it's not really a big deal, though.

It's huge.

In fact, go to your local bookstore, buy a thesaurus, check out the word, "huge," and plug in every synonym you can find.

Then multiply it by 5,000.

Why 5,000?

Just ask former UMass coach Ted Garber, who captained the Gorilla ship for four years in the early 1990s.

Before a UMass/Cuse game at the field named after his father, he received a phone call from the Amherst police.

Five thousand oranges were missing from UMass' dining halls. Everyone knew where they would turn up.

Another time during his coaching tenure, the University allowed a group of students to

See HOWE on page 8

Baseball grabs a win

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team put up a season-high 19 hits yesterday, but gave itself some difficulty in the later innings before pulling out an 11-8 win over Sacred Heart at Earl Lorden Field.

The Minutemen return to action this weekend when they host a three-game series with St. Bonaventure. Saturday will be a doubleheader beginning at noon with Sunday's game also at noon.

After the Minutemen fell behind 2-0 in the first inning, they answered with a four-run, two out rally in the bottom of the frame. Senior center fielder Jason Twissley started things off with a single to center field, then quickly stole second. He would score on senior left fielder Chris Szabo single to left.

Sophomore shortstop Bryan Adamski continued his hot hitting with a double to left center that put two runners in scoring position. On a 0-1 pitch, sophomore designated hitter Michael Weiner laced a single to right to drive in two runs. After Weiner advanced to second on a pass ball, sophomore catcher Bryan Guerin would collect the final rbi of the rally with an RBI single to right field to score Weiner.

With the score at 6-3 in the bottom of the sixth, the Maroon and White added another four runs, that nearly gave away the lead by allowing the Pioneers to score five runs over the next two innings.

The Minutemen also continued their struggle on defense with three errors.

"Once again, even though we [won], I feel we made things difficult on ourselves by walking people, hitting people, not having command and we made those errors shouldn't have made," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "You know, it's a struggle. We were up 11-4 and [it was] a long inning, we struggled to finish."

"I expect better defense," Stone added. "I expect better pitching performances or at least command of the [strike zone]. I expect more from [certain] situations. That's the frustrating part. When you're [playing] you expect more. [When you're] up and not getting it, you [get frustrated]."

Turning to his number two starter, senior lefty Keith

See BASEBALL on page 7

ANDY TAMULYNAS/COLLEGIAN

The Minuteman baseball team outlasted Sacred Heart yesterday at Earl Lorden Field. They will play three games this weekend.

A-10 weekend on tap for UM

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

It's crunch time for the Massachusetts softball team (26-14-1 9-3 Atlantic 10), which has seven regular season games remaining this season, with four of them being in-conference decisions. Two of those A-10 match ups will take place at the UMass Softball Complex this afternoon in a doubleheader against La Salle (12-32-1 2-8 A-10).

Although the two teams have dissimilar records — UMass in third place in the A-10 and the Explorers in eighth — the Minutewomen will try and avoid history repeating itself.

On Apr. 17, the Maroon and White faced, and lost to, the team ranked at the bottom of the A-10 standings, Temple (13-27 2-10 A-10). The consequence of this loss was the end of an 82-game winning streak at the UMass Softball Complex as well as a 9-game season winning streak.

After today's doubleheader, the Minutewomen have only three home games left in the regular season. While there are positives with playing at home, there is a certain amount of tension as the regular season begins to wind down.

"It's nice to play in the surroundings in which you practice, it's an advantage to know your field and know the wall," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "There's pressure playing at home to. The expectation level here is extremely high for us."

With the 2005 tourney beginning on May 12, the team's only focus right now is today's game versus La Salle. The Minutewomen will have to stop senior Liz Greenfield, however, who leads the Explorers with 24 runs batted in and a batting average of .283.

On the mound and facing Greenfield and the rest of the La Salle sluggers, will be senior Barb LaFogg and junior Jenna Busa.

LaFogg — the A-10 Co-pitcher of the Week — has totaled an A-10-high176 strikeouts on the season and currently has an ERA of 2.09. In Tuesday's doubleheader sweep of Harvard, LaFogg struck out seven batters and allowed four hits in the Game 1 comeback win.

Game 2 today will feature Busa, a Lexington native, who has been getting her job done at the plate lately as well. Busa's 99 strikeouts are good for fifth most in the A-10 and her ERA now stands at 2.42.

Strutting the second best team-batting in the conference, the Minutewomen will use their offensive power to try and overcome La Salle pitcher Laura DeZolt, who has recorded 98 strikeouts this season, and holds an ERA of 3.51.

Junior KJ Kelley is the leader of the team in more ways than one. While she is a veteran leader on and off of the field, the catcher also leads the team statistically in batting average (.376), home runs (9), RBI (30) and slugging percentage (.743).

Last year's A-10 Player of the Year, senior Hilary Puglia, has been nursing an arm injury, which has bumped freshman Stacy Cullington into the lineup. In Wednesday's doubleheader sweep of Harvard, the freshman recorded three hits and three RBI while homering in Game 1.

Despite her injury, Puglia leads the A-10 in doubles with 11 and is second on the team in batting average, with a mark of .347.

Other play makers include freshman Lauren Proctor (.333 BA, 39 hits and 24 RBI) and sophomore Candice Molinari

See SOFTBALL on page 8

ANDY TAMULYNAS/COLLEGIAN

Junior pitcher Jenna Busa has been an important part of the UMass softball team this season. Busa currently has an ERA of 2.42 and has struck out 99 batters this season.

Minutewomen look for upset

By Ian Kilpatrick
Collegian Staff

After officially being knocked out of contention for the Atlantic 10 tournament last Sunday by losing to George Washington, the struggling Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (5-10 1-4) heads into the weekend without any pressure for the first time in a while.

The team takes on Temple (8-6 4-1) in Philadelphia today, a team that no one on UMass's roster has ever experienced a win against. Sunday, the team takes on Richmond (6-7 4-2) on senior day and is the last game of what has been a tough, and somewhat disappointing season for the Minutewomen.

All there is left to do for this 2005 UMass squad is to play for pride and for the future. This young team has a bright future and will have to use every game they can to grow as players. The seniors, on the other hand, are playing to finish their career strong.

"I told them our seniors to set an example and go out with a bang, and what they do today on the field, and what they leave this year will certainly show up next year," coach Carrie Bolduc said. "What they do today will show up tomorrow."

With the pressure lifted, it is possible that the youthful Minutewomen may be able to play a little more relaxed and possibly more mistake free. They have made improvements, but every game has been a big game, which is hard for any team especially one with nine freshmen.

The upcoming games give the underclassmen a chance to try new things, take risks and play hard without having to worry about the consequences of mistakes.

"In a way, the pressure's not there so it'll be interesting to see how [my young] girls take into it and I think

See W. LACROSSE on page 7

POOR ORIGINAL

MAY

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

MONDAY, MAY 2, 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXV ISSUE 128

Around the world series continues with Asia

By CAMERON METHNER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Mengyi Liu, "Chloris," an undergraduate exchange student studying Journalism presented to a group of 25 at the third night of presentations of Prince/Crampton's Around the World in 30 Days.

Last the Prince -Crampton cluster hosted five presenters on Asia. Liu began her presentation on Taiwan by touching briefly on political tensions between China and Taiwan, "I know it's a sensitive question but I consider myself Taiwanese."

Liu gave the group a basic breakdown of Taiwan's political past starting at the establishment of democracy and struggle for the end of the ruling Monarchy, then continuing to the fight between the rising Communism and Democracy.

She then spoke about Taiwan's varied landscapes, "Jade Mt. Is almost 13,000ft high, at the top you look down and you are higher than the clouds."

Liu also touched upon the technological aspects of Taiwan, "A building In Taipei, the capital, has over 100 floors; it's higher than the Empire State Building. It is dangerous though, we constantly hear that stones keep falling off of it."

Liu mentioned the night life as being very busy, "After nine you have to order out here, but in Taiwan there are Night Markets open late." At the end of the presentation Liu proudly showed the group a picture of bubble tea and said, "Taiwanese invented bubble tea, and there most people drink a cup a day."

Dana Alhaffer, 28, a graduate student in the School of Education presented the Syrian Arab Republic. Alhaffer started her power-point presentation on Syria with facts on the demographics of Syria's people.

She then moved to the historical aspects of her country, "Syria is called "the cradle of civilization" because man was found first in this area." She then passed around a carved wooden box and a piece of fabric both made in the same traditions from ancient Elba, known for its carved wood, silk, and mother-of-pearl. Alhaffer while talking about Syria's political history tried to keep it light-hearted.

"So many people came to Syria everyone invaded us." She mentioned that Venetian glass was brought back from Syria to Venice by two Italian brothers. Alhaffer moved on to talk about the idea that Syria is a desert, "We do have a desert but Syria also looks like England and Germany, it is green."

Alhaffer finished up her presentation with talking about the Bosra Amphitheatre, "If you stand on the stage and a friend sits at the very top, and you whisper your friend can hear you. I've tried it."

We were then taken farther East to India where Alok Banga, 28, a graduate student studying Public Health and Policy, brought new insight to the group.

"The last 10,000 years India has not invaded another country, which is impressive," said Banga when starting out on India's history.

The theme of India said Banga is peace and contentment, which is why all of the religions that are present in India live together peacefully.

Banga had the crowd laughing when he mentioned that India too is the oldest civilization, just like Syria. Banga boasted about India's achievements, from things like a university in 700 B.C. to the calculation of pie.

He moved quickly to the arts, literature and architectural advances in India. "The Taj Mahal is a tomb that was built to remember a king's wife, now that's impressive," said Banga. "Bollywood" or India's productive movie industry, which is the largest producers of movies in the world, was also mentioned. Banga spoke briefly on the tension between India and Pakistan, attributing the problems to British rule and their policy of "divide and rule". Banga was very proud of India in its treatment of women, "Women have been rulers since the 13th century. Our culture is very open; men and women could marry more than one person, of any sex they wanted." Throughout the presentation Banga kept stressing the important fact that Hinduism is not a religion but a way of life.

Stephen Moy, a junior economics major, who taught English in China for two months, he said learned a

See WORLD on page 2

A Hoedown for the records

This weekend Amherst Police braced themselves for the annual Hobart Hoedown. Due to weather and confusion about location, most students opted against the hoedown on Saturday night.

Same-sex marriages debate continues

BOSTON (AP) — Approaching the anniversary of the nation's first gay marriages, the state's highest court on Monday hears a bid to halt same-sex couples from marrying until voters can weigh in.

A lawsuit filed by C.J. Doyle, executive director of the Catholic Action League, claims the marriages interfere with voters' ability to participate in the debate on a proposed constitutional ban of same-sex marriages.

Last March, two months before the Supreme Judicial Court's landmark ruling took effect, the Legislature approved a constitutional amendment that would ban gay marriage. Lawmakers must pass the measure a second time, either this year or next, before it can reach the statewide ballot in November 2006.

"What we're saying is that the dialogue, the robust debate that should be taking place, is being affected and shaped by the continuing marriages," said Doyle's attorney, Chester Darling.

Justice Roderick Ireland rejected Doyle's petition last year, but the full court is hearing his appeal.

Lawyers for Doyle, Attorney General Thomas Reilly's office and the Gay & Lesbian Advocates & Defenders are scheduled to deliver oral arguments before the high court on Monday. A spokesman for Reilly, whose role is to defend the law, said the office does not comment on cases going before the court.

GLAD argues that Doyle has failed to show exactly how issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples interferes with his ability to vote.

"The right of gay and lesbian couples to marry poses absolutely no harm to Mr. Doyle, the Catholic Action League or anybody else," said GLAD attorney Michele Granda.

Around 5,000 same-sex couples have married since the high court issued its 4-3 ruling in November 2003. The ruling took effect May 17.

Ireland, one of four judges who voted to legalize gay marriage, said couples shouldn't be denied the right to marry based on the mere possibility that voters will approve the amendment.

—Associated Press

Bride gets cold feet, fakes abduction

By MARY PEREA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — A Georgia bride-to-be who vanished just days before her wedding turned up in New Mexico and fabricated a tale of abduction before admitting Saturday that she had gotten cold feet and "needed some time alone," police said.

Jennifer Wilbanks, 32, was in police custody more than 1,420 miles from her home on what was supposed to be her wedding day.

"It turns out that Miss Wilbanks basically felt the pressure of this large wedding and could not handle it," said Randy Belcher, the police chief in Duluth, Ga., the Atlanta suburb where Wilbanks lives with her fiance. He said there would be no criminal charges.

Wilbanks, whose disappearance set off a nationwide hunt, called her fiance, John Mason, from a pay phone late Friday and told him that she had been kidnapped while jogging three days before, authorities said. Her family rejoiced that she was safe, telling reporters that the media coverage apparently got to the kidnappers.

But Wilbanks soon recanted, according to police.

Ray Schultz, chief of police in Albuquerque, said Wilbanks "had become scared and concerned about her impending marriage and decided she needed some time alone." He said she traveled to Las Vegas by bus before going to Albuquerque.

"She's obviously very concerned about the stress that she's been through, the stress that's been placed on her family," he said. "She is very upset."

The mood outside Wilbanks' home went from jubilant to somber after Wilbanks changed her story. Family members ducked inside and the blinds were drawn, but later expressed relief that Wilbanks was safe.

"Sure, we were all disappointed, maybe a little embarrassed, but you know what, if you remember all the interviews yesterday we were praying, 'At this point let her be a runaway bride,'" said the Rev. Alan Jones, who was to perform the wedding. "So God was faithful. Jennifer's alive and we're all thankful for that."

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Friends and family breathe a sigh of relief after missing bride Jennifer Wilbanks was found safe on Saturday.

Jones said the family had no idea that Wilbanks had fears about the wedding, and he believed she "probably had no clue how it had been blown out of proportion" while she

See BRIDE on page 2

Four men arrested in treasure hoax

By JAY LINDSAY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

METHUEN — Four men who made national headlines by claiming they dug up a buried treasure in a back yard were charged Friday with stealing the cache of old currency while doing a roofing job at someone's home.

The arrests came after the men made several appearances on national television, and police noticed how the story seemed to change each time.

Two men were arrested early Friday, and a third turned himself in to police Friday night.

Authorities said Barry Billcliff, Timothy Crebase and Matt Ingham were repairing a barn roof in Newbury when they discovered the stash, which included 1,800 bank notes and bills dating from 1899 to 1928 and is worth up to $125,000.

The roofers came up with a story about finding it in a box while digging under a tree in the back yard of a house Crebase rented from Kevin Kozak, and convinced the landlord to go along, police said.

Lawyers for Billcliff and Crebase said Friday their clients were sticking to their account.

"There is no evidence, none, that my client committed any crime," said Billcliff's lawyer, Alexander Cain.

Crebase, 24, and Billcliff, 27, of Manchester, N.H., pleaded innocent Friday to charges of receiving stolen property, conspiracy and accessory after the fact. Crebase posted $1,000 bail and was released. Billcliff was released after posting $5,000 bail.

Kozak, 27, of Methuen, surrendered and posted bail Friday

See TREASURE on page 2

New violence shaking Iraq, killing 10

By BUSHRA JUHI
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Insurgents launched fresh attacks in Baghdad and northern Iraq on Saturday, killing at least 10 Iraqis and wounding more than 30, officials said, in a second day of violence aimed at shaking the country's newly formed government.

At a meeting of Iraq's neighbors in Turkey, meanwhile, Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan warned the violence was "not solely the concern of the Iraqis but ours as well."

Some of the worst attacks occurred in the capital, still reeling from Friday's onslaught in which at least 17 bombs exploded in Iraq, killing 50 people, including three U.S. soldiers.

A suicide car bomb exploded Saturday near the offices of the National Dialogue Council, a coalition of 10 Sunni Arab factions that had been negotiating for a stake in Iraq's new Shiite-dominated government. The blast killed two Iraqi civilians and wounded 18, police said.

Another suicide car bomb targeting an Iraqi army patrol exploded Saturday near the Mohammad Rasoul Allah Mosque in eastern Baghdad, killing two Iraqi women and a girl, and seriously wounding four soldiers, police Lt. Col. Ahmed Abboud Effait said.

Two Iraqis — a policeman and a former official in Saddam Hussein's Baath Party — also died in shootings Saturday in Baghdad, police said.

U.S. officials had hoped Iraq's new government, which was approved Thursday and takes office on Tuesday, would help dent support for the militants within the Sunni Arab minority that dominated under Saddam and is believed to be driving the insurgency.

However, the lineup of Cabinet ministers named by

See IRAQ on page 2

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Barry Billcliff, left and Tim Crebase, right, stand in Lawrence District Court for their arraignment Friday.

ARTS & LIVING
A TOUCH OF GREEN
Green Day takes UMass on a 'Holiday.'
PAGE 4

EDITORIAL/OPINION
ACTION PLAN REVISED
Lombardi's new proposal still not suited for UMass students.
PAGE 3

WEATHER

TODAY Rain, H67°, L37°
TONIGHT Rain, L37°
TOMORROW Few Showers, H67°, L38°

SPORTS
UMASS BEATS SYRACUSE
Long awaited lacrosse matchup has UMass celebrating.
PAGE 8

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

BOARD & CHAIR Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Mike Martelli
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NEWS EDITOR Meghan Healy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha M. Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Michael Busack
CAMPUS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Matthew Reid
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lesley
PHOTO EDITOR Alex Demosthene
SPORTS EDITOR Bob McGovern
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappas
CLASSIFIED MANAGER Josh Kuggan
FINANCE MANAGER Hiral Shah
ASSOCIATE EDITOR Virginie Frocaut
HUMOR EDITOR Sandra Marquez
PRODUCTION MANAGER Mark Spinosa
ASSISTANT CAMPUS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ARTS Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASSISTANT NEWS Thomas Healy
ASSISTANT PHOTO Rachael Bruno
GRAPHIC ARTIST Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Matthew O'Rourke
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Chris Gazzara
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT PHOTO Megan Brinster
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY OWNED, OPERATING ON MISCELLANEOUS REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE, BECAME THE COLLEGE NEWS IN 1901, THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1914 AND THE THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1936. PUBLICATION CEASED 1968. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN PRINTED SINCE JANUARY 1968. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500, MONDAYS 8:30 A.M. AND 5 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Healy

PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brinster

COPY EDITOR
Matt Hider

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Samantha M. Nielsen

PRODUCTION STAFF
Jamieson Melbourne

Asian speakers host series that bring students around great deal and gave some tips. "The food is really different, they sold scorpions on sticks, and the pizza is not "pizza" so watch out." Moy is half Chinese and went to the South of China to teach English. "It was especially difficult since I didn't speak Chinese."

WORLD from page 1

He gave the impromptu presentation a serious tone when he said, "My grandmother used a fake ID to leave China, and we use fake IDs to drink." Besides having a broken foot and having to go to an American Embassy hospital Moy said he had a good time. "They asked me if I knew Kobe Bryant since I played basketball, I don't, but I told them I did," said Moy. He finished his presentation with a story about mountain mosquitoes and how his arm swelled to twice its normal size after being bitten by one of them.

The final presenter was a resident assistant from Prince who studied martial arts. Arthur LaPlante gave a brief lineage of martial arts and the story behind the praying mantis style of martial arts. He gave a demonstration of what he had studied and said, "I had ailments going into martial arts, but the moves are like deep tissue work and were able to realign my knees. The problems just disappeared."

LaPlante is in the Chemistry PhD program here at UMass and was one of the resident assistants who organized the presenters. The two other organizers were Steve Sasso, a Prince resident assistant who is studying Hospitality and Tourism Management and Ching Yin Yu "Wendy" who is a Crampton resident assistant and is a junior studying finance and economics.

Surge of attacks wounds dozens

IRAQ from page 1

Prime Minister-designate Ibrahim al-Jaafari after months of political wrangling excluded Sunnis from meaningful positions and left the key defense and oil ministries in temporary hands.

Insurgents also launched three separate attacks Saturday in Mosul, 225 miles northwest of Baghdad, killing three Iraqis and wounding eight, police 1st Lt. Mahmoud Arif Yahya said.

A suicide car bomb exploded near a police patrol, killing a woman who was passing by and wounding four policemen, said Dr. Abdul Sattar Ramadhan al-Khalidi at Mosul's Jimhouri Hospital.

Elsewhere in the city, a roadside bomb missed its police patrol target, killing two Iraqi civilians and wounding two others and gunmen opened fire on a separate police patrol, wounding two officers, al-Khalidi said.

Two civilian bystanders were wounded when a roadside bomb aimed at a police patrol exploded south of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad, army Brig. Hamid Al-Timimi said.

An audiotape released Friday by one of America's most-wanted insurgents, Abu-Musab al-Zarqawi, warned President Bush there was more bloodshed to come. In Washington, an intelligence official said the tape appeared to be genuine.

"You, Bush, we will not rest until we avenge our dignity," the speaker said on the audiotape that was posted on the Internet. "We will not rest while your army is here as long as there is a pulse in our veins."

In separate statements, posted on a Web site known for its militant content, al-Zarqawi's al-Qaida in Iraq group claimed responsibility for two of Friday's most deadly assaults — four suicide car bombings in one Baghdad neighborhood and four more bombings in Madain, south of the capital. The claims could not be verified.

Despite Friday's bloody toll, the U.S. military maintained that attacks are diminishing overall in Iraq.

Erdogan opened a meeting of foreign ministers from Jordan, Syria, Kuwait, Iran, Turkey, Saudi Arabia and Egypt, expressing concern about Iraq's new government and fear that Iraq's violence could spread to the region.

A man stands atop a mangled car that was parked near a suicide bomber in Baghdad on Saturday. The bomb killed at least 10 people.

GA family members relieved about bride was traveling across the country.

BRIDE from page 1

He said Mason had no hostility toward his fiancee.

"I have never met such a strong person in all my life," Jones said. "He's an incredible man."

The wedding was to have been a huge bash. The couple had mailed 600 invitations, and the ceremony was to feature 14 bridesmaids and 14 groomsmen.

Wilbanks, who is a nurse, was tired and thirsty, but was not complaining of any injuries Saturday, officials said. Her hair, which was long in pictures released by her family, was shoulder-length.

Authorities will "get her showered, get her something to eat and then reunite her with her family," Albuquerque police spokeswoman Trish Ahrensfield said. Wilbanks' family planned to fly to Albuquerque later Saturday.

Just hours before Wilbanks called her fiance, police in Duluth said they had no solid leads in the case and began dismantling a search center. Relatives offered a $100,000 reward for information and were planning a prayer vigil.

The hunt for Wilbanks had consumed Duluth, a tight-knit town. Her picture and newspaper articles about her disappearance were on telephone poles and shop windows. Police had also seized three computers from the home she shared with Mason.

Mason had become a target of suspicion and agreed to a private polygraph test, which Wilbanks' family said he passed. He had been negotiating with authorities for another test.

"That's been the hardest part for me," Mason said after Wilbanks called from Albuquerque. "It gives you a feeling like you can't walk outside your home."

Mason did not speak publicly after Wilbanks said she lied about being abducted. Her uncle, Mike Satterfield, thanked people who had helped in the search.

"Jennifer had some issues the family was not aware of. We're looking forward to loving her and talking to her about these issues," he said.

Men caught after bragging to media night, said Police Lt. Thomas Fram. He was scheduled to be arraigned on the same charges on Monday.

TREASURE from page 1

Ingham, 23, of Newton, N.H., was also sought on the same charges. Methuen Police Chief Joseph E. Solomon said that Ingham was believed to be in Florida.

Police said Crebase confessed to finding the money stuffed in rusting tin cans in the gutter of a barn they were repairing. Investigators said they were not convinced it was found in a barn and that it might have been taken from the barn owners' house.

Crebase's lawyer said Friday that the confession was not recorded and should be thrown out.

"The people who own the house were not aware the money was there," said Solomon, adding that most of the money was recovered, but some was probably already sold.

The family that owns the property on which the money was found was surprised, their lawyer said in television interviews Friday.

"They have been following the story, as we all have over the last several days with interest, and obviously I think they were quite surprised to find out they were thrust into the middle of the story," attorney Joseph Sullivan said.

The arrest of Billeliff and Crebase interrupted their planned appearance Thursday night on ABC's "Jimmy Kimmel Live" because they were being booked by police around the time the show was airing. They were to have been interviewed from the yard where they claimed they had found the money while digging.

Police also noticed that the money appeared to be in remarkably good condition for being buried a foot below the ground through decades of New England weather.

"We would have expected the money to be a lot more deteriorated," Solomon said.

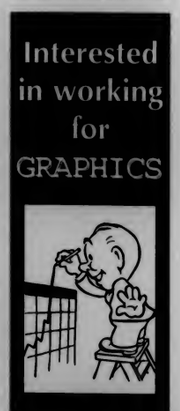
Police received an anonymous call on Tuesday from a woman who said the story the men had been telling was a lie, according to an investigative report filed in court.

They interviewed neighbors who said they hadn't seen anyone digging in the backyard of Crebase's house in Methuen, a blue-collar town on the New Hampshire border. And a coin shop owner who examined the money told investigators the men gave him conflicting accounts of how they found it.

When police asked Billcliff to show them the box he said the cash had been in, he claimed he had thrown it away, the report said.

Police said Crebase stuck to his story when he was first interviewed on Thursday night. But when detectives told Crebase they had new information and pressed him, "Mr. Crebase's face became red" and he confessed, the report said.

But Crebase's lawyer, Michael Ruane, said the confession was not recorded and should not be allowed as evidence.



"If the commonwealth can't show a location from which the money is taken, or even if it was taken, there's no case," he said.

Got ARTS?

We're looking for Assistant Editors for Fall 2005. Call 545-1361 and speak with Mike, Chris or Matt.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, MAY 2, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

New 'Action Plan' still not acceptable to students

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi has finally released his revised "On Improving Campus Diversity Action Plan" after dealing with many complaints and concerns from students and faculty. The report, however, seems to hardly be an improvement over the previous one.

In the new report, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano named UMass Associate Chancellor Esther M. Terry to oversee and enforce the rulings and decisions of Lombardi's plan.

What the administration has obviously neglected to address is the unhappiness the student body has expressed with the lumping together of RSOs to be headed up by the administration. The voice of the students is still being silenced and by appointing the Associate Chancellor, who in turn must answer to her boss, Gargano, the proposal is barely an improvement from having the Vice Chancellor do the job himself.

One other aspect of the plan that was mentioned consisted of mergers and reallocations of campus services and student groups into a Center for Student Development. By merging departments such as Commuter Services with Housing Services, it is even more apparent that the administration has not considered the students' needs. Due to budget cuts, the journalism major was combined with the communication major and consequently students feel that while they were given personal attention within their individual majors before, they are now neglected and strained by the merge. This is just one example of students' opinions being neglected in the Action Plan.

In addition, the new Action Plan proposes to discontinue the Office of African, Latino, Asian and Native Americans Affairs' affiliation with the Student Government Association and place it under the control of the new CSD. This will further limit the ability for the OAA to voice their concerns and affect change within the UMass community.

The SGA is a representative voice of the UMass student population and has been very vociferous pertaining to the needs of students and how they're viewed in this proposed Action Plan. SGA officials have opposed the new plan and recognize it as inadequate in addressing student needs.

The administration has had a long-standing tension with the SGA, which was particularly made evident this past year. Out of all the opportunities the administration has had to prove themselves to the student body, this decision could have portrayed them in a positive light and possibly smooth over some of the previous tensions. However, once again, they have failed and the students are the ones to pay for their failure.

Lombardi has referred to this Action Plan as a "blueprint." Going by that logic, this would imply that it is not set in stone and allows for changes and considerations to be made. However, since the students haven't been heard this past semester on the issues at hand, what chance do we have of being recognized the next time around? If the administration expects students to accept such an inconsiderate proposal, than they underestimate the student body.

There have been no real improvements made in this proposal, only clarifications. By clarifying their original stances that were not agreed upon by the student body in the first place, what makes them think students will agree with them now? If the initial ideas were ones that needed further explanation to begin with, perhaps their lack of clarity may be a hint to their flaws.

If the best the administration can do is appoint someone to head the RSOs, maybe a student representative agreed upon by both students and administrators would leave a better taste in the students' mouths. At least then the administration would prove that they are attempting to be accommodating to students rather than merely dictating the future of the university.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

TRUTH BEHIND POKER AS INCOME

This editorial is in response to the April 27 article by Jill Bergeron, which was entitled "Students are turning to poker for income." A great deal of the information contained therein is misleading, and could be potentially dangerous to the naive reader.

One of the individuals was quoted as saying, "I usually make $120-$140 each week." As a professional player, I am very familiar with what types of income are possible for players in various games. An average-to-good player can manage to beat a no-limit Texas Hold 'Em game for roughly 10 big bets (in no-limit, twice the size of the big blind) for every 100 hands played.

We'll be generous and assume that the individual in question plays in a 50-cent/one dollar game. For every 100 hands played in this game, our average-to-good winning player will make, on average, $20, in order to generate $120 a week, the player would have to play 600 hands a week.

Online poker, which moves fast, allows an individual to play approximately 80 hands per hour (at least this has been the case in my now four-year career of playing at UMass). Our average-to-good player would therefore need to play 20 hours a week to make an average of $120.

According to Bergeron's article, the individual quoted plays "two to three nights a week." That comes out to about eight to 10 hours of playing on each of those nights. To assume that the individual plays this many hours a night does not seem plausible.

Furthermore, 600 hands is an incredibly small sample of hands. That same average-to-good player would experience a standard deviation of roughly 30 big bets for every 100 hands played. In other words, after playing 100 hands, our player is equally likely to be up $70 or down $50 or anywhere in between. With this kind of variance, the statistical probability of anyone on Earth being able to never have a losing week, let alone to make over $100 a week consistently, is nil.

Incidentally, world-class poker players can experience losing streaks of over 30,000 hands in duration. As such, to say that poker is a main source of income for many students is simply incorrect. To my knowledge, there are at least five and probably no more than 10 UMass students who are able to generate legitimate incomes from poker. The range of yearly average incomes among those that I am aware of is between $30,000-$250,000. They all pay federal income taxes on their winnings.

The danger inherent in Bergeron's article is, first, that it reinforces the delusion that the vast majority of poker players have; namely, that they are able to subsist on an income derived solely from poker. And secondly, it creates more and more of a rapidly growing number of young persons who start playing with money they cannot afford to gamble.

As a founding member of www.UmassPoker.com, a non-profit site home to a community of nearly 500 UMass poker players who share information, discuss theory and dispel "get-rich-quick" rumors, I hope that this editorial reveals the truth behind attempting to derive your income as a poker player.

David E. Rudman
UMass student

Sweets and the city

World Perspectives

Paige Cram

Last night, my roommates and I discovered the secret bakery. There have been rumors all semester of its existence, but the only people who knew of its location refused to disclose it. Yesterday, a rumor started going around that this secret bakery was right around the corner from our apartment so we were determined to find it.

The bakery exists to supply all of the cafes in Florence with fresh pastries each day, but every morning between the hours of 2 a.m. and 5 a.m., it opens to the public ... sort of. It's completely unmarked, with a frosted glass door and the only sign outside simply says, "Silenzio, per favore." The front door opens into an obscure alley, so even those who have found it can't tell you how to get there. Our only instructions were to walk down some side streets and sniff. We were told that when we were nearby, we'd know.

It didn't seem likely that we would succeed in our hunt when we set out at 3 a.m., but after a long night of dancing, we were counting on our hunger to help us out. We hadn't walked more than a block when I smelled it: the distinct aroma of sugary, warm, flakey bread. We followed our noses around a corner and into an alley, which under normal circumstances I wouldn't consider walking down.

And there it was.

Exactly as our classmate had described it: just a frosted doorway glowing with the warmth of hard-working ovens but guarding itself from being seen by the outside world. At the time, we were the only ones in the secret bakery so it made the whole place seem that much more mysterious. We picked out our secret pastries and carried them back to our apartment to eat them ... secretly, but as we sat in our kitchen, thankful for our delicious discovery, I made another one of my own.

I may have only had a taste of what Florence has to offer, but what a delicious taste it was.

I've been living in this city for over three months and it occurred to me at that moment that it doesn't even come close to being enough time to learn the ins and outs of a place. All semester, we've been running around town trying different clubs and restaurants, visiting the museums, hanging out in the parks, going to soccer games and all the while thinking we are living like true Florentines. The only consolation for us leaving so soon was that we felt like we had really gotten to know this city when the truth of the matter is, we have only just been introduced. There are probably lots of secret bakeries, secret bars, maybe even secret supermarkets all over the place, but four months is simply not enough time to find them all.

We all feel like at least we understand Florence: we know its patterns, its rhythm. We finally managed to figure out when things will be open or when there will be a strike. We know the waiters at our favorite restaurants and the side streets we can take to avoid the tourists. But when it comes down to it, there will always be places like the secret bakery, places that divide the real locals from the fakers like us.

By the time this article is printed, I will probably be back in the good ol' U.S. of A, readjusting to being surrounded by all the things and people that I've been living without these past few months. It all seems to have happened so fast, and in a few short days it will all be over. I may not be coming away with an expert knowledge of the city I've lived in since January, but I'd like to think my friends and I bit off as much as we could chew in such a short time. I may have only had a taste of what Florence has to offer, but what a delicious taste it was.

Paige Cram is a Collegian columnist on exchange in Italy.

The debauchery of marriage

Allison Edles

When faced with a difficult situation, many of us find ourselves turning to people or certain places for answers or assistance. However, in the case of Jennifer Wilbanks, a bride-to-be in Georgia who was getting cold feet before her wedding, she faked her own kidnapping. Her kidnapping launched a nationwide search, which ended up involving Georgia police officials, Nevada police officials and the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

I can only imagine the mental process she was going through before she decided to go jogging the Friday night before her wedding and, consequently, disappear. "I mean, I just can't stand his snoring anymore, and that damn dog he's always in love with ... I'm his fiancee and I deserve the attention. Hmm, bet he'll miss me if I wasn't around."

This little story reminded me of those people who choose to fake their own death for what they can get out of it, such as a large sum of insurance money or a house or something. However, this was just silly. The reception was already paid for, the guests already set up in the hotel rooms and a priest was all ready to go. That priest could have been baptizing 10 babies in the time it took for this whole ordeal to be finished with.

If the majority of people in this country spent their time running from things, we would never get anything accomplished. Most of us get cold feet whenever we stand up in front of a large audience, but that doesn't stop us from accepting our diplomas at graduation.

If the majority of people in this country spent their time running from things, we would never get anything accomplished. Most of us get cold feet whenever we stand up in front of a large audience, but that doesn't stop us from accepting our diplomas at graduation.

The inconvenience alone was something that was irreversible. Wilbanks would honestly have been better off pulling a biblical move and switching her place with one of her girlfriends or something. At least all the money on the reception wouldn't have completely gone to waste. As ridiculous as that sounds, it's another option, one that doesn't warrant FBI involvement.

However, this situation also reminded me of all the people my age who are getting married. Sure, the amount of time each couple has known each other varies, ranging from six months to five years. And yes, Wilbanks was not 19, but 32. In short, she should have known better, but these "young adults" who think marriage is the way to go because they're one of the lucky ones to have found and maintained a successful relationship are idealists.

With 50 percent of marriages ending in divorce in this country, it is obvious to say that marriage no longer symbolizes what it used to. In a way, if the goal is to make a marriage last forever, it would be better to marry for political reasons or wealth than for love. At least then there is a tangible reason for the union.

Marriage is forced on members of society which is a factor that contributes greatly to people rushing into marriage. The point is hammered into people's heads that, if you don't get married by a certain age, you will ultimately end up unwanted and worthless. Really now, this is also a ludicrous concept.

The backgrounds of Wilbanks's engagement were not made known; however, there must have been obvious discomforts. Consequently, the marriage was not meant to be.

The institute of marriage has been made a mockery of in this society. Perhaps we can thank many of Hollywood's major celebrities for this. However, there are many reasons out there that make marriage very sensible, such as insurance benefits, tax cuts and financial aid. While I believe there should definitely be a mutual appreciation and some sort of emotional attachment to each other in addition to the other reasons for marriage, it seems as if it is not required anymore.

People today glorify the celebration of marriage rather than the actual bond between the two people getting married. This is where the downfall began, when the dress the bride wore became more important than the vows being spoken. It is our society's equivalent to Milton's "Paradise Lost."

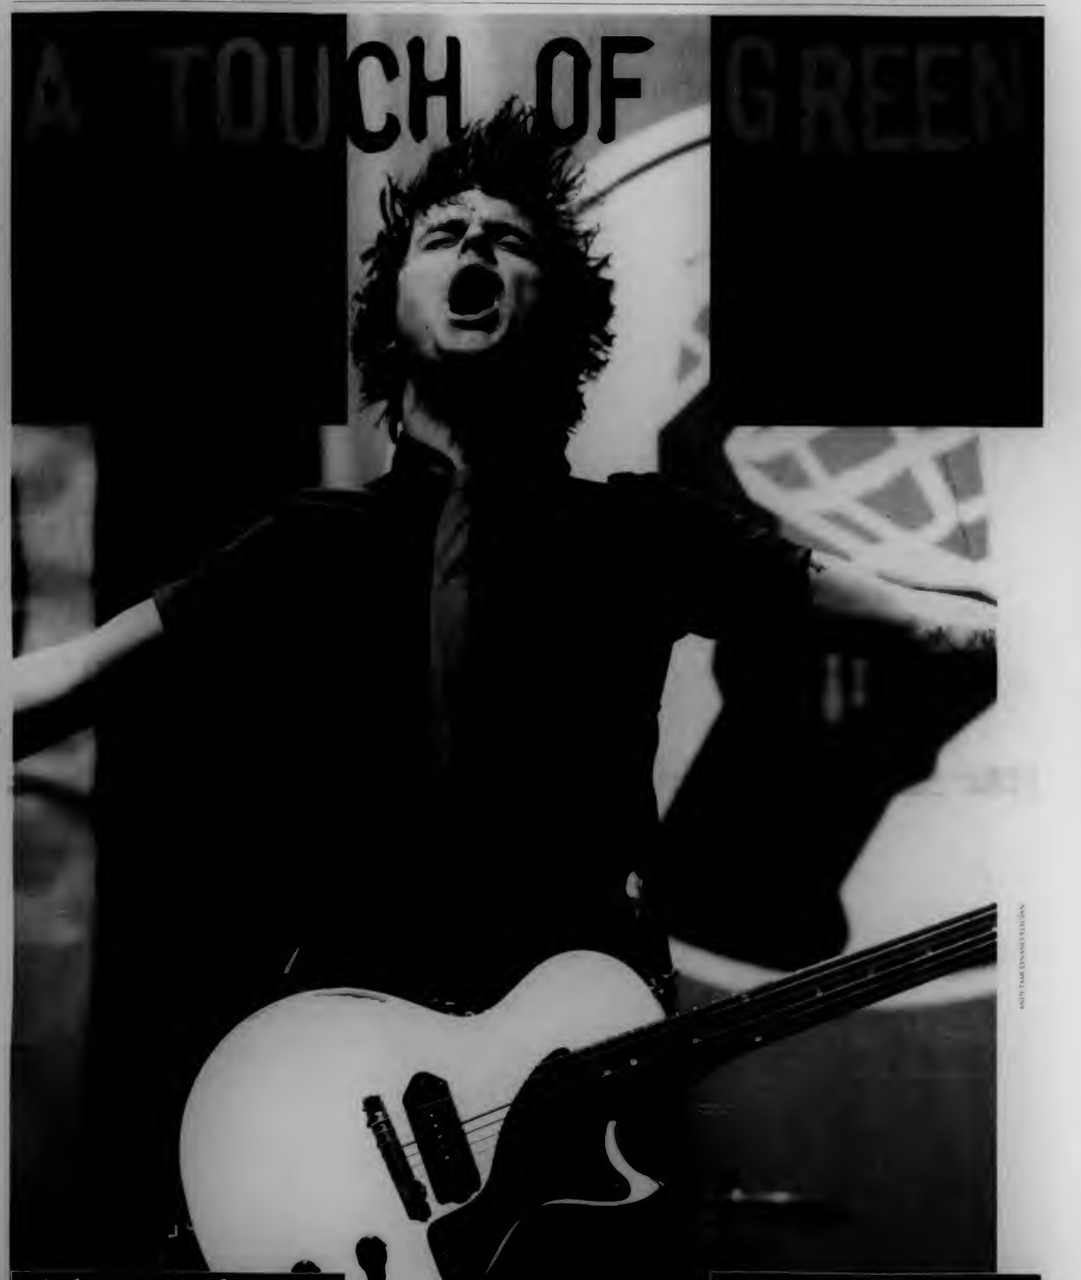
Wilbanks's kidnapping fiasco was, perhaps, the ultimate slap in the face to her family-to-be and to all married couples. By her running away from the situation in the manner that she did, not to mention getting the FBI involved, made it clear to America that she'd rather have nationwide attention than a legal union. It was an extremely selfish act on her part and, more over, very insulting to the rest of us for having to read this dribble on the front page of the New York Times.

In the end, her actions provided no lesson for anyone to walk away with and only succeeded in making her undesirable, not just to her fiancée, but to any other potential suitors. Nicely done.

Allison Edles is a Collegian editor.

What is your opinion of the revised Action Plan released on Friday?

A) I think it's a big improvement over Lombardi's previous proposal.
B) I think it's a good starting point, but it still needs some work.
C) I think students were ignored completely in the drafting of the new proposal.
D) This issue doesn't concern me.



Go to WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM and vote!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, MAY 2, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

ANDY TAMURIAN/COLLEGIAN

A history of punk

See PUNK on page 3

For the ages

Green Day
Mullins Center
Amherst
May 1

See CONCERT on page 5

Commercially inspired art

By CHRISTOPHER GAZZARA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Everyone knows that in order to sell products to a mass market, visual arts are necessary when it comes to capturing the minds of today's consumers.

Nobody knows this better than senior graphic design major, Rachel Bruno. Today marks the opening of her student gallery show, "The Art of Commercialization," a project she deems a reference to today's popular culture and its effects on the marketplace.

"The Art of Commercialization"
Student Art Gallery
UMass
May 2nd - 6th

One of her main drives was to take some of the standards seen in commercial advertising settings, and present them as fine art. In her opinion, too many people look at advertising and just see text, or the point being presented. She wanted to take time out to focus on the art that drives the work.

Rachel began first by taking self-portraits and then pictures of friends. She styled the photo shoots using clothing and accessories she saw as relevant to the project. After narrowing down her selection, she took the photographs and altered them digitally, creating silhouettes of her models.

When speaking about the drive behind the project, Rachel doesn't hesitate to remark on her desire to let the audience experience the work as they see it, according to their taste. In fact, she is downright modest about her goals.

"I didn't want to dictate anything to the viewers. I want them to view the pieces and take from them what they will."

Though she has no particular motive behind her desire to show her work, she does add, "you can't help looking at art and thinking about it. It's going to say something."

There are three works that will undoubtedly speak to the audience. These images are the only works in the show that are presented with text — the words, "image ala mode" and "fashion" are incorporated within the finished photograph, a statement Rachel says references advertising and the art that can be found with it.

Sharing the space with Rachel is artist Sarah Morrison, who's show "Pursuing Inspiration" centers on fantasy art. Her show consists of seven pieces, using watercolor and colored pencil. Finding herself inspired to read fantasy novels after seeing the dramatic art displayed on the cover, she was driven to create the pieces that follow two recurring characters, though there is no particular plot involved. Sarah sees fantasy novels, and their art, as an escape from the stress of daily life and hopes that her audience will view these pieces in a similar light.

The show opens today and runs through Friday, with a reception scheduled for tomorrow. Hours for the exhibit are 10-5 Monday thru Thursday and 10-3 on Saturday.

MELANIE BRONFERO/COLLEGIAN

Student artist and graphic design major Rachel Bruno will be displaying her exhibit "The Art of Commercialization" at the student Union Art Gallery this week from Monday thru Friday, May 6th.

Chronicling punk history

CONCERT from page 4

the Operation Ivy classic, "Knowledge." Billie Joe announced that he wanted to start a band on the stage, and selected three members of the audience to fill in on drums, bass and guitar. At the end of the song, he told his replacement that she could keep his guitar and explained that the new bassist was going to do a stage dive, and as he leaped from the stage they broke into another classic, "Basket Case."

Billie Joe disappeared for a minute, and came back on stage wearing a crown, a fitting hat for "King For a Day." In the middle of the song, the band burst into the Isley Brothers' "Shout," and fell to the stage during the quiet part, while Billie Joe put on a cape to match his crown for the end of the song. After playing "Minority," Green Day left the stage.

They started the encore with "Maria," from their "International Superhits" album and from there went into "Boulevard of Broken Dreams." Their cover of Queen's "We Are the Champions" had the entire crowd singing, and they had the lyrics flashing on the screen behind them for anyone who didn't know them. Billie Joe started a "Yankees suck" chant, and confetti filled the air. After the song, Tre and Mike left the stage and a spotlight came down on Billie Joe, who ended their set with "Good Riddance (Time of Your Life.)"

All things considered, it was an amazing show. Both bands were tight and on top of their game, and the crowd's energy was high the whole time. Billie Joe said that of all the tours the band had been on, this was his favorite, and it's easy to see why.

My Chemical Romance gave a boost to the show in the opening spot. The band is just off the release of their sophomore record "Three Cheers for Sweet Revenge," and have recently enjoyed the pleasure of sharing their first major bill.

"We are playing to bigger crowds than we have ever seen before," said MCR's bassist Mikey Way in a phone interview with the Daily Collegian. Way and his brother Gerard (lead singer of MCR) formed the MCR, with heavy influence from bands like Green day.

"Working with Green Day has been amazing," Way said. "Me and Gerard used to listen to them constantly when we were younger so it is just such a great experience to be playing shows with them."

Rent One of Ours
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
No additional fee for 21–25 year old drivers
POTTERS
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

CHERRY HILL GOLF COURSE
Rt. 63 North Amherst
256-4071
COLLEGE SEASON PASS - $350
COLLEGE FRESHMAN - $175
GOOD THROUGH THE ENTIRE 2005 GOLF SEASON.
STUDENT DISCOUNT ON GREEN FEES.
UMass Student Open House
TODAY, May 2nd
THE HARP
Irish Pub
Provides food and beverage.

Green Day revisits the Mullins to the delight of packed crowd

PUNK from page 4

tions, and of course, revolution. Combining hip-hop rhythm with the thrash of punk rock, lead singer Zach de la Rocha was able to grab the attention of two completely different crowd listeners. Their albums were almost all best sellers on the Billboard charts. In fact, even after the band's breakup, their website has remained active-calling for the release of Mumia Abu-Jamal, a black man accused of murdering a police officer who was sentenced to be murdered. They also played a set outside of the Democratic National Convention in 2000, pushing for a political shift in ideals. The band placed great faith in its listeners to go forth and make change.

"One of the great things about young people is that they do question, that they do care deeply about justice, and that they have open minds," Rocha is quoted as saying on their website.

Green Day too have joined the political-punk movement bringing the ideas of the 70s movements to a younger generation of listeners. However, this didn't truly occur until their latest album, "American Idiot," considered to be the group's most political album yet. Lead singer Billie Joe Armstrong is quoted recently in Rolling Stone, "This song ("Holiday") is not anti-American, it's anti-war." In fact, the change in sound may be the reason why Green Day won the Grammy for Best Rock Album earlier this year.

The latest war in Iraq pushed the band, like so many others, to fight back and call out what they see as an unjust cause. Unlike so many of their past albums which featured ruminations of teenage life and angst, "American Idiot" is almost completely political. "I'm not a part of some redneck agenda/Now everybody do the propaganda/And sing along to the age of paranoia," Armstrong sings while backed by heavy guitar and drums on their opening track.

I'ven their stage show features so many symbols similar to that of Che Guerra- fits clenched and black figures against crimson curtains. While Green Day may not be as "hard" as Rage, they still promote political activism with tables set up for concert-goers to register to vote, or become involved with Amnesty International.

Punk rock has provided an outlet for those who otherwise might not care to become involved in shaping change, while banging heads, fist pumping, and generally having a good time. Punk has continued to reinvent itself over the years, and as long as there is someone there to dictate authority, punk rockers will be there to question it.

ANDY TAMURIAN/COLLEGIAN

Punk rockers Green Day visited UMass this weekend in an all out rock show that excited fans at a packed Mullins Center.

Restaurant Night
Monday, May 2
from 5-8pm
DINING SERVICES
HAMPSHIRE DC presents:
The Delaney House
Menu features:
Chilled Strawberry Soup
Crab Cakes
Sweet Slaw
Tenderloin of Beef
topped/spinach, red peppers, mushrooms, with Beaujolais sauce
Potato Lasagna (vegetarian)
Penne Mediterranean (vegan)
Savannah Bell Salad
Walnut Vinaigrette
Balsamic Glaze
Spiced Nuts
BERKSHIRE DC presents:
Great Wall chinese restaurant
Menu features:
Grilled Pot Stickers
Mandarin Chicken
Shrimp Stir Fry
Spare Ribs
Spring Rolls
Vegetable Fried Rice
Pork Fried Rice
Mandarin Salad
Fortune Cookies
Almond Cookies
Rice Pudding

UMass drops 'Cuse

MEN'S LAX from page 8

the fourth quarter.

The Minutemen admittedly changed their style of play with the large lead in the final frame, as they stalled the clock, which they seemingly feared more than their opponent.

"We could have stretched our lead, and in the back of my mind, I'm thinking anytime you play Syracuse, you have to take advantage of those opportunities," Cannella said. "You can't let those opportunities slip because regardless of what the score is and how much time is left on the clock, they can come back and get you."

And they did.

Rattling off five consecutive goals in the final eight minutes and change, the Orange evened the score at 13 with 28.4 seconds showing on the scoreboard and turned a once ecstatic crowd of 3,428 into a group plagued by a state of shock as their home team began to completely unravel.

"I think in the last minute-and-a-half, it was the first time all season that our defense panicked a little bit, but the important thing is we calmed ourselves down," Dane Collins said. "We refocused going into overtime. It wasn't the end of the world. There is still a game left to play, and that is what mattered."

Collins, who won a career-high 18 faceoffs in 30 chances, wasn't able to out-muscle Danny Brennan in the opening draw of the extra period.

Park picked the ball up for Syracuse and eventually found Brian Crockett, who got a shot off that was wide of the net.

Crockett got another chance just a few seconds later, but his shot was off the mark by mere inches, caroming off the post and ultimately making its way into the hands of the Minutemen.

Zywicki got the ball at the left side of the net and unleashed what would typically be called a high-percentage shot, but 'Cuse goalie Jay Pfeifer, who made 12 saves and seemingly did everything in net besides stand on his head, stopped another shot by a UMass sniper.

It would be the last save he would make on that rainy Saturday afternoon.

Pfeifer couldn't corale the ball, and Zywicki picked up his own rebound and dumped the ball over Pfeifer's head, as he couldn't recover in time to make the save.

Cue the mayhem, the Canadian Flip, the pig pile and everything else an overtime win over an archrival would bring.

ANGELS TAMLYN/ASSOCIATE COLLEGIAN

Jeff Zywicki celebrates after scoring the game winning goal against Syracuse on Saturday afternoon.

Outside the press box

MCGOVERN from page 8

both teams. There was one UMass alumni that stood next to us, quietly saying, "Come one, come on..." to himself as he shook from the coldness of his soaked clothing and the anticipation of pending victory.

Syracuse came back and from our right we could feel the switch in momentum. After every goal, the Orange fans, who sat on the side of the bleachers closest to Garber Field's entrance, would chant and release a collective, metallic stomp.

With 28.4 seconds remaining in the fourth quarter, Syracuse's Brett Bucktooth tied it up and the Maroon and White looked as if it had given the game away. I looked down at the lime-green turf I was standing on and thought, "I guess it's just not their time."

Syracuse fans were jarring a couple of UMass supporters that happened to walk by when it happened, the Orange sideline was jumping up and down, and it appeared as though Garber Field had just been taken over.

Then came the cow bells.

From the UMass side of the stands, the cheers got louder and louder. The Maroon and White flag, which follows the diehards to every home and away game, was flapping in the thick Massachusetts air. It was very clear that the game was far from over.

In overtime, Jeff Zywicki rebounded his own shot and scored the game winner against the Orange for the second time in his career. The alumni next to us threw his hands in the air and the thousand or so umbrellas that lined Garber Field bounced up and down in euphoria.

The Minutemen rushed the field as Syracuse players slowly made their way off. There I stood, soaked, right between two of the best lacrosse teams in the country. I smiled and reached for my tape recorder before I slowly strolled onto that historic field to do my interviews.

I guess you could say I was pretty happy I left the press box.

Bob McGovern is a Collegian Columnist.

Temple takes down UMass

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse came into Friday's match up with the Temple Owls with just three wins in its last 26 meetings. This one was more of the same for UMass as the Owls defeated the Minutewomen 12-6 behind four goals from Allison Frengs and three from scoring counterpart Patty Glavin.

Temple	12
UMass	6

It was Temple's third straight win while the Minutewomen have dropped four out of their last five decisions.

Last year's contest between these two teams yielded a high scoring affair, with the Owls getting the better of the Maroon and White, 20-14. However, Friday's game was on the lower end of the scoring spectrum as a total of 18 goals were recorded. Only six goals were outs and holds an ERA of 2.28. Her season record now stands at 11-5.

This Sunday, the Maroon and White will take on Quinnipiac at the UMass Softball Complex for the Minutewomen's final game of the regular season. Sunday also happens to be the 23rd birthday for starting pitcher Barb LaFogg.

next 10 minutes as Temple had numerous opportunities to tie the game. The Owls finally found the net with 16:37 remaining in the first half, but Typadis responded immediately and UMass took the lead again. This would be the last time the Maroon and White would lead.

For the last ten minutes of the first half, Temple dominated the action, rifling off four straight goals and taking a 5-2 lead going into the break.

The Owls continued their assault on the UMass cage in the second half as they scored on a free position shot after just 35 seconds had ticked off the clock. This gave Temple a 6-2 lead and it would tally another goal before Sepulveda would end UMass' scoring drought with 22:24 to go in the second half to make it 7-3.

The two teams traded goals again as Glavin scored with 16:41 left in the game and Sepulveda answered just a minute later.

It was 8-4 at this point before the Owls sealed it with a 4-2 run to end the game. It was UMass' fifth loss to a conference opponent this year.

For UMass coach Carrie Bolduc, it was still about execution.

"We struggled on something we're typically very good at which is draw control," Bolduc said. "It kind of started there with draw possession. We're definitely playing more defense and then attacking. We were doing a good job. We had some issues getting the ball moving on the attacking end. We weren't catching and throwing as well as we have in the past. They pressured us well in the midfield."

The Minutewomen's season will end on Sunday with their last conference game against the Richmond Spiders. UMass' postseason hopes were ended by George Washington, who eliminated them from the Atlantic 10 tournament last Sunday with two games left. For coach Bolduc, there are more important things to be thinking about than the win column right now.

"We've got to finish [the season] out," Bolduc said. "Finish it with pride. Finish knowing that we did all we could. It can be difficult to play in games in which you are not playing for anything. You have to go back to basics. You're playing for UMass. You're playing for pride."

It will be senior day today down at Garber Field for the three seniors on this team of 24. Kristin St. Hilaire, Joey Rubin and Judy Kestner will all be leaving the team. However, even with such little time left there is always work to be done.

"The upperclassmen can help the underclassmen by leaving a legacy," Bolduc said. When they're out working somewhere else and they see that the UMass [women's] lacrosse team is back in the spotlight, they can know that they contributed to that."

Busa delivers on her birthday

BUSA from page 8

is a facet of the game that UMass coach Elaine Sortino has been trying to improve after yielding six errors in a doubleheader loss against North Carolina State last Sunday.

"We did really well today," Busa said. "We've been trying to make it a goal, not making errors."

As of late, Busa has been wearing two hats for UMass. Along with her usual pitching duties, she has found her way into the starting batting lineup for the first time since high school. Before April, Busa did not make an appearance at the plate since her freshman year at UMass and was looking to get swinging again.

During her high school days in Lexington, MA, Busa led the Middlesex league in batting average with a mark of .468 and recorded 26 runs batted in.

"I've been consistently doing my job hitting in practice and as coach says, practice is your audition," Busa said. "I've been trying to step it up, because I really have been wanting since my freshman year to hit continuously in the lineup."

Defensively, Busa's shutout on her 21st birthday added to her season numbers. This season, Busa has tallied 106 strikeouts on the season and holds an ERA of 2.28. Her season record now stands at 11-5.

This Sunday, the Maroon and White will take on Quinnipiac at the UMass Softball Complex for the Minutewomen's final game of the regular season. Sunday also happens to be the 23rd birthday for starting pitcher Barb LaFogg.

Minutewomen sweep Explorers

SOFTBALL from page 8

another run.

Senior Jasmine Edwards advanced to first base off of a walk and sophomore Candice Molinari singled, leaving the rest up to Puglia. Three more runs were scored as Puglia hit the fourth homerun of the game over the left field fence.

A two RBI double by freshman Maggie Flet was the end to the Minutewomen's air attack as they combined for 15 runs in five innings.

Prior to Friday's games, Puglia had been nursing an arm injury that occurred in a loss against North Carolina State last Sunday. In her return, Puglia registered three hits and four RBI. The team was pleased with its four homeruns in Game 1.

"I was very happy, it was good just to get good pieces. I just look for good contact," Denis said. "Our teams needs everybody that can to step up and it's the only way that we can get to as far as we want to get."

LaFogg allowed one hit, one run and struck out eight in her 17th win of the season. She added to her season total, and now has an A-10-best 184 strikeouts on the year, while her ERA stands at a mark of 2.06.

UMass won the second game of the afternoon in a slightly different manner than Game 1, as the Minutewoman's bats quieted down for three innings. The lack of runs scored paved the way for junior Jenna Busa to hold down the defensive side and struck out seven batters, while not allowing a single run on the day.

"It was a good feeling knowing that I had a few pitchers that were working consistently," Busa said. "Today I felt really confident in my defense. And I know that all of us were working towards the same goal."

Cullington followed up to her grand slam in Game 1 with a double to left field. This gave the other freshman, Lauren Proctor, a chance to take advantage of the situation. Proctor hit her second homer of the season and gave UMass the lead, 2-0.

The final run of the day came in the fifth inning, with a fly out by Puglia, which drove in Molinari for the score. Proctor led the team in Game 2 with two RBI, and Busa was able to contain La Salle, despite a small Minutewoman lead. Busa has 106 strikeouts on the season and holds an ERA of 2.28.

Summer Move-Out
The Easy Way
Move and store packages
Starting at $99
for the Whole Summer!
• FREE Pickup
• FREE Dropoff
• FREE Boxes & Tape
5 COLLEGE Storage
888-455-MOVE
www.5collegestorage.com
$10 Off Summer Storage
Mention this ad and save $10 on your summer move-and-store package! We make moving out easy!
Offer valid on 10-box, 12-box and 16-box packages. Must sign up by May 15, 2005. Not valid with any other offer.
www.5collegestorage.com
5 COLLEGE Storage

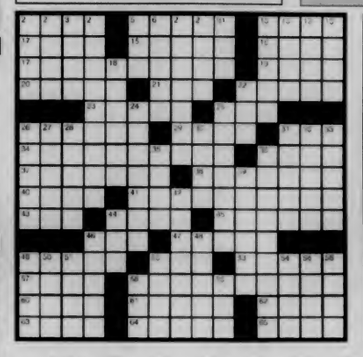
Cash For Your Books
Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.
Jeffery Amherst College Store
253-3870
Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst

Spring Specials
$5 OFF Style Haircut
$15 OFF Any Foil Highlite
*With Andrea Only
Starting at $30
FREE Eyebrow Waxing
With any other salon service
Exclusively at:
549.5610
Styles by Deborah
65 University Drive, Amherst (413) 549-5610
Now also featuring hairstyling, manicures, pedicures and body waxing.

Nails
Walk-ins Welcome
Summer Special!
$5 off manicure or pedicure*
expires August 1
*with coupon only

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"If you can count your money, you don't have a billion dollars."



—J. Paul Getty

ACROSS
1 Farmer's production
5 Red beginning?
10 Movie pig
14 Gives a hand to
15 Like showers
16 Tricks or Kings
17 Heliotrope
19 Siva's bite
20 Missionary Junipero
21 Word before or after pack
22 Lugers
23 Mass of metal
25 Existed
26 As a precaution
29 Deserve
31 Lofty peak
34 Jeanette MacDonald's partner
36 Melville novel
37 Emptied
38 Similar things
40 Silver and Perlman
41 Blue-eyed feline
43 NASA orbiter
44 Banana wrap
45 Kisses and cuddles
46 Observe
47 Type of printer
49 Temple table
52 Enthusiasm
53 ___ you mind!
57 Perform ushering
58 Rambling
60 Segment of a sewer
61 F.O.E. chapter
62 Frozen desserts
63 Impudence
64 Whimsical
65 Branch headquarters?

DOWN
1 Hacks
2 Tick off
3 Nose alert
4 Skin ailment
5 Part of TGIF
6 Explosive liquid or jelly
7 Didn't sink
8 Flat tea?
9 Fruit drink
10 Fancy dances
11 Lutein additive
12 National poet
13 Conclusions
18 "Cheers" star
22 "The Streets of Francisco" star
24 River to Lake Ontario
25 Dry quality of humor
26 Arboreal lemur
27 Peter and a Wolfe
28 Highland groups
30 First father
31 Shell rival
32 Boston airport
33 Job stations
35 McClurg or Adams
36 Relative of pine tar
39 Poplar trees
42 Tempo between allegretto and presto
44 According to 46 Gluts
48 Shower month
49 Adder cousins
50 Her Solo's love
51 Faucets
52 Docking site
54 Evil behavior
55 12/24 and 12/31
56 Time out
58 June honoree
59 Snaggler's catch

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

The school year is almost over...
But there is still time to submit a comic!
Send your work to Aly
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
Spring is Here!
Come in and get the attention you want!
•Free haircolor consultations
•We specialize in Multi-Color Highlighting and eyebrow shaping
•Facial and Body waxing
Walk-ins Welcome
253-1200
Mon-Fri 10-6
Sat 10-4
40 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
No checks/we accept debit cards
$2 OFF HAIRCUT
1/2 PRICE FACIAL
With this COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You're good at making a grand entrance.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
It's funny how you forget things quickly when you're drunk.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Chicken and beer is, actually, a great way to start any week.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Things will be much better when you have a place of your own.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Perhaps you should call your friend back.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Your new running shoes are bound to last a lot longer than your last pair.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Today you are going to get annoyed with the person who calls you twenty times a day.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Your hair looks like it was attacked by a machete.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You should pretend like you don't know what you know.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Today you're going to have that weird eye-twitchy thing going on.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You are a very memorable person. You light up the room wherever you go.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
No more wandering over to the townhouses.

$$$ Build your business with our business.
Place your ad here, in The Collegian. $$$

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@worry.com Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

AUTO FOR SALE

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, tint. $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

1993 Nissan Maxima SE V6, 5 speed stick, loaded, $1500. Elumew@edic.umass.edu

EMPLOYMENT

NOW HIRING CAMPUS MANAGERS Ready for the UReps challenge? UReps is looking for the most outgoing, enthusiastic leaders for our Campus Managers position for the Fall, 2005 semester! Work 10 hours per week, gain valuable business experience, and earn while you build your resume. $100 weekly salary plus bonuses. To learn more, and apply visit www.UReps.com

Camp Counselors —Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pineforestcamp.com

Painters 2-3 years experience Must have a vehicle part-time, full-time Call Michael 367-9810

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $8 - $12/hr. (888)277-9767 www.ed-leavy.com

Responsible college students wanted for Franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown. (888)427-7672 Ext 445

Cleaning 2 days (8-2) and Saturday AM Hampshire Fitness 59.50 per hour and membership. Jason or Deb 256-6446

Summer/Beyond- Local franchise Major healthy, home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay. 587-9500

Live in Babysitter needed for two girls this summer in Wellfleet on Cape Cod Salary, Room, and board. Please Call 508-349-6392

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe. 60 Masonic St. Northampton. Make $75 taking online surveys www.mymikeyauthor.com

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokespersons positions. $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cf.asp to apply.

Help Wanted – Cutting edge agricultural facility on 116 in Amherst seeks quality motivated, detail oriented help. Flexible shifts, relaxed atmosphere, on bus route. 15-40 hours weekly, morning a must. Please e-mail inquiries to peter@bushellers.com

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetBestPrinting.com - Call Dan 413-682-4020

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 15-40 hours per week, June 22 - August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necessary. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

Summer Jobs in Environment

Moving: Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Spring Break 2006 with STS. America's #1 Student Tour Operator. Hiring Campus reps. Call for group discounts. Info/Reservations 1-800-648-4849 www.ststravel.com

Administrative Assistant for Teen-Bicycle Touring Program. Part Time until late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

FOR SALE

Full Size bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old. Excellent condition. $200 & price must pick up. (444)-304-6844

HOUSE FOR RENT

Hadley - 5 Beds, Large lot, September, $1375 - plus utilities. Skibski Realtors 586-1827

4 Bedroom, Northampton for June. Double living room, enclosed side porch $1300/month +utilities Skibski Realtors 586-1827

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 bedroom Newer home Laundry Dish/gas. Large yard 549-4270

House Hadley. Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen, and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

MISCELLANEOUS

www.butchbutts.com

Just Look Stupid

MISCELLANEOUS

Your Opinion Could Get You a Scan PSP! Have you taken Kaplan or another SAT/GMAT/GRE exam review course? How about a college course? Education site researching course providers want to hear from you. Students who submit course reviews are automatically entered in a drawing to win Sony's new PSP. For details, visit www.coursehero.com

ROOMMATE WANTED

1 Bdrm in 2 bdrm Brandywine Mnr. Aug. $480/Rent & dates negotiable pmoss@student.umass.edu

Roommate Wanted in House $325/Call 413-687-4976

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control and Emergency Contraception, STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9892

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, MAY 2, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Déjà vu, all over again

Zywicki scores game-winning goal against Syracuse ... again

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

In terms of a game that was slated to be one of the greatest the lacrosse world would see in 2005, this one lived up to every ounce of attention, hype and anticipation.

It was supposed to be everything a solid rivalry should be: a huge crowd, tons of emotion and an intense, unpredictable finish.

UMass	14
Syracuse	13

It had all of that.

All of that, minus the unpredictable part.

During a post-game interview with Sean Morris, Jeff Zywicki strolled by and spouted out an interesting comment.

"Tell them how I called the overtime goal [on Friday]," Zywicki said to Morris.

"He did," Morris responded.

Why not?

Two years ago, on the same Garber Field, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (11-2 4-1 ECAC) knocked off Syracuse 14-13 with the help of a game-winning goal in overtime by Zywicki.

Once again, on Saturday, No. 8 UMass defeated the No. 7 Orange 17-5? 14-13 in overtime on yet another Zywicki goal.

To add even a bit more deja vu to the thriller, Zywicki proceeded to land a front flip right in front of the Syracuse sideline, a la former 'Cuse legend Mike Powell, who seemed to live on rubbing his good fortune into the opposition.

"We were talking about it at the house," Morris said. "We're roommates, and we were just saying nonchalantly about how it was going to be a close game, and if someone sticks the game-winner, we've got to do a front flip in front of their bench because they rubbed it into us last year. He did it. He stuck it and ran and did it. He backed it up."

Zywicki's celebration dance, which will eternally be deemed "The Canadian Flip," as the senior attackman hails from Ontario, was the talk of the locker room after the game, almost more so than the game-winning goal itself.

"I just hope he didn't hurt himself," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

Zywicki didn't seem so worried.

"It was a summersault, not a flip. I can't do a flip. It was a good summersault, not a bad flip," Zywicki said.

Be that as it may, Zywicki's goal 50 seconds into the sudden-death overtime, his 32nd goal of the season, preserved the sanity of the Minutemen, who blew a five-goal lead in the fourth quarter and were one left post away from walking off Garber Field on the business end of a heart breaking loss that could have destroyed all of the momentum they had built up in the month of April, in which they went a perfect 6-0.

UMass was leading 13-8 — with the five-goal deficit being the largest the Orange have faced all season — until Jarett Park trimmed the margin to four goals at the 8:14 mark of

See MENS LAX on page 6

ANDREW TAMUTNAS/COLLEGIAN

A referee holds up his hand after Jeff Zywicki (not pictured) scored the game-winning goal in overtime against Syracuse on Saturday.

ANDREW TAMUTNAS/COLLEGIAN

Senior attackman Jeff Zywicki charges down the field after scoring the game winning goal against Syracuse in overtime. Zywicki's goal game the Minutmen a 14-13 victory over the Orange on Saturday.

The view from the sidelines

Bob McGovern

A lazy mist had gathered over Garber Field on Saturday. It was a combination of rain, sweat and youthful competition that was barely permeated by the lights which gave focus to the best lacrosse game in the nation that day.

It was Syracuse against UMass, one of the fastest growing rivalries in Division I lacrosse. People had been talking about it for weeks, the teams had for a little bit longer. By the time the final two minutes of the fourth quarter came around, it was imminent that this game was worth every second of the hype.

My colleague and I stood in the press box for the entire game, which was a circus in its own right. Syracuse media, reporters from lacrosse magazines and even a few local guys lined the seats in front of the large, horizontal window. But not us ... we were beaten to the seats by the older guys.

Throughout the game, we dodged our heads back and forth, trying to keep up with the action that was blocked by the cow licks and backs of those who got there before us. On one side of the press box were Syracuse fans, on the other were the cow bell laden fans of the Maroon and White.

With time running down and the Minutemen in the lead, my colleague looked over at me and said, "Hey man, let's go down to the field."

I immediately obliged, I wanted to experience the excitement first hand, I wanted to hear Garber explode when the Minutemen defeated Syracuse for only the second time in two decades. On top of it all, I was getting pretty sick of the Syracuse radio guy who kept complaining about his view, every single time the UMass fans stood up.

As we left the press box, it was like leaving a vacuum. We were hit by the rain, the noise and the environment that we had kept ourselves from for the whole game.

I crept by a line of UMass fans, who were easy to maneuver around, because they were all standing on their seats. As I made my way towards the field, I looked left and saw the entire side of Tobin Hall, chock full of people who could feel the intensity and couldn't stay away.

We made our way to the sidelines and stood right between

See MCGOVERN on page 6

ANDREW TAMUTNAS/COLLEGIAN

The Minutemen swarm Jeff Zywicki after he scored the game-winning goal against Syracuse on Saturday. The Minutemen won the game 14-13 for their second victory over Syracuse in 24 years.

UMass rolls over LaSalle

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Before the start of the Massachusetts softball team's doubleheader against Atlantic 10 rival La Salle, the Minutewomen were closing in on a UMass single-season home run record.

The Maroon and White then proceeded to break that record, as the team cranked out five homers on the day, with the first four coming in the opening three innings in a doubleheader sweep of the Explorers.

The Minutewomen will take on Boston University on Tuesday afternoon at 5 p.m.

UMass	15
LaSalle	1

UMass came out of the gates running in game one and did not slow down, blowing out La Salle 15-1 in five innings. After senior Barb LaFogg shutdown the opposing offense before it could get started, the Minutewomen offense exploded.

A single to center field by senior Hilary Puglia set up the Maroon and White's all-time home run hitter, junior KJ Kelley, to go in for the kill. Kelley connected and put two runs on the board, homering to left field.

Home run number two on the day came immediately following the Kelley homer, as senior Denise Denis hit a towering shot over the flag pole and recorded her fifth homer of the season.

"I thought we did a good job hitting the ball today," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "I thought we had some good solid contact. I think overall this is a good hitting team."

The Minutewomen picked up where they left off in the bottom of the second inning. A double by freshman Sarah Hurd was the start to a long inning for La Salle. After sophomore Pam Sulick advanced Hurd with a sacrifice bunt, Puglia singled and drove in Hurd. The Minutewomen then loaded the bases, as Denis singled and put one more run on the board.

With two outs and ducks on the pond, freshman Stacy Cullington did not let the pressure get to her as she hit a grand slam to left field. With the lead increased to nine, the Minutewomen were not done yet.

Vinnie Caputo of La Salle recorded the only hit of the game for the Explorers, as she homered to left field and cut the lead down by one. LaFogg would get out of the inning without sacrificing

See SOFTBALL on page 6

Busa shines on her birthday

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Junior pitcher Jenna Busa, of the Massachusetts softball team, had a reason to celebrate on Friday. Scratch that. She actually had three reasons to celebrate.

The first reason is one of the most celebrated happenings in a college students life: it was her 21st birthday.

The second reason is that her team swept La Salle in a doubleheader, winning Game 1 in a blowout, 15-1 and Game 2 in a shutout, 3-0.

The third and final reason is that in Game 2, Busa pitched a one-hit shutout, while striking out seven batters and capturing her 11th win of the season.

"I was really happy," Busa said. "Things seemed to click really well today."

Last year, on Busa's 20th birthday, she experienced strikingly similar success on the mound. In another shutout, UMass beat Rhode Island 5-0 and Busa surrendered only three hits and three walks, while not allowing a single run. This was her 12th win of the season.

In Friday's contest, age wasn't the only factor that changed for Busa. Prior to the start of the game during warmups, Busa noticed that there was something off with her curveball. After talking with UMass pitching coach Kaila Holtz, a few adjustments were made to fix the problem.

"Before the game, my curveball wasn't working very well," Busa said. "I just stepped a few more inches across my body, and that made a big difference."

The results were positive for the Minutewomen. A single to right field by La Salle infielder Laura DeZolt in the top of the second inning accounted for the sole hit of Game 2.

Another component that Busa attributes to the shutout is the sound play by her supporting cast as there were no errors on the day. Solid fielding

See BUSA on page 6

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, May 3, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 129

Program finishes with global flavor

By Cameron Methner
Collegian Staff

The Prince/Crampton Cluster in the Southwest Residential Area finished off its "Around the World in 30 Days" event Saturday with an international dinner, where all of the residents were invited to prepare a dish from their country and share it with the community.

The dinner was the finale in a series of presentations by Prince and Crampton residents that educated others on the cultures of different countries around the world.

It first drew 40 attendees last Saturday at 6:30 p.m., but as the night went on the number grew to over 80. The spread of the table was so great that the dessert had to be placed on chairs next to the table. The dinner was held in the Ping-Pong Lounge, located in between the Prince and Crampton dormitories, where the residence life staff set up the many lounge couches into a large horseshoe to help the line move faster.

The residents who cooked prepared large dishes of foods from all around the world, including an Indian dish named Royal Butter Chicken to a very spicy chili from the southwestern U.S. The youngest of the cooks, Good Farah, age 10 and resident director Dr. Mohamed Good's son, cooked Basmati Rice for the event. On the large table over 40 dishes were placed with pots coming in at the last minute.

"We do an international dinner every semester, one to end this event and one in the fall where we invite the RSOs to participate," said Theresa Ray, a resident assistant and senior studying neuroscience.

Erica Piedade, the resident director of Cance Hall said that she had been to the international

See DINNER on page 2

Lombardi drafts final diversity plan

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi posted the final draft of his response to the Commission for Campus Diversity Friday.

In the plan, "On Improving Campus Diversity," he named Associate Chancellor Esther M. Terry to oversee diversity related issues on campus. Terry was a member of the original 23-person commission.

"The final draft is not substantially different from the second draft primarily because most of the major changes in response to comments appeared in the second draft," Lombardi said in an e-mail to The Daily Collegian.

Lombardi added that this plan is a little clearer than the old plan that came out on April 11.

"[The final draft] assigns responsibility for the continuing monitoring of the various activities described in the document to Associate Chancellor Esther Terry," Lombardi said.

Terry's main job will be to oversee the progress of diversity related issues on the campus.

The first performance review by the commission, which is now chaired by Terry, will take place on July 1, 2006. The performance will review all the work that the commission did in the fiscal year.

"Our goal here is student success," Lombardi said to the Springfield Republican during an interview. "This is a blueprint that we will then try to execute. Some of it will take time."

Lombardi expressed similar thoughts in his e-mail.

"The point of the exercise is to make progress and improve our effectiveness in building a diverse and inclusive campus. There is much to be done to achieve this goal, and the only want to get there is to start," he said.

Lombardi's original plan was released on March 12. He was met immediately with resistance from students and faculty who thought that parts of his plan would take away from student organizations.

While not many have reacted negatively towards Lombardi's ideas on academic issues, the university community voiced its displeasure of the other half of the recommendations.

"It's the student affairs part that's really scaring the students," said Pavel Payano, president of the Student Government Association, to the Springfield Republican. "They see the administration taking ownership of something they created."

The new plan, and all old drafts of the plan, can be found on the commission's Web site at www.umass.edu/campusdiversity/.

—Matt Elder

Frat closed due to building violations

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

The Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity, which serves the University of Massachusetts, was closed Friday due to "building and fire code violations that were dangerous to life," according to the Amherst Fire Department.

The violations were first noticed by an Amherst Building Inspector who happened to be on his way to work when he noticed that a couch was partially blocking an exit door at the 395 North Pleasant St. house, officials say.

The inspector then called the fire department, which joined Amherst Building Inspectors in an attempt to enter the building. No one answered the door initially. A fire escape also was observed to be partially obstructed. The University's Environmental Health and Safety Department and the Office of Fraternities and Sororities were contacted and both agencies sent representatives to the building.

According to the Amherst Fire Department, the House President allowed the Fire and Building Department personnel into the structure on their second attempt to inspect the house. Those officials say they noticed that all smoke detectors had been covered in aluminum foil. The Amherst Board of Health and the University's Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs were notified and also dispatched representatives to the scene.

The fire department says it found 19 deficiencies with the house.

University and town officials determined that the building would be closed until the deficiencies were corrected. All students reportedly exited the house in an orderly fashion. It was then posted by the Building Department.

A short time later, town and University officials jointly conducted inspections of all the remaining fraternities and sororities around UMass and found no serious life-safety violations that would have resulted in another closure.

This situation occurred less than 48 hours after another North Pleasant St. fraternity was observed with its front doors partially blocked by furniture and resulted in an inspection by the Amherst Fire and Building Departments, the University's Environmental Health and Safety and Office of Fraternities and Sororities. All of the minor violations were corrected immediately by its occupants.

The town and University jointly conducted a semi-annual inspection of all Greek houses several weeks ago. No serious life-safety violations were found at Sigma Alpha Mu at that time. However, the fraternity was taken to court several years ago for serious life-safety violations, which resulted in a court order to maintain life-safety systems and fire prevention measures.

Rob Mantegazza, a resident of Sigma Alpha Mu and junior at UMass says he is not sure how long he and his fellow fraternity brothers will be unable to live at the house, but they are not worried about finding temporary places to stay.

"There's always places to crash," he said.

Town and University officials also say it is unclear how long the fraternity will be closed. They are currently assessing whether to institute further sanctions or court actions at this time. But fraternity members are remaining optimistic.

"We're going to get through this just like anybody else," said Mantegazza.

The Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity house at 395 North Pleasant St. is temporarily closed due to building code violations found by the Amherst Fire and Building Inspection Departments.

$5.1 million settlement reached for wrongful death in 2004 Red Sox riots

By Michael Kunzelman
Associated Press

BOSTON — The city paid a $5.1 million settlement on Monday to the parents of a college student killed by police trying to subdue rioters after the Boston Red Sox won the American League pennant last fall.

Victoria Snelgrove, a 21-year-old Emerson College senior from East Bridgewater, died hours after she was hit in the eye socket with a pepper-spray pellet fired by a police officer outside Fenway Park on Oct. 21 after Boston eliminated the New York Yankees.

"Of course, no amount of money can compensate the Snelgroves for the untimely loss of their daughter," said Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole. "Our prayers continue to be with them.

"I am hopeful the settlement recognizes the tremendous loss to them and represents our acceptance in the role the police played in that tragedy," she said.

O'Toole said that the department's investigation showed Victoria Snelgrove was an innocent bystander.

"Tory was not the target of any police action nor was she engaged in any activity that would have led police to think that she was behaving unlawfully," the commissioner said.

Patrick Jones, the Snelgrove's family lawyer, said that acknowledgment was the most important aspect of the settlement to her family. He said Snelgrove's parents, Richard and Diane Snelgrove, and her brother Michael, would not have any comment beyond a statement they recorded on a DVD released at the news conference.

Deputy Superintendent Robert E. O'Toole, who was in charge of operations around

See SNELGROVE on page 2

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Boston Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole announces the city's $5.1 million settlement yesterday for a wrongful death.

Groom still wants to wed Wilbanks

By Charles Odum
Associated Press

DULUTH, Ga. — The jilted groom whose bride-to-be ran away four days before their wedding still wants to marry Jennifer Wilbanks, saying, "Haven't we all made mistakes?"

"Just because we haven't walked down the aisle, just because we haven't stood in front of 500 people and said our I Do's, my commitment before God to her was the day I bought that ring and put it on her finger, and I'm not backing down from that," John Mason said Monday in an interview with Fox News' Hannity & Colmes show.

It was Mason's first public statement since he learned on the morning of his scheduled wedding day that his fiancee had gotten cold feet.

As her family and friends feared the worst, police say Wilbanks cut her hair and took a Greyhound bus to Las Vegas to back out of a lavish, 600-guest wedding planned for Saturday. She then went on to Albuquerque, N.M., where she eventually called Mason and police from a pay phone at a 7-11, saying she had been kidnapped. She later said it simply a case of cold feet.

Mason said he has given the 32-year-old Wilbanks her ring back — she had left it at the house — and said they still planned to marry.

But if Mason is ready to forgive the jittery bride, authorities are still peeved.

The mayor said Monday she is looking into the possibility of suing Wilbanks for the estimated $100,000 cost of searching for her. That option would have to be approved by the city council. The groom's father, Claude Mason, is a former mayor of Duluth and a local judge.

"We feel a tad betrayed and some are very hurt about it," Mayor Shirley Lasseter said.

She added that they want to hear from

See BRIDE on page 2

COURTESY MSNBC.COM

A billboard seen in Duluth, Ga. yesterday pokes fun at runaway bride Jennifer Wilbanks. Wilbanks' fiancee says he still wants to marry her.

Judges unlikely to reverse gay marriage

BOSTON (AP) — A Catholic activist's bid to persuade the state's highest court to reverse itself on gay marriage likely has failed, his lawyer said Monday after the Supreme Judicial Court heard arguments in the case.

Justices, even two who dissented on the 2003 landmark ruling, pressed activist C.J. Doyle's lawyers to prove how his rights were denied by allowing same-sex marriages, but did not question lawyers on the other side.

Chester Darling saw that as a "negative" sign for his client.

"I'm not too confident," he said after the hearing. "I had an inference from that, that it was a little negative, from our point of view."

Nearly a year after the nation's first state-sanctioned, same-sex weddings began, Doyle went before the very court that ruled, in a 4-3 vote, that the state constitution guaranteed gays and lesbians the right to marry in Massachusetts. He asked the court to halt the marriages until voters can consider changing the state constitution.

"He should be part of the process — the robust debate which is required on such an important issue as marriage," Darling told the court, referring to Doyle.

Justice Robert Cordy, one of three judges who dissented in 2003, appeared skeptical.

"How has the full and robust public discourse been inhibited?" he asked. "It seems to me, if anything, it's been enlivened on this subject... I don't see how it gets inhibited by the fact that the court has made a constitutional ruling."

Last March, two months before the SJC's landmark ruling took effect, the Legislature approved a constitutional amendment that would ban gay marriage. Lawmakers must pass the measure a second time, either this year or next, before it can reach the statewide ballot in November 2006.

Doyle's petition calls for a stay on gay marriages until a vote. Last year, a single justice of the SJC rejected Doyle's arguments. It was heard on appeal Monday by the full court, which did not immediately rule.

Justice Martha Sosman, who wrote the 2003 dissenting opinion, told Darling's co-counsel, Robert Muise, that unless it's proven that the single justice — Roderick Ireland — erred in his ruling last year, then "that's the end of it."

Darling later said the case will be hard to win because "they wanted to confine the argument to our responses to what the single justice did."

—Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING
SPRING CONCERT
A recap of the events in the Mullins Center on Sunday.
Page 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
LIBERAL UMASS?
What exactly does it mean to call UMass a 'Liberal' university?
Page 5

WEATHER
TODAY Sunny, 159°
TONIGHT Cloudy L35°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H61°, L45°

SPORTS
ONE LAST STAND
UMass Women's lacrosse seniors played in their last game on Sunday.
Page 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Heah
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Matthew Reed
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Customer Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Foucaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Programming Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Copyediting Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gattara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brunner
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts fall and spring semester. The Collegian is independently financed, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life. It became the Collegianससस in 1907. The Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1950. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been printed since January 1986. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Meghan Heah

Photo Technician
Megan Brunner

Copy Editor
Michael Busack

Production Supervisor
Nick Belanger

Production Staff
Amanda Allen, Samantha Nielsen

Army Pfc. pleads guilty to Abu Ghraib prison abuse

By T.A. Badger
Associated Press

Joined by her legal team, U.S. Army Pfc. Lynndie England arrives at a military court in Fort Hood, Texas on Monday.

FORT HOOD, Texas — Pfc. Lynndie England, the young woman pictured grinning, giving a thumbs-up and holding a naked Iraqi by a leash in some of the most notorious photos to come out of the Abu Ghraib scandal, pleaded guilty Monday to mistreating prisoners.

Wearing her dress green Army uniform and speaking somberly in a soft voice, the 22-year-old Army reservist told the judge that she initially resisted taking part in the abuse at the Baghdad prison, but ultimately caved in to pressure from her comrades.

"I had a choice, but I chose to do what my friends wanted me to," she said, entering her pleas a day before the start of her trial.

The charges carry up to 11 years in prison, but prosecutors and the defense reached an agreement for a lesser sentence. A military jury will convene on Tuesday to determine her punishment; she will get the lesser of the jury's sentence or the term agreed on in the plea bargain.

If she had been convicted as charged, she could have gotten 16 1/2 years behind bars.

The judge asked her about a photo depicting her smiling and pointing at a naked detainee's genitals while smoking a cigarette. England said she replied, "No, no way" at first when a fellow soldier asked her to pose for the picture.

"But they were being very persistent, bugging me, so I said, OK, whatever," she told the judge.

The plea bargain settles one of the most prominent cases to come out of the Abu Ghraib scandal, which damaged the image of America's military and sparked outrage against the United States around the globe.

England became a central figure in the scandal after photos emerged last year showing her and others sexually humiliating Iraqi prisoners.

One of the photos showed her holding a hooded, naked prisoner on a leash. Another showed her smiling and giving a thumbs-up next to a nude prisoners stacked in a pyramid. A third depicted England pointing at the prisoner's genitals as a cigarette dangled from her lips.

England's lawyers have argued that she and others in her military police unit were acting on orders from military intelligence to "soften up" prisoners for interrogation. But Army investigators testified during hearings last summer that England said the reservists took the photos while "they were joking around, having some fun."

The judge, Col. James Pohl, went through each photo while asking England about her actions at Abu Ghraib in the fall of 2003.

She told the judge that Pvt. Charles Graner Jr., the reputed ringleader of the abuses and the man said to be the father of England's infant son, put the leash around the prisoner's neck in order to take him from one cell to another.

When the prisoner resisted, she told the judge, Graner said to her: "Hold this. I'm going to take a picture."

Pohl asked if she thought the leash was a legitimate way to control the detainee.

"I assumed it was OK" because he was an MP, England said of Graner. "He had a background as a corrections officer."

Graner was convicted in January on a range of abuse charges and sentenced to 10 years in prison. Last month, he married former Spc. Megan Ambuhl, an Abu Ghraib defendant who was discharged from the Army without serving prison time. Graner had another man stand in for him in the marriage-by-proxy April 12 near Fort Hood.

England's lawyer Rick Hernandez said last week that the defense will present evidence during the sentencing that England has severe learning disabilities and mental problems. He said there had been no decision on whether she will testify.

England entered guilty pleas to two counts of conspiracy to maltreat prisoners, four counts of maltreating prisoners and one count of committing an indecent act. Prosecutors agreed to drop another count of committing an indecent act and one count of dereliction of duty.

England, from Fort Ashby, W.Va., is one of seven members of the Maryland-based 372nd Military Police Company charged with humiliating and assaulting prisoners at Abu Ghraib.

Four other members of the 372nd and two low-level military intelligence officers have entered guilty pleas, with sentences ranging from no time to 8 1/2 years. The only soldier to stand trial so far is Graner. Spc. Sabrina Harman, a former Abu Ghraib guard, is scheduled to go to trial at Fort Hood next week.

International food featured in Prince dinner before. "It's a way to support people and the food is always phenomenal," she said. "They used to have dancing but I think people have become shyer over the years."

DINNER from page 1

Residence Life staff members from Gorman and Wheeler, Van Meter, Butterfield, and JQA all attended to support the diversity of people here. The dinner started with Dr. Good's welcome, "Thank you very much for coming. This is a tradition we have where we want people to come and meet your neighbors. Enjoy and share with each other," he said.

A boom-box provided music in the background as peoples talked and ate their lill. Other dishes on the buffet line were Senegal couscous, pita and hummus, lamb, hot chicken wings, vegetable beef soup, a Somalian pasta dish, and a good helping of American macaroni and cheese.

A graduate student, Ekundayo Shittu from Nigeria and studying Industrial Engineering said this was his second time. "You can meet with people you don't normally talk to," he said "It provides an avenue to talk to people. The atmosphere is right for this kind of interaction."

Every seat was taken so people began to sit on the floors, which also began to lill up quickly.

"Its amazing to meet all these international people and getting to know your neighbors from their food and conversation," said Jonas Schaefer, a German molecular biology graduate student.

After an hour passed the food began to disappear and people began to talk more easily with each other.

A resident assistant, Justin Cunha, a political science graduate student said, "This is an important event; everyone can get to know each other and have a good time."

Diversity issues on campus do not seem to have affected the atmosphere in Prince/Crampton. "We deal with diversity on our own terms, with our own programs," said Cunha.

Police, Snelgroves reach a settlement

SNELGROVE from page 1

Fenway Park that night and fired one of the weapons, also will retire from the force, the commissioner said. The two are not related.

"Bob has been at the center of controversy and media speculation since this tragedy occurred," she said. "While Bob is the first to admit that he's made mistakes during his career, he has served the city for 37 years and his contributions to the Boston Police Department cannot be overstated."

Two other people were injured when they were hit in the face by the pellets, which are fired from compressed-air weapons. O'Toole said it was too soon to discuss their cases.

The incident is the subject of at least three separate investigations.

Prosecutors are looking into whether criminal charges are warranted against the officers who fired the pepper pellet weapons.

The commissioner named a special outside panel to look into the shooting and police policies. Former U.S. Attorney Donald Stern, who is leading that investigation, said the panel could release its report as soon as this week.

And the results of an internal Boston Police Department investigation were forwarded to the Suffolk District Attorney's Office about a week ago, according to a spokesman for District Attorney Daniel Conley.

Runaway bride could face criminal charges

BRIDE from page 1

Wilbanks' family, to see if perhaps there was a good reason for the woman's disappearance. "I would love to hear from the family and know there might have been a problem and know we should work with this lady on some recourse other than legally."

A local prosecutor said Monday he will conduct a thorough investigation, which could take weeks, before deciding whether to charge Wilbanks for falsely claiming she had been kidnapped. District Attorney Danny Porter said he has not yet interviewed Wilbanks.

He said Wilbanks could face a misdemeanor charge of false report of a crime or a felony charge of false statements. The misdemeanor carries a penalty of up to a year in jail; five years in prison is the maximum sentence for the felony.

"I've got to know all the facts before I know the appropriate charges," Porter said. "Now I've got to gather all the information from Duluth and Albuquerque and the FBI."

Porter said earlier Monday that authorities have evidence that Wilbanks' disappearance "was not just a spur-of-the-moment thing." He noted she had cut her hair and said there was evidence she bought the bus ticket ahead of time and secretly set some cash aside.

Wilbanks boarded a plane from New Mexico back to Georgia wearing a new FBI hat, blazer, polo shirt and pants and carrying a new tote bag and teddy bear, a gift from the aviation police chief. She flew first-class — thanks to tickets bought by her parents — and said she planned to name the bear "Al," for Albuquerque.

"Law enforcement is really making a major move to deal with people in crisis," Albuquerque Police Chief Ray Schulz said Sunday. "Miss Wilbanks was definitely a person in crisis."

Most nurses spend their entire careers in the same hospital. In the United States Air Force, it's unlikely you'll even spend it in the same state or country. You'll have the opportunity to practice nursing in as many as 20 different fields in a variety of nursing environments. And you'll feel a greater sense of shared responsibility when you have the opportunity to actually lead your team. Sound like the kind of career you'd like to have? Then call 1-800-588-5260.
AIRFORCE.COM/healthcare • 1-800-588-5260

WANT TO WRITE FOR NEWS???
OF COURSE YOU DO!
call:
413-545-1762
~ or e-mail ~
news@dailycollegian.com

$ Looking for a Job? $
The Daily Collegian
is seeking energetic and creative individuals to fill fall 2005 advertising executive positions.
Sound like you? Contact Kerry O'Grady @ 545-3500 for more information
This year, get yourself a job where you meet great people and gain great experience!

National News

Supreme Court considers military case

By Hope Yen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court said Monday it will consider whether colleges and universities may bar military recruiters from their campuses without fear of losing federal funds.

Justices will review a lower court ruling in favor of law schools that restricted recruiters to protest of the Pentagon's policy of excluding openly gay people from military service.

That ruling, by the Philadelphia-based 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, invalidated a 1994 federal law requiring law schools to give the military full access or lose their federal funding. The appeals court ruled the law infringed on law schools' free speech rights.

The Supreme Court will hear the case during its next term, which begins in October.

The law, known as the Solomon Amendment, has been controversial for law schools that have nondiscrimination policies barring any recruiter from campus if the organization unfairly bases hiring on race, gender or sexual orientation.

"The Solomon Amendment forces the law school to violate its own policy and actively support military recruiters who come onto campus to engage in the very discriminatory hiring practices that the law school condemns," wrote the coalition of 31 law schools, known as the Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights.

The Bush administration countered in court filings that equal access to campuses for recruiting is necessary to fill the military's legal ranks "in a time of war." It said the law does not violate free speech rights because schools are free to protest so long as they are willing to forgo federal research dollars, which amount to hundreds of millions at some schools.

"The Solomon Amendment reflects Congress' judgment that a crucial component of an effective military recruitment program is equal access to college and university campuses," Acting Solicitor General Paul Clement wrote.

A three-judge panel of the 3rd Circuit disagreed. It voted 2-1 to bar enforcement of the Solomon Amendment pending a full trial because of a "reasonable likelihood" the law would be found unconstitutional.

The 3rd Circuit cited a 2000 Supreme Court ruling that allowed the Boy Scouts to exclude gay scoutmasters. Just as the Scouts have a right to exclude gays based on a First Amendment right of expression, so too may law schools bar groups they consider discriminatory, the 3rd Circuit said.

The Bush administration's appeal has drawn the backing of Rep. Richard Pombo, R-Calif., some law students and the Mountain States Legal Foundation, who argued in a friend-of-the-court filing that the court should defer to Congress on this matter.

In February, the House passed a nonbinding resolution on a 327-84 vote that expressed support for the law, which also denies defense-related funding to universities that don't provide ROTC programs.

When the Solomon Amendment was passed in 1994, many law schools opted to give military recruiters limited access. Harvard allowed the military on campus but declined to volunteer its career placement staff to arrange interviews. The University of Southern California allowed recruiters to interview but didn't invite them to school-sponsored job fairs off campus.

After the Sept. 11 attacks, the Pentagon began strictly enforcing the measure, demanding full recruitment access to campuses and threatening to pull funding if schools didn't comply. In summer 2003, Congress amended the Solomon Amendment to require equal access.

Since then, law schools have grudgingly complied but also filed lawsuits challenging the law. Earlier this year, a U.S. district judge in Bridgeport, Conn., ruled Yale Law School had a right to bar military recruiters from its job interview program. Similar cases are pending elsewhere.

Arguments will be heard in the court's next term beginning in October.

Court nominees spur ad campaign

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A costly advertising war erupted Monday over President Bush's controversial court nominees, with opposing groups vowing to spend at least $1 million each over the next two weeks.

Responding swiftly to advertising from a group that supports Bush's nominees, People for the American Way said it would launch counter-commercials.

"We do not intend to let their ads go unanswered," said Ralph Neas. "We're working with the masters of deception and distraction that brought us the Swift Boat smears," he added in a reference to last year's campaign attacks on Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry.

Neas spoke less than an hour after Progress for America, which has strong Republican ties, unveiled a commercial designed to pressure wavering Republicans and help assure quick approval for Bush's judicial nominees.

Over the next two weeks, Progress For America Intends to spend $350,000 on "radio ads on Christian stations" and $1.5 million on television ads in six targeted states as well as nationally, according to one internal estimate.

"Senate Democrats have abused the rules and refused to even allow a vote," says the television ad. "So courtrooms sit empty, while thousands of Americans have their cases delayed."

The ad says It's the job of a senator to vote, adding: "Urge your senators to vote, up or down."

Neas, whose group has strong Democratic ties, said it would air its commercial in the same media markets. He said the group would spend more than $1 million over two weeks on television, radio and newspaper advertisements.

The ad criticizes the two nominees whom Progress for America defended in its own commercial, Priscilla Owen and Janice Rogers Brown.

"Too much power's a dangerous thing," it says, referring to Republican threats to ban judicial filibusters.

Questioned about his attempt to connect the current ad campaign with the attacks on Kerry, Neas cited the presence of Ben Ginsberg at a Progress for America news conference earlier in the day. Ginsberg, a lawyer, advised Swift Boat Veterans for the Truth, an organization that accused Kerry of inflating his Vietnam War record.

"The People for the American way are as skewed and misguided about this attack on Progress for America as they are about the Constitution," countered Stuart Roy, a consultant to PFA. "Judges deserve an up or down vote and Ralph deserves to say whatever he wants no matter how wrong or obtuse his screed may be."

The dueling ad campaigns dramatize the importance the two parties and their allies attach to a struggle that directly impacts the fate of seven appeals court nominees — and also has implications for any Supreme Court vacancy that occurs during Bush's term.

Democrats blocked 10 of Bush's first-term appeals court nominees by filibuster, a parliamentary tactic that requires supporters to post 60 votes to advance to a final vote.

Fla. imposes tougher child sex abuse laws

By David Royse
Associated Press

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Spurred by the killing of a 9-year-old girl, Gov. Jeb Bush on Monday signed a law imposing tougher penalties on child molesters and requiring many of those released from prison to wear satellite tracking devices for the rest of their lives.

The measure gives Florida one of the toughest child-sex laws in the nation.

The Jessica Lunsford Act was quickly drafted after Jessica's death was discovered in March and was pushed through by lawmakers outraged that the man accused of killing her was a registered sex offender. It passed both the Senate and House unanimously.

It establishes a mandatory sentence of 25 years to life behind bars for people convicted of certain sex crimes against children 11 and younger, with lifetime tracking by global positioning satellite after they are freed.

Until the new law goes into effect Sept. 1, molesting a child under 12 is punishable in most cases by up to 30 years in prison.

Bush was joined by Jessica's father, Mark Lunsford, who wore a tie bearing pictures of his daughter and said he had been working so furiously on the legislation that he has not yet really grieved.

"I'm still lost, I haven't really dealt with it yet," Lunsford said. He called the tie his "hug" from Jessica. "I'm still minus my kiss, but that's my hug."

John E. Couey, a convicted sex offender who was living near Jessica, was arrested in Georgia and was charged with snatching her from her bedroom and murdering her.

The bill's momentum in the Legislature increased in April after another Florida girl, 13-year-old Sarah Lunde, was found dead and another registered sex offender was charged with murdering her.

The 23-year minimum would not apply to anyone convicted of molesting older children. Those offenders would have to be monitored electronically only during their probation, not for life.

Some offenders already on the street could be ordered back to jail or be placed under GPS monitoring if they violated their probation.

Lots of other states have minimum mandatory sentences for sex crimes against children. A number of states already require some form of lifetime supervision of sex offenders, including GPS tracking, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.

However, Florida's new law may be the first requirement of lifetime GPS monitoring for an entire group of people who commit a certain crime, the NCSL said.

Florida's new law could also open the door to the death penalty for more killers, because it allows a defendant's status as a sexual predator to be considered as an aggravating factor during sentencing for a murder.

Sarah Lunde's mother and sister also were at the governor's side as he signed the bill.

"I'm just glad something's being done," said Sarah's sister, Rebekah Lunde. "Maybe no one else will have to go through this."

Let your voice be heard
Call 413 545 1762
or e mail news@dailycollegian.com

MENU FEATURES:
St.Louis style ribs
BBQ chicken
Lo-mein (vegetarian)
Vegan bbq riblet
Caesar salad
Tri color pasta salad
Fresh fruit
Brownies & Italian ice

4:30–8:00pm
Wednesday,
May 4, 2005

Top of horsehoe
in Southwest

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

International News

U.N. asks U.S. to reduce its arsenal

By Charles J. Hanley
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Secretary-General Kofi Annan challenged the United States and Russia on Monday to slash their nuclear arsenals irreversibly to just hundreds of warheads, and urged nonweapons states like Iran to give up potential bomb technology in return for international guarantees of nuclear fuel.

The U.N. atomic energy chief followed with an offer to begin work on a system of international fuel supplies.

The two spoke at the opening of a monthlong conference to review the workings of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. The session comes at a time of mounting nuclear tensions over North Korea's withdrawal from the 189-nation pact and Iran's program to enrich uranium, a possible step toward a bomb.

"Developments of many kinds in recent years have placed it under great stress," Annan said of the treaty.

The United States wants the review conference to focus heavily on North Korea, Iran and the nuclear fuel issue. But many states without nuclear arms want equal emphasis on what they see as a softening commitment by the big powers to nuclear disarmament.

Because of the differing priorities, treaty members were unable to agree on a complete agenda for the conference. Organizers hope to have agreement before the nuts-and-bolts work of committees begins next week.

Under the 35-year-old NPT, states without nuclear arms pledge not to pursue them, in exchange for a commitment by five nuclear powers — the United States, Russia, Britain, France and China — to move toward nuclear disarmament. Three other nuclear states — Israel, India and Pakistan — remain outside the treaty.

Italian investigators critical of attack

By Aidan Lewis
Associated Press

COURTESY MSNBC.COM

U.S. military personnel are seen near a car said to be that in which an Italian journalist Giuliana Sgrena was traveling with slain Italian agent Nicola Calipari.

ROME — Italian investigators blamed U.S. military authorities for failing to signal there was a checkpoint ahead on the Baghdad road where American soldiers killed an Italian agent, and concluded that stress, inexperience and fatigue played a role in the shooting, according to a report released Monday.

The probe found no evidence that the March 4 killing of intelligence agent Nicola Calipari was deliberate.

The Italians challenged the American contentions that the car was traveling more than 50 mph, saying it was going half that speed. But, despite their refusal to sign off on the U.S. report that the soldiers bore no blame for the death, the Italian investigators didn't object to many of the American findings of fact.

Calipari was killed just after he secured the release of Italian journalist Giuliana Sgrena from Iraqi militants who held her hostage for a month. U.S. soldiers fired on the Italians' vehicle as it approached the checkpoint near Baghdad's airport. Sgrena and another Italian agent were wounded.

"It is likely that the state of tension stemming from the conditions of time, circumstances and place, as well as possibly some degree of inexperience and stress might have led some soldiers to instinctive and little-controlled reactions," said Italy's report.

U.S. investigators, in their report made public Saturday, said the American soldiers gave adequate warning, beaming a light and firing warning shots, as the car traveled toward Baghdad's airport. They cleared the U.S. soldiers of any wrongdoing, sparking outrage in Italy, where Calipari had been hailed as a hero.

The Italian report, written by two experts who had participated in the joint probe, said no measures were taken by U.S. officials to preserve the scene of the shooting. It said the car carrying Sgrena and the agents was removed before its position was marked, for example. The soldiers' vehicles also were moved.

"That made it impossible to technically reconstruct the event, to determine the exact position of the vehicles and measure the distances, and to obtain precise data defining the precise trajectory of the bullets, the speed of the car and the stopping distance," the report said.

Italy and the United States have publicly differed over crucial points about the incident since the first hours after the shooting.

When several days of negotiations failed to yield a common report, both sides went their own way.

Italy is a main partner in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq. The approximately 3,000 Italian soldiers sent to Iraq for reconstruction constitute one of the coalition's largest contingents.

But Premier Silvio Berlusconi, a staunch American ally, has faced political fallout over the case, including calls to bring home Italy's troops from Iraq.

There was no immediate comment from the Italian government on the report.

Berlusconi is scheduled to address both houses of parliament on the case Thursday.

The U.S. report contained many blacked-out portions, including the names of the soldiers at the checkpoint and their units. But due to an apparent error, what was blacked out in the report could be read on the Web site of the Italian newspaper La Repubblica.

Defense Ministry is shaky in Iraq

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Iraq's incoming prime minister struggled to find a Sunni Arab to run the key Defense Ministry in time to join Iraq's first democratically elected government when it takes office Tuesday. A torrent of bloodshed — at least 140 killed in five days — followed the approval of a Cabinet that mostly shut out members of the disaffected Sunni minority.

Disputes persisted over the Defense Ministry on Monday after Prime Minister-designate Ibrahim al-Jaafari filled six of the seven Cabinet seats left undecided last week, said al-Jaafari aide Laith Kuba. The defense portfolio — in charge of some 70,000 soldiers and national guardsmen — is destined for a Sunni, part of an attempt to balance the conflicting demands of Iraq's many religious and ethnic factions.

At least 23 Iraqis were killed Monday, including eight soldiers cut down by a suicide attacker who blew up a truck at a checkpoint south of the capital, and six civilians caught in a car bombing that set fire to a Baghdad apartment building. A British soldier was also killed by a roadside bomb in the southern city of Amarah.

In New York, U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan issued a statement strongly condemning the "cruel and heartless" violence apparently aimed at undermining Iraq's newly formed government.

The skyrocketing attacks are blamed on an insurgency believed largely made up of members of Iraq's Sunni minority who dominated for decades under Saddam Hussein but were excluded from meaningful positions in a partial new Cabinet announced Thursday.

Al-Jaafari had promised to form a government that would win over Sunni moderates and reduce Sunni support for the insurgency. He offered them six ministries and a deputy premiership, but only four ministers have been approved so far by the National Assembly.

His initial choice for defense minister, the most important ministry destined for a Sunni, Saadon al-Dulaimi, was rejected by members of his Shiite-dominated alliance because of suspected ties to Saddam's Baath Party, which brutally repressed the majority Shiites and Kurds. Since then, rival Sunni factions have submitted a number of candidates for the job. Three Sunni lawmakers quit al-Jaafari's alliance, complaining he should look within his own coalition first to fill Cabinet posts.

Al-Jaafari wants to have all positions finalized before the new government is sworn in Tuesday, Kuba said. He declined to identify those already selected before they are presented to the interim National Assembly for approval.

Assuming there are no last-minute objections, the candidates must still be approved by President Jalal Talabani and his two vice presidents and then submitted to the assembly. The swearing-in of the new government will likely go ahead even if there are still vacancies in the Cabinet.

Blast kills at least 28 in Afghanistan

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — A warlord's secret arms cache exploded in a remote Afghan village Monday, flattening nearby houses and a mosque and killing at least 28 people in what appeared to be the deadliest accident of its kind since the ouster of the Taliban regime.

The blast highlighted the dangers in a country awash with weapons amassed during a quarter-century of fighting, first against occupying Soviet troops, then among Afghan factions and now in the insurgency that followed the ouster of the Taliban in late 2001 by a U.S.-led coalition.

Afghan and U.N. officials are trying to disarm militias, but face an immense task in a nation where warlords still command local loyalties and remain wary of each other and the U.S.-backed central government.

The weapons and ammunition that exploded were in a bunker under a warlord's house in Bashgah, a farming hamlet in the mountains of Baghlan province, 75 miles north of the capital, Kabul, authorities said. They said it was unclear what set off the explosion about 6 a.m.

An Interior Ministry spokesman, Latfullah Mashal, said the cache was hidden by Jalal Bashgah, a former commander of a militia brigade, apparently to conceal it from the U.N. disarmament program.

The provincial police chief, Gen. Fazeluddin Ayar, said Bashgah's house was among a half dozen flattened along with the mosque and that eight of the commander's relatives were killed or injured. Bashgah was not at home at the time, Ayar told The Associated Press.

Initial accounts reported the blast also injured more than 70 people, but Ayar said officers sent to the village in a mountain valley found only 13 were hurt.

Before the accident, the most deadly reported incident with arms involved the U.S. military, which lost eight soldiers in January 2004 when arms they were preparing to blow up exploded prematurely.

Mohammed Yusuf Faiez, director of the province's only hospital, in Pul-e-Khumri, said 11 of those injured Monday — six men and five women — were admitted for treatment, two of them in serious condition.

He said they told of being blown off their feet as they walked home from morning prayer — apparently at the mosque next to the commander's house.

"One man told me there was a huge explosion and then all he can remember is the thick smoke," Faiez told AP by telephone from Pul-e-Khumri, the provincial capital.

Ayar said the cache included explosives and rockets from "a long time ago." He said Bashgah had given up only a portion of his militia's weapons to the United Nations, which has so far demobilized more than 50,000 former fighters.

That program as well as the disposal activities of U.S. and NATO troops, who report the discovery of weapons caches almost daily, have collected thousands of tons of weapons, many left over from the resistance against occupying Soviet forces during the 1980s.

But Peter Babbington, head of the U.N. program, said there are still "many, many thousands of tons" scattered across Afghanistan.

There are sure to be more accidents, he said.

"These guys think they can store it forever and that it'll be as good as the day it came off the production line, but it isn't. It deteriorates and it becomes volatile," Babbington said. "We're surveying the known sites, but new sites come up every day."

Collection efforts are currently focused on northern Afghanistan, but in cities such as Mazar-e-Sharif and Herat rather than the remote valleys of Baghlan, he said.

Accidents with land mines and other old explosives have afflicted a stream of Afghans, including children who lose arms and legs while playing on roadsides or farmers simply working their land. Poor Afghans are frequently killed trying to recycle gunpowder from rockets to use in quarrying.

Foreign troops also worry that hidden weapons will fall into the hands of the insurgents who have been active since the Taliban's fall.

Bring these back and get pennies on the dollar.

Bring these back and get $250 in discounts on travel, DVD movies, software, and more!

Here's all you need to do:

> Return your Comcast cable box, remote, and/or Comcast-provided modem to your local Comcast Payment Center (visit www.comcast.com to find the Payment Center near you).

> Go to www.comcast-ne.com/students and register for your $250 rewards card.

> When you receive your rewards card via mail, you'll have exclusive access to a website marketplace with tons of deals, including travel, DVD movies, magazines, software, and more! It's that simple!

Comcast.

KISS A SENIOR Goodbye

Send your favorite Seniors a
UMass Amherst Champagne Glass
full of Hershey Kisses to celebrate graduation!

Only $6.00 per glass

Available online until May 6, 2005 at www.UMassAlumni.com/students
or at the
Student Alumni Association Table on the Campus Center
Concourse Tuesday, April 19 - Wednesday, May 11

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

Tuesday, May 3, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Is UMass a 'liberal' school?

Mike Sances

Since I started going to school here, I've been listening with some curiosity to the perennial criticisms of the University as a bastion of liberalism, sometimes with a big 'L' for extra emphasis. Universities in the United States, so the story goes, are overflowing with liberals, and UMass — despite the best efforts of our conservative governor — is of course no exception.

Why this so enrages some people, I'm still not quite sure. Not satisfied with conservatives running all three branches of the federal government, eh?

But more perplexing is the amount of time, energy, and emotion devoted to the assault on big-'L' Liberalism in the absence of a working definition for the key term. Perhaps I can be of some assistance, as I am about to finish my third year here and have had ample opportunity to interact with the infamous liberal UMass professors.

One way to spot a liberal is by their frequent and at times vocal criticism of the president, but this won't do as a complete definition, for it would encompass far too many free-thinking conservative pundits — and conservative pundits cannot, by definition, be liberals.

It is widely acknowledged among academics, and has been for some time, that the United States simply can do wrong in the world.

More specifically, then, liberal UMass professors will criticize the president's foreign policy. In the past few years, this has meant criticism of the Iraq War and the Global War on Terrorism.

Since this definition would also include many Republicans, further revision is needed. For example, what sort of criticisms do liberal UMass professors make of these ventures? This is the surest way to spot a liberal.

On closer examination, we find that the liberal UMass professors criticize the president's foreign policy on very particular grounds. Thus we as students are subject to such treasonous utterances as:

"The war in Iraq has hurt America's prestige and credibility in the world, and diverted attention away from further military action in Afghanistan."

"The president should have secured Security Council approval for the war."

"Spreading democracy in the Middle East, while a noble vision, is far too ambitious to succeed."

Save as a minor point under the heading of bad publicity, they do not say that the Iraq war was wrong because of the tens of thousands of dead. They do not acknowledge that the number of children starving in Iraq has doubled since the invasion began. They fail to recall that the President opposed the celebrated January 30 elections. They do not dispute that the president wishes to spread democracy throughout the world, or that he truly cares about combating terrorism. They appear to imply that, if Iraq suddenly became paradise tomorrow, there would be nothing to complain about.

They have nothing bad to say about the prewar sanctions, whose toll on Iraq's children you can read about from UNICEF, or the Gulf War, which was justified on grounds about as shaky as the one in 2003. They shamefully did not object to the use of force in Afghanistan in 2001, even though there was even less evidence that the 9/11 plot had been hatched there, than there was that Hussein had illicit weapons.

Crucially, they do not question the premise that the United States has the right to invade or intervene in any country it wants to, pretext or no. The allegedly controversial Bush Doctrine, for example, is criticized from a solely public relations standpoint.

It is widely acknowledged among academics, and has been for some time, that the United States simply can do no wrong in the world. The most extreme criticism you will encounter is that we have sometimes been misguided. In discussions on the Cold War, the gruesome litany of atrocities and massacres visited upon Latin America by American-sponsored regimes and paramilitary forces is, if conceded to have taken place at all, invariably excused as a necessary evil in the purported fight against communism. Again, questioning the cold war pretext or the assumed right to intervene in other countries is literally unthinkable.

Despite the charges of radicalism, it is a sad fact that the mindset of liberal UMass professors is indeed representative of the country at large, where the real split is not between Republican and Democrat, but between denial and justification. Thus, on the right, we have those who deny that, to take a recent example, the CIA is shipping dozens of prisoners to Uzbekistan, where torture is systematic, and where the resident dictator is known to boil his political opponents alive and to then subsequently sentence the victim's mother to six years of hard labor for daring to complain (as was calmly reported in the liberal New York Times Sunday).

On the left, they do not deny it, but they will provide the necessary "apology." Personally I'm still trying to decide which is more morally repugnant.

In the meantime, I am inclined to agree with those calling for an expulsion of liberals from the nation's schools. Purging the UMass campus of its liberals would be a most worthy endeavor, and would much improve the moral character of this campus, not to mention society at large. But, please: take those angry conservatives with you.

Mike Sances is a Collegian columnist.

Why nuclear weapons are necessary for our protection

Zach Oelschlegel

Every Sunday, I drive down the town common past the Amherst Vigil for Peace and Justice. They're there standing at the light across from Bank of America every weekend, from noon until 1 p.m. holding rainbow colored flags, and passing out fliers to cars with an update on what's been going wrong in the Middle East.

On the back of these fliers is an explanation of the group's maxim: "The vigil continues to advocate for an end to the arms trade, for an end to nuclear weapons at home and abroad, and for social justice around the world." It sounds preachy when you read it.

The problem is, advocating for the abolition of nuclear weapons around the world isn't only completely unrealistic, but also fails to see how nuclear weapons have been a blessing, and how they probably have saved more lives than they've taken.

'Winning' a nuclear war means you wipe out 50 million people from the other country, while they were only able to kill 10 million of your own. It's just not worth it.

Nuclear weapons are unusable. Everyone knows the destruction that occurred to Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945, and that was with an atom bomb, something puny in comparison to the hydrogen bomb developed a few years later. We also all know how the United States and the Soviet Union together had enough nuclear weapons to obliterate the earth multiple times over. The phrase that describes why our earth was never blown to smithereens is "mutually assured destruction."

If one of the countries set off a nuclear warhead, retaliation was more than planned for. The U.S. named this sequence in 1948 "Halfmoon," where 30 atomic bombs would be dropped on 20 Russian cities. As the American nuclear capability increased, the numbers of nuclear weapons planned for a possible strike soon increased to 3,000, including hydrogen bombs, to be dropped on 1,000 Soviet targets. Knowing that much firepower is pointed your way in the case of conflict is enough to stop just about anybody.

The reason the two countries continued to build more and more warheads was to have a second strike capability. Both countries had considerable spy networks, and had some idea of where missiles were located. The term "second strike capability" refers to having enough nuclear weapons to shoot back at the enemy if he used the first strike to destroy as many of your weapons as he could. This is why we could annihilate the world many times over, and why we had submarines dedicated to sitting under the ice caps to come out at the right moment to shoot off a ballistic missile, and then go back under. It made the nuclear deterrent even bigger, knowing you could try as hard as you could to destroy all of your enemy's nuclear weapons and still not come close, leaving him with plenty to fire back.

It's like having a gun. It's been proven the cities with the highest amount of gun control also have higher crime rates than those with less gun control. It's a deterrent for a crook to rub someone when he knows his life could be at stake. Having more guns results in less petty crime. It's comparable to nuclear weapons, and how having them has prevented more small-scale wars from becoming worse.

Consider the Vietnam or Korean wars. Both of those wars were essentially impossible to win for the United States, because taking large offensives would end up in a more general war with China. If the American forces escalated their offensives too much, the other major powers would join the war.

The same is true for the Cuban Missile Crisis. We read about this in our textbooks and watch on the History Channel how close the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. were to a nuclear war, but it was just a case of the two countries toeing the line as far as they could.

Nuclear weapons force countries to make concessions, or to compromise, or back down because the other option is unthinkable. "Winning" a nuclear war means you wiped out 50 million people from the other country, while they were only able to kill 10 million of your own. It's just not worth it.

Ironically, the same thing nuclear protesters want, which are more global problems settled diplomatically, is what is achieved through having so many nuclear weapons in the first place. It forces both sides to sit down at the table, because anything else would mean destruction.

Moreover, to think nuclear weapons could be abolished is a ridiculous idea. Someone would have them, somehow, stowed away in secret. Ridding the world of nuclear weapons would be nearly impossible to enforce. If only one or two countries were left having nuclear weapons, the deterrent to using them would all but disappear. Having so few countries with nukes would make the weapons the polar opposite of what we want: completely usable. That, in itself, is a scary enough proposition.

Zach Oelschlegel is a Collegian columnist.

The things that I'll miss

Yousef Munayyer

In my senior year of high school I walked into my guidance counselor's office with five completed applications for universities. My counselor had recommended that I choose one more school, one more application, because the counseling office recommended at least six schools to be on the safe side. He pointed me in the direction of a drawer which had many random applications in it. Since I was fairly sure of where I wanted to go I carelessly grabbed the first application I saw in the drawer. That was the application for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

Since then, everything has been done my way. And much like the Frank Sinatra song I have a few regrets but, then again, too few to mention. Now, with under a month left before I don a cap and gown I look back at the past four years and look forward to the future.

Though I am ready to leave, and I know many of you aren't, there are certainly things I will miss about this place. I know that years from now I will look back on this experience and reminisce about the years I spent studying at the University. Since I entered as a freshman, I was able to do a lot and if I could do it again I would do more of everything I did.

I am going to miss having to go to class. To some this seems like lunacy, but in reality it's much better than having to go to work. Here your main obligation is learning. The deadlines you have to meet are for yourself not for some middle-management coffee guzzler in the office upstairs. This is an experience that benefits you. I am definitely going to miss professors, especially the first week of a semester when you meet them all. It is in that week that you get used to how weird some of them really are.

You can't forget the good times at sports games here at UMass. I will definitely miss seeing this level of competition. Though professional sports offer players with more talent, it is here, at the college level, where you see players with heart. This is what makes the games worth watching. I am going to miss being able to see great hockey games by just waving my UCard. I'm going to miss watching one of the best lacrosse teams in the country, year in and year out, win gut wrenching games because they play as a team. I am going to miss heckling players and refs till they go home crying at night.

I have had a great experience with just about everyone here from the PhDs to the custodian that I play ping-pong with.

I hope you're sitting down. I am going to miss dressing up like a gigantic slice of pizza on the Mullins center ice. That's right; for the past three years this ultra-serious political columnist's secret identity was none other than Mr. Slice. Move over Clark Kent it's my time now.

I am going to miss being around so many people in my age group. The real world is so different. Here everyone, well ok a lot of people, are between the ages of 18-24. In the real world I'm never going to be surrounded with so many people who have the same goals and interests that I do.

I am certainly going to miss the people I have met here. My friends, who have proven to be great people, were always there to laugh with. Professors and faculty who have influenced me will certainly be missed. I have had a great experience with just about everyone here from the PhDs to the custodian that I play ping-pong with.

There are also some things that I will definitely not miss. I will not feel bad leaving rural Massachusetts. I will not miss the smell of bison in Hadley. I will not miss the Student Government (sorry guys, but I really won't). I will not miss the administration which values presentation over education and finds it acceptable to have flat screen TVs in the dinning halls over an escort service available to students walking alone at night. I am certainly not going to miss ignorant people, who refuse to think outside their cave, who are wasting their time and other people's money at this University. If you spend four years here and still have the same conclusions about everything you did when you came in, you may receive a diploma, but you have failed to open your mind.

I suppose in closing this is an admonition to everyone who is still here and will be here for a while. Make the most of your time here. I finished with two majors, a minor and a Five-College certification. If I could do it again I would try for more. See what is out there, meet new people, try new things, learn and leave your mark. Failures are those who get a diploma after four years but are immediately and easily forgotten.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian columnist.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

FLAWS FOUND IN RIGHT WINGER ARTICLE

I'm an alumnus of UMass-Amherst (PhD. 1987), and currently an Associate Professor of Anthropology at the University of Denver. In the April 29 issue, the "No Freedom for Right Wingers" column contained two key factual errors. First, Dick Lamm doesn't teach in the Colorado public university system. He teaches here, at the University of Denver, which is a private institution.

Secondly, Governor Lamm didn't seek to publish his essay in our campus faculty publication. Rather, he sought to publish it in "The Source," which is an all-campus newsletter reporting campus activities, events, and soft, "feel good" news. "The Source" doesn't publish, and it's not the appropriate place for publishing, substantive essays on social issues (controversial or otherwise).

Thus, there's no controversy here, and certainly no infringement of Governor Lamm's academic freedom. There's no left-wing faculty hypocrisy afoot and, indeed, comparing anything in this episode to the Ward Churchill affair is absurd. The re's nothing going on that contradicts the DU faculty's position on Academic Values, Rights, and Responsibilities. Our Faculty Senate is currently working with Governor Lamm to find a suitable on-campus publication outlet for his essay, which will be accompanied by essays expressing opposing views. This is how healthy intellectual debate within a community of scholars should work.

Dean J. Saitta
UMass alumnus

Interested in writing for EdOp?

Send submissions to editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

SPRING CONCERT ROCKS THE MULLINS

FABOLOUS

By REID DAVENPORT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sunday, the Mullins Center played host to the annual Spring Concert. The event, sponsored by the University Productions and Concerts, WMUA, SGA and the Student Activities Center, featured Battle of the Bands winner Stay Behind, rapper Fabolous, hip-hop artist Nas and Boston's own Dropkick Murphys.

As Stay Behind prepared to perform, the seats and the floor area were still filling up. The local band won the honor of opening the Spring Concert by winning the April 8 Battle of the Bands.

While their set was short, they managed to entice the crowd to create a concert atmosphere. They featured one song, "365 Reasons," which they dedicated for anyone in the audience who has been hurt by someone else. For an unknown band, they managed to warm up the crowd fairly well.

During a brief break in the action, the UMass Dancers performed as DJ Hazard, who kept the music going during breaks, assisted with the music. The crowd started to roar with anticipation as the lights dimmed again. Fabolous and company took the stage.

DJ 45 set-up and got the crowd warmed up as Fabolous' crew took the stage. Fabolous walked out as the audience pushed to the front of the floor and those in the seats stood up. He then proceeded to prove that he was an excellent choice for the opening act.

Fabolous' set included hits like "Breathe," "Tit4tat," "Don't Stop, Won't Stop," and "Keepin' it Gangsta." The crowd was very into the performance as most of the audience seemed to know the words to nearly every song. The floor turned into a sea of hands waving to the music as the people in the seats stood up and bounced to the music.

Fabolous and crew finished their set with "It's My Party" and a strong performance of the hit song "Never Leave You (Uh Oh)." Fabolous finished strong and thanked the crowd, his crew, DJ 45 and [illegible] his new album, "Real Talk," in stores [illegible].

The lights came up for a short break and [illegible] to take the high energy out of the audience. Those who decided to go for a bathroom break missed out on plenty of very good break dancing going [illegible] once again, [illegible] by DJ Hazard. The crowd's energy was [illegible] up to [illegible] they cheered on the [illegible]

'Spring Concert'
Sunday May 1
Mullins center

being the headliner portion of the night. He talked to the crowd, got them to feel his music and played as many familiar hits as he could. He finished in saying that there have been many losses in the rap industry and proceeded to sing "One Mic" in dedication to his fallen fellow artists. During On the song, thousands held up their lit-up cell phones to create an ocean of blue throughout the Mullins Center. Nas thanked the crowd one last time as he left the stage.

In a rather shocking turn of events, a sizeable portion of the crowd left after Nas' performance. However, it did not affect the energy of the large group the stayed to see the Dropkick Murphys perform. Chants of "Lets Go Murphys!" broke out as the stage was being prepared. The lights went out and a Celtic ballad began to play. As the soothing sounds of the ballad came to an end, the lights came up on the stage and the Dropkick Murphys jumped right into their first song.

They played the hits "Boys on the Dock," "Barroom Hero," and got the crowd really going when they played their hit single "Tessie." Throughout the performance the crowd's energy was at its peak as the members of the crowd moshed, sang along and crowd surfed. People were screaming, dancing, pushing, shouting, surfing, and enjoying every moment.

Dropkick got the crowd to calm down a bit as they sang the song "Fields of Anthry" in memory of a Weymouth soldier whom requested this song be played by Dropkick if he did not return home. They went as far as to play it at the young man's funeral. The crowd held lighters in the air as Dropkick played the song dedicated to a fallen soldier.

Dropkick proceeded to pull a young male from the crowd, who claimed he knew all the words for "Barroom Hero." It would be up to the audience to vote if he did well enough to hang out with the band after the show or if they should beat the hell out of him. The young man showed no fear as he went right into the song, leaped around stage, and got a loud roar from the crowd as he finished, but he may not have liked the voting process as the crowd roared for both options.

"So what you're saying is he did a good job, but we're going to kill him anyways?" lead singer Al Barr asked the audience to a roaring response.

"You guys are sick bastards!" replied bassist Ken Casey to the response.

The band continued as the security allowed [illegible] members of the audience to come on stage [illegible] and sing with the band. The set, a finale [illegible] consisted of the four songs [illegible]

ANDREW TAMURA/COLLEGIAN

What happened to dating?: A guide for braving the system

MeiMei Thai

Heaps of college students are dancing in the dimly lit back room of the Monkey Bar in downtown Amherst on a nippy Thursday night in late March. It is the first night out after spring break, so everyone's out to party, drink and get down and dirty. Hip-hop, reggae, and reggaeton music blares from speakers. Ladies and gentlemen squeeze past each other to get to and from the bar. It's nearly impossible not to bump into anybody. Tonight is the night to get crazy. Is this the typical singles scene for college students?

Dating was a shy process in high school. If I liked a boy, I'd tell my friend to tell him, or not say anything at all. Others would write notes telling one another that they liked each other. If it worked out, they'd hang out, get to know each other and go to the movies. That's how it usually went down. As for high school, depending on how "experienced" you are in dating, it may be more straight forward and less awkward.

However, at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst, that changes. Many students seem to have different opinions, yet very similar views in college dating.

Before attending the university, I, myself, thought I would find my potential boyfriend here. Boy, was I wrong!

College.

You'd think people would want to meet their loved ones and settle down. But it looks like they just want to "explore" before they're actually ready to commit seriously. Basically, dating at UMass is lacking. People just want to have fun. It's more about hooking up and having sex. Guys are trying to be smooth. Few want a relationship, and most of the time, guys just want to "do the damn thing." On the other hand, ladies are more low-key. It may seem like they want a serious relationship, but there are females out there who just want the same thing guys do: sex without the commitment.

"Most students don't want to get into relationships because they want something casual and quick," UMass senior Javier Cruz says. "Plus, they're busy with classes and other activities. They don't want to be tied down with their four years here."

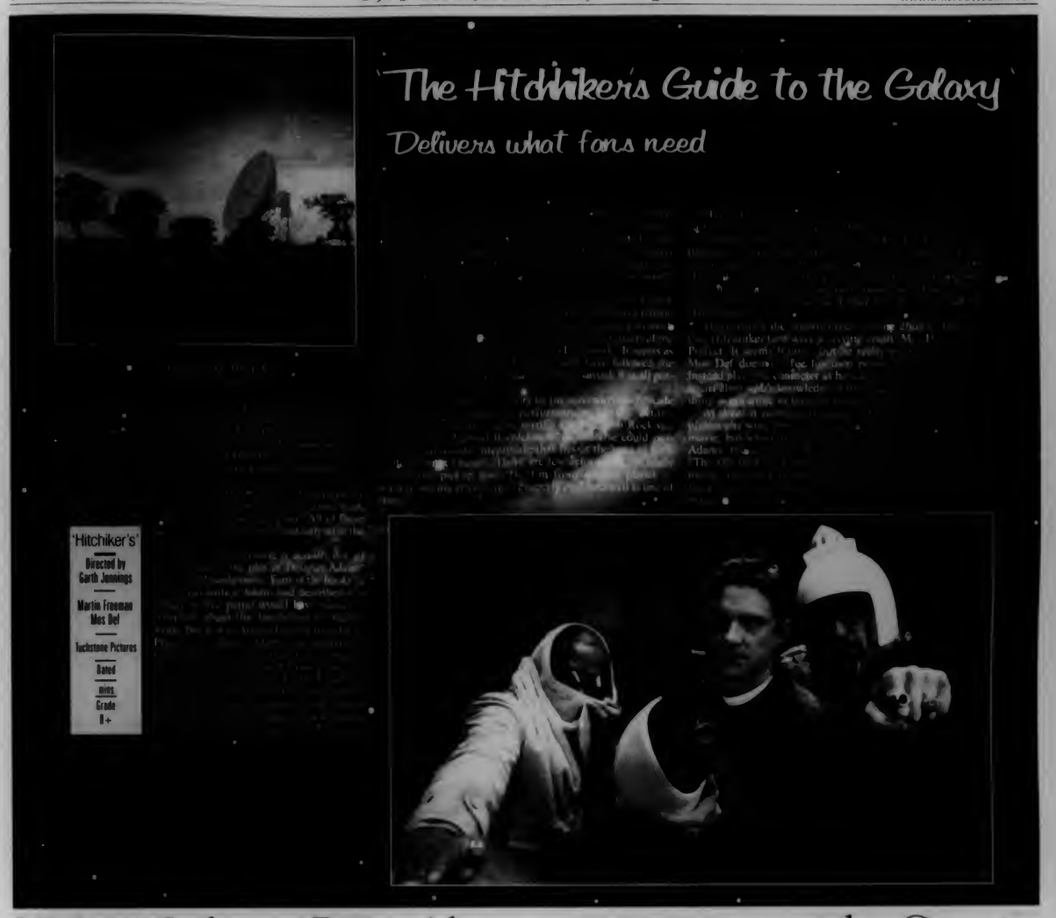
"Students, at the moment, like hooking up with no strings attached," Cruz continues. "They want friends with benefits, but it's hard to find that. If a guy or girl ends up falling in love, it's no longer friends with benefits because of the emotional attachment. No one likes to be used. Nobody wants to be anybody's doormat."

Cruz isn't the only one who thinks this way.

"Students aren't getting into relationships because they just want sex," senior Mihyun Kim says bluntly, laughing. "I don't think I want anyone from UMass because I never really met a smart person who plans [his] future. They're not good enough."

Even though Kim hasn't found anybody she could see herself with, she's still keeping her eyes open.

As for UMass junior Raj Paul, he had one serious relationship in high school when he was in India. But now that he's here, it's different.



"I'm not really looking to date,"

See DATE on page 8

COURTESY HAMPSTEAD.NET

Bars and pubs seem to be the ultimate meeting ground for college students these days. Though the average student is not looking for love, most keep their options open while out for a night.

UMass' 'Life is a Dream' brings imagination to the Curtain

By JARED DEMICK
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Imprisoned princes in cavemen attire, a vengeful woman disguised as a man, a fool that liked to sit on audience members' laps, a chorus that tangoed on a bare, incandescent stage. What is immediately striking about the UMass Theater Department's production of "Life is a Dream" was the way in which it patched incongruous elements together to recreate the bizarre yet captivating logic of dreams. During a brief but fascinating 90 minutes on stage, the line between reality and fantasy blurred.

'Life is a Dream'
Through May 7
Curtain Theater
FAC

In theater, there is a constantly raging debate over how faithful a director should be to a script. One extreme believes that directors should follow the specifications of a script and have the action on stage accurately reflect it. At the other end you have those who maintain that a script is merely a platform upon which the director launches their own vision. In this production of Pedro Calderon's "Life is a Dream," the director Kara-Lynn Vaeni definitely subscribed to the principles of the latter and ended up making some very audacious decisions.

"Life is a Dream" was written during the Golden Age of Spain, a commercial and artistic renaissance that took place in the 16th and early 17th centuries. The play seriously addresses the nature of reality and the meaning of dreams in our lives. In a way, it predates Freudian psychology and the Spanish surrealism of Dali, Bunuel, and Lorca with its recognition of the mysterious truths that might lie in dreams.

The play is essentially the story of a Polish prince named Segismundo. Segismundo has spent most of his life locked in a tower because his father received a prophesy (a form of a dream?) that his son would grow up to become a cruel tyrant. Many years later, the King in his old age grows remorseful of his decision to imprison his own son and before he chooses his successor, he conducts an experiment. He decides to let Segismundo free and observes his son while he is being treated as royalty for the first time in his life.

As prophesized, Segismundo becomes callous and vindictive. So with great remorse, the King sends Segismundo back to the tower and he appoints his nephew, Astolfo, and his niece, Estrella, as his successors. Meanwhile at the tower, Segismundo is brainwashed by his keeper, Clotaldo, into thinking that his brief stint as a ruler was merely a dream. However word gets out among the peasants that the rightful heir to the throne is being imprisoned. So a revolt tears the nation apart and Segismundo is freed so he can spearhead the rebel army.

After a bloody battle, Segismundo's forces overtake the king's and he gains full control of Poland. At first everyone expects him to once again be callous and cruel, but he surprises all by being fair and just. For in prison, he learned the lesson that whether in our lives or in our dreams, we should strive to do the right.

The most impressive thing about the production was the translation of the play which was a collaboration between UMass professor Harley Erdman and graduate student Lauryn Sasso. When translating older texts, especially dramas, many English translators choose to use archaic Elizabethan phrasing, a phrasing that is not present in the original language. Thankfully, Erdman and Sasso avoided this pratfall and kept the play's poetic

See PLAY on page 8

"Life is a Dream" a play by Pedro Calderon de la Barca runs through May 7th. Above is a picture published on the cover of the book.

BURNING MAN
BEYOND BLACK ROCK
Take an Unprecedented Journey Behind the Scenes of a Worldwide Cultural Phenomenon in BURNING MAN: BEYOND BLACK ROCK.
The latest from Gone Off Deep Productions
May 5th at 9:00pm and 11:15 pm
Tickets are $7.00 and proceeds will benefit the local Burning Man chapter
Call 533-FILM for information or tickets.
Come meet local Burners! View art and photographs from years past!
South Hadley's Tower Theaters
533-FILM
www.towertheaters.com

CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS
Sell us your textbooks, whether purchased here or not Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.
JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
253-3870
Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst

STUDENTTRAVEL
Cheap Student Airfare
London $313
Paris $368
Rome $443
Amsterdam $375
Frankfurt $375
Lima, Peru $501
Tokyo $703
Bangkok $937
"The world is a book, and those who do not travel, read only a page." Saint Augustine 354 A.D.
We've Got EVERYTHING You Need for Summer Travel!
Europe Rail Passes
Eurailpass $382
Britrail Flexipass $199
France & Spain Pass $199
Greece & Italy Pass $200
Inca Journey
A great adventure combining Andean culture, the most famous Incan ruin and the lush Amazon Rainforest
9 days from $875
Northern Thailand
Experience the River Kwai, rice barge, Chiang Mai, elephant ride, hilltribe trek and the Golden Triangle
15 days from $585
South African Nomad
Travel along the southern coast of Africa and continue inland through tropical rainforest to the impressive Victoria Falls.
20 days from $995
Airfare is roundtrip from Boston. Featured packages do not include airfare. Subject to change and availability. Taxes and other applicable fees not included.
STA TRAVEL
www.statravel.com
U of M Campus Center, Rm. 324
(413) 256.1261

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
• a grade dispute?
• teacher, roomate or job concerns?
• billing problems?
• harassment?
• ...or any other University related problem?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course!)
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome
823 Campus Center
Office hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0567
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Eels return with sixth album, a cinematic epic with blinking

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Eels founder Mark Oliver Everett, better known simply as E, has made a career of honest, personal and often intensely depressed songwriting. The essentially one-man band broke onto alternative radio and MTV in 1996 with the dark, and bleakly comic, "Novocaine For The Soul" and proved to be more than a novelty act with 1998's brilliant, highly acclaimed "Electro-shock Blues" album, which dealt with E's sister's suicide and his mother's terminal battle with cancer. Over the course of his career E has constantly been a shining star of modern pop-rock. From bombastic rockers to piano-lead lullabies and bare-bones acoustic-guitar confessionals Eels have provided evocative journeys through the mind and life of E. While it can occasionally be a rough and painful path, there are always plenty of rewards for those that take the time and effort to really listen. However E's ear for pop melody and zest for music generally makes everything enjoyable even on a more basic level.

Eels
'Blinking Lights and Other Revelations'
Vagrant records

On their sixth album, the double-disc epic "Blinking Lights And Other Revelations", E continues to bring what people might expect from Eels (of course longtime listeners know to expect the unexpected) while presenting his songs under a different light.

The album starts with "Theme From Blinking Lights" an instrumental (aside from angelic "da da da da" vocals) and throughout the next 90 minutes the theme is reprised, alongside other short instrumental pieces. Aside from that there are two tracks, "Blinking Lights (for me)" and "Blinking Lights (for you)", which are nearly identical except that only the first one has vocals. What at first seems like filler turns out to be the heart of the project and gives the epic set a cinematic vision.

"The first thing I did that started this whole thing was 'Blinking Lights (for me)'," E explained in a phone interview with the Collegian shortly before the album was released, "It was originally written for a film ... but it ended up not being made. And shortly after that I got the idea that I wanted to make a 'Blinking Lights' album 'cause I liked the idea of what the song was about. The song wasn't about anything that was gonna be in the movie anyway it was something I really wrote to comfort someone that was close to me that was going through a hard time."

The song is based around quiet acoustic guitar and faint, galloping percussion. E's scratchy vocals are front and center as he sings about "Morse code signals" he receives from blinking lights on an airplane that inspire him. "One day I will be alright again" he tells himself in a half-sing/half-whisper.

The rest of the album deals with similar issues and is full of both cynical views of life and attempts at self-comfort. The grand, booming "The Other Shoe" finds E "sitting here, waiting for the other shoe to drop", "Trouble With Dreams" is dominated by a haunting melody, and is one of the album's best songs, where E begins by admitting "There's nothing that I wanna do / More than get along and be with you" and then immediately realizes that "Trouble with dreams is they don't come true / And when they do they can catch up to you." "Checkout Blues" finds E threatening to "check out at any given time" and battling with "the curse" which has claimed nearly E's whole family (aside from his sister and mother, his father died when E was 19, and his cousin died during 9/11). E often revisits his similar lyrical territory if only because there is no way to ignore it.

The recording of "Blinking Lights" was no less harrowing for E. He has been working on it off-and-on since 1997. While E typically works by himself he found this experience to be particularly lonely.

"It was pretty scary in a lot of ways. I always make [records] very independently in that I pay for everything myself, 'cause I don't want any involvement from any companies ... and it was kind of a big undertaking being that it is a double album, it could've been a quadruple album. Nobody was asking me to do something like that; it was just something I really felt I needed to do."

E often finds himself working on multiple albums at once and, although he had been writing songs for "Blinking Lights" for a while, it was while touring for 2003's "Shootenanny!" album that the idea began to take shape. Ironically he had written and recorded the more straight-forward rock album as a "reaction to [his] frustrations with how difficult making ['Blinking Lights'] was."

"It wasn't until during the Shootenanny tour that ... I was thinking about treating the record more like a film. That's when I started to do the instrumental stuff ... the little vignettes between the songs. My idea was to have something that you could feel more then you could think about. That's when I realized it needed a little more breathing room than one disc was gonna give it."

And indeed the main complaint that could be made about "Blinking Lights" is that it has a little bit too much breathing room. The slightly over 90-minute album could easily be condensed to fit on an 80-minute CD but E has, once again, defied convention: this time by refusing to make a traditionally structured pop record.

Additionally E hasn't lost his sense of humor, or his remaining shreds of optimism. His sarcasm and wit is often overlooked and his ability to find the silver lining in a sky full of dark clouds is no doubt what's gotten him this far. "Things The Grandchildren Should Know" is cautiously optimistic and the entire "Blinking Lights" theme is "about finding something good amongst the ruins." Within the figurative ruins of "Blinking Lights" there are light moments. "Hey Man (Now You're Really Living)" is filled with "oooooh"s and "sha-la-la"s and "Going Fetal", which features Tom Waits doing a "crying solo" was born out of E's sense of humor about the younger generation.

The Eels return with their sixth record, a brooding album with cinematic elements worked in. The title track, "Blinking Lights" was originally written for a movie that never got made.

"[Kids] have so much on their shoulders...they are a very cynical group...[so] I had this dance number. I wanted to start a dance craze for the teenagers basically where the dance is falling down and giving up under the pressure and curling up on the dance floor as if you were back in your mother's womb. I picture [Waits'] part: it's like we're on American bandstand in 1965 and he occasionally shoots up to the front of the stage, slides up on his knees, and does the 'waaah' and all the girls in the audience scream and you're never sure if they're screaming in delight or horror." E even jokes about why he could never bring that vision to life. "It'd be great to make a video of that [but Waits] might hurt his back or something."

At the end of the long trail E is no doubt proud of his most epic, and arguably best, work to date and seems to think that the long, painful process was worth it.

"I feel like everyone's gotta do it sometime, everyone should do it sometime. It's like Bob Dylan said, 'you're nobody if you haven't been booed.' You're nobody if you don't do a double album at least once."

When asked if he'd ever do another double album, E jokes, "Remind me not to...that's not to say I won't do a triple album. That challenge is ahead," he laughs, "and then there's the box set."

'Dream' delivers more than life

PLAY from page 7

grandeur while endowing it with a direct clarity. Consequently, viewers could spend more time concentrating on the character's emotions rather than trying to decipher their language.

The acting in the performance was impressive and uniformly strong. One is hard pressed to name a particular stand out performance as each actor managed to endow their characters with a compelling complexity. Randolph Paulsen (Segismundo) did a wonderful job capturing the seething anger and unrelenting confusion that Segismundo is cursed. Paulsen did so well that at some points one felt that Segismundo was going to eat himself alive.

Jonathan Graffam (Clarin) was an audience favorite as he freely interacted with them during the performance and possessed a Jerry Lewis-like aptitude for physical comedy.

Kate Mettam (Rosaura), who has given strong performances in past UMass shows like "All's Well That Ends Well" and "The Curse of the Starving Class," conveyed the volatility of an emotionally wounded person with an intense, unhinged performance.

Tom Adrian Villalobos (Basilio the King) and Maxfield Raynolds (Clotaldo) were captivating with their thundering voices and dominating stage presences.

Kelby Akin (Astolfo) and Lindsay Grace Robitaille (Estrella) were very humorous in portraying their characters' overeager attempts at social climbing. The chorus or Los Chicos Calientes had a sort of strange power and had a commanding presence on stage that equaled the main characters.

The choices in the presentation of the play were both frustrating and admirable. Costuming was baffling as characters were wearing attire from all different periods ranging from the Golden Age of Spain to the 20th century. Also, the director's use of the chorus was awkward. Before each scene started, a member of the chorus would announce which scene was about to begin.

Also, the director decided to insert choreographed musical interludes which blended moves from tango to what seemed to be Michael Jackson's "Thriller" video at one point. However, while the insertion of modern elements in a Renaissance drama was bizarre, there was something admirable in it. "Life is a Dream" succeeded in using the incongruity of its elements as a way in which one could contemplate the mysteries that come to visit us every time we close our eyes.

Should we date or hook up?

DATE from page 6

he says. "I'm just looking for fun, [but] I think UMass is a good place because you can find people who have similar interests. There's a wide range of people to choose from."

Although UMass can be a good place to meet someone you like because of its somewhat diverse setting, many females believe that guys just want to have sex. Nothing else. You'd think women are the ones who are looking for the commitment, but Paul disagrees.

"[Girls] want what guys do," he says. "They just hide it more. They're just selective in who to hook up with. They're not as random, but they want the same thing."

Perhaps, it's true. Perhaps, girls just want to have fun without the whole relationship thing. But there are ladies who want to be with someone they love and care about. And some have even dated at UMass. It's just a matter of finding the right one.

A female senior, who wished not to have her name used, dated somebody who wasn't Indian for the first time, which lasted for seven months. It was her last relationship.

"That's the one relationship I learned a lot from, and I grew as a person," she says. "It made me realize for the first time how important my culture and family are. And love is not the only thing that makes a relationship work. It takes a lot of understanding, patience, and trust."

That, I agree with. Being single may be the best way to go. No worries, no insecurities, no doubts and no problems. But maybe it's not so bad to date somebody from UMass. I just haven't found anybody who interests me. Nor have I found anybody who is a one-woman man, a fact most girls soon discover as freshmen.

Oh, the many lessons you'll learn at UMass. Both male and female students just want to fool around before they find that special person, while others have already tried. Overall, dating does occur, just not as often.

Hence, the Monkey Bar scene. It's a great place to drink and meet people. I can see several dancing drunken couples grinding and feeling each other up as the song "Tempted to Touch" kicks off. Perhaps, this trend may fade as students graduate and get into the real world. But for now, it's time to dance and live the single life.

MeiMei Thai is a Collegian staff member.

The BIG Chill

THE BIG CHILL
Wednesday, May 11
Library Lawn 2-6 pm
Free Admission

Come chill out with your friends and celebrate the end of the year. A fantastic afternoon of music, rides, free food, and giveaways- all on a perfect May afternoon. These are the days you come to college for! Rain date: May 12

TENSION BREAKERS
Thursday, May 12
Campus Center - Concourse 10am-12pm
Free Admission

Save the drama for yo' mama, serenity now. Come by the Campus Center Concourse and relieve your stress with some sugar, a massage, or some aromatherapy.

MIX IT UP DANCE SERIES - COUNTRY
Thursday, May 12
Student Union Ballroom 7-11pm
Free Admission

A fantastic boot stomping dance for all who have "got friends in low places" or all who know "it's five o'clock somewhere." Come early for line dancing instruction and as always, fantastic giveaways for all who attend!

ULTIMATE CHILL DISC TOURNAMENT
Friday, May 13
Library Lawn 12-6pm
Free Admission

Take a study break and grab your friends for an afternoon of ultimate. Sign up in teams of eight and compete or just come out to cheer on your friends. All skill levels welcome; there will be brackets for "competitive" and "just for fun." Prizes for the winning teams and t-shirts for everyone!

Contact: Ashley Russell - aerussel@student.umass.edu
Sponsored by the Student Activities Center and Student Affairs and Campus Life.

Schilling rushed back

PELLAND from page 10

Yankees. Had he pitched the outcome may have not been much different than the 9-2 shelling the Bombers gave to Boomer and the Sox.

One would think that Schillings only rehab start in Pawtucket was an indication he wasn't ready to face major league talent, or minor league talent for that matter. In that game he gave up seven runs on 11 hits in only six innings of work. Right there the organization should have known he needed a little more time.

Instead, Schilling was thrust right into the fire as he made his first major league start of the season against the Yankees. He lost that game for Sox giving up all five New York runs in five and two-thirds innings.

His only win of the season came against the punchless Toronto Blue Jays. Even in that start he didn't look to be completely healthy. Then, last Saturday, Schilling gave up nine hits to the lowly Tampa Devil Rays and six earned runs.

Overall in his three starts of 2005 Schilling is 1-2 with an outrageous 7.13 earned run average. Not exactly the Schilling of old.

In 32 starts last year Schilling led the majors with 21 wins and just 6 losses. He only lost one start at Friendly Fenway last year a feat he as already matched in 2005.

It would have been better for all parties involved if Curt had just taken the time to reach full health. Instead, a lot of pressure has been put on a lot of people who really don't need it right now.

Take for instance the Red Sox bullpen. As of late, the struggles of closer Keith Foulke are no secret. Right now Foulke couldn't close out a game against the Minutemen, not to mention the Orioles. His ERA is right up there with Schilling's at 7.20, a horrendous number for a closer.

Pressure has also been place on injured starter Wade Miller. With two of Boston's starters out, Miller may feel the need to rush his own rehab to join the big league club. Who can blame him? As of now the rotation looks like this: Tim Wakefield, Bronson Arroyo, Matt Clement, John Halama and plug in a minor leaguer.

It's also up to the offense to put up the numbers to support this less than stellar starting rotation.

One may be quick to point out the Red Sox of 2004 and how they played mediocre baseball until the middle August. There are a few clear differences between those Red Sox and the team of 2005.

Last year the Sox played .500 baseball with Curt Schilling in the rotation, not on the DL. Also, that staff included hall of famer Pedro Martinez and seasoned veteran Derek Lowe, both now departed to the New York Mets and Los Angeles Dodgers, respectively.

The players and coaching staff will say that the rigorous 162 game season is a marathon not a sprint. But wasn't it that sprint they went on in August last year that saved their season and set the stage for the stretch run against Yankees?

Moreover, this isn't 2004 anymore, it's 2005. Who's to say the Sox are going to go on another torrid streak as they did in August of last year. That's not to say it can't happen because it most certainly can, and hopefully will. Granted all of this is happening in April but, May is just around the corner, the time when games begin to "count".

Also, this year the problem is going to be pitching, not offense as it was in 2004 with the absence of Nomar Garciaparra. Everyone knows you win baseball games with pitching and not with the bats. Just ask the Texas Rangers or Baltimore Orioles.

Jon Pelland is a Collegian Columnist.

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Red Sox ace Curt Schilling has had a rocky start to the 2005 campaign. Schilling has been fighting injuries since the end of last season.

Walker will return for game 5

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

WALTHAM — The Boston Celtics get Antoine Walker back for Game 5 of the playoffs. The Indiana Pacers hope their own defense and shooting return from a one-game break.

"We've got to do a lot of things better," Indiana coach Rick Carlisle said Monday.

The Celtics tied the best-of-seven series 2-2 and regained homecourt advantage by handing the Pacers their worst playoff loss ever, 110-79 at Indiana on Saturday night, despite Walker's one-game suspension for grabbing a referee.

Ricky Davis started in his place, scored 15 points and is expected to start again Tuesday night while rookie Delonte West returns to the bench to make room for Walker. The Celtics hope Davis' shooting can get them off to a good start.

"We have to try to force the tempo and push the ball up the court and make (the Pacers) run," Walker said, "get them out of setting the ball in the halfcourt where they can force the ball into Jermaine O'Neal and Reggie (Miller) can come off those screens."

Boston did that in Game 4 and Indiana hit 27 percent of its shots with O'Neal going 4-for-15 for nine points and Miller going 3-for-12 for 12 points. Boston's aggressive defense on the ball handler kept Miller from receiving passes in good shooting position.

The Celtics relied on a smaller lineup Saturday night with four good ballhandlers who could spearhead the fastbreak after winning Game 1 with a bigger lineup.

"The thing that scares me about Boston is they've blown us out once with Walker and their normal team, and they've blown us out once going small," Carlisle said. "He's so good all around _ putting the ball on the floor, shooting 3's, driving it, posting up, I don't see where him coming back could possibly hurt them."

Especially if the Pacers' defense doesn't improve. The Celtics hit 57 percent of their shots in Game 4 and outscored the Pacers 48-22 near the basket.

"They're a transition team," Miller said, "and if they get out and get easy open (shots), we know they're going to be tough to beat."

The Pacers could be down to their third-string point guard. Jamaal Tinsley missed the last 27 regular-season games and four in the playoffs with a bruised foot. His backup, Anthony Johnson, didn't practice Monday because of a sore back after being hit accidentally by teammate James Jones in Game 4.

Carlisle expects Johnson to try to play, but Tinsley hasn't been cleared by doctors. Fred Jones probably would start if neither can play.

Boston is at full strength now that Walker has served his suspension for trying to move referee Tom Washington out of the way after getting his second technical foul in Game 3 when he fouled O'Neal hard.

Walker watched Game 4 from his hotel room.

"Sitting out a game of that importance was very difficult," he said. "It was fun to watch to see how a group of guys picked up and played the way they did in the biggest game of the season."

Paul Pierce helped make up for Walker's absence with 30 points, eight assists, seven rebounds and five blocks.

"We played well in Game 4, but for us to go on and advance, we need to be full strength," Pierce said.

A Boston loss would give Indiana a chance to win the series at home Thursday night. A seventh game would be in Boston on Saturday night.

"No one's been able to get a rhythm in this entire series," partially because whichever team plays its style better has a big advantage, Boston coach Doc Rivers said.

A running game favors the Celtics, who have won by 23 and 31 points. A slower pace works for the Pacers, who have won by 3 and 20, and gives Miller time to cut off screens to catch a pass and put up an open shot.

"We were concentrating on getting the ball (inside) too much" in Game 4, Miller said. "It worked for us in Game 3, but we have to move the ball."

COURTESY ASSOCIATED PRESS

Celtics forward Antoine Walker will return to the Celtics lineup for game 5 against the Indiana Pacers. The series is currently tied 2-2.

Why play video games, when a quick, painless finger prick could save a life?

Come to the Student Nurses' Association Annual Bone Marrow Typing Drive!

May 4th 10-4pm
Campus Center
Rm 101

YOU could be a match!

Minutewomen face BU

SOFTBALL from page 10

eager to get there."

UMass locked up the second seed with four home wins last week, including a doubleheader sweep of A-10 foe LaSalle on Friday.

The Minutewomen thoroughly dominated the Explorers, winning 15-1 and 3-0 while allowing only one hit in each game. Jenna Busa led the way on the mound, turning in her second strong performance of the week.

Busa was named A-10 Pitcher of the Week for the first time this season, following her two starts in which she did not allow an earned run. Busa (11-5) has turned it on lately going 8-1 with a 0.89 ERA in her last nine starts.

"It meant a lot," Sortino said of sweeping LaSalle. "We hit the ball really well. We got two pretty solid pitching performances. I thought the team's energy level was good. Overall, I was pretty pleased."

UMass set a school record for home runs in a season in the games against LaSalle. The Minutewomen hit five home runs on Friday to bring their season total to 38.

UMass features four players in the top ten in the A-10 and batting, and has had a balanced offensive attack all season. Adding to this depth has been the recent production of freshman Stacy Cullington. Cullington had been a role player for much of the season before getting her chance to shine last week.

With starting shortstop Hilary Puglia out of action with an injured shoulder, Cullington stepped into the lineup and had a huge week.

Cullington had a huge day filling in for Puglia last Tuesday against Harvard, as she hit a game-winning three-run homer in the first game of a doubleheader, and scored the winning run in the second game.

Even with Puglia back on Friday, Cullington stayed in the lineup at second base in the first game and as designated hitter in the second. Cullington once again came up big, bashing a grand slam in the first game.

During the huge four-game stretch, Cullington batted .600 (6-10) with two home runs, seven RBIs and four runs scored. As a result, Cullington was named A-10 Rookie of the Week for the second time this year.

The challenge for Sortino now is finding a spot in the lineup for her hottest hitter.

"Stacy's an amazing player," Sortino said. "She's made a niche for herself, and now I have to figure out how to get her in the lineup."

COURTESY KAREN WINARD

Senior outfielder HilaryPuglia dives for a catch against N.C. State on April 24. UMass lost 6-0.

Players' union calls for penalties

By Ben Walker
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The baseball players' union told commissioner Bud Selig on Monday that it was willing to talk to him about his call for harsher steroids penalties.

"We will look forward to discussing the points you raised," union head Donald Fehr said in a letter to Selig.

Last week, Selig wrote to Fehr, asking players to agree to even tougher penalties than the ones that took effect at the start of the season. Selig now wants a 50-game suspension for first-time steroid offenders, a 100-game ban for a second offense and a lifetime suspension for a third violation.

Earlier in the day, Minnesota Twins reliever Juan Rincon was suspended for 10 days after testing positive for a performance-enhancing substance. He was the fifth player banned under the Major League Baseball policy, and the most well-known.

Under current rules, the first offense draws a 10-day suspension. The penalties increase to 30 days for a second positive test, 60 days for a third violation and one year for a fourth. The penalty for a fifth failure is at the commissioner's discretion.

Along with stiffening the penalties under his "three strikes and you are out approach," Selig also wants the union to ban amphetamines, to increase random tests and to pick an independent person to handle the big league drug-testing program.

Fehr noted in his letter that the union agreed in January to tougher penalties and said the program was working, adding, "You now request that we further modify our agreement."

"Given the players' demonstrated commitment to make certain that the goals of our program are met, and their desire to continue to strive to make sure that is done, we are willing to discuss the matter with you," he wrote.

Fehr suggested that the sides "negotiate at the table, and not in the media."

"Accordingly, I will not here otherwise respond to your letter," Fehr wrote. "We will look forward to discussing the points you raised, and other appropriate matters."

Summer Move-Out
The Easy Way
Move and store packages
Starting at $99
for the Whole Summer!
• FREE Pickup
• FREE Dropoff
• FREE Boxes & Tape
5 COLLEGE Storage
888-455-MOVE
www.5collegestorage.com

$10 Off Summer Storage
Mention this ad and save $10 on your summer move-and-store package! We make moving out easy!
Offer valid on 10-box, 12-box and 16-box packages. Must sign up by May 15, 2005. Not valid with any other offer.
www.5collegestorage.com
5 COLLEGE Storage

UMass falls to Spiders

LAX from page 12

With 8:16 left in regulation, Connerty scored her third goal of the game to cut the lead down to one at 9-8. However, for the next two minutes Richmond possessed the ball, stalling and killing clock by moving the ball around the perimeter. It was suffocating for the UMass defense and it finally caved, letting Richmond attacker Caroline McGuire knife through and score with just over four minutes left in the game.

It was the final blow for the Minutewomen, as it pushed the lead to 10-8 with time winding down on their season. Richmond killed clock during its possessions, but the Maroon and White had a last chance to cut the lead to one with just over a minute left in the game.

After moving the ball around the outside of the defense, Connerty tried to penetrate but was stripped by a Richmond defender. The play ended the game and the season, but the attention after the game was on the seniors, who had played their last game at Garber Field.

"They meant a lot," Bolduc said of the seniors. "They've been through thick and thin. They've seen it all, from victories to losses, heartbreaks to heartaches, and through all of that, especially this season, what kept them going was their spirit, and their faith and belief in knowing what this team is made of. I think that they've created that. They are the reason why we will do good things next year."

Rubin turned a solid performance in only her third career start, with 10 saves and only allowing 10 goals. Throughout the game she kept the Minutewomen within striking distance, making great saves on tough shots. For coach Bolduc it was rewarding to see Rubin performing well.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Jackie Nesbitt backs into a Richmond defender on during the Minutewomen's game against the Spiders on Sunday afternoon.

"I think for her the pressure wasn't on and she just went out there and played knowing that this was her last shot in cage," Bolduc said. "And I think she probably told herself, 'go out with a bang, don't give up, don't doubt and don't regret'. And I think it was evident in how she played today."

For the seniors it was an emotional last day.

"We're all best friends on the team," Kestner said. "I'm going to miss it a lot. After the game we all went over and hugged each other, we're going to miss it so much. It's over."

Last stand for seniors

SENIORS from page 12

tozone shots . . . my knee has been through a lot," St. Hilaire said. "Ofcourse it's going to feel good not to have to go through that every day. But if I had another year to play I would do it."

Rubin got the start in cage for her last game in uniform and had a tremendous performance after getting off to a rocky start. She had 10 saves and kept the Minutewomen alive for most of the game. With every save she made the UMass sideline erupted in support of its senior goaltender, who was making just the third start of her career.

"Unbelievable. It was awesome. I was ready." Rubin said.

Rubin was caught off guard by the emotion of the day.

"It was more than we thought it was going to be," Rubin said. "I love these guys. They're unbelievable, such a great team, you couldn't ask for anything more. And they're going places, absolutely, without a doubt."

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

(From left to right): Seniors Judy Kestner, Kristin St. Hilare and Joey Rubin pose for a picture before UMass' game against RU on Sunday.

"They're going to be so good," Kestner said of the future squad. "They have so much heart, so much hustle. I would rather be in a rebuilding year with these girls than on a winning team. It's been a great experience. I love them all."

The team lost, 10-8, to the Richmond on the final day of the season, but it hardly mattered, as saying goodbye would be the most important task of the day.

It wouldn't be easy, however, as the three seniors served as big sisters to a team that was extremely young. Throughout the year it was easy to tell that this team was tightly wound and together in every way, and it makes the seniors' departure that much harder.

Coach Bolduc had one last huddle on the field before they would break for the final time in the 2005 season.

"We talked about the first lacrosse stick they picked up and how far it's gotten them," Bolduc said. "It's important for these three seniors and for the rest of the team to have heart, hustle, to give the effort and never give up. Those characteristics are valuable and are phenomenal traits that they should carry with them into life. Some day when things are down, think back and know that they stuck to the end and finished. We talked about knowing that next year, what they did today will show up in a very positive way."

Schilling loss damages Red Sox

Jon Pelland

What's going on here? This isn't supposed to be happening. The Boston Red Sox are the defending world champions, they aren't supposed be entering May with double-digit losses.

The hometown team was dealt yet another blow to their pitching staff on Wednesday. It was announced that ace Curt Schilling was going make his second trip of the year to the 15 day disabled list. The news can't come at a worse time for the Red Sox as they lost their number two starter David Wells to the DL just one day before Schilling.

The so-called "bone bruise" on Schillings ankle raises a number of questions for the Red Sox. First of which, did he rush his rehabilitation from off-season ankle surgery?

The injured ankle is the same one that Schilling had sutured during the 2004 American League Championship Series and World Series. In those series it was his bloody sock that made national headlines and will forever be remembered in Red Sox lore.

Originally Schilling was supposed to make his season debut some time in early to mid-May. Now however, he's out at least two weeks and could miss up to three starts. Could it be that Schilling's larger than life ego forced him to return to the team before he was a 100%? It's more than possible.

If Schilling had it his way he would have pitched opening night in New York against the hated

See PELLAND on page 9

Minutewomen set to face Terriers

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

With only five games remaining in the regular season, it would be easy for the Massachusetts softball team to look ahead to the postseason. But UMass coach Elaine Sortino wants her team playing well down the stretch, beginning with a home game today at 5 p.m. against Boston University (21-16-1).

"We're looking to play well," Sortino said. "They're a good team and they're coming to our house. We need to come ready to play."

It would be forgivable for the Minutewomen (28-14-1 11-3 Atlantic 10) to begin to look towards the postseason because all they are playing for this week is to improve their status as a potential at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament if they fail to capture the automatic bid that comes with the Atlantic 10 title.

The A-10 Tournament begins next Thursday at the University of Rhode Island and the Minutewomen have clinched the No. 2 seed. All that is left to be determined is who UMass will face in the first round. The opponent will either be Saint Bonaventure or Saint Joseph's, both teams that UMass swept doubleheaders from this season.

Entering the tournament as the No. 2 seed is a change for the Minutewomen, as they had won 10-straight regular seasons crowns, but this year were knocked out of the top spot by Fordham.

"It's a new spot for us because we're used to being the one-seed," Sortino said. "It's going to be different that we don't have the target on our back. This is a good position for this team because it's young. We're really with no money, risking injury and jeopardizing their financial security? No way. And while staying in school obtains moral superiority, the smartest business decision for kids who can make it would be to skip March Madness and head straight for the Big Show.

See SOFTBALL on page 9

Too little too late for Stern

GREENFIELD from page 12

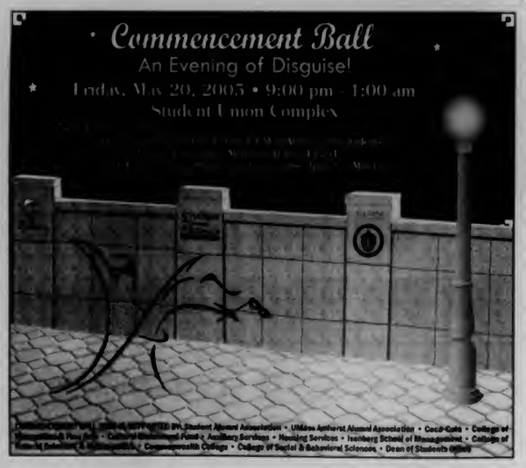
Many basketball people believe that playing for an elite division one basketball school would be a great learning experience, and playing for a coach who actually teaches the game (opposed to NBA coaches who baby sit) would help a player improve and learn the intricacies of basketball. However, players like LeBron James have shattered all of the rules and leaped directly from high school into the NBA elite.

How many of you thought that Carmelo Anthony was going to be a better pick than LeBron? I know I did, because he had what LeBron didn't. He had the big game experience, he played under one of the best in coaches in basketball and he had played against better competition. He was a champion; glory was earned, not given.

Watching LeBron play on television in high school (ESPN showing high school basketball?) was like watching Jordan light up the competition in his hay day. Granted, some of the kids he was playing against were going to high level division one colleges, but James was truly a man amongst boys.

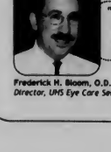
The transition from high school to the NBA would be overwhelming for anybody. LeBron had people calling him a flash in the pan. But he is the real deal, and his maturity as a teenager shined through in his first two years as he handled the transition with relative ease, bearing the burden of all the media hype in the world on his shoulders. LeBron is the exception to the rule, the person who lived up to the hype when most of the athletes these days fall well short. He is stomping on the theory that basketball players should go to college if they want to succeed in the pros.

Basketball will suffer because of LeBron's success. With NBA scouts robbing cradles for new basketball talent, high school hot dogs will go to the pros with all athleticism and no basketball IQ. It makes for boring television and bad basketball. The NBA Finals couldn't be less exciting and it is because NBA fans value hops over hustle, dunks over dedication. The kid who can throw it down is the best player, end of story.



The ease of LeBron's entrance into the NBA has raised a question that is bigger than King James himself. The issue of age in the NBA is a delicate one, and LeBron — though great for the NBA's publicity and worldwide appeal — has been detrimental to the league by just being too good, too mature, too perfect.

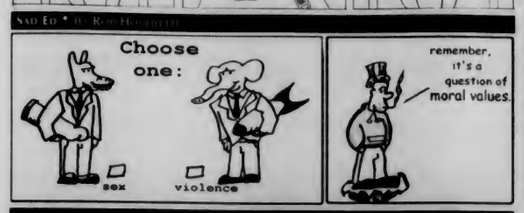
LeBron, along with his contemporaries, has created an illusion for young, talented basketball players on their chances of making It. On Sportscenter we hear about the "diaper dandies", but we don't hear about the countless high school players that go out for the draft every year and go home heartbroken.



An age limit would be ideal for the NBA at this moment in time. It would improve college basketball by filtering in more talent. There would be better basketball being played in the pros with more kids going through the team-oriented college system, as opposed to jumping to the NBA which is starting to look more like an And One mix tape.

However, it is unlikely that Commissioner Stern will follow through with it, no matter how much it would improve the quality of the league. There is too much money to be made, too many millions to be spent on Escalades and mansions. The money is the drive to make it, forget about the championship ring. And as long as the payouts are as steep as they are, David Stern and company will have to wait.

Rob Greenfield is a Collegian Columnist.



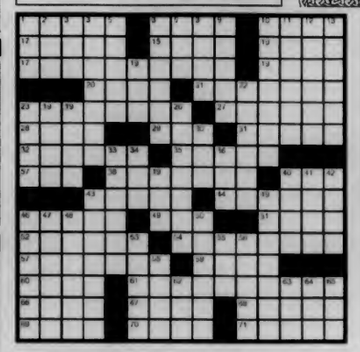
THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
Is Looking For a
Bright, Talented, Multitasking Wizard!
Now Accepting Applications For:
'HUMAN RESOURCES MANAGER'
*Freshmen and Sophomores preferred
*Great Resume Builder
*8.5 hours per week
Applications Available in Room 113 Campus Center Basement. Attn: Sandra Marquez
-Please Bring Resume-

GREAT Reasons to use UHS Eye Care Services
1. Savings on routine eye exams for students at UMass
2. A great place to get contact lenses
3. FREE sample start-up contact lens solutions
4. Same day replacement of disposable contact lenses, in many cases
5. Contact lenses mailed directly to your home or office
6. FREE eyeglass adjustments and one year warranty on frames
SPECIAL OFFER: 10 PERCENT STUDENT DISCOUNT ON ALL FRAMES AND EYEGLASS LENSES!* * Cannot be combined with other Insurance discounts.

Frederick H. Bloom, O.D. Director, UHS Eye Care Services
"I invite you to use the Eye Care Services"
For appointments or questions, call 577-5383
UHS EYE CARE SERVICES

Quote of the Day

"A man is not old until regrets take the place of dreams."



—John Barrymore

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

ACROSS
1 Used a rasp
6 Verdi opera
10 Actor Franco
14 Ryan or Dunne
15 Vehicles for ETs
16 Scent
17 Pays back
19 Parasitic arachnid
20 Graph or mat lead-in 21 Student's performance
23 Cylindrical pillows
27 Piano adjusters
28 "Lucky Jim" author
29 Wonderment
31 Color anew
32 Straightforward
35 Playing marble
37 Greek letter
38 Muzzle loaders' requirements
40 Chasing game
43 Fortuneteller's deck
44 Live wire
46 Respond to
49 Resistance unit
51 Yeast basalis
52 Lightning rod
54 Longing
57 Make haste!
59 Golf gadgets
60 City in Yemen
61 Leader in a field
66 Whimpered
67 Sound reflection
68 Mental
69 2004 Brad Pitt movie
70 Nightly twinkler
71 Delivered an address

DOWN
1 Evergreen
2 Angel
3 Waikiki garland
4 As a group
5 Initial showing
6 Denver suburb
7 Suppositions
8 Performer
9 Useful quality
10 Candidate
11 Prepared for publication
12 Traffic circle
13 Unspecified thread
18 Shoshone
22 Gesture of request
23 Summoned, old-style
24 Leave out
25 Former monetary unit of Italy
26 Having a dark complexion
30 Self-image
33 Crevice
34 Black goo
36 Tack on
39 Bovine call
40 Cab
41 Prayer ender
42 Resonant metal disk
43 Casual contest
45 Continuous
46 Struck by shock
47 More coarse
48 Matador
50 Luminous trail in the sky
53 Plays for a fool
55 DDE's rival
56 Lively dances
58 Solemn agreement
62 Half a dance?
63 Tango team
64 Wapiti
65 Grain in a Salinger title

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
May Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Outdoor Deck Open!
Tonight. ·TRIVIA NIGHT @ 9pm!
WED. ·Breakaway soL
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Seisiun
No Cover!
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
Spring is Here!
Come in and get the attention you want!
•Free haircolor consultations
•We specialize in Multi-Color Highlighting and eyebrow shaping
•Facial and Body waxing
Walk-ins Welcome
Mon-Fri 10-6 Sat 10-4
254-1200
40 Main St
Downtown Amherst
No checks or cards please (cash only)
$2 off haircut and color
1/2 price facial and wax
With this COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You have a secret that you're not telling your friends.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You need to stop singing that song. You're bugging everyone around you.

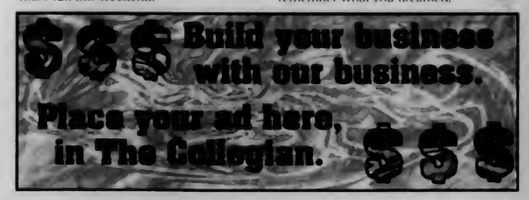
aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You have had some crazy ideas in the past, but this one blows them all away.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Tonight you're going to go to bed early, like you do every night.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Pretty soon you'll be leaving on a jet plane. Who knows when you'll be back again?

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You'll definitely be able to have a lot more fun this weekend.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Your money troubles will soon be solved with a huge stack of gold.



virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Everything is going to go down the crapper now that you're in charge.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Today the time will fly while you're in class.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
You need to stop eating more than dinner a night.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You have discovered a new form of caffeinated beverage to keep you going.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
It would be really cool if you could remember what you dreamed.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve Get them while they last www.brandywineapts.com stop by or call 549-0600

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7477 Mill ValleyEstates@primo.com Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route Minimal move-in costs 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

Auto for Sale

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, tire $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

Employment

Make $75 taking online surveys www.monkeyauthor.com

Employment

Camp Counselors - Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pinoforestcamp.com

SUMMER IN MAINE
Males and females Meet new friends! Travel! Teach your favorite activity. Tennis, Swim, Theatre Tech, Canoe, Water-ski, Kayak, Gymnastics, Nature, Lacrosse, Archery, Theatre Costumer, Copper Enameling, English Riding, and more TRIPP LAKE CAMP For Girls! 1-800-997-4347 www.tripplakecamp.com

Painters 2-3 years experience Must have a vehicle part time, full-time Call Michael 367-8810

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around homes/inn. Earn $8 - $12/hr (888)277-9767 www.ed-legarreta.com

Employment

Responsible college students wanted for Franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown (888)427-7672 Ext. 445

Help Wanted – Cutting edge agricultural facility on 116 in Amherst seeks quality motivated, detail oriented help. Flexible shifts, relaxed atmosphere, on bus route. 15-40 hours weekly, mornings a must. Please e-mail inquiries to peter@hoshelters.com

Live in Babysitter needed for two girls this summer in Wellfleet on Cape Cod. Salary, Room, and Board. Please Call 508-349-6392

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring outgoing students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply

Employment

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.45 per hour, 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065 Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer

Cleaning 2 days (8-2) and Saturday AM Hampshire Fitness $9.50/ per hour and membership Jason or Deb 256-6446

Employment

Summer Jobs For The Environment
*$275 - $475 / Week
*Stop Global Warming
*Protect the Environment
Make a difference. Work with MASSPIRG on a campaign to stop global warming. Career opportunities and benefits. Call Chris 413-256-6443

Administrative Assistant for Teen-Issues Touring Program. Part-Time until Late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

Summer/Beyond. Local franchise Major health's home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay $87-950.

Moving. Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Employment

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe. 62 Masonic St. Northampton.

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPainting.com Call Dan 413-682-0020

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided 1-800-965-6520 x162

For Sale

Full Size bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition $200 & Buyer must pick up. (443) 904-6844

House for Rent

Hadley. 5 Beds, Large lot, September, $1575, plus utilities Shiboski Realtors 586-1827

House for Rent

4 Bedroom, Northampton for June. Double living room, enclosed side porch $1300/month +utilities Shiboski Realtors 586-1827

Hadley. Close to UMass 3/6 bedroom Newer home Laundry Hook-ups Large yard 549-4270

House Hadley. Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms. Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass, $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

Miscellaneous

www.butchbutts.com Just Look *Stupid

Your Opinion Could Get You a Sony PSP. Have you taken Kaplan or another SAT/GMAT/GRE exam, review course? Do you or a college course? Education site researching course providers want to hear from you! Students who submit course reviews are automatically entered in a drawing to win Sony's new PSP. For details, visit www.courseadvisor.com

Roommate Wanted

1 Bdrm in 2bdrm Brandywine May-Aug $480/ Rent & Utils negotiable pmss@cumulus.edu

Roommate Wanted in House, $325 Call 413-687-4976

Services

Did you know your rights as a student, tenant, worker and consumer? The Student Legal Services Office can help with your questions. Come to 922 Campus Center or call 545-1995

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment Affordable and confidential Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 548-9922

Preetum? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Need a sublet? Advertise in the Collegian Classifieds! Call 545-3500 or visit the Campus Center Basement

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

One last dance for UMass

UM falls to Richmond

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team concluded its season on Sunday with a 10-8 loss to Richmond on an overcast day at Garber Field.

The day was started with a ceremony to honor the team's three seniors (Kristin St. Hilaire, Judy Kestner and Joey Rubin) as the players and their families were introduced over the loud speaker and brought out to mid-field for pictures.

Richmond	10
UMass	8

It was an emotional day for everyone, and the team wanted the seniors to go out on top with a victory against Richmond.

Senior goalkeeper Joey Rubin got the start in goal over junior Lauren McCarthy, as it would be her last shot in goal wearing the UMass jersey.

It was all business, however, after Richmond began the game with two straight goals, taking advantage of some early UMass mistakes.

With 26:11 left in the first half, junior Jackie Nesbitt cut the lead to one. At the twenty minute mark Richmond pushed the lead to 3-1 with a goal by Morgan Vahue, but the Maroon and White quickly answered with two of its own by freshman Jeanette Villapiano and junior Kerri Connerty (three goals on the day).

The score was tied 3-3 until Vahue and Villapiano traded goals around the ten minute mark. Inside of a minute later Richmond scored again, putting them up 5-4.

UMass would not take the lead again as it was a back and forth contest throughout the afternoon, but the Minutewomen could not get over the hump.

"We had some issues with the midfield and their trap," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said. "That was our lack of game plan, but we got through it and knew what we needed to do. We had to be patient with working through it. I was happy overall. I was happy with the effort and hustle, with the spark and fire."

See LAX on page 10

COLLEGIAN KAREN WINGER

Senior defender Kristin St. Hilare runs through a tunnel of her teamates before the Minutewomen's game against Richmond on Sunday. It was the last game for seniors St. Hilare, Judy Kestner and Joey Rubin. UMass lost 10-8.

Seniors play one last time

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

It was an emotional day at Garber Field on Sunday for the seniors on the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, as they played their final game against the Richmond Spiders under overcast skies.

Seniors Kristin St. Hilaire, Joey Rubin and Judy Kestner will all be moving on.

There were tears, hugs and happiness for the three upperclassmen as they were surrounded by teammates, friends and family after the game concluded. It was a bittersweet day for these girls, as they looked back on their fond memories at Garber Field.

"Obviously I'm going to miss it a lot," St. Hilaire said. "[Lacrosse] has been a big part of my life for the last eight or nine years. Even more I'm going to miss all the friends that I've made here. I've been on five different teams here and I've made some great friends and met some great people."

St. Hilaire, a captain, was the defending Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year and also scored the first goal of her career this year. The elated reaction from her teammates on the sideline after the goal spoke worlds about how she will be missed. For UMass coach Carrie Bolduc it has been a long journey with St. Hilaire that began when she first got the coaching job here in the Valley.

"She's the foundation," Bolduc said of St. Hilaire. "She's been here since I've been here. She's a huge part of the program. She created the program. With that said, it will be weird not seeing her in the fall."

During the year the senior captain constantly battled a knee injury and was always seen with an icepack at practice and games. It was a grind for St. Hilaire in her last year, and though she would do it again in a heartbeat, getting away from the day to day labor will be a relief.

"I've had three knee surgeries, two cor-

See SENIORS on page 10

Age limit comes too late

So David Stern wants to put an age limit on entry into National Basketball Association, huh? Well it's too late now. The league has Jermaine O'Neal claiming racism and high school stars like LeBron and Amare Stoudamire using NBA defenders as doormats.

Rob Greenfield

And no, it doesn't matter if they'll get a better education if they go to school, it doesn't matter if they're not mature enough, and it doesn't matter that they'll get to experience the college basketball atmosphere. It's about money now, just like it is in every sport. Sports are a business, whether purists like it or not.

The National Football League has not had to deal with this problem because high school kids are physically not able to compete with the players in the NFL. But this is a very real dilemma for the NBA, and one that they have addressed too late. If David Stern — once he had seen Shawn Kemp storm out of high school and into stardom — had put the restriction on the league then, it wouldn't be an issue because Kemp would still be an exception to the rule, a one-in-a-million that made it.

But now high school kids can compete in the NBA, and even though it is a select few, it is enough to make the argument that the age limit will hurt kids whose financial future is on the hardwood — tough luck. Commissioner Stern.

The college game has no appeal to these young, super-talented basketball players, as more and more studs are making the leap of faith into the pros. Most of these guys won't even play regular minutes, and maybe a four year tenure in college ranks would've improved their game enough to get them into an NBA starting lineup, but forget all of that. They'll be millionaires.

The cliché example is Tim Duncan. He is everything that most of the NBA players are not — humble, subtle, quiet, and his game isn't flashy (he has a bank shot, enough said). He stayed four years in college at Wake Forest, graduating with his class and getting his diploma. The problem has become that you don't see stuff like that in headlines. All we see is LeBron James, Amare Stoudamire, and Jermaine O'neal's mugs all over the place.

People are split down the middle on this issue. There are those who want the kids to go to college and get themselves an education and there are those who say 'let them play'. However, people who want the former seem to be losing ground because their argument is considered retro and outdated.

They say that the kids should go to school, but why? So they can spend a couple of years

See GREENFIELD on page 10

Bonnies take two of three

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

Senior center fielder Jason Twomley has found his niche in UMass baseball history in his final season wearing Maroon and White.

In bottom of the eighth, Twomley homered to give the Massachusetts baseball team a 9-8 lead yesterday. Despite the senior left-handed hitter's effort, the Minutemen gave up a two-out error in the top of the ninth that lead to seven St. Bonaventure unearned runs and a 15-10 loss at Earl Lorden Field. The two teams split Sunday's doubleheader though; with the Minutemen picking up a 1-0 win in the first game and the Bonnies took a 3-0 victory in the second game.

Twomley's 14 homer on the year tied him with Aaron Braunstein, who had 14 in 1997, for second all time on the single season home run list. Twomley is now five home runs behind Billy Knight's 19 home runs in 1995 for the top spot.

The Minutemen return to action today when they travel to Loudonville, N.Y. to play Siena at three p.m. The Saints are riding a nine-game winning streak heading into the game against UMass.

UMass was holding a one-run lead heading into the ninth inning. Junior David Sullivan got two batters retired before sophomore Travis Munsey committed an error at third base to load the bases. The Bonnies quickly responded to the opportunity when sophomore third baseman Matt Mardeuz hit a two-run to the right side to take a 10-9 lead. Sophomore left fielder Brian Pellegrini then doubled in the eventual winning run to make the score 11-9.

Sophomore designated hitter Joe Rizzo added the last four runs of the inning on grand slam off reliever Scott McGovern to secure a six-run lead before UMass' last at-bat.

The only UMass run in the ninth was on sophomore designated hitter Michael Weiner's solo homerun.

The win was picked up by junior John Zinnicker, who pitched the final three innings for St. Bonaventure to earn the win, his third of the season. Zinnicker allowed two runs on three hits.

Sullivan picked up the loss after 4.2 innings pitched with two walks and a strikeout while giving up nine hits. The junior hurler gave up three unearned runs, though eight runs were scored while he was on the mound.

The Bonnies accumulated 17 hits and had five two or more runs batted in. Mardeuz lead the St. Bonaventure attack after going 4-for-6 with two RBIs and two runs. Rizzo was clutch with runners in scoring position totaling five RBIs and two runs on a 3-for-5 day.

Sunday's doubleheader featured the Red Sox general manager Theo Epstein in the crowd to watch the first game of the twin-bill. Junior ace Matt Torra made the most of his opportunity in front of Epstein by pitching a two-hit complete game shutout to preserve a 1-0 UMass victory. Torra gave up no walks and struck out two in the third victory of the year.

The Pittsfield native earned Co-Pitcher of the Week for the A-10 for his performance on Sunday. In ten games this season, Torra has pitched five complete games and leads the A-10 with 79 strikeouts while posting a 1.24 earn run average through 72.2 innings.

In the bottom of the seventh, the Bonnies intentionally walked Twomley to load the bases for senior left fielder Curt Szado, who singled home sophomore right fielder Bill Rankin for the game winning run. Rankin went 5-for-8 in the doubleheader.

The Minutemen left eight men on base and gave up an earned run in fourth, fifth and sixth innings for the 3-0 Bonnies win.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Minutemen pitcher Jason Lavorgna is 0-2 on the year with a 5.62 ERA. UMass won one of three games against St. Bonaventure this weekend.

Track team sees individual achievements

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Many members of the Massachusetts men's and women's track and field team saw much success at this past weekend's UConn Husky Invitational in Storrs, Conn.

The teams were led by senior Jen Iasiello, who was able to qualify for the ECAC Championship Meet in the hammer throw competition. Iasiello's throw of 158 feet, 8 inches marks her personal best of the 2005 season.

Iasiello came in second to Connecticut's Erin Connelly, who threw the hammer a distance of 174 feet, two inches.

Gaining event victories on the women's side for UMass was sophomore Katelyn O'Toole in the high jump and the 4x100 relay team.

O'Toole cleared 5 feet 3 inches and won the event on cleared attempts. Junior Ashely Creel came in third place behind Boston College's Julie Regan. Both also cleared the bar at 5 feet 3 inches. The jump marked a season best for Creel.

UMass beat out New Hampshire's A and B teams in the 4x100 with a time of 48.99 seconds.

Creel also posted another season-best with her 16.83 second time in the 100-meter hurdle event. The time was good for third place in the event behind a pair of New Hampshire runners that included Kaitlin Norberg and Kiah Quarles.

Other notables on the women's side were sophomore Jenna Elznic in the 800 meter run, freshmen Christina DeRosa and Ashley Davidson both in the 1,500 meter run and junior Elisabeth Budd in the 400 meter hurdles.

Elznic finished ninth in the 800m with a season-best time of 2:25.16. The event was won by UConn's Jillian Sullivan.

DeRosa finished sixth in the 1,500m just ahead of Davidson who finished in seventh. The finished at 4:51.34 and 4:55.51 respectively.

In the 400m hurdles Budd finished in second-place with a time of 1:04.36 behind UConn's Marlene Priest.

Leading the Minutemen on the men's side were junior Corey Draffen and seniors Henry Smith and Mike Carr. The trio were each able to record an event win on Saturday.

Draffen recorded his victory in the 100m dash ahead of UNH's Ronald Harvey and UMass teammate Steve Miceli. Draffen crossed the finish line with a time of 11.45 seconds.

The triple jump event belonged to Smith, who recorded a distance of 43 feet, 7 inches to edge out UNH's Tristan Hall who checked in at 43 feet, 3 inches.

In the javelin throw, Carr beat out six Huskies to win the event. The winning throw for Carr sailed 188 feet, 7 inches, a full 17 feet ahead of David Constant's 171 feet.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, May 4, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 131

Into Amherst event fosters community service

By Hannah Drake
Collegian Staff

Last Friday, approximately 300 students gathered on the Amherst Town Common for the University of Massachusetts's Into Amherst Community Service Day with a kick-off from Chancellor John V. Lombardi and Amherst Town Manager Barry L. Del Costilho.

"This kind of work is the key to what describes the campus and the community interaction," Lombardi said.

"It's what builds the strength of our connection, and what makes it possible for us to have a first-rate community in which to have a first-rate university," he added.

Students volunteered for more than 20 local organizations. Student help varied from garden work, to cleaning, to sorting books for the League of Women Voters, to picking up litter around the Connecticut River Greenway Bike Path State Park, to building a playground at the Amherst Montessori School, to building a handicap access ramp with the Stavros Center for Independent Living.

"This is absolutely one of the best days of the year for us. Not only because we get some work done that is badly needed, and of course when funds are short, every bit helps, but we also get to showcase some of the very best of our students," Del Costilho said.

"For those of us who have devoted our careers to public and community service, it's great to have community service be a part of your education, and a positive experience instead of an alternative to jail," he said.

Students from all different backgrounds and majors participated in the event.

Maria Franco, a junior psychology major, and friend Nicole Desrochers, a sophomore communication disorders major, are two UMass students who volunteered at the Food Bank Farm.

"I thought it sounded like a great idea. I wanted to do something to give back to the community," Franco said.

Both Desrochers and Franco believe that adding community service as an alternative option to the graduation requirements at UMass Amherst would be beneficial to both students and the community.

"It was a requirement for me to graduate high school and it was a really good learning experience," Desrochers said.

"It would be really great to see people helping out year-round, not just at a one-day thing. It would be great to have an even larger presence — a community service week would be great as well, because not everyone can go on a Friday," Franco added.

Into Amherst Day was coordinated by the Town of Amherst and the UMass's Office of Community Service Learning.

"Today is a great day for us because we really see the campus and the community come together as one to solve short and long term community issues. Students help with everything from helping spring clean-up for non-profits, to making real life improvements for people in convalescent homes, or in other non-profit organizations all around Amherst, and for the first year in Hadley, and even over into Pelham as well," graduate student and coordinator Joshua Stearns said.

According to Stearns, Into Amherst Day began 12 years ago. The UMass marching band would lead students from Haigus Mall to the Amherst Town Common, where students would disperse to their various jobs for the day.

"This event is one of the places where students get started on [long-term] involvement. It really does two things. It helps students make connections to this community that we live in, and supports us, and it gives back to the community. For the university to acknowledge its dependence on these communities is critical," said Director of the Office of Community Service Learning John Reiff.

"University students live in Amherst, and Pelham, and surrounding communities. Students come into town if they live on-campus to eat, to play, to buy a pair of shoes—all the things students do. We depend on the community to provide an infrastructure for us that makes this a place worth living, and that's why it's important to give back, and show appreciation," Reiff said.

The day concluded about three hours later in a celebration. UMass Dining Services and other local restaurants provided food and bottled water for the volunteers, and various local vendors donated gift certificates for the raffle.

Chancellor Lombardi stands with fellow Amherst residents Friday afternoon during the fifteenth annual Into Amherst celebration.

UMass fraternity remains closed

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

In hopes of creating a stronger sense of safety awareness in off-campus housing, the Amherst Building Department along with the Amherst Fire Department teamed together last week to crack down on deficiencies and code violations in fraternity housing throughout the area.

Residents of 395 North Pleasant St., home of the Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity, were ordered to leave their building due to "building and fire code violations that were dangerous to life," according to the Amherst Fire Department.

The fraternity had their semi-annual inspection two weeks ago and was scheduled to have a follow-up inspection this past Monday. In the short period of time between the inspections, according to Assistant Fire Chief, Michael Zlogar, the inspectors found that there had been serious deterioration in the conditions of the building.

According to the Amherst Fire Department, the building contained 19 deficiencies and violations of building code.

"There had been minor damage to heat detectors, dangerously excessive use of extension cords and plug strips, rubbish in the hallways, and pieces of furniture obstructed egresses at the front and back exits of the house," said Zlogar. "If there were a fire, nobody would be able to get out."

But the most serious violation was the covering of the smoke detectors throughout the home.

"The number one violation, the impaired smoke detectors, covered in aluminum foil, was most serious because it completely takes the system out of service," said Zlogar.

"They had been told the night before by the property manager to uncover the detectors, but had failed to do so by the time we arrived."

What's particularly frustrating to the inspectors is that the initial inspections, like the one Sigma Alpha Mu's inspection had two weeks ago, is a scheduled inspection set up weeks in advance.

Fraternity residents are alerted to the day and time the inspection team will conduct inspections. And even with that, Zlogar says there are still significant violations and deficiencies within the inspected building.

"If those are the conditions we find when we tell them we're going to be here on this day at this time, this is what we're looking for, and your certificate of occupancy hangs in the balance, and they still don't take that seriously, than we have to change the way they think about safety," said Zlogar.

According to the Web site, campustire.org, there have been six fatalities in off-campus fires within the last three weeks, and 11 this year.

"This type of housing is a huge fire risk. We have to raise these residents awareness to safety and fire hazards," said Zlogar. "They have to get on board with this. They can't just say 'Hey, we passed inspection', and then go and trash the building after we leave."

"We want to make sure that everyone takes their safety seriously every day. We're tightening up our restrictions; we will not except the bear minimum to get by today only to ignore safety tomorrow," said Zlogar. "And if that requires unscheduled inspections, than we may look into that. We will persue every avenue, with officials from the University and the Building Department, to do everything that we can to prevent a fatal fire in our area."

Students urged to donate during drive

By Elizabeth Vargas
Collegian Correspondent

The words "bone marrow donation" may sound initially painful.

However, according to the Student Nurse's Association, the process is actually quite painless and is much easier than a blood donation.

And according to University of Massachusetts Continuing Education student Poppy Hiser, it can also save lives.

Three years ago Hiser registered at the 2002 Bone Marrow Typing Drive.

Almost three years passed before the National Bone Marrow Donor Program Donor Center contacted her to inform her that she was indeed a match for a young boy for a young boy who needed a bone marrow transplant.

Hiser followed through with her commitment and donated her bone marrow to the young boy.

Six months went by and Hiser received a letter from the young boy's mother saying that he was doing very well.

"It gives you an opportunity to save someone. I feel like it's a huge privilege to help save a life."

The University of Massachusetts Student Nurses' Association will be holding its Annual Bone Marrow Typing Drive in Campus Center Room 101 today 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

After filling out a brief health questionnaire, all donors have to do is get their finger pricked and give consent to have tissue type listed on The National Bone Marrow Donor Program Registry.

The National Donor Program then processes the information.

Once a tissue type is on the registry, officials will compare the donator's tissue to thousands of patients around the world who need bone marrow transplants, such as leukemia patients.

If a potential donor is matched to a patient, the donor is contacted by The National Bone Marrow Donor Program Donor Center.

The potential donor is then notify the donator of the match and will be asked to consent to donation.

The Center urges all people to donate. The center stresses that it is important for people of color donate.

These tissue types are the most needed because tissue type is inherited and a patient has a better chance of a match with someone of their own ethnicity.

Potential donors are never forced to donate.

GEO pickets Lombardi's home

By Erin Lemkey
Collegian Correspondent

While the "A-21 Student Boycott/TA Walkout" at the University of Massachusetts drew an estimated 1,400 people on April 21, however graduate students remained vigilant over the fate of their new contract.

Friday morning, over a dozen graduate student employees continued their "flying pickets" with a 6 a.m. morning wake-up call to Chancellor Lombardi.

With the clamor of pots and pans, GEO activists amplified their demand for a contract that includes an increase in stipends, a waiver for student fees, the expansion of health benefits and protection of childcare benefits.

These issues have been central throughout the bargaining process that has been taking place since the spring of last year between GEO and the University. "Wake up John Lombardi!" yelled GEO Grievance Coordinator Mark Nelson, "stop sleepwalking through our contract negotiations!"

While there was no response in the cool dawn air from Lombardi's home near Orchard Hill, graduate students continued to yell for his attention.

Students protest Chancellor Lombardi's residence Friday.

GEO has taken on a campaign of unpredictable flying pickets throughout the month, in an effort to draw attention to their contract negotiations which are nearing a close.

"While it may cause some short-term disruption," said organizer Amanda Plumb, "the intention is to get long-term gains for better health care, stipends, and child care for graduate students." She stressed that upholding these standards will enable UMass to continue to recruit the high quality graduate student teaching assistants who teach many undergraduate classes and partake in University research.

According to the GEO Web site, since the inception of GEO in 1980, the cost of stipends has doubled. In addition, the UMass proposed contract eliminates health insurance for same-sex couples.

The GEO bargaining team has attempted to settle these issues with the University in negotiations that have taken place for almost a year.

According to GEO organizers, UMass has refused to concede on the issues that graduate students have brought to the bargaining table.

Climate lecture series continues

By Ashish K. Sahu
Collegian Staff

There is a need for better policies and more funding for renewable resources in order to solve the problem of rising levels of carbon-dioxide in the Earth's atmosphere, according to Doctor Marty Hoffert, a physics professor from New York University.

Hoffert spoke on "Combating the fossil fuel greenhouse effect by transforming the global energy system" at a public lecture organized by The Environmental Institute (TEI) on Monday.

The lecture was held at the Bernie Dallas Hall at the University of Massachusetts.

There has been a tremendous increase in the carbon-dioxide level in the earth's atmosphere over the past years, which causes global warming.

Scientists predict the Earth's temperature would increase by 2.5 degrees centigrade if carbon-dioxide levels double in the future.

In order to keep carbon-dioxide levels stable, the planet would need 1,000 megawatts of emission-free power per day for the next 50 years.

These levels of carbon-dioxide are not even close to the values of the Kyoto protocol.

Hoffert showed a relation between the Gross Domestic Product (GDP) and the carbon intensity. The average carbon intensity of the world today is about 0.2 kg of carbon per dollar value.

Some countries that are higher than the average are Russia, China, India and Indonesia.

China has about five times higher carbon emissions than any other country in the world because of its high manufacturing units. Some countries that have lower average carbon emission values are Switzerland, Germany, Congo.

Hoffert pointed out that Congo and Switzerland come in the same category, though the former is a underdeveloped country and the latter developed that is because, Switzerland gets its power from France and it has only hydroelectric power so there is less carbon emissions.

The biggest challenge in knowing all this, he emphasized, is to stabilize the carbon emissions while the economy and industry are growing.

Hoffert's solutions suggest using technology such as wind energy, hydrogen as fuel for obtaining some of the carbon free energies.

In New York, the Freedom tower design proposed by Daniel Liebeskin and David Childs will have 25 wind turbines to harness the wind energy from the New York harbor, which will provide 20 percent of the buildings energy.

Hoffert is an ardent believer in technology, as he uses hybrid cars and electricity from utilities obtained from wind energy in Brooklyn.

"Wind and solar are the fastest growing renewable power sources but is not likely to grow without major incentives, research and development and demonstration of enabling technologies," he said.

Some other solutions are technology that captures solar energy in space and beams it on earth, as well as global superconductivity for transmission grid.

Green coal technologies can provide power and reduce the carbon dioxide emissions if developed and deployed on time.

Hoffert talked about clean nuclear technologies, such as the pebble modular reactor, but he said there isn't enough uranium 235 available and one will have to shift to other isotopes and there is a waste problem to tackle.

Doctor Martin Hoffert.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Walking for a cause.

After finishing a 39-mile walk to help raise awareness about breast cancer, Rachel Vidal, 32, celebrates at the finish line in Washington, D.C.

ARTS & LIVING
PATTY GRIFFIN TO PLAY CALVIN
Boston native brings unique Americana to Northampton's Calvin theater.
PAGE 8

EDITORIAL/OPINION
SNELGROVE BEHIND US
The Snelgrove family settlement serves as a warning to UMass students.
PAGE 6

WEATHER
TODAY Showers, 115°
TONIGHT Clear, 134°
TOMORROW Sunny, H67°, L38°

SPORTS
MINUTEWOMWN CLINCH WIN
UMass softball team scores two runs in the seventh to beat BU.
PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Peter Foundas
MANAGING EDITOR Mike Marzelli
BUSINESS MANAGER Rich Pacheco
PRODUCTION MANAGER Cory Rosenberg
NIGHT SUPERVISOR Meghan Healy
ADVERTISING MANAGER Tiffany Sugalski
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Samantha M. Nielsen
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Michael Busach
COMICS EDITOR Alyson Zillmann
EDITORIAL EDITOR Matthew Reid
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Erika Lovley
PHOTO EDITOR Alex Demosthene
SPORTS EDITOR Bob McGovern
CIRCULATION MANAGER Kristen Weiss
CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING Marty Pappas
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Josh Kagano
FINANCE MANAGER Hiral Shah
ACCOUNTING CLERK Virginia Frecaut
HUMAN RESOURCES Sandra Marquez
PROMOTIONS MANAGER Mark Spinosa
ASSISTANT OPERATIONS Linda Wallack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Josh Greenberg
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ASSISTANT FINANCE Thomas Hecht
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Rachael Bruno
GRAPHICS ADVISOR Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Matthew O'Rourke
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Chris Gianzaro
ASSISTANT NEWS Julie O'Donnell
ASSISTANT NEWS Dan O'Brien
ASSISTANT PHOTO Megan Brinster
ASSISTANT SPORTS Jeff Howe
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS CALENDAR SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS INDEPENDENTLY FUNDED, OPERATING ON ADVERTISING REVENUE. FOUNDED IN 1890, THE PAPER BEGAN AS AGGIE LIFE. BECAME THE COLLEGE SCENE IN 1907. THE WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IS HELD AND THE TRI-WEEKLY COLLEGIAN IN 1958. PUBLISHED DAILY SINCE 1967. THE COLLEGIAN HAS BEEN BROADSHEET SINCE JANUARY 1994. FOR ADVERTISING RATES AND INFORMATION, CALL 545-3500 BETWEEN 8:30 A.M. AND 5:30 P.M.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Erika Lovley
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Jamie Lau
COPY EDITOR
Alyson Zillmann
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleson
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nick Belanger, Josh Wensser

www.dailycollegian.com

SLU testing new flu vaccination

By Cheryl Wittenauer
Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — Saint Louis University is testing a needle-free approach to administering the flu vaccination that could use less vaccine and deliver it more efficiently.

Researchers at the medical school's Center for Vaccine Development are studying the use of ultrasonic waves — rather than a syringe — to create microscopic openings in the skin to deliver the flu vaccine.

The theory is that a high concentration of a certain immune system cell in the uppermost layer of the skin will allow the body to respond very efficiently to the vaccine, thus requiring less, said Dr. Elizabeth Babusis, clinical investigator in the study.

Traditionally, vaccine is injected into the muscle, but it doesn't have the same concentration of these cells. The hope is the method will provide better immunity against influenza, using less vaccine.

The sound waves are applied to a small area of the skin via a hand-held device manufactured by Sontra Medical Corp. of Franklin, Mass. Once the skin openings are created, a coin-size patch containing a flu vaccine is placed over the area, allowing the vaccine to pass into the patient's bloodstream.

The technology is widely use to deliver drugs.

"The painless pulse of sound waves takes about 15 seconds and the skin returns to its normal state within 24 hours," said Dr. Robert Belshe, lead investigator for the study and the center's director.

The study, which started this week and will last about a month, will use 50 subjects, half of whom will be vaccinated using the ultrasound device, the other half in the muscle.

Blood samples drawn before and 30 days after the flu vaccination will show whether there's been an increase in antibodies, indicating the vaccine is working.

Belshe said his center published a paper last November in the New England Journal of Medicine on research suggesting a lower dose of flu vaccine is needed when administered between layers of skin rather than in the muscle.

He said Sontra Medical Corp. noticed the paper and contacted Saint Louis University with the ultrasound approach to flu vaccine. Results should be known this summer.

Sontra Medical scientist Shikha Barman said the technology is different — in one critical way — from a transdermal patch that allows medicine to be absorbed into the skin.

The device makes the microscopic channels to allow the drug to pass through the skin. She said vaccine molecules are too large for them to be absorbed efficiently otherwise.

Peter Wright, a pediatric infectious disease specialist at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville, Tenn., who is familiar with Belshe's work, said the research is a good idea and worth doing, though he could not comment specifically on the device.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A patient receives the flu shot.

Police searching for suspect in mysterious Berkshire murder

By Adam Gorlick
Associated Press

STOCKBRIDGE — Ian Stackhouse was no stranger to this Berkshire town that offered a quiet getaway from her home in New York City.

The divorced union worker would sometimes visit friends living in this community idealized in the paintings of native son Norman Rockwell.

But her three-day stay at their home last weekend ended in unexpected tragedy when a motorist spotted her lifeless body alongside a narrow, wooded road Sunday afternoon.

Stackhouse, 52, died from a single wound to her neck, becoming Stockbridge's first homicide victim in more than 35 years, Berkshire District Attorney David Capeless said Monday.

Capeless would not say what kind of weapon was used to kill her.

Nor would he say whether investigators had any suspects.

He said Stackhouse was last seen alive Sunday afternoon when she left her friends' house to go for a walk by herself.

About 30 minutes later, a motorist called 911 to report finding her body alongside Dugway road, Capeless said.

News of the grisly discovery spread quickly along Main Street, featured in many of Rockwell's idyllic illustrations of New England life.

"Stockbridge is such a small, old-fashioned town," said Erin Wentworth, 26, who works in a downtown art gallery. "I try not to take it for granted, but we don't lock our doors at night and we leave our cars running on Main Street. I guess we're a little sheltered here."

The heavily wooded area where Stackhouse's body was found is not far from Rockwell's former studio, now a museum, as well as the home of Lincoln Memorial sculptor Daniel Chester French.

On Monday morning, state police were using metal detectors and surveying equipment to search for clues along the banks of a brook that runs alongside Dugway Road.

"It's a very strange thing to have happen in this town," said Paul Costelloe, a 55-year-old builder and inventor who lives in nearby Washington.

"I'm hoping I don't know who was involved."

Stockbridge's last homicide was in 1969, when Glendale resident John Winn beat to death a Connecticut man he'd accused of molesting his daughter.

Stackhouse, who lived in New York City's Brooklyn Heights neighborhood, had worked for the past three years as a director in the membership and dues department at Local 1199 of the Service Employees International Union.

She was divorced, lived alone and didn't have any children.

Her mother, Jane Stackhouse of St. Augustine, Fla., said she would make periodic visits to her Stockbridge friends.

Snelgroves receive settlement

By Michael Kunzelman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Victoria Snelgrove wanted to be a successful broadcast journalist, but the 21-year-old college student also looked forward to meeting her "Prince Charming" and starting a family.

"I'm still young. I still have time," she said on a videotape she recorded in her bedroom.

Less than a year later, Snelgrove was killed by police who were trying to subdue rioters after the Boston Red Sox won the American League pennant last fall.

On Monday, the city paid a $5.1 million settlement to Snelgrove's parents. It is believed to be the largest settlement in the city's history.

Snelgrove, an Emerson College senior from East Bridgewater, was hit in the eye socket with a pepper-spray pellet fired by a police officer outside Fenway Park on Oct. 21 after Boston eliminated the New York Yankees.

"I can't even imagine the pain the Snelgrove family has felt and will continue to feel," Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole said. "There is no amount of money that can relieve that pain, I'm sure."

Snelgrove's parents, Richard and Dianne Snelgrove, and her brother, Michael, spoke at length about her death on a DVD their attorney gave to reporters Monday.

"She was the light of our life," her mother said. "When she died, the light went out."

Richard Snelgrove recalled witnessing the last 12 hours of his daughter's life, after she lapsed into a coma. The family kept a bedside vigil in the hospital and watched her slowly "fade away," he said.

"I would hold her hand and

See SNELGROVE on page 3

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Boston Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole addresses the media during a press conference yesterday about the Snelgrove settlement.

Do you dream of the highest quality, craftsmanship & comfort in your mattress?

The YANKEE Mattress Factory

Zzzz Luxurious, hand crafted sleep sets

Zzzz Custom-made sizes, antiques, RV mattresses and waterbed inserts

Zzzz Locally owned with 14 years of providing affordable, superior mattresses for a great night's sleep

Now conveniently located in Amherst Center!

220 North Pleasant St.
Amherst, MA 01002
413-658-0013

Today is your LAST day to apply for assistant news editor!
Please fill out application and attach resume and writing samples at the Collegian office by midnight!

www dailycollegian com

FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
*a grade dispute?
*teacher, roommate or job concerns?
*billing problems?
*harassment?
*...or any other University related problem?
THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course!)
students, faculty and staff are all welcome
522 Campus Center
Office hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0567
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Attention Seniors!
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
Congratulations to the Class of 2005 from your Alumni Association!
Visit the Alumni Association Table at Cap and Gown May 2-20 in the Textbook Annex. Get your FREE Young Alumni Guide and enter to win $1,000!
Join the Alumni Association for only $20 - Get two chances to win $1,000 and 1/2 off your Commencement Ball ticket!
UMassAlumni.com
You were. You are. UMASS.

Choose your classroom...
Take summer online courses taught by the faculty of the Isenberg School of Management and have the flexibility of choosing when and where your class meets. Have a look at the abundant offerings for this summer!
Summer Session I: June 6 - July 14
Summer Session II: July 18 - August 24
Build your business skills by taking any of the many online business courses offered this summer.
SUMMER 2005 COURSE OFFERINGS
Accounting 221, Accounting 222, Accounting 371
Fin & Op Mgmt 250, Fin & Op Mgmt 301, Fin & Op Mgmt 347, Fin & Op Mgmt 359, Fin & Op Mgmt 370
Management 260, Management 301, Management 314, Management 3[illegible], Management [illegible]
Marketing 301, Marketing 412, Marketing 437
Sch-Mgmt 197I, Sch-Mgmt 210, Sch Mgmt 310, Sch Mgmt 391A, Sch Mgmt 497A
To find out more information, contact UMass Continuing Education at 545-3430
Register for courses by visiting umassulearn.net or call 545-3653 or 1-800-922-8211

National News

Customer bites on finger in ice cream

RALEIGH, N.C. — (AP) This time, no one is doubting the claims: A customer really did find part of a worker's finger in a pint of frozen chocolate custard purchased at a shop in North Carolina.

Despite the horrifying find — and widespread media coverage of an infamous finger incident at a Wendy's restaurant in California in March — workplace statistics show that the chance of a body part winding up in food is extremely small.

The piece of index finger, which an employee had severed at the first knuckle, was found Sunday by Clarence Stowers in a pint of dessert he purchased from Kohl's Frozen Custard in the coastal town of Wilmington.

Kohl's owner Craig Thomas said 23-year-old employee Brandon Fizer tried to catch a bucket of custard he had dropped and accidentally put his finger into a machine that beats the custard mix. As shop workers tried to help Fizer, a drive-thru window attendant unknowingly scooped frozen custard from the bucket containing the finger and served it to Stowers.

The state Department of Labor is investigating to determine whether Kohl's was in compliance with state workplace safety rules — a probe that likely will take about two weeks.

—Associated Press

ASSOCIATED PRESS

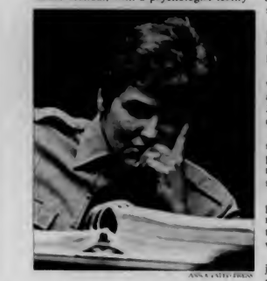
Kohl's employee, Will Franklin shows his mangled index finger he received from an accident last summer. A customer recently reported finding a human finger in her ice cream after a similar accident was reported.

Snelgrove family reaches settlement

SNELGROVE from page 2

there was just no movement," he said. "We stayed there 'til the last few moments. It was absolutely the most horrific time of our life."

Shortly after his daughter died, Richard Snelgrove discovered the videotape she recorded, apparently for a class project. Sitting on her bed, Victoria Snelgrove recalls feeling that she lived in a "bubble" until an aunt died after a short battle with brain cancer.



"Our lives were so good and we haven't been in touch with any tragedy or anything," she said. "That's one of my biggest fears — that in a second my life or somebody close to me's life could just be taken away."

The DVD ends with a montage of family photos, including one her best friend Kaitlyn Sachetta snapped just minutes before Snelgrove's death.

Iraqi prisoner abuse hearings underway

By T.A. Badger
Associated Press

FORT HOOD, Texas — Defense lawyers sought leniency for Pfc. Lyndie England at a hearing Tuesday to determine her punishment in the Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal, with a psychologist testifying that the reservist was oxygen-deprived at birth, speech impaired and had trouble learning to read.

ASSOCIATED PRESS

A former prison guard listens to testimony in the Iraqi prisoner abuse hearing yesterday.

West Virginia school psychologist Dr. Thomas Denne — the first defense witness — said England's learning disabilities were identified when she was a kindergartner — and though she made progress in school, she continued needing special help.

"I knew I was going to know Lyndie England for the rest of my life," West Virginia school psychologist Dr. Thomas Denne said.

A military jury of five men and one woman was seated earlier Tuesday to make a sentencing recommendation for England, 22, who pleaded guilty Monday to seven counts of mistreating prisoners.

England accepted responsibility for the smiling, thumbs-up poses she struck for photographs taken at Abu Ghraib that made her the face of the prisoner abuse scandal.

The charges carry up to 11 years in prison. Prosecutors and the defense reached an agreement that caps the sentence at a lesser punishment; the length was not released.

She will get the lesser of the military jury's sentence or the term agreed on in the plea bargain.

Prosecutor Capt. Chris Graveline told jurors in opening statements that England and a half-dozen other soldiers in the 372nd Military Police Company took great pleasure in humiliating the prisoners. The prosecution rested its sentencing case without calling any witnesses.

Graveline said England and Pvt. Charles Graner Jr. — the abuse ringleader and the father of England's child — knew it was wrong to mistreat the detainees and take the photos, "but they did it anyway for their own amusement."

Graner is scheduled to testify for the defense.

In one of the photos, England held a leash looped around the neck of a hooded, naked prisoner. Another showed her next to nude prisoners stacked in a pyramid, while a third depicted England pointing at a prisoner's genitals as a cigarette dangled from her lips.

When asked by judge Col. James Pohl whether England knew right from wrong, Denne said she had a compliant personality and tended to listen to authority figures.

On Monday, England told Pohl that she initially resisted taking part in the abuse at the Baghdad prison, but that she succumbed to peer pressure.

"I had a choice, but I chose to do what my friends wanted me to," she said.

Graner was convicted in January on abuse charges and is serving a 10-year prison sentence.

Why play video games, when a quick, painless finger prick could save a life?
Come to the Student Nurses' Association Annual Bone Marrow Typing Drive!
May 4th 10-4pm
Campus Center
Rm 101
YOU could be a match!

MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR
Cinco de Mayo
$500 in Prizes
Wet T-Shirt Contest
May 5
Only 20 minutes from campus
1910 Memorial Drive Chicopee MA
www.maximumsportsbar.com

HEY SENIORS!
NEED NEW WHEELS TO GET TO THAT NEW JOB?
UMassFive, the Official Credit Union of UMass Amherst Students, has teamed up with Enterprise Car Sales to offer you high quality used cars at fantastic low prices with low rate Credit Union financing.
If you are a graduating senior who has already accepted a job offer and are in the market for a new set of wheels, then the UMassfive Enterprise Car sale is for you. Even if you are not a member, you can still join before you graduate. Just apply online at www.umassfive.org to be pre-approved.
WHY BUY FROM ENTERPRISE?
No Haggle Pricing.
Certified Vehicles
All Vehicles Below Book Value.
Money Back Satisfaction Guarantee.
Powertrain Warranty, Service Contracts and Roadside Assistance.
UMassFIVE COLLEGE FEDERAL CREDIT UNION
800.852.5886
www.umassfive.org
INCREDIBLE ONE DAY EVENT:
Date: Saturday, May 14th
Time: 9 a.m. to 2 p.m.
Place: UMassFive at 200 Westgate Center Drive in Hadley (next to Applebee's)
Over 60 late model, low mileage vehicles available on-site!
Preview the inventory at www.ecars.com.
WANT TO SWEETEN THE DEAL?
Get pre-approved, use your UMassFive financing to buy a vehicle during the Sale and we'll make your first car payment up to $500. You'll make no payment until July 30th!
BE AHEAD OF THE GAME!
Get pre-approved before the sale and your car purchase will be a breeze. As an added bonus, we'll give $25.00 in FREE GAS to all pre-approved buyers!
Apply online today at www.umassfive.org to be pre-approved. You can also preview the inventory at www.ecars.com.
Enterprise 1-800-car sales

FINAL INSTRUCTIONS
For Seniors About The Commencement Ceremony
135th Commencement Ceremony Sunday, May 22, 2005

Pre Commencement General Information:

There is no Commencement rehearsal.

Tickets are not required and there is no limit on the number of guests you may invite. There is no reserved seating. The stadium is uncovered. The ceremony will be held at the stadium, rain or shine. Tell your guests your entry and exit gate numbers.

UNIVERSITY REGULATIONS STRICTLY PROHIBIT THE POSSESSION OR CONSUMPTION OF ALCOHOL AT THE STADIUM. NO GLASS OR METAL CONTAINERS WILL BE ALLOWED IN THE ASSEMBLY AREA OR ON THE FIELD. THIS POLICY WILL BE ENFORCED FOR BOTH GRADUATES AND GUESTS.

Photographs of graduates will be taken in the assembly area by Chappell Images. Proofs will be mailed to your permanent address. You decide to purchase or not – no obligation. Costs range from $7.00 depending on the package you choose.

The Index (the yearbook) may be ordered by calling 545-3600

Commencement Videotapes and DVDs may be ordered by calling 545-1283. Also, there will be a booth at the stadium where videos may be ordered.

The University Club on campus will be open to the public and will serve gourmet meals from 12 noon to 4 p.m. It accepts MasterCard, Visa, Diner's Club, and Carte Blanche. To make reservations, call 545-2551 as soon as possible.

Disability Services for mobility or hearing impaired guests, please call 545-0892. For guests who are unable to walk long distances, please park in Lot 25 near the Mullins Center. Shuttle buses will provide transportation to and from the stadium. Wheel chairs are also accommodated.

Diplomas will be mailed after the grades have been received, recorded and processed by the Registrar's Office, and the diplomas have been engrossed, which is usually in early September. Inquiries may be made to the Registrar's Office, 545-6296.

Commencement Morning Time Schedule:

9:00-9:15 a.m.: Students should arrive at the assembly area, Yellow Lot #11, no later than 9:15 a.m., carrying your cap and gown.

9:15 a.m.: Lew Louraine, Operations Director of the Fine Arts Center, and Commencement Marshals will help graduates line up by school/college and escort the Processional onto the field.

9:30-9:45 a.m.: Chappell Images photographs individual graduates.

10:00 a.m.: Faculty Processional begins. Faculty greet Degree Candidates at each gate.

10:05 a.m.: Processional of Degree Candidates (See entrance gates.)

10:25 a.m.: Platform Party Processional.

11:45 a.m.: Recessional begins. Graduates exit through north gates #1 and #2.

12:00 noon: Chancellor's Reception for Graduates and Guests.

What to do and where to go when you get to the stadium:

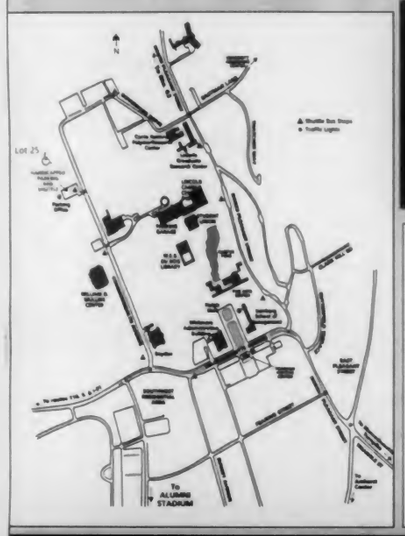
Go directly to the Graduate Assembly Area in Yellow Lot #11 north of the football stadium. Do not enter through the main gates of the stadium. Marshals will greet you and Lew Louraine will organize the Student Processional.

Look for the signs for your college/school. If you are unsure of the school or college of your major, see "Gate Entrances by Degree Program/Major."

Commencement Photographs will be taken as the procession of degree candidates gets underway. Graduates will be photographed in their regalia. Proofs of these photographs will be mailed to graduates along with order forms and information for those wishing to purchase prints.

Commencement Day General Information:

Routes to campus/travel assistance: Please advise your guests to plan ahead to allow extra travel time to campus. Traffic is usually very heavy on major routes and in the greater Amherst area as early as 9:00 a.m., and delays are frequently encountered. (Commencements at Amherst and Mount Holyoke Colleges are the same day at 10:00 a.m.) Encourage your guests to arrive by 9:00 a.m., park in the upper campus lots, and take a shuttle bus to the stadium. Seating at the stadium is "first-come-first-served."



Parking and shuttle services: Police officers will direct you to designated parking lots. Beginning at 8:00 a.m., free shuttle buses will circle campus every 5-10 minutes, taking you and your guests to the stadium, and returning you to the lot after the ceremony. Please take note of the lot number.

Snacks and souvenirs: Coffee, soft drinks, bottled water, donuts, bagels, and pastries are available at the refreshment stands on both sides of the stadium. Fresh-cut roses, bouquets of flowers, and balloons will be for sale inside and outside the stadium. Sweatshirts, T-shirts, baseball caps, seat cushions, diploma frames, teddy bears, banners, disposable cameras, and film are available at the tent on the east side. In addition, the University Store in the Campus Center will be open from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. with a complete supply of UMass clothing, gifts, and other merchandise.

Food Services: Grinders, salads, wraps, fruit cups, desserts, and more are available. You may preorder Gourmet Box Lunches.

Meeting arrangements: You will exit through the north gates #1 and #2. Be sure to decide ahead of time where you will meet your family after the ceremony. The Chancellor's Reception is a good place to gather and to make introductions to friends and family. Individual gathering sites will be marked for each college and school.

Post-Commencement Reception: After the ceremony, graduates and guests are invited to the Chancellor's Reception. It will be held under the large white tent in the southeast corner of the stadium near the entry gates. Punch and cookies will be served. This is an opportunity to meet, greet, and take a family photograph with the Chancellor. Faculty are also invited to attend.

Caps and Gowns:

Caps, Gowns and Tassels are available now through May 20 at the Textbook Annex
Hours of operation are 9:00 a.m. – 4 p.m.
Monday through Friday
A student ID card is required to confirm eligibility
With your cap and gown you will receive one 4
Commencement Announcement
Personalized announcements may be purchased through Printing Services (151 Whitmore, 545-2718)
You are strongly advised to pick up your rental gown as soon as possible

REMEMBER

University regulations prohibit the possession or use of alcohol at the stadium.

No glass or metal containers will be allowed in the assembly area or on the field.

This policy will be enforced.

Gate Entrances by Major

Major	Gate
[illegible]	4
[illegible]	4
[illegible]	4

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Final Snelgrove settlement holds warning for students

The family of Victoria Snelgrove can finally lay their daughter to rest after being paid $5.1 million in a settlement from the city of Boston. Of course, no monetary equivalent will ever bring back Snelgrove or erase what happened. Although the situation has now been placed behind us, it is vitally important to forever keep Snelgrove in mind during future college celebrations.

With the UMass Police Department adding Tasers to their arsenal next semester, an onus will be on the UMass student population to be on their best behavior, at least in terms of riotous celebrations. However, that cooperation from the students is only contingent upon the UMPD.

According to a statement from Boston Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole to the Associated Press, "Tory was not the target of any police action, nor was she engaged in an activity that would have led police to think that she was behaving unlawfully."

This situation accurately describes the average UMass student at any of the riots during the American League Championship Series games. It has become apparent that most students act as observers at riots. Snelgrove was one of those observers and died as a result. This is not to discourage celebration, but only to think and reflect on the situation that surrounded Snelgrove's death.

In addition to the settlement, Deputy Superintendent Robert E. O'Toole has announced that he will be retiring from the police force. While Snelgrove's situation served as a warning to students, O'Toole's resignation serves as a warning to police officers.

Proper training and proper recognition of hazardous and threatening situations is one way for police officers to prevent another accidental death from occurring. Carelessness is the most serious threat to student safety, especially with new weapons that, although there will be training involved, are still new.

Snelgrove was killed by a pepper-spray pellet shot in her eye socket. With Tasers coming in, it is not certain whether older forms of weaponry and crowd control, such as the pellet guns and tear gas, will be going out. There never needs to be another example of brute force and personal consequence to prove the point that riotous behavior is dangerous, whether that danger comes from the participants or the police officers.

A lot can be done with $5.1 million dollars. That money can go to benefit Boston's public education systems, improve the city's crime statistics and the city of Boston generally a better and safer place. It is truly tragic that that money had to go to comfort a family who has lost their daughter. Please keep this in mind as the semester ends and baseball season continues to flourish.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Motherhood isn't for everyone

Amelia Sabadini

It was about this time last year that I had a fight with a very large woman in a coffee shop. Maybe fight is too strong a word; we weren't actually making physical contact with each other. If we had been, she probably would've mopped the floor with me. We had an altercation, that's more like it. She had left her two small (somewhere between the ages of four and six) unruly children at the table next to mine and had disappeared into the crowd, presumably to join her friend up at the counter. Her children had climbed on top of the table and started rocking it back and forth.

Intermittently she had returned to restore temporary order and bestow cookies (for the desired good behavior the little darlings couldn't maintain). On her very next fly by, after the kids had started throwing things, I asked her if she was going to be leaving. She snorted "Yeah" at me and I knew she was pissed, but so was I. So I added "soon hopefully?" Well that set it off. She started swiping things off the table and jamming them into her bag, she jerked her kids up by their arms and kicked the chairs back and then she shouted at me, "They're only a couple of kids. You'd think you could put up with it for a couple of minutes."

It's strange how people will reveal themselves in a moment like that. Passion is often a mercenary for truth. This woman had been neglecting her children with the expectation that the 30-something woman she'd left them near (that would be me) would pick up the slack. Now, I don't like kids, no bones about it.

However, if I had been entrusted with the care of two children, I wouldn't walk away from them in a busy café. I wouldn't assume that they were safe just because I'd left them near a complete stranger who looked sane. I still don't know what this woman was doing with kids.

A big part of why I don't like kids is that being female I am expected to like them. I know that sounds reactionary, but it's not when you realize the extent to which women are expected to like children. We are expected to like children to a point that seems nearly pathological. We're expected and encouraged to have children whether or not we can provide for them (financially and/or emotionally). We're expected to drop everything and make fawning noises if someone shows up with just pictures of a baby. If they've got a real baby, we're suppose to be beside ourselves lining up for a chance to get spit up on. We're told that our absolute fulfillment will be found in motherhood when this just isn't so for everyone.

[Women] are expected to like children to a point that seems nearly pathological. We're expected and encouraged to have children whether or not we can provide for them. (Financially and/or emotionally).

You might think with the way that females get motherhood pushed at them that we, as a society, actually value children and the parent-child relationship. We don't. If we do, then why are our school systems lacking in funding? Why is childcare at the workplace so rare in this country? Why is it that right here at UMass, the Administration is displaying a total disregard for the childcare needs of its students and employees?

Institutions are allowed to issue ultimatums to women about personal life vs. professional advancement. Women get put in situations where they have to decide between opportunities for advancement and the immediate safety of their children. Often, the professional advancement is going to bring an improved earning capacity that both mother and child will need. These ultimatums are not fair and would be inconceivable if children were truly valued as anything other than potential load stones around women's necks.

How is setting up a situation where a woman is apt to feel resentful of her children conducive to having healthy productive members of society in the next generation? I'm not just talking about women who had to down shift or bail on their education and or careers here; plenty of women who thought they were going to be satisfied being housewives found out otherwise.

It seems that females get inundated with the babies-are-the-be-all-and-end-all message because someone has to pick up the slack in a society that neglects its children. This isn't fair to either women or children. I don't like children and I don't plan on having any, but I'd pay twice what I pay in taxes if it would go to public education and child health care instead of military spending. Everyone has a certain degree of obligation to the children in our society. All of us have to pick up the slack and some of us have to realize motherhood isn't for everybody.

Amelia Sabadini is a Collegian columnist.

Letter to a young columnist

Thomas Naughton

Dear X,

Recently scandalized on a minute scale by right-wing fringe bloggers and 10-watt conservative talk-radio shows because of a number of my columns, I found myself encountering our First Amendment and all of its responsibilities and pressures head on.

Much to my surprise and bewilderment, there are many people outside of our college community who read the Ed/Op page of The Daily Collegian and seem to have a real vested interest in what is said by the columnists who write for it.

I am elated that a whole community outside of our own is interested in our newspaper. I feel honored to have a diverse group of people read my writing and feel affected by it; however, there is a major responsibility and danger that comes with having the job of handing out your opinion.

That is why I have written to you today, X, to pass on some major advice to you or anyone wishing to navigate the sometimes-dangerous territory that columnists tread by choice. I'm not attempting to crown myself King of the medium; I still have much to learn myself, but its part of my job to keep people from making the same mistakes I've made. You can be diametrically opposed to me and everything I write about (I hope that is the case for at least some of you, or else I'm out of a job), but there is no denying that what I learned by falling flat on my face will help you, so I humbly ask you to consider my letter.

YOU HAVE TO FIGHT FOR YOUR READERS.

Why am I a writer? I have some kind of crazy idea that what I have to say needs to be said and no one else can say it just like me. Every time I want to give up and let some hack take my spot to write about the religious denominations of each player of the Red Sox, I think about what would happen if my story wasn't told, if my angle wasn't considered. The emptiness of that missed opportunity should make you want to jump out the window. If it doesn't, you don't have any business writing.

If you don't have the intention of completely arresting your readership every single time you write something, then you won't and no one will read a thing you say ever again. Sound scary or even paranoid? Perhaps a little. You'll be read again, but you have to believe you won't in order to have the urgency inside of you needed to say what needs to be said. Since I don't have the experience or authority to teach a class on this, you'll have to learn arresting tactics by trial and error. You'll know how well you did when your friends talk about your latest piece without you asking for their opinion.

Whatever you write takes on a life of its own and its message can be twisted, misunderstood and warped from its original intention — so much that it can terrify and surprise you. I accepted that reality and I continue to live through it as I mature with my writing.

ANTICIPATE DISTRUCTION.

When I was a teenager writing for a small magazine with my friends in high school, my mother imparted unto me a reality of publication: whatever you write takes on a life of its own and its message can be twisted, misunderstood and warped from its original intention — so much that it can terrify and surprise you. I accepted that reality and I continue to live through it as I mature with my writing.

That being said, some of your writing is just not fit to print. I don't know a single young writer who doesn't cringe when looking back on some of the things they've printed, myself included.

In converse, you have to beware of your own vitriol. As someone who is completely devoid of all diplomacy, I see sugar-coating or watering down of one's words or ideas as the enemy, and as a result, I can sometimes step over the line which determines what is "offensive." I always laugh at the idea of "offensiveness" and that's why I still have a lot of learning to do, but the fact remains that by putting your thoughts out there, you will invariably offend someone. That means you are doing your job. It also means that you have to decide how much you want to deal with the consequences.

YOU WILL BE THREATENED.

While standing up for yourself, you will face threats of violence and death. I didn't believe this until I received phone calls, emails and even one hand written letter threatening to kill me. I have been followed to classes and harassed in the dining commons (thanks, dish guy). It's frightening, but I knew that I somehow chose that result by being unafraid to say exactly what I want. Freedom of Speech is a lie, not a law. Just do as Jenny said to Forest, "run away," but don't stop writing.

You can't stop, X, I know it and so do you. Only when you let others take away your voice are you a real failure, and that's the golden rule.

With love,
T.P.N.

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

Social Security under attack

Ethan Burke

Social Security is a social insurance and pension program that has protected the most vulnerable Americans from economic disaster. During the Great Depression, when disaster struck, there was nothing for people to fall back on in times of soaring poverty and unemployment. The idea was that a decent society could not allow the elderly, widows and their children to live in destitution with no means of support.

The importance of Social Security is not even disputed. On the White House Web site under the title, "Strengthening Social Security," one of the bullet-points reads, "For one-third of Americans over 65, Social Security benefits constitute 90 percent of their total income." The Web site goes on to explain, what has been called a "crisis," and claims that the president's plans for privatization will "fix" the problem and "make it a better deal for our younger workers."

A quick glance at the facts indicates there is no crisis. Assuming long-term economic growth will be about half of the historical level, the Social Security Administration estimates Social Security will not have the assets to fund its promised benefits in the year 2042. If the economic growth continues to outpace SSA estimates, as it did in the 90s, Social Security faces no problems in the foreseeable future.

The only way the Bush administration will be able to find acceptance for dismantling most popular and successful social program in American history is through fear and misinformation

Let's assume the SSA projections are correct. In 2042, Social Security will only pay 74 percent of its promised benefits. Seventy four percent of future promised benefits is greater than benefits received today after adjusting for inflation because benefits increase with the national average annual wage.

Still assuming there will be a shortfall in 2042, there are several solutions. Social Security taxes are funded by payroll taxes capped at $90,000 of annual income. Raising the cap could solve the problem. A modest increase of the payroll tax rate would also do the trick. Restoring the Bush tax cuts for the wealthiest one percent of Americans solves the "crisis." Adjusting promised benefits to increase at a slower pace could also alleviate any looming shortfall.

Why are we being told Social Security is in crisis? The president and like-minded people want to eliminate the social programs that came along with The New Deal. The only way the Bush administration will be able to find acceptance for dismantling the most popular and successful social program in American history is through fear and misinformation. The president has raised millions of dollars to mount the latest propaganda offensive. President Bush, Treasury Secretary John Snow and even Karl Rove are traveling around the country misinforming the American public.

DECEPTIVE STATEMENT No. 1:

"Just 13 years from now, in 2018, the government will begin to pay out more in Social Security benefits than it collects in payroll taxes. By the year 2027, the government will somehow have to come up with an extra $200 billion a year to keep the system afloat." The first sentence is misleading. Social Security has built up a trust fund currently worth $1.7 trillion. Interest earnings will actually increase assets and the fund will be worth $6.6 trillion in 2028. Saying that the government will "somehow have to come up with an extra $200 billion" is deceitful given the massive savings in the trust fund.

DECEPTIVE STATEMENT No. 2:

"There is no trust fund, just IOU's." Trust fund assets are in U.S. government bonds. Unless our government plans on defaulting on its debt payments, the president is lying. And if bonds purchased by the American public are deemed worthless, the government has stolen the savings of middle and low-income workers to fund tax cuts for the rich in the single largest case of fraud in history.

DECEPTIVE STATEMENT No. 3:

"Social Security is facing an $11 trillion shortfall." This is true when calculating for infinity. This number is useless unless the objective is to scare people with big numbers.

DECEPTIVE STATEMENT No. 4:

Privatization "strengthens Social Security." There is nothing "social" or "secure" with private accounts. Social insurance will be replaced by private investing. The purpose of Social Security is to provide "security." Whether workers would benefit or lose with private accounts depends on whether they retire during a boom or bust in unstable financial markets.

DECEPTIVE STATEMENT No. 5:

"African American males die sooner than other males do, which means the system is inherently unfair." I laughed in disgust at this one. Rather than addressing the causes of shorter life expectancy for black males — healthcare, poverty and violence — the president uses this fact to pitch privatization. However, life expectancy for black males is lower due to higher infant mortality rates and higher exposure to violent crime. When adjusted for males who reach age 65, there is little difference between life expectancy for black and white males. Blacks also tend to benefit more from progressive benefits under Social Security where lower income workers receive greater benefits.

Social Security is under attack, and if Americans value this program (and polls show they do), we must demand that our leaders protect and strengthen Social Security, or complacently watch as our future security is taken from us.

Ethan Burke is a Collegian columnist.

Europe served as eye opener

Colin Jones

There's a certain element in the human condition that causes the differences we see in each other: subjectivity. Any experience is subjective, and the reactions that any one person can have to any experience are dependent on a huge number of factors and impossible to predict. We often forget this, and in doing so, when we act upon the world, we push our needs and wants outward, projecting them onto people and situations. This can often lead to failure, resentment, doubt ... a multitude of negative internal responses that we incorrectly attribute as reflective of environmental influences, rather than personal faults.

Forcing any issue will rarely lead to success, and in the rare instance in which it does, it does so for the wrong reasons. But enough epic intangibility. Your grandmother was right. You will catch more flies with honey than with vinegar.

I remember the first time I became fully aware of my own arrogance and the ignorance implicit with it. The realization itself probably began the first time I stepped off the plane when I arrived in Cork, ready to begin five months of adventures with a combination of anxiety and anticipation. As time passed, living in a new place with new people, I started to see things differently. Culture shock can sometimes be the perfect remedy for stagnation.

Months later, a friend of mine and I embarked on a true quest, though at the time we both felt that it was probably going to be just one crazy party: a two-week long odyssey across the continent of Europe. We started things off on the right (or wrong?) foot from the beginning, getting wasted on a 10-hour bus ride to Dublin. After a short stay at the not-so-luxurious Stansted Airport in London, we met another good buddy of mine in Berlin, who was on exchange there for the year.

Already, though, a change had begun, a subtle interior shift beginning imperceptibly and yet one that was to forever mark this journey as the first time I really opened my eyes.

After many rounds, a night of drunken sleep and a day of sightseeing, we hit the bars with some of his German friends. I was struck by how respectful and open-minded they were. Although they were highly opinionated on every topic from politics and the role of America in the world to the evolution of Metallica, they listened and displayed a genuine curiosity I have rarely seen, before or since.

Next was Prague. We took a daylong train ride, and out the window we saw snow-capped mountains, quaint cottages and endless, evergreen forests. Already, though, a change had begun, a subtle interior shift beginning imperceptibly and yet one that was to forever mark this journey as the first time I really opened my eyes. When we got to the city, one of my friends admitted that he had never been to a strip club. As there was no shortage of them in the area, we immediately set about finding one.

Prague is a city where sex and beauty are commodities, and while in one sense I was in awe of the sheer number of exotic-looking beautiful women everywhere, in another sense, I felt guilty. As a result of my birthright as an American middle-class white male, I have never had to worry about where my next meal was going to come from or if I could find a place to sleep. Doubtlessly, many of the women selling themselves to strangers on the street on that cold night or who later danced for our money onstage were looking for those very things, not for only themselves but for their families as well.

Over the course of choosing just the right spot (because in Prague there are so many you can be picky), these African guys approached us and tried to persuade us to check out a certain club. "These girls love Americans," they told us, and being that we had no idea of what was what, we went along with them. While we were walking to the club, one of the Africans explained that he is paid commission to bring people from the street to the club. He also said that he wanted to come to America someday. "I've heard that I can sweep the streets and make enough money for my wife and my son." I was so taken aback by that statement; it resonated right in my gut.

A few days later, while in Amsterdam (yes, all the stories are true), I was getting ready to smoke a joint in one of their beautiful public parks. "Don't do that," my friend told me. When I asked him why, he said "You've got to stop pushing yourself on people, man. I'd like to smoke too, but I'm not going to, and the reason is not because I wouldn't want to, but because this isn't the place. Just because you can doesn't mean you should." As I looked around and saw the families enjoying the nice day together, the elderly couples sitting on the benches, the children rollerblading on the stone walkway ... I knew he was right. He had stated a principle that I had known but ignored many times, often out of selfishness.

So now, I feel grateful for the opportunities afforded to me by my birthright alone. And while on a personal level I often make mistakes, when viewing things from a societal standpoint, I now have a social conscience. I try to listen more, not just hear, but to give other people my full attention. When I see activists speaking volumes about their particular plight, while I often sympathize with it, I notice that their method often precludes them from getting the results they want. Pushing is a disrespectful action, while pulling is not. If we can remember this, and try to apply it more in our day-to-day lives, we might find things will be better for all of us.

Colin Jones is a Collegian columnist.

Apathy harms human rights

Samantha Sharac

There are many reasons why the Boston Red Sox are a great team. One reason is the Red Sox's stance against gender violence.

According to Voice Male, a magazine put out by Western Massachusetts' Men's Resource Center, "In partnership with Northeastern University's Center for the Study of Sport in Society, the Red Sox trained their players in the Center's nationally renowned Mentors in Violence Prevention program, an innovative gender violence prevention and education program."

The MVP program helps both men and women work as a team in finding solutions against gender violence such as domestic violence, rape and sexual harassment. The program turns these so called "women's issues" into human rights issues; both men and women participate in this inclusive and educational venue to stop the violence against human beings.

For the Boston Red Sox to realize the importance of the program is a credible effort on their part to educate themselves and their families, as well as bring awareness about these issues to the Major League Baseball audience. Go Red Sox.

Aside from the MVP program, there are other ways to educate yourself on human rights. For instance, if you watch pornography, do you understand how destructive viewing pornography really is? Robert Jensen, Professor in the School of Journalism at the University of Texas at Austin, says it best when he defines pornography and other aspects of the sex industry as a "system in which women are sold for sexual pleasure."

In other words, "Do you want to live in a world in which some people are bought and sold for the sexual pleasure of others?" This is the reality of pornography, as well as prostitution, strip bars, etc. People who seek out these activities are, themselves, buying and selling other people.

Whether or not going to strip bars or watching a porn flick is fun, the fact remains that some people are being exploited. Are you willing to exploit someone else in order to get what you want? It is hurtful when human beings are turned into sexual commodities? Apathy is also hurtful.

Apathetic behavior includes "[Looking] the other way as your friend tries to get the woman he's out at a club with drunk ...

If a person simply tunes out a neighbor's verbal abuse, will that same person tune out when the neighbor hits, rapes or kills his girlfriend? Apathy solves nothing, but only increases the chances of harmful actions to perpetuate.

[or][turning] up the radio when the guy in the dorm room next door starts shouting at his girlfriend again."

Pretending that nothing is wrong does not make the situation disappear. A person who tries to get someone else drunk so sexual advances can proceed is also someone who is capable of other manipulative acts like sexual harassment and assault. Likewise, if a person simply tunes out a neighbor's verbal abuse, will that same person tune out when the neighbor hits, rapes or kills his girlfriend? Apathy solves nothing, but only increases the chances of harmful actions to perpetuate and aggravate.

University Health Services' Community Health and Patient Educator Thomas Schiff offers excellent reasons why and how men should protest violence against women. "Violence is a man's issue." Because men are the main perpetrators, as well as primary targets of violence in general, men need to challenge violence and its connection with "manhood."

Schiff suggests a change in defining what it is to be a man. In this redefinition, "speak[ing] out against violence and support[ing] women" needs to be included. Another way of connecting men's presence in violence against women is that "if men were to stop raping, rape would essentially go away."

Schiff's suggestions on what men can do to stop violence against women are to first "look at ourselves"; is our behavior hurtful or degrading to women? Refuse to consume any and all entertainment that degrades men and women. Next time you are at the movie theater and you see an act of violence against women, make a comment aloud about the scene. Support women and wear a white ribbon as a pledge to help stop violence against women. Take a Women's Studies course and educate yourself of the many aspects of the oppression of women. Be a mentor to young boys to stop any gender-degrading habits before they form. There are so many opportunities for men to support this cause and so many dangers if they don't.

To challenge yourself to become more aware of violations against women, as well as solutions for these issues, you can go to The Men's Resource Center here in Amherst. The Men's Resource Center is located at 236 North Pleasant Street.

Samantha Sharac is a Collegian columnist.

Problems with outsourcing

Andrew Freeman

As we all know, corporate America should be emulated in everything, from its amoral drive for profit to its reckless endangerment of the environment.

I recently realized that privatization is just the first step — we need to go farther in our blind imitation of corporate overlords. We need to go ... to India.

I know what you're thinking, India? That big subcontinent with a billion people — what could possibly interest anyone there? Well, India is a wonderful developing economy, with a large, competitive workforce, a portion of which is highly educated. According to the Securities and Exchange Board of India, over 200,000 engineers and 40,000 management students graduate annually. Increasingly multinational corporations are sending jobs there: everything from customer service call centers to information technology operations.

The American dollar, though it is falling like a speeding anvil, still goes far in India due to advantageous exchange rates, and companies can hire workers to do jobs at a fraction of the price. The entire Indian economy breaks down to about $3,100 per person, while the comparable American figure would be $40,100 per person, according to the World Facebook.

Where does the University of Massachusetts come into the picture? Well, with cheaper living conditions and better exchange rates, as well as a favorable (i.e. desperate) labor market, we could move the entire university there, wholesale. $15,000 per student would go a lot farther in India than here in the scenic but uncompetitive Pioneer Valley.

UMass-Bangalore, as the new school would be called, would attract countless well-educated Indians, who could be trained by and ultimately replace our beloved but expensive faculty. The massive labor savings could be reinvested in building a marvelous palace to house the administration, and our president could rename himself Maharajah, an Indian prince.

Best of all, the campus and surrounding area would be fantastically diverse. Imagine, instead of being surrounded by predominantly white towns, we could live surrounded by millions of non-white people. Indeed, the paranoia would reverse itself, with the few white students banding together into a Paranoid Whites Association to protect their unique ethnic heritage against the perceived discrimination.

In all seriousness, we are moving to a world in which there are fewer and fewer jobs that can't be outsourced. Think you're safe as a professor — think again. Institutions are now offering distance learning programs, such as our school's UMass Online, that take learning out of the classroom; the next step will be outsourcing these jobs to more favorable labor markets. Think you're safe as a manager — what will you do when your financial company moves to India. China or anywhere else where your skills are worth $30,000 a year rather than $100,000?

UMass-Bangalore, as the new school would be called, would attract countless well-educated Indians, who could be trained by and ultimately replace our beloved but expensive faculty.

With an increasingly connected and competitive world, none of us will be safe from the ravages of the market, labor or otherwise. The first stage of outsourcing was in manufacturing; the current is in information technology and customer service, but the final may be mass-migration. When companies finally conclude that Americans aren't worth the expensive health insurance and wages we foolishly expect, they are going to desert us in droves. People in search of work may be forced to leave the country altogether.

This may not seem too significant, until you realize that our economy is built on overpaid labor. A sizable portion of the economy, rather than producing commodities, is simply trying to convince others to buy them — advertisers, salesmen, retailers, etc. If the highest paying professions were outsourced, professionals would turn to the service sector out of desperation. But their wages would not allow them to buy as many consumer goods, meaning that the market for those goods here would shrink. Ultimately the entire American economy would collapse, if the middle-class was unable to maintain its reckless levels of spending.

What is the solution to this? I'm not sure there is one. I'm not sure that America deserves to survive in the Darwinian struggle that is economics. At one point, Spain was the dominant European economy, but it was surpassed by the Netherlands, which was in turn overwhelmed by England; and the United States ultimately overtook all of Western Europe for financial supremacy. Each of these transitions was accompanied by suffering, and many countries that once ruled the seas and markets, such as Portugal, today are comparably poor. America is in transition now, and the consequences are uncertain, but outsourcing threatens our long-term viability.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

Suggestions for springtime

Jessica Zolotorofe

While New England is a great place to attend college, the dark, harsh winter weather is not only depressing, but it is a difficult obstacle, impeding on the social lives of thousands of college students in this area. UMass students are cooped up all winter. When it's finally nice out, we want to get outside and meet people somewhere a bit more wholesome than the basement of a frat house.

Personally, I am always looking for new ways to meet people and I feel that college students need outdoor activities after such a long, cold winter.

We need something relaxed, not too organized, but still an event that will provide students with an outdoor activity to celebrate the end of the year, and the finally beautiful weather.

Why not have a campus-wide barbeque on the Mullins Center lawns? There is so much open space. Perhaps the University could hire a D.J., maybe a magician, even set up carnival-type booths and have student organizations, fraternity or sorority members work at them. Maybe some of the faculty would want to come participate in activities, offering students an opportunity to see them outside of a classroom, in a more casual setting.

What student wouldn't want to dunk his or her math T.A., or throw a pie at the professor who failed them on their last paper?

We could set up a stickball game, or designate an area of the lawn for Frisbee. People could bring towels or blankets and hang out on the grass, listening to the D.J. We would need something relaxed, not too organized, but still an event that would provide students with an outdoor activity to celebrate the end of the year, and the finally beautiful weather.

UMass students tend to complain about the location of Amherst, and while we are lucky to have the town, and other colleges nearby, we have no beaches or outdoor pools. We are not close to any water parks or white water rafting, and we are barely provided with any outdoor opportunities unless we belong to a sports team.

Maybe at this hypothetical barbeque, students could win prizes such as UMass beach balls or T-shirts, provided by the University.

We do pay an activities fee as part of our tuition, but what do we get for it? A spring concert with a group that only part of the student body is interested in? Couldn't UMass afford a few hotdogs or a chicken wing or two?

The activities that the University does organize tend to segregate the living areas, with events such as Southwest Week or the Central Celebr-ation. We need to be unified as one University. What if we want to meet people that do not live in our area? Or what if we do not live on campus at all?

I don't think that many people would object to an outdoor barbeque. Perhaps the police department might send a few men to participate in stickball, maybe even form a team against UMass students. Such a simple activity might ease some of the tension between the local police and students, building a much-needed respect.

In addition, I've been hearing a lot of complaints that with 20,000 people at UMass, students still don't feel that they have very many opportunities to meet new people, especially students who don't live on campus. Wouldn't an outdoor, laid back activity, like a campus-wide barbeque be a good way?

And how great would it be if we had a barbeque dinner and fireworks show? I bet the turnout would be huge.

I, and I think I speak for a lot of students, am pretty disappointed with the social life at UMass. It seems you have to be interested in a specific club, be good at a sport or be an alcoholic to make friends and maintain a social life. It shouldn't feel that way ... why not offer us more positive social activities to take part in?

Jessica Zolotorofe is a Collegian editor.

What is your opinion of the revised Action Plan released on Friday?

A) I think it's a big improvement over Lombardi's previous proposal.
B) I think it's a good starting point, but it still needs some work.
C) I think students were ignored completely in the drafting of the new proposal.
D) This issue doesn't concern me.

Go to WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM and vote!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Introspective folk artist finds Dream realization

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

It's typical for musicians on tour to acknowledge their crowd. However, it's less common for artists diverge from their setlist while onstage and change what they are playing mid-show. Singer-songwriter Patty Griffin does just that — she plays on emotion and allows it to control her live show.

Tonight at the Calvin Theatre, the Cambridge/Boston area native will entice the crowd with her unique sound — a combination of Americana, country and pop vocals. While she may be soft spoken, Griffin's music moves from quiet and somber to loud, occasionally giving chills to listeners.

Patty Griffin loved to listen to the Beatles and Bruce Springsteen in her childhood, yet never planned on becoming a musician even though she has been songwriting since the age of 16. She draws much inspiration from her mother, who would sing to her and her six siblings. Her songs can be heartfelt too, as her the title track on her latest album "Impossible Dream," features her parents' singing, in a tribute to the amateur artists. Eventually she moved out of Massachusetts, living in Florida for two years. After moving back north and after her husband left her, she began to play in Boston coffeehouses. It wasn't long before the artist had her first record deal with A&M Records. Her first two studio albums, "Living With Ghosts" and "Flaming Red" soon followed, garnering her respect in her field.

Patty Griffin's voice, with a classic country accent, plays well to both country fans and folk aficionados. She has collaborated with folk sensation Emmylou Harris for her most recent studio album, "Impossible Dream" out on Dave Matthews' own record label, ATO Records. For what she has in a small stature she makes up for in her powerful and soulful singing. And she doesn't let age get to her either. Even at 41, her songs are full of power and youthful energy and age only brings experience to her songwriting.

Griffin is also a patron of various social movements. The "Patty Griffin Birthday Drive" may be misleading in its title, but is a fund established by the singer that makes donations to VVAF's "Campaign for a Landmine Free World." She recently played in a benefit concert for Tsunami victims hosted by Willie Nelson, which was released on a CD titled "Songs for Tsunami Relief: Austin to South Asia."

Unlike some other singer-songwriters, Griffin doesn't write protest songs for the sake of protest, but rather, looks at the world through a kaleidoscope of politicized ideals. She doesn't bother to separate personal from political. Songs like "Don't Come Easy" and "Cold As It Gets" are examples of such emotion. She sings in "Cold As It Gets," "There's a million sad stories on the side of the road/Strange how we all just got used to the blood/Millions of stories that'll never be told/Silent and froze in the mud," relating lyrics that Americans can see truth in, both at home and abroad. "Rain," One of Griffin's staples and a favorite of her fans, paints an image of a stormy day in the reader's mind while relating love to the passing of clouds. Colorful imagery, combined with metaphors for life, make Griffin one of the best in her field and a musician not to be missed.

Patty Griffin
Wed. May 4
8p.m.
Calvin Theater
Northampton
$17.50, $25, $29

Apocalyptica's 'Reflections' combines metal and classical music

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Staff

Most people would never consider the fusion of the classical sound of the cello with the extreme noise of a heavy metal guitar to be particularly fruitful; however, Apocalyptica begs to differ. The trio of classically trained cellists from Helinski, Finland began their fusion experiment with covers of their favorite heavy metal bands on 1996's "Plays Metallica by Four Cellos." After considerable success with this album, Eicca Toppinen, Paavo Lotjonen, and Perttu Kivilaaksobe — all graduates of Finland's prestigious Sibellius Musical Academy — set out to carve their own niche somewhere between the classical and metal music genres. Apocalyptica presents this unique style in all its glory on 2005's "Reflections."

Apocalyptica
'Reflections'
Nuclear Blast America

Enlisting the help of legendary "Slayer" drummer, Dave Lombardo, Apocalyptica starts things off with a jarring mid-paced riff interwoven with moving cello solos. It is difficult to discern at first, but the opening track, "Prologue (Apprehension)" with the exception of the drums, is performed exclusively with cellos. The result is quite satisfying. Apocalyptica are able to utilize the cello to produce many intriguing passages that reach out to the listener in a way that differs from the traditional distorted guitar.

Another shining example of the fruits of cello and metal fusion lies within the track, "Resurrection." From an initial boiling pot of intertwined riffs, this song floods over into an intricate mix of drumming from Lombardo and cello work that teems with themes of hope and power. This track also features a breathtaking cello solo performed in true metal fashion.

The track, "Pandemonium" could be seen as an exhibition of Apocalyptica's mastery over their instruments. Although this is the shortest piece on the disc, not a moment is wasted as the cellists brew intricate passages climaxing in a manic technical frenzy of soloing.

There are also several slower tracks on the album that teeter towards the classical end of Apocalyptica's musical balance. While some metal-heads might be turned off by the slower-paced change, enthusiasts of classical music and open-minded listeners will discover moving pieces displaying a vast wealth of emotion and power.

Among the more moving of the classical tracks is "Faraway." This piece opens with a sad piano movement that creates a sense of longing. The cello is then introduced, complementing the piano and heightening the lonely atmosphere. Among the bonus tracks on the disc is an alternate version of the track titled, "Faraway Vol.2" featuring the vocal work of Linda Sundblad, vocalist for the Swedish rock group, "Lambretta". While Linda's vocals certainly add power to the track they also add a certain pop-influenced feel to the song.

One of the most intriguing pieces performed by the band is the conceptual, "Toreador II" ("tore-

See METAL on page 10

Finland's Apocalyptica blend classical music and heavy metal on their latest album, "Reflections."

Gang of Four is reclaiming its post-punk throne from copycats

By Ben Wener
The Orange County Register

There scarcely has been a piece written about either the already white-hot figures of the new new-wave or those rising into it that has failed to saddle them with a huge debt owed to Gang of Four.

Franz Ferdinand, Hot Hot Heat, Kaiser Chiefs, the Bravery, Bloc Party, Dogs Die in Hot Cars, the Futureheads — Google each and you'll find a slew of savvy scribes noting how much they take after Gof4's never-equaled kinetic sound.

"But do they really?" wonders Dave Allen, bassist and sometimes vocalist for the recently reunited post-punk revolutionists, who, after a successful U.K. run, performed Sunday at the Coachella Valley Music and Art Festival. "There are moments, right, but I don't think they do. This is where a little homework needs to be done."

A brief history might help: Gang of Four was formed in 1977 by four students at Leeds University: strident, hectoring chanter Jon King; the martially funky rhythm section of Allen and drummer Hugo Burnham; and guitarist Andy Gill, whose abrasive, strings-slashing style became one of the band's hallmarks.

Another: a caustic, penetrating political fury, a radical temperament that, because it was so intensely focused on bolstering individualism and skewering everyday apathy, has arguably retained more impact over the years than either that of the Sex Pistols (too reckless by comparison) or the Clash (ultimately too diffuse in its global reach).

Within four years Allen would be gone, departing through a haze of drugs to eventually form Shriekback with ex-XTC guitarist Barry Andrews. Gang of Four carried on without him, mostly for the worse, though ironically both acts garnered more stateside attention for later songs (Shriekback's "Nemesis," Gof4's danceable "I Love a Man in Uniform") that bore little relation to earlier work.

The original lineup issued just two albums (1979's vital "Entertainment!" and 1981's equally startling "Solid Gold"), each followed by an EP (first "Yellow," then "Another Day/Another Dollar"). "Art meets the devil via James Brown" — that was INXS frontman Michael Hutchence's description. "Like a big Man Ray photograph jumping up and doing the watusi" was how Red Hot Chili Peppers' Flea put it.

Wielding a Velvet Underground-esque influence over such disparate bands — U2 and Rage Against the Machine are two more that learned much from this lot — Gang of Four, like Wire and the Fall, has come to be even more of a truly cult (read: small but significant) phenomenon than any of Coachella's other, more celebrated reformations: Bauhaus and New Order this year, Pixies last year, Iggy and the Stooges before that.

What set Gof4 apart is the group's dialectical bent, although Allen, a former L.A. resident and Internet-geared entrepreneur now living in Portland, Ore., who for a time managed EMusic.com, says that stance is often misconstrued. "We were known for our slightly Marxist leanings, but I think we were more socialist and to the center than people would have guessed."

The unacquainted need only check some of the band's song titles to get the gist: "At Home He's a Tourist," "Guns Before Butter," "Damaged Goods," "We Live As We Die, Alone," "To Hell With Poverty" ("... we'll get drunk on cheap wine!").

Or take notice of three increasingly magnified images of a cowboy and Indian shaking hands in the corner of the mostly monochromatic cover of "Entertainment!" (Rhino reissue due May 17). Snaking around the illustrations, this scrawl: "The Indian smiles, he thinks the cowboy is his friend. The cowboy smiles, he is glad the Indian is fooled. Now he can exploit him."

As Allen points out, "Most people have the attitude that Gang of Four was a political band with a big P, but actually we were more interested in the small-p personal politics. As Andy put it in a recent interview, people wake up in the morning feeling that they have no control over their lives: the day job, the commute, the mortgage, the debt, the constant demand to have the latest car or the latest gadget.

"Well, you do have control over that. It's just not suggested that way by the media. That's what we glommed onto very quickly: that if you don't take care, you'll be consumed by this overarching propaganda that suggests you have to strive for more all the time."

After years of prodding to return, Gof4's revival brings this "Fight Club"-presaging idea full circle. "The timing couldn't be better," Allen believes, "because nothing has changed. If anything, it's gotten worse. That gives us incredible relevance. No one else is talking about this stuff."

Plus, the current uneasy political climate "is an ideal one to be working in, from our standpoint. I think it's safe to say that one band is not going to turn a society on its heels. You can only spread your message as best you can. But enough people have taken note to understand why Gang of Four has been such a cultural force in popular music.

"Twenty years ago we were trying to point these same things out and no one noticed. So," he said, starting to laugh, "we think we'll do it again."

Which brings us back to constant comparisons of the post-post-punk elite to Gof4. Allen argues that "it's hard to discover exactly what the big link is musically." Astutely, he hears more of the Jam and "Drums and Wires"-era XTC in the new sound.

"I saw Franz Ferdinand in Portland with my son, and they're an amazing band. And, yes, there's one song ('This Fire') where they hit the chorus and I could've sworn they were doing a cover of 'Damaged Goods.' But apart from that, these bands are not that musically close to us. They're not anywhere near lyrically close to us."

Consider how the band handles the utterly fractured track "He'd Send in the Army" — "a very crucial song in the Gang of Four canon," Allen says — in the increasingly little-seen new-wave omnibus "Urgh! A Music War" (reportedly headed to DVD).

Gill attacks his guitar, half the time not striking strings. Allen and Burnham maintain a tension/release dynamic. And, then as now, "Jon destroys a microwave on stage to keep the beat. It's an amazing bit of musical theater that should cause head-scratching among most 25-year-olds.

"But I think it will strike a chord. I'd like to think there's some band starting out somewhere that would see us live and go, 'Holy crap! That's the way to do it.' And to have this badge of honor, that we influenced so many other bands, is one worth wearing.

"If people think back on that period and that thing that comes to mind as the most plausible is Gang of Four, then hooray. We're finally being accepted, somewhat, for making a huge statement back then that changed the course of music for a lot of people."

Gang of Four's political post-punk has influenced such bands as Franz Ferdinand and Hot Hot Heat.

Andy Gill defined the Gang of Four with his grating guitar style.

www.dailycollegian.com

AMAX STORAGE
EASY ACCESS OFF RT 91 IN HATFIELD
•OPEN 7 DAYS 7AM TO 7PM •SECURE
•CLIMATECONTROLLED •KEYLESS GATE
•MOVING SUPPLIES •SURVEILLANCE CAMERAS
CALL ABOUT OUR PORTABLE SELF STORAGE "$COUTS"
WE LOAD IT, HAUL YOU FILL IT, WE PICK IT UP AND SECURE IT
RENT WITH A FRIEND AND SAVE $$
413-247-3030
164 West Street • West Hatfield
www.amaxstorage.com

Little Black Dress
• Study for finals
• Pack dorm room
• Say good bye to friends
• Shop at little black Graduation
Perfect styles & accessories to dress up your memorable spring parties & graduation.
413 253 7727
98 N. Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002

The trend starts here.
Sequin espadrilles $29
ZAWA
downtown Amherst

To the World's Best Customers
Thanks!
You helped UMass Dining Services strike gold.
We were selected by NACUFS (National Association College University Food Services) as the 1st Place Winner
2005 Loyal E. Horton Dining Awards Contest
in the category of
Residence Hall Dining - Multiple Concepts
In addition we were the 2nd Place Winner
in the category of
Residence Hall Dining - Theme Dinner
Halloween Lobster Special
(remember what a fun time we had?)
But wait... the best is yet to come, Go UMass!

Film examines racism in L.A.

By John Snodgrass
The Lantern

COLUMBUS, Ohio — When done correctly, films can do more than entertain. They can evoke emotion, cause debate and even challenge the trends and culture of a nation. "Crash" is this type of film. It is powerful, provocative, poignant and poetic. It will be one of the best films of 2005 and will be one of the most important films made about American society in post-9/11 America.

"Crash" is the directorial debut of Paul Haggis (screenwriter for "Million Dollar Baby"), which takes a serious and unforgiving look at racism in modern day Los Angeles. The film focuses on the lives of about a dozen characters and how their decisions affect not only those directly around them, but also those that they have never met.

At first, "Crash" seems like a predictable movie filled with boring and overused ethnic stereotypes. In early scenes the stereotypes are so thick that it is like watching a crude propaganda film depicting racial superiority. However, the problem with this is that viewers will not be sure which ethnic group is supposed to be superior. After fifteen minutes of racial pigeon holing, Haggis' screenplay and characters come alive. Their stereotypes are chiseled away and the characters become fully developed.

For example: Some of these characters change and perform acts that are outside their characteristics. Racist characters become heroes and the tolerant characters become villains.

What makes this film powerful is that it does not just show racism happening, but it attempts to show why it is happening. For many of the characters fear is the root of their problems. Haggis' characters are afraid of others as well as themselves, meaning they are not only ignorant of one another but often ignorant of themselves.

This film is filled with terrific performances. Don Cheadle plays Graham, a detective who has trouble juggling what is right and wrong in his professional life. Matt Dillon gives the best performance of his career as a ferociously racist Los Angeles police officer. Ryan Phillippe counteracts Dillon's intolerance as his rookie partner. Terrence Howard gives a fabulous performance as a TV executive named Cameron, who must accept the racism that comes with being famous in Hollywood. Thandie Newton gives a knockout performance as Cameron's wife, who sees her husband as having Uncle Tom traits. The best performance, however, goes to Michael Peña, who plays a quite young locksmith trying to give his family the lifestyle he always wanted. His character, Daniel, is a voice of reason in the film's manic and insane world.

Haggis' camera angles are intricate and when need be, extremely powerful. He often blurs images giving the film a gritty feel that coincides with the film's soundtrack. Haggis' use of the American flag also adds to the film's mood. For example: He places a flag over a character's shoulders, which sends an uneasy message to viewers. This type of details adds to the intricacy of "Crash".

This is a movie about a nation, which less than four years ago went through an unspeakable act, yet still refuses to allow itself to be "the melting pot" it says it is. Though this film does show that this country has come along way (there are many ethnic jokes that the diverse audience laughed at) there is still a long way to go before fear and ignorance will stop dictating what we do as a culture.

"Crash" is a phenomenal and brilliant film. It takes racism in America head-on and leaves viewers with a plethora of questions and emotions.

This movie is destined to trigger debate and conversation. It pulls no punches. It does not pander to an audience. Racism is a part of our culture and "Crash" asks its audience, "What are we going to do about it?"

'Simpsons' future in question

COURTESY FOX ENTERTAINMENT

Matt Groening is ready to make another 350 episodes of "The Simpsons," if he gets the chance.

By Rick Porter
Zap2it.com

It's a cliché for reporters to ask the creator of a long-running TV show about his favorite episodes, and the clichéd response is for the creator to say that he loves them all and can't possibly single out one or two.

Yet upon meeting "The Simpsons" creator Matt Groening on Monday at a party celebrating the show's 350th episode, which airs May 1, the temptation to ask the favorite question was too hard to resist. Happily, he didn't give the usual non-answer, rattling off a list of his top secondary characters — Apu, the Squeaky-Voiced Teen, Ralph Wiggum and Milhouse's dad, Kirk, among them — and episodes he loves.

"I don't have a single favorite. There's a bunch I really like," Groening says. "I love 'Bart Sells His Soul,' the old episode (from October 1995) where he sold his soul to Milhouse for five bucks. I love the one where we had Frank Grimes ('Homer's Enemy,' from May 1997). And I like an episode we have coming up where Bart converts to Catholicism."

That episode, originally scheduled for earlier this month, was pulled following the death of Pope John Paul II and is now set to air May 15. Groening says the decision was one the network made: "We think it's offensive whenever you run it."

It's remarkable enough that "The Simpsons" has even made it to 350 episodes, more than any other scripted show currently on TV. That it can still create a buzz after that long, despite the now-familiar chorus that the show isn't what it once was, is pretty much unheard of in this era.

"No matter how hard people try to run it into the ground by putting it on too many times a day, putting it on multiple DVDs and oversaturating the marketplace and all the rest, we still keep going," Groening says. "In fact, I have to say I'm very proud of this season and the coming season."

Groening thinks the show has lasted so long because "with animation, there are so many possibilities to surprise the audience. That's really what we try to do. We try to keep surprising the audience and keep surprising ourselves."

Groening was quoted Sunday in The New York Times as saying "the show has almost reached its halfway point." Monday, he said he "was not serious at all" about whether "The Simpsons" can last another 350 episodes, but he quickly added, "I'll do them if we can."

"That's a long time, but if we, you know, unless we all get killed," he says with a shrug. "I think five of the main people could get killed and the show could still go on. But any more than five — that's why we all ride in separate airplanes."

Apocalyptica rock out on cellos ador" translates as "bullfighter"). This track acts as a soundtrack to an epic confrontation between an angry bull and a skillful matador. The piece begins with a fanfare and proceeds from movement to movement tracing the battle. The confrontation is signified by a rapid-fire passage while the matador flaunting his skill in the face of the angry bull is portrayed through speedy solos.

METAL from page 8

Keeping with tradition, Apocalyptica has included a heavy metal cover in "Reflections." For this album, the band chose to borrow a song from the industrial metal group Rammstein. Apocalyptica's rendition of "Seeman" — which translates as "Sailor" — is very similar to its predecessor. Among the noticeable differences is the more delicate sound of the cellos. More importantly however is the guest appearance of the noted punk singer from Berlin, Nina Hagen. This combination of classical instruments and Hagen's controlled yet powerful performance makes for an interesting and worthwhile cover.

Apocalyptica is certain not to be embraced by all, as proponents of heavy metal and classical music may not welcome the musical bridge. However, for those who are willing to experience new forms of music and experimentation there is much to discover on "Reflections." Apocalyptica have created a deep and compassionate album that manages to package the fury of heavy metal and the delicacy of classical music into a considerable hybrid, boasting both raw power and painstaking complexity that cannot be easily overlooked.

CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS

Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.

JEFFERY AMHERST COLLEGE STORE
253-3870

Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst

Want to be Assistant Arts Editor?

Come see Mike, Chris, or Matt for an application.

UMassAmherst Student Activities Center
UP TO THE MINUTE

Wednesday, May 4
Music Injection Wednesdays
Bring your lunch and get a healthy dose of live music between classes!
Student Union, South Steps, 11am – 1pm
Rain location: Cape Cod Lounge

International Movie Series
Good Bye Lenin
A disarming and offbeat comedy directed by Wolfgang Becker.
Campus Center 163C, 8pm FREE

Thursday, May 5
2nd Annual Festival of the Arts
Be amazed by the musical, dramatic, and artistic talents of your fellow students. Find your inner artist at interactive art displays.
Fine Arts Center Plaza, 12pm – 3pm, rain or shine

Friday, May 6
Something Every Friday
White Noise
Cape Cod Lounge, 9pm FREE

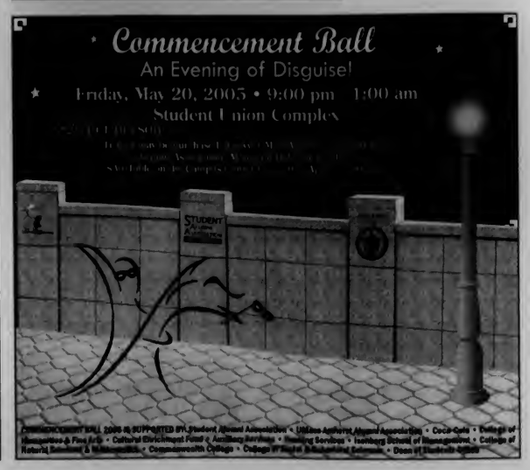
Saturday, May 7
Black Mass Communication Project (BMCP) presents
Funk-O-Thon
With DJ Showtime
Curry Hicks Cage, 9am – 2am
$5 UMass Amherst students / $8 Five College students
Must have college ID for entrance.

Sunday, May 8
Sunday Night Movie
White Noise
Cape Cod Lounge, 8pm FREE

Monday, May 9
7th Annual Queer Graduation
16th Annual Awards Celebration
Recognition for contributions to the LBGT community on campus.
RSVP: 545-2824
Memorial Hall, 7pm

Brought to you by Student Affairs and Campus Life
UMass Amherst Calendar of Events: www.umass.edu/umhome/events

STUDENTTRAVEL
Discover Europe!



Perfect trips for your European Adventure

The Big 3 $491
Mediterranean Explorer $551
UK & Beyond $561
Eastern Europe Experience $327

These packages do not include airfare. Taxes and other applicable fees are not included.

STA TRAVEL
(413) 256.1261
www.statravel.com

Commencement Ball
An Evening of Disguise!
Friday, May 20, 2005 • 9:00 pm 1:00 am
Student Union Complex

COMMENCEMENT BALL 2005 IS SUPPORTED BY: Student Alumni Association • UMass Amherst Alumni Association • Coca-Cola • College of Humanities & Fine Arts • Cultural Enrichment Fund • Auxiliary Services • Housing Services • Isenberg School of Management • College of Natural Sciences & Mathematics • Commonwealth College • College of Social & Behavioral Sciences • Dean of Students Office

UM rallies for win in seventh

SOFTBALL from page 14

Terriers increased their lead by two, scoring a run in the fifth inning, as well as the sixth.

"We have extremely great talent in the infield and the outfield," Sulick said. "It's all in our heads, because we have amazing talent. If we just relax and let it fly, we're good."

With two innings left for the UMass offense, it was a defensive regular who began the comeback. After a pitching change by BU, Busa stepped to the plate and delivered a homer to left field, cutting the Terrier score down to 3-2.

The homer was Busa's first of the season, as she just recently found her way into the Minutewoman starting lineup.

"I was really pleased with her home run obviously, because it only put us one run down," Sortino said. "But more than anything with Jenna, I'm pleased about her pitching and that she got herself out of those jams."

Busa was able to get out of another jam in the top of the seventh, when the bases were loaded with two outs. A foul ball pop up was snagged by junior catcher KJ Kelley to end the inning and left the fate of the game up to the Minutewoman hitters.

Kelley began the inning with a line drive double to center field. Senior Denise Denis advanced Kelley with a single to right field, and after a steal by Denis to second base, freshman, A-10 Rookie of the Week, Stacy Cullington was walked, loading the bases.

The other rookie, freshman Lauren Proctor was next in the lineup and hit a grounder to the infield, which was fielded by a Terrier. As Kelley slid into home plate, the BU catcher dropped the incoming throw, and Kelley scored the tying run.

Sulick then entered the game and came off the bench to pinch hit. With the bases loaded, Sulick hit a single to left field and consequently, ended the ballgame. Sulick was confident heading to the plate off of the bench.

"You know what, I'm ready, I took my time, I took my slumps and now it's time for me to come out and do something for my team," Sulick said. "Any pitch she was going to give me, I was just going to get it done, no matter what."

The comeback victory, which put a stop to the BU winning streak, was the fifth straight win for the Minutewomen. The game-winner was Sulick's 16th RBI of the season and her 30th hit. Sortino was certain of her decision to put the veteran in under pressure to take control of the game.

"Well, she was waiting the whole game to do it, she found a way to get it done," Sortino said. "We knew she was going to get her bat on the ball, there was no two ways about that."

Sophomore Amanda Morin and Kelley led the team in hits with a pair each on the day, while Denis added one. Kelley currently leads the team in homeruns (10), slugging percentage (.771), batting average (.385) and doubles (12) on the season.

Busa has stuck out a career-high 112 batters and now holds an ERA of 2.27 on the season. The win yesterday was her 12th of the year.

COURTESY KAREN WINCHESTER

UMass third baseman Sarah Hurd recorded two assists and one putout in the field during the Minutewomen's 4-3 victory over the Boston University Terriers at the UMass Softball Complex.

COURTESY KAREN WINCHESTER

The UMass offense rocked the Terrier pitching staff for seven hits and four runs yesterday. The Minutewomen came from behind, scoring three runs in the final two innings, to record the win.

Spurs stacked at top

FOSTER from page 14

are not close to the best.

Since Shaquille O'Neal entered the league back in 1992, he groomed himself into the most dominant force in the NBA. He also continued to improve himself, his game and his teammates. Dwayne Wade went from a breakout rookie year into the best guard in the East. Former Celtic Damon Jones and defensive demon Eddie Jones look like superstars behind the arc with all the open looks Shaq is getting them. Will they be the Eastern Conference Champion? Yes, but not on the strength of a trio.

The international connection in San Antonio demonstrates un-selfish team play better than any other team or trio in the NBA. Tony Parker has stepped up his game, while Manu Ginobili is scoring more points than Tim Duncan. Duncan and Ginobili are All-Stars and Parker will be one soon enough. Two aggressive, smart playmakers with the ability to score anywhere on the floor and a former MVP. Sound like a winner?

But we can not forget about the best show in the NBA, the Phoenix Suns. Since the Suns acquired a speedy, dime-dropping Steve Nash, they have been a force in the West. The player with the most potential to be a superstar in the NBA could be Amare Stoudemire. When you include a nightly double-double threat in Shawn Marion, you have a deadly trio.

With rings on their fingers, the Spurs would be considered the best trio in the NBA, but the Suns are a very close second. The Suns showed off their deadly fastbreak while sweeping the Grizzles. Marion is one of the most complete players in basketball Stoudemire is the most explosive post player in the NBA. This trio along with ex-Celtic Joe Johnson make up the best tandem in the NBA for years to come. That's why they are favorites for the NBA championship.

Todd Foster is a Collegian Columnist.

Where are YOU living next semester?

CHECK OUT PUFFTON VILLAGE!

Excellent location... 1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments- 1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.

PUFFTON VILLAGE
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

The Daily Collegian
NOW HIRING FOR FALL 2005

- Comics Editor
- Copy Editors
- Finance Manager
- Human Resources Manager
- Circulation Manager
- Advertising Executives
- Photo Editor
- Photo Technician
- Photographers
- Graphic Artists

Contact Us at 545-3500 or Come Down to the Campus Center Basement to Pick Up an Application

Mirabelli has grand night in Sox victory

DETROIT (AP) — Doug Mirabelli hit his third career grand slam and John Halama limited Detroit to two runs and four hits in five innings in his first start of the season to help the Boston Red Sox beat the Tigers 5-3 on Tuesday night.

Halama (1-0) won for the first time since last October when he beat the Tigers while pitching for Tampa Bay. Halama, taking the injured David Wells' spot in the rotation, didn't walk a batter and struck out two.

Matt Mantei pitched a scoreless sixth and Mike Timlin worked two scoreless innings. Keith Foulke allowed Marcus Thames' leadoff homer in the ninth before finishing for his fifth save in six opportunities.

Detroit starter Mike Maroth (2-2) allowed five runs on five hits in six innings. He walked six and struck out six.

Ivan Rodriguez also homered for Detroit.

Boston took a 1-0 lead in the first on Jason Varitek's one-out line single. The hit scored Johnny Damon, who had led off the game with a double and moved to third on Edgar Renteria's single.

Detroit tied in the bottom of the inning on Rodriguez's home run deep into the left-field stands.

The Tigers took a 2-1 lead in the fourth on Marcus Thames' two-out double inside the bag at third. It scored Carlos Guillen, who led off with a triple.

Mirabelli's grand slam in the fifth put Boston up 5-2. He drilled Maroth's 2-1 pitch into the left-field stands.

Notes: Boston's Wade Miller allowed five hits and four runs in 3 2-3 innings on Tuesday in his second rehabilitation start for Triple-A Pawtucket, a 6-5 victory over Rochester. Miller, out with a frayed rotator cuff since last June when he was with Houston, struck out seven, walked four and threw a wild pitch. Three of the four runs he surrendered were earned. Miller topped out at 96 mph. ...

Red Sox chairman Tom Werner went to New York on Tuesday to present 2004 World Series rings to Pedro Martinez and Doug Mientkiewicz. ... Mirabelli's last grand slam was on July 3, 2004. It was the fourth grand slam of the season for Boston. ... Detroit DH-1B Dmitri Young missed his third straight start because of the flu. ... Guillen's triple in the fourth inning was his second in two games.

Red Sox right fielder Trot Nixon dropped his appeal Tuesday and started serving a two-game suspension stemming from Boston's April 15 scuffle at Tampa Bay.

—Associated Press

Wade Boggs gets ready for induction

By John Kekis
Associated Press

COOPERSTOWN, N.Y. — Wade Boggs seemed at home in baseball's Mecca before he even stepped inside.

Prior to a tour of the newly renovated Hall of Fame on Tuesday, Boggs greeted an elementary school group from Chicopee, Mass., sounding more like an escort than a former star soon to be enshrined.

"Welcome to the Hall of Fame," said Boggs, clad in blue jeans, sneakers and a rugby shirt. "I'm one of the new inductees."

"Congratulations," the students replied in unison, some of them recognizing the man who won five American League batting titles in 11 seasons with the Boston Red Sox and finished his 18-year career with 3,010 hits.

"You guys enjoy your day here," said Boggs, who will be inducted July 31 along with former Chicago Cubs star Ryne Sandberg. "Enjoy the tour."

They did, but surely not as much as Boggs, who was clearly taken aback by what he saw on his first official visit to the sport's shrine.

A student of history, Boggs was nearly speechless as he made his way through, uttering "Wow!" and "Incredible!" at almost every turn.

When he stopped to take a closer look at the Red Sox exhibit from their improbable World Series triumph last fall, he seemed somewhat wistful that he wasn't a part of it.

"I was almost there, very close, a strike," said Boggs, a member of the 1986 Red Sox team that lost to the New York Mets in seven games after Bill Buckner's famous two-out error in the bottom of the 10th inning of Game 6 gave New York a stunning comeback victory.

A career .328 hitter, the 12-time All-Star also was known for the array of superstitious rituals he went through before and after games. Maybe it was his near-obsessive passion for detail that brought a smile to his face when he gazed at a 77-ball hitting display devoted to former Red Sox slugger Ted Williams, who wrote "The Science of Hitting."

"I had to read the book over and over and over," said, Boggs, who set an American League record with seven consecutive 200-hit seasons in the 1980s. "It's still the Bible."

A wall that has a ball from every no-hitter thrown in the major leagues since the Hall of Fame opened in 1939 elicited more memories. Boggs played in four of them, including Matt Young's on April 12, 1992, which the Red Sox lost to the Cleveland Indians.

"Afterward, in the clubhouse it was the strangest thing," Boggs said. "He threw a no-hitter, but we lost 2-1."

Only about a quarter of the Hall of Fame's 35,000 artifacts are on display at any given time. The rest are stowed in the basement, which is open to only a select few. Boggs qualified, and he was amazed, especially by the tiny gloves of yesteryear.

"How did they ever catch a ball back then?" he asked, holding gloves once that belonged to former Yankee greats Babe Ruth and Lou Gehrig. "Absolutely amazing."

"Shall I get a Ted Williams bat for you?" asked Tom Shieber, curator of new media for the Hall.

"Sure!" Boggs said, his eyebrows raised. "The man!"

Then it was up to the library, where a copy of Boggs' 1984 book "Fowl Tips, My Favorite Chicken Recipes" and a tape of the well-known "Homer at the Bat" episode in 1992 of "The Simpsons" television cartoon show lay on a table.

As usual, it was the Gallery that left the biggest impression. The guy they used to call "Chicken Man" because he ate the fowl seven days a week nearly floated away.

"Goosebumps," said Boggs, who was accompanied by his wife, Debbie. "The goosebumps were remarkable walking down the hall where all the plaques are. The goosebumps started overwhelming me. The Hall of Fame is not something that an athlete can set as a goal. It's something that evolves."

After leaving Boston, Boggs spent five years in New York, where he helped the Yankees win the 1996 World Series. He played his final two years for his hometown Tampa Bay Devil Rays, in 1999 becoming the first player to hit a homer for his 3,000th hit.

For the past four years, Boggs has worked as a volunteer coach for his son Brett's high school team, which was to begin district play on Tuesday night in Tampa. Boggs had to miss the game, but that was OK.

"It's a warm feeling I have," said Boggs, just the 41st player to be elected in his first year of eligibility.

Not too much can phase Washington

TRAGEDY from page 14

er right away."

Washington, 21, made just such a mark in his initial seasons at Bayshore High and the University of Nebraska. He started all four seasons for Woodie and all three of his seasons in college.

For now, Charles Woodson and Nnamdi Asomugha are the projected starters at cornerback for next season. Washington will get a crash course from Hall of Fame cornerback Willie Brown, among others, on the nuances of the position and a long look at showing what he can do on defense and kick returning.

"I'm trying to learn as much of the defense as I can so I can take it home and study as much as I can and come back more prepared than when I came here," Washington said Friday.

The Raiders already know about Washington's upbringing and outlook on things concerning life and football. They gleaned that during a one-on-one interview at the Scouting Combine and from probing people such as Woodie Jr.

Washington arrives with an impressive background, according to Woodie Jr. and others who have known Washington since his formative years.

"He's a dynamic individual," Woodie Jr. said. "He's the type of kid who cares about others. If you look at talented kids, the majority of them are selfish. Not Fabian. He has character, God-given ability and no fear."

He also has a mother and a grandmother, Jessie Washington, who were there for him when his father, Edward Clemmons, no longer could be. And Woodie, "who always pointed Fabian in the right direction, always stayed on him," Chandra Washington said.

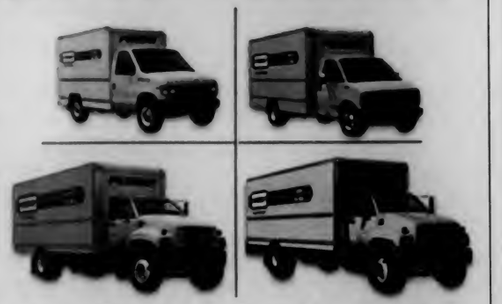
Fabian avoided the pitfalls that drag down so many others in similar situations by putting his faith in God and those who took the time to nurture him, he said.

"I've seen Fabian at his worst and I've seen him at his best," Woodie Jr. said. "He's the type of kid who can handle adversity. The Raiders know that by now."

Washington is where he is today because of adversity. He decided to enter the NFL draft after learning of a close friend's murder in Bradenton last December.

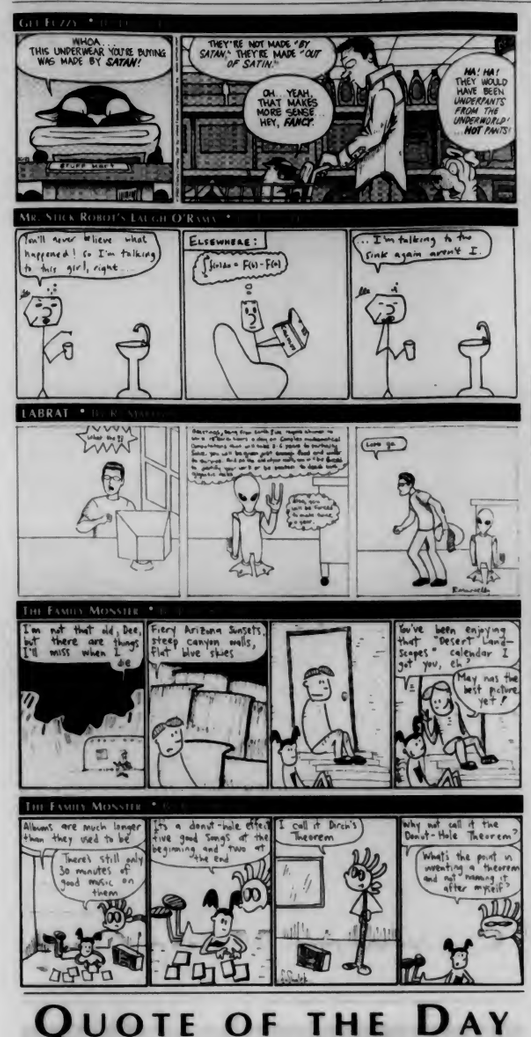
It got him to thinking about how far he had come since his father's accidental death 15 years earlier, how it very well could have been him who got killed instead of his friend, how his younger brother, Breontae McNear, needed a safer environment, how his mother needed an easier life.

"It's been a long, hard struggle for us," Chandra Washington said. "I worked 12, 16-hour days for 14 years."



No more. Washington entered the NFL draft despite being told he likely wouldn't be selected any higher than the third round. The difference between the contract a first-rounder and third-rounder receive can be several million dollars.

Talk about pressure. Washington knew he had to do something to stand out. His agent told him the key lay with his speed.



Perform well for the owners, general managers, coaches and scouts, and you'll go from being just another faceless prospect into a hot commodity, said Brian Mackler, Washington's agent.

Twenty-four teams interviewed Washington after his eye-opening 40. Numerous teams worked him out after the combine and reportedly had him in their sights in the first round. The Raiders struck first.

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
anti-hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

Heading Home for the Summer?

Local ~ One Way ~ Do-It-Yourself Moves
We'll Take You Where You Want To Go
PENSKE Truck Leasing
* Low Rates
* Full Line of Moving Accessories
* Free Unlimited Mileage on One-Way Truck Rentals
* Full Range of Clean, Fuel-Efficient Trucks
* 24-hour Emergency Road Service
* Automatic Transmission and Air Conditioning Available
10% student discount with coupon below.
Receive a 10% discount WITH THIS COUPON on your next Local or One-Way truck Rental
Call (413) 549-1644
10% Discount PENSKE Truck Leasing 10% Discount
Affordable, new, clean trucks at convenient rental locations
This coupon is not valid with any other offer. One per truck rental and subject to availability. A One-Way rental means your Penske truck is rented in one city and returned to another.
For Reservations Call 549-1644

Summer Move-Out The Easy Way
Move and store packages
Starting at $99 for the Whole Summer!
• FREE Pickup
• FREE Dropoff
• FREE Boxes & Tape
5 COLLEGE Storage
888-455-MOVE
www.5collegestorage.com
$10 Off Summer Storage
Mention this ad and save $10 on your summer move-and-store package! We make moving out easy!
Offer valid on 10-box, 12-box and 16-box packages. Must sign up by May 15, 2005. Not valid with any other offer.
www.5collegestorage.com
5 COLLEGE Storage

Quote of the Day

"Please don't mistake my anal retentiveness for actual affection."

—Bree, Desperate Housewives

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

ACROSS
1 Asparagus unit
6 Kind of crazy?
10 One-night stands?
14 Border snubs
15 Actress Gabi
16 Like a couch potato
17 Fire/Zodiac sign
18 Haughty
19 Pouty expression
20 Dispute
22 Penn's partner
24 Peculiar
25 Exhaust
26 Safe
30 Legislators
34 Panic pairing in a set-in 36 Gerry/Ferrell
37 Surgeon's device
38 Begley and Begley
39 Veranda
41 Gomez's cousin
42 Resolve quality
44 Kitchen devices
47 Wears
48 Ireland to the Irish
49 Snaky shape
50 Trainload
53 More resentful
56 Invoice stamp
59 Whispers
61 Creamy color
62 Summit
63 Pass due
64 Bring about
65 Mob
66 Coattail
67 Joints with caps

DOWN
1 O'Neal of basketball
2 Center of the Incan empire
3 Emmy winner Tesio
4 Ripens
5 Antique shop employee
6 Endured
7 Fork-tailed seabird
8 "Ax letters
9 Rampaging
10 Grand-time cocktail
11 Rocker Billy
12 Adhesive stuff
13 "Jeopardy!" host
21 March date
23 Chapter in history
25 Like a stairwell
26 Banana
27 Muse of poetry
28 ___ Rica
29 Shoshone
30 Facets
31 Proprietor
32 Oven-dook
33 Kind of cheese
35 ___ Haute, IN
39 1976 Margaux Hemingway movie
40 Year in Madrid
42 Breakfast grains
43 Attention getter
45 Racquet at Wimbledon
46 Soft metal
48 Bedding down
50 Health resorts
51 To ___ his own
52 Coaling oil ice
53 Second of a series
54 Boyfr or Hunter
55 Raise
56 Scottish Gaelic
57 Cereal grasses
60 Pol's prov.der

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
April Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles: Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Outdoor Deck Open
WED. ·Breakaway soL
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Seisiun
Sat: ·Savoy Shuffle
No Cover!
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. ·N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

659-3384 ROADHOUSE 63 Rt. 63 North Millers Falls
Only 15 minutes from campus
Wednesday
Thursday
Karaoke Promo Night
Cinco De Mayo Party
Friday
LITTLE MONSTERS ROCKERS
Ladies Night NO Cover 9:30 PM
Saturday
John Sheldon
Original Rock and Blues 9:30 PM
Sunday
Monday
Blue Monday's
Tuesday
Texas Hold-em Night
All interested parties 7:00PM
$5.00 pitchers of Bud and Bud light always
www.rt63roadhouse.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You are more mature than you seem sometimes.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You need to restrict yourself when it comes to sending out nasty e-mails.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You drink enough Diet Coke to kill a moose.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
There will be a little friction between you and one of your friends today.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Now, the worst part of the week is over for you.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You should hug a scorpio today. Hugs are always appreciated.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You should get out of bed and go to breakfast this morning.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You should stop eating all your friend's food. Go forage for nuts and berries.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
You might be able to make your headache go away if you blink really fast

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Don't forget to check your phone today. You might have an important message

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Working is always more fun when you have another person by your side.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You should play the harmonica today when you're bored and have nothing to do.

Want to have a position of ultimate power?
Have graphical skills?
APPLY TO BE THE NEXT COMICS EDITOR!
Just come down to the Campus Center basement and fill out an application by 6 p.m., Sunday May 8.

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywineapts.com stop by, or call 549-0600

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st! CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@worldnet.att.com Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

AUTO FOR SALE

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, tint. $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

EMPLOYMENT

Yardwork, Landscaping, Handyman. June, July, August. $10.00/hr. Car needed. 549-1578

Camp Counselors – Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pinefirecamp.com

Make $75 taking online surveys www.moneyyouthere.com

Painters 2-3 years experience Must have a vehicle part-time, full-time. Call Michael 367-9810

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $8 - $12/hr. (888)277-9787. www.collegepro.com

Responsible college students wanted for Franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown. (888)427-7672 Ext. 445

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Cleaning 2 days (8-2) and Saturday AM Hampshire Fitness $9.5C per hour and membership. Jason or Deb 256-6446

Summer/Beyond: Local franchise Major healthy home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay 587-9500.

Live in Babysitter needed for two girls this summer in Wellfleet on Cape Cod. Salary, Room, and board. Please Call 508-349-6392

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

Moving: Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE). Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

Help Wanted – Cutting edge agricultural facility on 116 in Amherst seeks quality motivated, detail oriented help. Flexible shifts, relaxed atmosphere, on bus route. 15-40 hours weekly, mornings a must. Please e-mail inquiries to peter@bashelters.com

EMPLOYMENT

Housekeeping. June, July, August. Flexible hours. $10.00/hr. Car needed. 549-1578

Summer Jobs For The Environment
*$275 - $475 / Week
*Stop Global Warming
*Protect the Environment
Make a difference Work with MASSPIRG on a campaign to stop global warming. Career opportunities and benefits. Call Chris 413-256-6443

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Café, 60 Masonic St. Northampton.

MARKETING/SALES
Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time. www.GetSetPrinting.com Call Dan 413-682-0020

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necc. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Administrative Assistant for Teen-Suicide Training Program Part-Time until late Spring Then Full-Time thru late August. Call 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

FOR SALE

Full Size bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition $200 & buyer must pick up (443) 904-6944

HOUSE FOR RENT

Hadley 5 Beds, Large lot, September, $1575, plus utilities. Skibiski Realtors 586-1827

4 Bedroom, Northampton for June. Double living room, enclosed side porch. $1300/month +utilities. Skibiski Realtors 586-1827

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 bedroom Newer home Laundry, Hook-ups. Large yard 549-4270

House Hadley: Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage, 1 1/4 miles to UMass, $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879.

MISCELLANEOUS

www.butchbats.com
Just Look Stupid

Your Opinion Could Get You a Free PSP. Have you taken Kaplan or another SAT/GMAT/GRE.com review course? How about a college course? Education site researching course providers want to hear from you. Students who submit course reviews are automatically entered in a drawing to win Sony's new PSP. For details, visit www.courseadvisor.com

ROOMMATE WANTED

1 Bdrm in 2bdrm Brandywine May-Aug $480 Rent & dates negotiable. prass@student.umass.edu

Roommate Wanted in House $325 Call 413-687-4976

SERVICES

Need help filling out immigration forms? Want advice on arranging documents for filing with INS? Contact the Student Legal Services Office at 545-1995 for help with immigration forms.

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING HIV TESTING Birth Control and Emergency Contraception STD Screening and Treatment. Affordable confidential. Tapestry Health 27 Pray Street, Amherst 549-0907

Pregnant? Need help? Birthright of Amherst can help, free testing and support 549-1906

SUBLET

Room Available June 1st Aug 31st in Amherst Center Call Noah 413-687-2465

WANTED

Egg Donors Needed. Help make a couple's dream of becoming parents one true by becoming an egg donor. Very generous compensation and expenses paid. Ages 21-32. Non-smokers only. For more information please visit our website at www.eggdonationcenter.com or contact Christine at Liz at 781-769-6900

Subletting your apartment this summer? Advertise in the classifieds! Call 545-3500

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Minutewomen rally in last at-bat

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

Darkness began to fall on the UMass Softball Complex, and the air was cooling down as the Massachusetts softball team trailed the Boston University Terriers by one run.

UMass	4
BU	3

With the bases loaded and no outs, senior Pam Sulick entered the game for the first time in the contest and proceeded to crank out the final hit of the day and the game winner.

This dramatic ending capped off an unusual afternoon for the Minutewomen (29-14-1 11-3 Atlantic 10), who overcame a 3-1 deficit to snap the Terrier's 13-game winning streak. UMass plays another Beantown team today at 5 p.m., taking on Boston College again, at the UMass Softball Complex.

The game began slowly for both squads, with a scoreless first inning. BU took advantage of the first of six errors in the afternoon, when it scored in the second inning.

"Every inning, we found a way to make it difficult," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "I thought it was incredible the way Jenna [Busa] pitched herself out of those innings."

Busa battled against the errors and struck out six batters, while allowing two earned runs throughout the afternoon. Busa earned A-10 Pitcher of the Week honors for her performance in last week's games.

The Maroon and White came back to deadlock the game in the third, as freshman Angela Conforti scored off of a walked batter. With the Minutewomen continuing to commit errors, the

See SOFTBALL on page 11

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

UMass pitcher Jenna Busa pitched a complete game for the Minutewomen yesterday to earn her 12th win of the season on the mound. She let up three runs (two earned) and struck out six Terriers.

UMass' eight crazy nights

Jeff Howe

Wow.

What a crazy stretch of games that turned out to be.

If you have followed the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (11-2 4-1 ECAC) over the past week-and-a-half, you may want to follow the advice of UMass Spring Concert performer Fabolous and just "Breathe."

Three games, eight days, three wins.

It all started two Saturdays ago, an April 23 home matchup with perennial ECAC powerhouse Georgetown, which was ranked No. 3 in the nation at the time.

Skipping ahead to the end of the game, Georgetown, which trailed by three goals in the fourth quarter, flexed its muscle and cut the deficit to one with 62 seconds still left on the clock.

UM goalie Bill Schell made two saves in the final half-minute, including one as time expired, and the Minutemen took control of their conference and put themselves into position to win their first ECAC championship since 2002.

Time for the Maroon and White to relax after such a hefty win, right? Not a chance.

The Minutemen were given a day to recover and about 24 hours to prepare for the Crimson, a game that was originally scheduled for March 9 in Cambridge. A snowstorm that day moved the game into the middle of a week that was already full of showtime performers in the Hoyas and the Orange.

To add to the importance of the game, the Minutemen needed to pull out a victory to ensure their 20th New England Championship.

Though it looked bleak for awhile — heavily favored UMass was clinging to a 2-1 lead six minutes into the second half — the visiting crew avoided a setback, in a week where it seemed totally possible, and finished off the Crimson 8-5.

They looked physically and emotionally drained after the game, which started 72 hours after their last one finished, and Syracuse appeared to be the last thing on their minds.

Rest was needed, and tons of it.

Fast forward to last Saturday, four days after Harvard, seven after Georgetown. There was no way the Minutemen had their legs back, was there?

They were back at the cozy confines of Garber Field, where they hadn't lost all season.

But three goals by the Goliath known as the rival Orange in a span of 81 seconds gave Syracuse a 3-1 edge and started to raise the doubts about UMass having the ability to conquer these three teams during the most intense eight days of its season.

Enter a six-goal run by the Maroon and White, which included two instances in which it scored a pair of goals within a span of 10 seconds. Enter later on a 13-8 lead with just over eight minutes to go in front of a calmly optimistic crowd.

UMass, which had beaten 'Cuse in 2003 — by one, single goal — for the first time in 22 years, was about to roll through its rival without barely breaking a sweat. Oh, but then it all came apart.

The Orange rallied for three goals, killed off a one-minute penalty and put the finishing touches on the five-goal horror show that no one at UMass wanted to see. The tying goal, Brett Bucktooth's fourth of the afternoon, came with 28 seconds to play in regulation.

Nothing looked good. Except — for everyone who believes in fate — for one, tiny detail.

The score was knotted at 13, heading into sudden death overtime, in the midst of a rainy day at Garber Field. The scene was identical to that of two years prior.

And so was the result thanks to one Jeff Zywicki, who scored on Jay Pfeifer to propel the Minutemen to their second 14-13 victory in as many meetings at Garber Field.

Those were UMass' eight crazy days in a nutshell. Just in case you missed them.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian Columnist. He can be reached at JeffHowe@DailyCollegian.com.

UM crosses plate five times in ninth for win

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

When it was all said and done yesterday, the Massachusetts baseball team (9-28 3-12 Atlantic 10) needed a five-run ninth inning to outlast the Siena Saints (20-18), 15-10, in Loudonville, N.Y.

For a team that has been struggling to score runs all year, the Maroon and White were able to hang 15 on Siena on 16 hits. It took a four-hit performance by freshman catcher Bryan Garrity in order for the Minutemen to pick up the win.

UMass	15
Siena	10

In a break out game for the freshman backstop, he had three runs batted in to up his season total to 14. Garrity also scored two runs to lead the Minutemen to victory.

The score was knotted at 10 entering the final frame. The inning began with senior Curt Szado striking out followed by a single from sophomore shortstop Bryan Adamski. A walk to freshman Brent Tarasuik moved Adamski up to second with one out in the inning.

Freshman Andy Teutken reached on a throwing error committed by Saints third basemen Jacob Willis, his 19th of the year and second of the game. The blunder allowed both Tarasuik and Adamski to score and Teutken to advance to third base. A balk by Siena pitcher James Pacifico allowed Teutken to come home from third with UMass' third uncarned run of the inning.

The inning was then kept alive on singles by freshman Ryan Franczek and sophomore Anthony Santos. Franczek advanced to third on Santos' hit and eventually scored on a sacrifice bunt by sophomore Bill Rankin, who now has 14 sacrifices on the year, tying him with Cullen Maumas who had 14 sacrifices in 2003, a single-season school record.

The scoring was capped by Garrity's two-out single that plated Franczek. Senior Jason Twomley popped out to end the inning for UMass.

UMass kicked off the scoring with one run in both the first and second innings. Adamski plated Garrity in the first with a single to center field, but was stranded along with Twomley when sophomore Michael Weiner flied out to left on the first pitch he saw.

In the second, Teutken doubled down the left-field line and advanced to third when Franczek grounded out to second base. The very next batter, Santos, drove in Teutken on a sacrifice fly to center.

The Minutemen plated three runs in the third to take a 5-0 lead. Leading off, Garrity ripped a single to left field for his second consecutive hit. He eventually scored on a Szado double. Adamski stepped into the box with one out and a man on second and proceeded to take a 1-0 pitch over the left field fence for a two-run homer.

Not to be outdone, the Saints came right back, answering the Minutemen with a six-run bottom of the third. Siena scored the runs on six hits off of UMass starter sophomore Chris Lloyd. Five of the six Saints hits were singles.

UMass scored one run in the fourth and sixth innings to retake the lead, 7-6, heading into the eighth inning.

In the top of the eighth, the Minutemen scored three times to extend their advantage over the Saints 10-6 with the help of two errors from Siena. Tarasuik pinch-ran for Weiner after he led the inning off with a single to left field. He advanced to second thanks to a sacrifice bunt from Tuetken. Willis' first error of the game opened up the opportunity for Tarasuik to score. Garrity later scored because he was allowed to reach on a throwing error by the right fielder.

Once again, Siena would not go quietly. It scored four eighth-inning runs to tie up the game. Lloyd was lifted after two outs, not before hitting two batters and walking in two runs.

Freshman Mark Winter had no more luck with the Saints. He allowed two more runs to score on a single by Eric Hildenbrand. Winter was then lifted by UMass coach Mike Stone for freshman Aaron Smith, who got Gabe Perez to ground out to third.

Smith then pitched a scoreless ninth to close the door on the Saints and capture the win for the Minutemen.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

UMass freshman Sam Boone has registered one hit this season for UM, which beat Siena yesterday.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

UMass freshman pitcher Jason Lavorgna is 0-2 with a 5.62 ERA in 10 appearances this season.

Weighing out the best threesome in the NBA

Three is indeed the magic number in the NBA.

No, I'm not talking about the addiction to the shot that has completely killed the mid-range game or the littlest big man in Philadelphia doing it all on his own (who should be the NBA MVP). I'm talking about the history of champions.

Todd Foster

Since the great 1980's battles between the Celtics and the Lakers, there have always been a core three players who have led their team to the promised land. Larry Legend, The Chief and McHale. Magic, Kareem and Worthy. MJ, Pippen, and Horace Grant, who was replaced by Dennis Rodman.

Has every NBA champion been the result of a talented trio? Of course not. Look at the Detroit Pistons, who won their NBA championship through outstanding team defense, great shot selection, the deepest team in the NBA, and by playing with more heart (yes, it still lingers in some players in NBA). That's what makes them a major contender this year, too.

But, are the Pistons a dynasty? Could this team be a dynasty? I seriously doubt it, because Larry Brown might not even be their coach after this year. That's why you should always have the core three players to fall back on. If one player is off, one of the other two or both pick up the slack.

So, who has the best trio in the NBA right now? Phoenix? Detroit? Miami? Washington? San Antonio?

The best place to start is with the reigning champions, the Detroit Pistons, who have possibly the smartest trio of stars in the NBA with Richard Hamilton, Ben Wallace and Chauncey Billups. These players were the core that former Bad Boy, now Pistons general manager Joe Dumars wanted to build his team around. Put together two intelligent guards with a great touch, who play tough defense, and the Beast from the East, and you have a great nucleus for a champion. Though, with players like All-Star quality power forward Rasheed Wallace and jack-of-all-trades Tayshaun Prince playing out of their minds, this is a team effort.

A team that surprised everyone this year was Washington. The trio in the nation's capital is made up of a group of underachievers who have worked well together. Larry Hughes went from being considered a wasted lottery pick to one of the best all-around scorers in the East. Gilbert Arenas quickly developed into an NBA All-Star at point guard. Then, you have Antawn Jamison with his 20-point, 10-rebound ability on a night-in, night-out basis. If coach Eddie Jordan is smart, he'll keep this young group of potential All-Stars together, but they still

See FOSTER on page 11

Washington overcomes tragedy

By Steve Corkran
Knight Ridder

ALAMEDA, Calif. — Where some sense fear, cornerback Fabian Washington finds excitement. Staring down a talented wide receiver such as Randy Moss isn't scary, it's a challenge.

Feeling pressure never enters the equation on the football field for Washington. Not when you have learned some of life's hard lessons at an early age.

Pressure is learning that your father has been killed and that now you are the man of the house at five years old. Pressure is needing a strong showing in front of representatives from all 32 NFL teams to validate your leaving college early to take care of your younger brother and mother.

DEAN COPPOLA/CONTRA COSTA TIMES

Raiders rookie, Fabian Washington, was drafted out of Nebraska last weekend, works out in Oakland's minicamp.

"He's the type of kid to make a bad situation turn out good," said Chandra Washington, Fabian's mother. "If there's a job that's got to get done, he gets it done."

In life and on the field. The teachings he has learned have served Washington well and led to his being selected by the Raiders in the first round of the NFL draft eight days ago.

On Friday, he embarked upon his latest challenge: showing the Raiders that they made the right decision by trading up again and again until they were in position to draft Washington.

Naturally, there is skepticism and a wait-and-see attitude by some toward Washington because of the track record of the player ostensibly he is being asked to replace.

The Raiders traded up twice to draft cornerback Phillip Buchanon out of Miami in 2002. Everyone was certain that he would develop into a Pro Bowl cornerback and dynamite punt returner.

Buchanon had his moments but ultimately proved too inconsistent, as well as unworthy of a first-round pick and all the hype. The Raiders traded him four days before the draft so that they could get enough ammunition to move up into the first round and find a replacement.

That player was Washington, from the moment Raiders managing general partner Al Davis witnessed Washington run a 40-yard dash at the NFL Scouting Combine in February that some clocked as fast as 4.25 seconds.

"He's a guy that our scouts ... were extremely excited about," Raiders coach Norv Turner said. "When our coaches got a chance to be around him, work him out, watch the tape, the feeling was exactly the same. So, he's a guy that we think will have a great future with the Raiders."

Those closest to Washington say it's only a matter of time before the Raiders know that they scored a direct hit.

"They're getting the total package out there," said Raymond Woodie Jr., Washington's football coach at Bayshore High School in Bradenton, Fla. "I foresee him being an impact play-

See TRAGEDY on page 12

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday May 5, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 132

ROTC to host UMass dodgeball tournament

By Naomi Rudov
Collegian Correspondent

Get ready to dodge, dive, dip, duck and ... dodge. No, this isn't a sequel to Ben Stiller's cult comedy — it's even better. The University of Massachusetts' Army ROTC is hosting a dodgeball tournament tomorrow, May 6, to raise money for the Massachusetts Soldiers Legacy Fund.

The tournament, which offers a $500 prize for the winning team, will be held at Totman Gym from 12 to 3:30 on Friday. Teams must have ten members and be co-ed to compete, and every participant is asked to donate five dollars to the fund in order to enter the competition. Participants will play 15-minute bombardment-style games with double elimination, where each team is guaranteed a spot in at least two games. There will be a captains' meeting at 11:30, and all teams must be registered and ready to dodge by noon.

Created by UMass Hockey player Peter Travato, the MSLF raises money to help support children who have lost mothers or fathers in the war against terror. Currently, about 30 Massachusetts soldiers have lost their lives in this war, leaving behind about 20 children without sufficient means to pay for college. Travato is supported by his hockey teammates as well as his friends from ROTC, who are enthusiastic about community service.

"I want the fund to stick with the University," said Travato. He stressed that since Umass Amherst is the state's flagship university, it is important for the students on campus to become invested by helping future college students from Massachusetts receive higher education and have the opportunities UMass students have. So far, there has been substantial local interest in the MSLF, resulting in donations for everything needed to make the tournament run this year. Travato is planning to continue to work on the MSLF when he graduates this spring, and hopes to pass involvement down to younger members of his team.

"We are encouraging large groups like frats and sports teams to participate in the tournament," said Dave Pease, one of the event's organizers and a member of ROTC. He is optimistic about the opportunity to contribute to the first year of the tournament. "We are looking to establish this as an annual event."

So far, about seven teams have signed up, including two from the UMass Hockey team, two from ROTC, and several sports teams, including Women's Lacrosse.

"There will be a barbecue for tournament teams, and Red Bull is coming to give away free stuff," said Pease.

The UMass community is getting excited to play "a good 'ol fashioned game of dodgeball," especially Travato. For him, the tournament is the culmination of months of hard work and organization to get the MSLF up and running. The fund's first official day was December 1, 2004, and since that day, the fund has been a

See DODGEBALL on page 3

Nursing Students Assoc. registers over 65 potiential bone marrow donors

The Annual Bone Marrow Typing Drive sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Student Nurse's Association went very well according to next year's new Student Nursing Association President Jessica Dayo.

The drive collected blood samples from donors to be entered into the National Program Donor Registry. Two teaspoons of blood are needed to avoid matching errors.

Contrary to popular belief, donors do not need to worry about tattoos, piercings, or if they have recently left the country — issues that can prevent people from donating blood for blood drives.

The actual typing costs $65, which can be claimed on taxes. Yesterday, the SNA was able to pay for 65 caucasian donors to be typed. Many who came after the limit had been passed paid for themselves. Due to the lack of minority donors nationwide, all minorities were typed for free.

If a donor from yesterday's drive is matched with a patient needing a bone marrow transplant, they will be contacted by the registry to be re-typed for safety purposes.

According to the NSA, patients needing a bone marrow transplant are often suffering from cancer and have severely weakened immune systems. In this instance, an accidental mismatch would most likely be fatal.

Once a match is confirmed the donor must go to a hospital to make the bone marrow donation. A needle is inserted through the skin and into the upper pelvic bone after the donor is anesthetized.

Although some soreness may occur after the donation, medication is often prescribed for the pain, which disappears within a week.

—Elizabeth Vargas

MEGHAN BRINSTER/COLLEGIAN

A balloon and flier advertises the Nursing Student Association's bone marrow transplant donor typing drive yesterday in the Campus Center.

MEGHAN BRINSTER/COLLEGIAN

Design your career

BDIC major Ben Nathan poses with BDIC alumni Loring Barnes, '83. Nathan , a short film major, will be shooting a film in New York City this summer about a Brookland boy who goes to Paris to become a spy. Barnes, who studied public relations and marketing communication, currently owns Clarity Communications.

'A PhD is not enough' talk opens students' eyes

By Ashish K. Sahu
Collegian Staff

Students at the University of Massachusetts got a taste of what to expect after graduation during "A PhD is Not Enough!", an event and workshop held at the Campus Center Auditorium on Tuesday to raise awareness about graduate education and an understanding of the graduate climate.

The event hosted approximately 275 registrants including 235 students, 33 faculty and administration. In his opening remarks, Graduate School Dean John Mullin said that a graduate student climate survey conducted earlier this year at UMass showed that the level of satisfaction among graduate students was not as high as the administration had hoped it would be.

He said he liked one theme of the workshop that focused on developing "soft skills," networking, and research skills as a scientist or engineer and committed to another such workshop for this coming fall for new incoming students.

Doctor Peter Feibelman, author of the book "A PhD is Not Enough," conducted the workshop, telling students how he saw some very bright students make their lives miserable by making mistakes while planning for their career. He also mentioned scientists and engineers in general need to improve their social skills in order to better succeed in the workplace.

The workshop brought about a range of questions by students about job search in academic, government and industrial, how to find a right advisor and mentor, and how to make the most of our times as a PhD student.

"To be accepted as a scientist you have to learn to act like one ... in all ways," emphasized Feibelman.

"The question and answer sessions with Feibelman raised awareness about the common concerns common to all STEM graduate students," said Jessica McCoy a co-organizer of the event and a third year graduate student from Polymer Science and Engineering.

During a lunch session geared toward faculty and students in their early years of their PhD and near graduation, students were allotted tables in a fashion that no two department students sat next to each other so that every one would get a different perspective about others' research and the common problems they face.

"The lunch discussions were an opportunity for graduate students to share their own experiences and issues while brainstorming solutions for graduate education," said Ticora Jones a co-organizer of the event and also a fourth year graduate student from polymer science and engineering.

Each table came up with solutions to bridge the communication

See PhD on page 4

SGA reviews new budget

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Controversial discussion carried the tone to last night's Student Government Association as many student groups were distraught over the 2006 budget — set to be voted on last night.

Certain student groups criticized the budget and its committee members for cutting the funds for multicultural groups such as certain African Latino Asian Native American groups even though those funds are essential to their mission statement.

Chair of the Ways and Means Committee Colin Delargy said that he and his committee members have been working since February on budget allocation for students groups and Registered Student Organizations. Delargy told Senators and RSO members who came to the meeting that the budget allocation was based upon many things, one of which was the past expenditure of the groups' budget.

"If an RSO did not spend all of its money," Delargy said, "then we did cut their request based on what they spent last year."

Some groups like the Asian American Student Association was furious with the budget plan because their budget was cut by more than 70 percent.

"We're pissed off that you guys are cutting our budget by 70 percent," one AASA member said, "this is ludicrous, we serve over 2,000 people and we are the biggest minority group on campus, we are the huge hub for the Asian American community."

Delargy insisted that the budget allocations were made as fairly as possible and in terms of cutting finding for the AASA groups, he said, "they never sub-

See SGA on page 3

Court hears bids for Puerto Rican votes

BOSTON — A lawyer told a federal appeals court Wednesday that denying the U.S. territory's residents the chance to vote in presidential elections creates a "government without consent."

"We have the same at stake in presidential elections as all other American citizens," attorney Gregorio Igartua said during a hearing in the 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

A three-judge panel last year rejected Igartua's petition to allow Puerto Rican residents to vote in U.S. presidential elections, and Igartua asked that the full court review the case. Previous federal court rulings have held that the constitution must be amended or Puerto Rico must become a state before its residents can vote for president.

The full seven members of the court didn't immediately issue a ruling.

Gregory Katsas, a lawyer from the U.S. Attorney General's office, said the court doesn't have the authority to order Congress to count electoral votes from Puerto Rico or admit the territory as a state.

Igartua fought back tears as he noted that 28 American citizens from Puerto Rico have died serving in Iraq and Afghanistan, yet none had the right to vote for the president who sent them to fight overseas.

"This situation must be ended," he said. "You can make history today."

The appeals court already has rejected Igartua's claims three times, including in 1994 and 2000.

Judge Juan Torruella, who dissented from the court's ruling last year, has called the lack of voting rights for the island's residents a "colonial condition" that represents a "gross violation of their civil rights."

"If, on the one hand, it can be argued that Puerto Rico and its 'citizens' are better off materially than they were when the island was invaded 106 years ago," Torruella wrote last year, "the undeniable fact is that it has been, and continues to be, at the basement of the American hegemony."

Torruella challenged Katsas during the hearing to explain what he meant in court papers when he referred to Puerto Ricans and "their country."

"What country are you referring to?" he asked.

"The United States," Katsas responded.

"How do they take part in the government in the United States?" the judge asked.

By electing a nonvoting member to U.S. Congress, Katsas answered.

"They have a constitutional system with a democratically constituted government," the lawyer said.

—Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING
BRUCE SPRINGSTEEN
Comes back with a rocking post 9/11 masterpiece
Page 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
GOODBYE TO UMASS
One columnist's advice to UMass students graduating this year.
Page 5

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H65°, L37°
TONIGHT Clear, H37°, L20°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H66°, L39°

SPORTS
BEGGING FOR MERCY
UMass softball routs Boston College in Amherst yesterday.
Page 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor-in-Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Healy
Assistant Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts/Living Editor Michael Busack
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Matthew Reid
Features Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marry Pappas
Display Manager Josh Kiggins
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Prevaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Distribution Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Assistant Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzaro
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890 the paper began as Aggie Life. As the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Daily Collegian in 1970. Published daily since 1986. The Collegian has been awarded since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 413-545-3500. Rates are $10 a.m. and $30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Michael Busack
Photo Technician
Meghan Brinster
Copy Editor
Meghan Healy
Production Supervisor
Molly Eggleston
Production Staff
Melody Natal, Lauren Egavian

Correction, Mistake, or Error
Due to a reporting error the Daily Collegian reported that Yousef Munayyer asked Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano if he was considering resigning during a Faculty Senate meeting. He did not say this.

International News

Reporters celebrate Press Freedom day

By John Leicester
Associated Press

PARIS — There was no freedom for Shi Tao and Florence Aubenas on World Press Freedom Day, or for Dawit Isaak, or for Marie-Jeanne Ion, or for Ricardo Gonzalez Alfonso, or for ...

But they were remembered Tuesday. Even in press-hostile countries, journalists held marches and sit-ins to demand an end to the threats media workers face: killings, prison, kidnapping, government censorship and other abuses.

The list of reporters in jail, held hostage, or killed on the job was particularly long this year — in part because of the violence in Iraq. The number of dead is higher than it has been in a decade.

"We will not be cowed. We will not be silenced," the National Union of Journalists of the Philippines vowed in a statement marking the 15th annual worldwide observance. It said 23 journalists were killed there in the past three years, with a total of 66 murdered since dictator Ferdinand Marcos was ousted in 1986.

In Pakistan, where violence against reporters is common, baton-swinging police arrested 30 journalists who marked the day by protesting outside parliament in the capital Islamabad, witnesses said. They were later released.

Chanting "free detained journalists. Reinstate press freedoms," 1,500 reporters marched through the capital of Nepal. Dozens of reporters have been arrested since King Gyanendra seized power in February, and 12 remain in jail.

Scores of police watched the protest in Katmandu but did not intervene. Journalists are barred from criticizing the king, his government and the security forces. Independent radio stations have been banned from broadcasting any news.

Kenyan first lady Lucy Kibaki and her security detail showed scant regard for the global day of campaigning, storming the Nairobi office of Kenya's largest newspaper early Tuesday, triggering a confrontation where she allegedly slapped a television cameraman and demanded the arrest of another reporter and his editor, witnesses said.

President Mwai Kibaki's wife also seized notebooks, tape recorders and cameras of reporters covering her protest at The Daily Nation's offices, said Wangethi Mwangi, the newspaper's editorial director.

First democratically elected Iraqi government sworn in

By Alexandra Zavis
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The first democratically elected government in the history of Iraq was sworn in Tuesday against a backdrop of surging violence, and the new Shiite prime minister pledged before a half-empty parliament that he would unite the country's rival ethnic factions and fight terrorism.

Despite months of tortuous negotiations, there was no final decision on seven positions in the 37-member Cabinet — including the key oil and defense ministries. More critical still, the partial Cabinet fails to give the country's disaffected Sunni Arab minority, believed to be driving the insurgency, a meaningful governing stake.

Many lawmakers skipped the ceremony, which took place in a conference hall deep within Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone. Among those absent was the government's most senior Sunni member, Vice President Ghazi al-Yawer.

The Cabinet that took office Tuesday includes 16 Shiite Arabs, nine Kurds, four Sunnis and one Christian. Two deputy prime minister's slots — including one Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari hopes to offer to a woman — were left vacant and five ministerial portfolios are in temporary hands.

Courtesy Xinhuanet.com

The new Iraqi government was sworn in yesterday amids a wave of violence within the country.

Al-Jaafari played down the disputes still roiling his government more than three months after millions of Iraqis risked their lives to vote in landmark parliamentary elections on Jan. 30.

He blamed the delay in filling the Cabinet on Sunni infighting and said the matter would be resolved in two to three days.

"But we are not in a hurry," he told reporters after Tuesday's ceremony. "We want the choice to be accepted by all the Iraqi people."

Al-Jaafari's government has less than eight months left to complete its main tasks: draft a new constitution by mid-August and submit it to a referendum no later than Oct. 15. If approved, new elections must be held by Dec. 15, under Iraq's transitional law.

Al-Jaafari pledged to get to work confronting the "heavy legacy" left by Saddam Hussein — a country afflicted by poverty, corruption and mass graves.

Blast kills 25 in Afghanistan

By Tomas Munita
Associated Press

BASHGAH, Afghanistan — Stony-faced men buried a toddler on a hillside alongside 25 other fresh graves Tuesday, while searchers picked through the wreckage of homes smashed by the explosion of a warlord's cache of explosives in this mountain hamlet.

As villagers mourned, and some muttered complaints about dangerous arms being kept among houses, the former anti-Taliban militia commander denied accusations by government officials that he was hiding weapons from a U.N. disarmament drive.

Warlord Jalal Bashgah insisted the explosives at his family's compound had been intended for improving the rough road to the village, and U.N. officials backed up his claim that he has cooperated in disarming his former militia unit.

Bashgah shrugged wearily when asked about the government announcing an investigation of the blast, which killed at least 25 people, most of them his relatives.

"I have lost so many members of my family here," he told The Associated Press. "What else are they going to do to me?"

Nearby, a few men with shovels dug gingerly through debris searching for signs of three people still missing.

The blast Monday morning flattened six houses and damaged a mosque in Bashgah, a village in Baghlan province hidden away in a mountain valley 75 miles north of Kabul.

Twenty-four of the known victims were buried Tuesday, including a 2-year-old girl called Wasila. Two small feet with red-painted toenails stuck out from under a shroud of raw cotton as men lowered her into the damp earth next to other new graves, each marked with a stone.

The girl's father, among dozens injured by the explosion, was being treated in Pul-e-Khumri, at Baghlan province's only hospital. A village woman died there Monday night.

Some in the village complained bitterly about Bashgah, who arrived Tuesday to inspect the damage.

"Why did he have to keep explosives and ammunition in his house, which was so close to everyone else?" said one man who refused to give his name out of fear it could bring him trouble. "He is responsible for a very bad thing."

Bashgah and his immediate family live elsewhere, but the families of his two brothers lived in the compound where the explosives were kept and most of them died in the blast.

He said 190 pounds of high explosives and three crates of gunpowder in a basement were to be used to level the road along the valley. There was also some ammunition stored as well — indicated by spent shell cases littering the blast site.

rentals@eaglecrestmanagement.com
Need a house or condo for the 2005-2006 school year?
Call or Email today
256-3442
Eagle Crest has just the place for you to call home.
Eagle Crest Property Management

thinking about internships?
Didn't get the summer job you wanted?
Think about Fall semester co-ops and internships
You could spend your fall full or part-time at a place you have only dreamed about working at Places like
Late Night with Conan O'Brien
MTV
IBM
Northwest DA's Office
Bay State Medical
Reebok
EMC
Amherst Schools
WBZ
Local and national positions for all majors
Find out how
Come to a Field Experience Information Session
Today May 5 * 3 pm * Goodell 508
phone: 413-545-2224
fax: 413-545-4426
www.umass.edu/careers
CareerServices
Career Services Office
UMass Amherst
511 Goodell Building

Ron-O of Ours
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
549-RENT (7368)
No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
POTTERS AUTO & TRUCK RENTALS
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
75 Sunderland Road North Amherst, MA 01059
www.northamherstmotors.com
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

Cash For Your Books
Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.
Jeffery Amherst College Store
253-3870
Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst

Four Seasons
WINE • LIQUOR • CIGARS
333 Russell St., Rt. 9
Hadley, MA 01035
584-8174
Sale date 05/05/05 - 05/11/05
responsible for typographical errors.
Beer
Wine
Moet & Chandon Brut Imperial 750 ml....$34.99
Moet & Chandon White Star 750 ml....$29.99
Chandon California Sparkling Brut 750 ml....$15.99
Green Point 750 ml Australian Chardonnay, Shiraz....$15.99
Chandon Chardonnay 750 ml....$15.99
Stonegate Napa Valley 750 ml Cabernet Sauvignon, Merlot....$15.99
Casa Lapostolle 750 ml....$12.99
Cuvee Alexander Chardonnay
Sebastiani 750 ml Sonoma County Merlot....$10.99
Principato Pinot Grigio 1.5 lt....$8.99
Liquor
*NEW*Navan Vanilla Cognac 750 ml....$29.99
Bushmills Irish Whiskey 1 Liter....$24.99
Crown Royal Whiskey 1 Liter....$24.99
Bailey's Irish Cream 750 ml....$18.99
Romana Sambuca 750 ml....$18.99
Jose Cuervo Tequila 750 ml....$16.99
Captain Morgan & Parrot Bay Rum *Including Spiced, Coconut, Mango, Pineapple 750 ml....$10.99
Dr. McGillicuddy's Schnapps 750 ml....$10.99
Smirnoff & Smirnoff Twist * *Including Strawberry, Watermelon, Raspberry 750 ml....$10.99
Emmets Irish Cream 750 ml....$9.99
Hours: Monday - Saturday 9am - 11pm, Sunday 12pm - 11pm

Former president Bustamante relays dislike over new budget mitted a budget." Delargyalso said that he made repeated attempts beyond expectations to contact officers from AASA to receive a budget.

SGA from page 1

Graduate Assistant for the office of ALANA Affairs, Gladys Franco was "disgusted" at the way the budget turned out and urged Senators to fail the budget.

"The UMass population will not be happy with you," Franco said, "this budget is an insult to UMass, it is disgusting and appalling, I felt like crying. I appreciate the time and the effort but something needs to be done tonight."

Franco proceeded to identify every group that had received significant cuts citing that "they are the groups who do positive things on this campus."

The AASA group said that it had used all of it $11,000 last year and then had applied for various grants to fulfill its mission statement, however, Delargy reiterated that their cut was so drastic because they did not submit a budget.

"This is a result of groups leadership falling through," Delargy said in reference to the AASA group, "this is not taken as a punitive measure, this is money being turned over every year, lets put it towards another group or finance."

Former President of the SGA Eduardo Bustamante who is no longer involved in the SGA came to last night's meeting to voice his issues with the budget.

"I don't really want to be here right now, I never really like Senate meetings," Bustamante said, "I have a problem when different RSO's come to me and ask me why they aren't getting funded. I am going to write two points: one outing UVC and two surplus."

Bustamante criticized the Ways and Means committee members for allocating too much money to groups during the year who didn't need the money. In February, the Senate voted to allocate $8,000 in emergency funding to the UMass Outing Club and the UVC-TV 19 station. He also said that there is an unprecedented reserves fund that should be allocated to the RSO's whose budgets were cut.

Delargy, however insisted that the finance reserves fund would not be dipped into just because cuts were made and that the cuts were a result of a history of spending habits.

"I don't think that we will dip into long term reserves," Delargy said, "I think that these budget allocations are right on."

Delargy also recommended that groups that are unhappy with their allocation should come to the Senate and lile a grievance so that after a review, they might be able to receive money out of finance reserves.

The special order to approve the 2006 budget was not voted on at press time, however, if it fails, it will be dissected and voted on an individual basis.

Megan Brinster/Collegian

Former SGA President Eduardo Bustamante expresses his dislike over the changes in the budget for next year at last night's meeting.

Do you dream of the highest quality, craftsmanship & comfort in your mattress?
The Yankee Mattress Factory
Luminous, hand crafted sleep sets
Custom made sets, antiques, RV mattresses and waterbed inserts
Locally owned with 14 years of providing affordable, superior mattresses for a great night's sleep
Now conveniently located in Amherst Center!
220 North Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002
413-658-0012

Travato organizes tournament

DODGEBALL from page 1

tax-exempt, registered non-profit organization. It is the first charity of its kind in the nation, said Pease.

Travato was motivated to begin this fund after spending last summer working for state representative Mike Rush. As a legislative aid, it was Travato's job to keep Rush up to date on important news. As Travato read through the newspapers each day, the stories of local soldiers going to war and never returning home made him said, "I thought to myself, why don't you do something on your own [to help out]," said Travato. "Here I am, a college athlete ... I have a privilege to go to school that these kids don't have. Maybe there's something I can do."

Every semester, the students of the Minuteman Battalion participate in a community service program called the Scabbard and Blade. In the past, ROTC has held ice cream socials at the Holyoke Soldier's Home, and raised over $2,000 for their annual Family Outreach Holiday Drive. The MSLF is a unique enterprise that many members of the Hockey Team and the ROTC have become passionate about in their pursuit to help others less fortunate than themselves.

"If your parent dies when you're young you don't think about college right away, but eventually it's something you have to consider," said Pease.

Woman charged in children's death

MARTINEZ, Calif. (AP) — A woman was convicted Wednesday of two counts of second-degree murder in the hit-and-run deaths of two children who were struck down on a sidewalk during an evening stroll with their mother.

Jimena Barreto, 46, sobbed and buried her face in her lawyer's shoulder as she heard the jury's verdict. She faces 30 years to life on the murder charges. She also was convicted of leaving the scene of an accident, driving under the influence and driving on a suspended license.

Authorities said she swerved across two lanes without braking before smashing into Troy Pack, 10, and his 7-year-old sister, Alana.

Barreto, a nanny who has four previous drunken driving convictions, acknowledged taking the prescription painkiller Vicodin and a muscle relaxant for back pain on the day of the crash in October 2003, but denied being under the influence of alcohol.

Her attorney said prosecutors had not proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the drugs affected her ability to drive. The case is believed to be the first time a California resident has been prosecuted for murder based on intoxication that resulted from prescription drug abuse.

—Associated Press

ALL FIRED UP! creative food & beverage
FEATURING
MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE
ALL YOU CAN EAT
BUFFETS
STUDENT SPECIAL
ALL YOU CAN EAT
SUNDAY BRUNCH
$9.95
(Regularly $13.95)
48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
www.allfireduphadley.com

"If you can dodge a wrench, you can dodge a ball."
-Dodgeball
Charitable DodgeBall Tournament
All proceeds go to
The Massachusetts Soldiers Legacy Fund
$500 Grand Prize
Friday, May 6th from 12-3:30 pm
at Totman Gym
Entry Fee: $50, 10 players pert eam (co-ed, teams must have at least 1 guy or 1 girl)
To register: email umassdodgeball@yahoo.com, call 508.736.8852, or come to Totman Gym day of tournement at 11:30 am with team and entry fee.
Hosted by the Massachusetts Legacy Fund, Army ROTC, and Air Force ROTC
The Massachusetts Legacy Fund raises funds for children of Massachusetts soldiers who have died in Iraq or Afganistan.

Worcester/Franklin
Spring Fling Barbeque
Menu features:
Steak sandwich
Grilled chicken sandwich
Garden burger
Cold lo-mein (vegetarian)
Fruit salad
Whoopie pie
Ice cream bar
4:30–8:00pm
Friday,
May 6, 2005
in the Quad north of Worcester DC
Dining Services
UMassAmherst

National News

Sick kids get diagnosed at daycare by new 'telemedicine'

By Ben Dobben
Associated Press

ROCHESTER, N.Y. — Marilyn Gonzalez worried that her 2-year-old was coming down with an ear infection. Rather than miss work for a doctor visit, the 25-year-old single mother of two dropped her daughter off as usual at the day care and went to work.

Little Iaeda was examined soon afterward by a University of Rochester pediatrician and given antibiotics. Using telemedicine tools wielded by a day care staffer, the diagnosis was done through the Internet.

"When I picked her up, everything had been taken care of," said Gonzalez said with a sigh of relief. "At least for those common things like ear infections and strep throat that most kids get, I'm comfortable with the diagnosis. Telemedicine has done wonders for me."

A federally backed project offering "virtual doctor" visits at seven child-care centers in this city of 220,000 has proven so successful since 2001 that it is being expanded this spring and summer to five more centers and 10 public schools throughout the city and suburbs.

The expansion will create the biggest metropolitan network of its kind in the nation, covering 8,500 children in all, and provide a tantalizing glimpse into the future of medicine.

Though there were some technical problems, sickness-related child absences dropped on average by 63 percent at each of the seven pilot centers. They serve about 950 children of mostly low-income families with little or no health insurance, according to a study published this week in the journal Pediatrics.

In addition, it said, 92 percent of parents said the option allowed them to stay at work when they otherwise would have taken their children to a family doctor or an emergency room.

Telemedicine has evolved since the 1990s chiefly as a way to bring medical care to rural communities across America. Doctors can monitor patients via voice, data and video hookup as well as verbally direct medical procedures.

Aided by school nurses, hospitals already have telemedicine units set up at several schools in Kansas and Texas.

The project here was the first to offer telemedicine at day care centers in low-income neighborhoods where "the need is greatest," Dr. Kenneth McConnochie, a pediatrician at the university's Strong Memorial Hospital and director of the so-called Health-e-Access program.

Launched with $2.6 million in federal grants and another $2 million from mainly nonprofit groups and local businesses, the expanded network will now largely pay for itself.

"Maintaining it, as I see it, should come from the usual sources of reimbursement for health services, which is local insurance organizations," said McConnochie, who is also chief scientific officer of a company that provides hardware and support services for any center that opts to use the program.

More importantly, by catching illnesses promptly and reducing the need for costly after-hours trips to the hospital, telemedicine could help to improve children's health and reduce health care costs, proponents say.

"Having it available where children spend the majority of their time, such as schools and child-care centers, we have the potential to reshape the way our nation's pediatric offices provide care for very common childhood illnesses," said McConnochie.

An employee at each location gets a week of technical instruction in how to operate the equipment _ from using a stethoscope to sending live video across town _ as well how to swab a throat or clear wax out of a child's ear before inserting an otoscope. The assistants remain under supervision for eight more weeks but do not make medical decisions.

Technical problems or the lack of an assistant forced suspension of telemedicine during several periods for the first three centers. One center terminated the service because it wasn't generating enough child visits.

COURTESY INTERMEDIX CORP.

The Mobile Telemed Workstation Health Station 2004 allows doctors to view a patient and diagnose them without an office visit.

AIDs drugs tested on foster kids

WASHINGTON (AP) — Government-funded researchers tested AIDS drugs on hundreds of foster children over the past two decades, often without providing them a basic protection afforded in federal law and required by some states, an Associated Press review has found.

The research funded by the National Institutes of Health spanned the country. It was most widespread in the 1990s as foster care agencies sought treatments for their HIV-infected children that weren't yet available in the marketplace.

The practice ensured that foster children — mostly poor or minority — received care from world-class researchers at government expense, slowing their rate of death and extending their lives. But it also exposed a vulnerable population to the risks of medical research and drugs that were known to have serious side effects in adults and for which the safety for children was unknown.

The research was conducted in at least seven states — Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, New York, North Carolina, Colorado and Texas — and involved more than four dozen different studies. The foster children ranged from infants to late teens, according to interviews and government records.

Several studies that enlisted foster children reported patients suffered side effects such as rashes, vomiting and sharp drops in infection-fighting blood cells. In one study, researchers reported a "disturbing" higher death rate among children who took higher doses of a drug.

The government provided special protections for young wards in 1983. They required researchers and their oversight boards to appoint independent advocates for any foster child enrolled in a narrow class of studies that involved greater than minimal risk and lacked the promise of direct benefit. Some foster agencies required the protection regardless of risks and benefits.

However, researchers and foster agencies told AP that foster children in AIDS drug trials often weren't given such advocates even though research institutions many times promised to do so to gain access to the children.

— Associated Press

Mass. Dems to endorse gay marriage

BOSTON (AP) — The state Democratic Party plans to endorse same-sex marriage next week, just days before the first anniversary of legal gay weddings in Massachusetts, the party's chairman said.

The party's 3,000 delegates will gather at the Tsongas Arena in Lowell on May 14 to add the endorsement to its platform, state chairman Philip Johnston told The Boston Globe.

"I don't anticipate any serious debate about it," he said. "I think most delegates will support it. In this state, the more people get used to the idea, the more support there is."

Gay weddings began in Massachusetts last May 17, making it the first state to legalize marriage for same-sex couples and sparking a national backlash.

Voters in 11 states have since approved constitutional bans on same-sex marriage, bringing the number of states with such bans to 18. In addition, 24 states have enacted legislation defining marriage as the union of one man and one woman.

But a Boston Globe poll in March found that 71 percent of Massachusetts Democrats believe same-sex marriage should be legal, compared to 35 percent of the Republicans surveyed.

Party platforms have little influence on candidates' positions on issues, but they tend to reflect the widespread sentiments of a party's core membership.

Next week's vote will, in effect, codify a resolution passed by the state party committee last year. It reads: "We affirm our commitment to the Massachusetts constitutional guarantee to same-sex marriage, and all of its rights, privileges, and obligations, and reject any attempt to weaken or revoke those rights."

State Democratic parties in Iowa and Colorado have already endorsed gay marriage. The national party platform doesn't explicitly endorse same-sex marriage, but it does support "full inclusion of gay and lesbian families in the life of our nation." It also opposes efforts in Washington, D.C., to pass a federal constitutional ban on gay marriage.

— Associated Press

Author says PhD isn't enough

PhD from page 1

gap in graduate education between faculty and students. They also discussed what they all could learn from each other's research and a scientific community as a whole.

Later in the evening, Feibelman spoke about "Junior Scientist Survival Training" and asked students to really think about their careers and how can they make their job search effective by increasing their chances by creating their own network. He compared education and scientific life to a business model and said education-al investment is a risk and students need to know their own research interests, the market, and their competition.

"I learned to decide what projects to take and how important is your PhD," said first-year PhD student Kunal Ganeshpure.

Fourth year Molecular Biology student Sangram Parelkar said the event was very educational and it taught him to plan in advance for the tough world.

Heading Home for the Summer?

Local ~ One Way ~ Do-It-Yourself Moves

We'll Take You Where You Want To Go

PENSKE Truck Leasing

* Low Rates
* Full Line of Moving Accessories
* Free Unlimited Mileage on One-Way Truck Rentals
* Full Range of Clean, Fuel-Efficient Trucks
* 24-hour Emergency Road Service
* Automatic Transmission and Air Conditioning Available

10% student discount with coupon below.

Receive a 10% discount WITH THIS COUPON on your next Local or One-Way truck Rental

Call (413) 549-1644

10% Discount PENSKE Truck Leasing 10% Discount

Affordable, new, clean trucks at convenient rental locations

This coupon is not valid with any other offer. One per truck rental and subject to availability. A "One-Way rental" means your Penske truck is rented in one city and returned to another

For Reservations Call 549-1644

Spring Specials

$5 OFF Style Haircut
$15 OFF Any Foil Highlite
*With Andrea Only
Starting at $30

FREE Eyebrow Waxing
With any other salon service

Exclusively at: 549.5610

Styles by Deborah
65 University Drive, Amherst (413) 549-5610

Now also featuring hairstyling, manicures, pedicures and body waxing.

Shear Bliss
Holistic Full Service Salon
$10 off Special Occasion Package includes:
*Updo
*Mini facial
*Makeup
offer expires July 1st
460 West St., So. Amherst
shearblisssalon.net
253-2322

UMassAmherst

You'll find smaller classes, the same great teachers, credits that can add to your GPA, with flexible class options so that you can take care of the rest of your life, too.

Your Summer Your Way

UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414

Summer

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it" -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Senior citizen sendoff

Matt Brochu

It seems like it was just last night that you laid awake in the top bunk of a freshmen dorm you didn't want to be in with a roommate you didn't know, trying to figure out why you left home in the first place. You were homesick, but you weren't alone.

You wondered how far you'd have to walk to class, and if you'd meet anyone nice enough to walk with you. You wondered if the things people had told you about your school were true. Do they really put laxatives in the food? Do people really have sex in hidden corners of the library? Do students really get drunk enough to flip over cars, jump off dining hall roofs or go to women's basketball games? Little did you know that this scary new place would become your home.

Now, the end to fun as you know it) is approaching fast for all the 16th graders out there. If this were a middle school dance, Bryan Adams's "Everything I Do (I Do it For You)" would be halfway through the guitar solo and you'd be publicly rounding first base. If this were "Braveheart," you'd be screaming "Freeedom!" in slow motion as an axe falls decisively towards your Adam's apple. If this were sex, your girlfriend would be (edited for content) and you would be (edited for content) before rolling over for the obligatory clock-check to see exactly how long you lasted.

Anyways, in case you haven't updated your AIM profile countdown today, allow me to give you a hand: 17 days until graduation. To tell you the truth, it doesn't matter if you're excited about the countdown (cool-sunglasses-smiley-face) or completely mortified by the idea (single-tear-sad-face). There's no way around it. No matter how much you've screwed around over the course of the last semester, barring failing grades on your Intro to Beer Pong and Snooze Button Studies finals, you will proudly stand along-side the three friends you made within your soon-to-be-useless major and receive your imaginary diploma in McGuirk Stadium three Sundays from now.

I'm not here to tell you to enjoy your final two weeks here at UMass because I'm pretty sure you're going to do that anyway. Instead, as the only consistent Collegian contributor with a diploma framed on his bedroom wall, I will give you a taste of some things you can look forward to.

Congratulations, you've just graduated college with a degree in Sociology, a 2.8 GPA and a liver that works. What have you won? A no-expenses-paid trip on the Graduation Party Express around New England to eat penne with chicken and broccoli under a tent for eight consecutive weekends. Mothers will plan flip cup (and tell embarrassing childhood stories), fathers will plan beer pong (and become the main characters of embarrassing adulthood stories) and nosey relatives will ask the famous post-Superbowl question: "So what are you going to do now?" To put an end to this seemingly endless line of questioning, just tell them you're taking the year off to concentrate on your music.

In terms of meeting that special someone, the message to single seniors is fairly simple: treat these last two weeks like you have a fever, and the only prescription is casual sex (with the potential for something more). College, for lack of a word that won't make me seem sexist, is a thousand fold meat market, with the exception that sometimes the meat will drop it like it's hot and expect you to buy it a drink.

So if you've gone eight straight semesters without so much as a semi-serious relationship, well, you're pretty much screwed. That's like standing in the middle of a driving range for four years, walking away completely unscathed and hoping to get pegged by a golf ball on the walk back to your car. Best of luck trying to find your soul mate at Barnes & Noble or Taco Bell. I'm sure your children will love it when you retell the story about meeting Mommy after she dropped her Chalupa.

Sure, some of you plan on attending grad school or have jobs lined up in exotic locations like Roxbury or Worcester, but the rest of you will be moving home for an unspecified period of time. It's weird. Some people will waste an entire semester decorating and rearranging their college rooms, but when it comes to their room at home, they won't take two seconds to rip down the glitter-glue-ridden "Best Friends" collage they got from Topanga at the end of eighth grade.

College, for lack of a word that won't make me seem sexist, is a thousand fold meat market, with the exception that sometimes the meat will drop it like it's hot and expect you to buy it a drink.

Who updates their room anyway? I'm sure if you get lucky, meet a girl and bring her home, she'll be turned on by the opportunity to get busy in your X-Men sheets. Just make sure to turn off your lava lamp before you get the party started, otherwise Drew Bledsoe and Kathy Ireland might sneak a peak from your walls. And just so you don't forget, your condoms are hidden on the shelf behind the "Goosebumps" books.

So it's been settled. Much like Donna Martin, the majority of you will graduate, but reality won't slap you in the face for a while.

Fast forward to a month from now. You wonder where you'll accept your first real job, and if anyone will be nice enough to visit you there. You wonder if the things people told you about the economy are true. So you lie awake in a different bed, one you know all too well, without a roommate to talk to, trying to figure out why you left Amherst in the first place. You're homesick, but you're not alone.

Matt Brochu is a UMass graduating student.

Police misconduct the norm?

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

It has come to my attention that police abuse of power is becoming disturbingly common in Amherst. Most of us have been at parties here that have been broken up with excessive force, and probably know someone whose arrest shocked us and seemed entirely uncalled for. Many are vaguely aware of a growing trend of extreme police aggressiveness in and around universities in this country — some may have even seen video of the U.C. Santa Cruz police brutality against non-violent campers from last Monday — but most have chosen to hang their heads and just try to stay out of the way.

Unfortunately this trend is hitting the Amherst area particularly hard. In the past months, there has been a rash of police misconduct as officers have stepped above and beyond the call of duty in harassing and brutalizing innocent civilians and generally galvanizing otherwise non-violent situations. Whether these are the actions of individual officers on power trips or local police departments either tacitly or explicitly encouraging such actions, they are illegal and unjust and they must cease.

Clearly, there is at least some institutional blame: the UMass police log is habitually filled with 18 to 20-year-olds arrested for possession of alcohol by a minor. This is how the university spends its tight budget while it is annually forced to cut financial aid, minority and community outreach programs and academic departments. Do we really think our money is better allocated in the senseless punishment of college drinking than in education? Are these really our values as a society?

There are so many UMass police officers yet they rarely prevent actual crime, like the impressive razing of the Native American statue or the hundreds of rapes on campus every year that go unreported. Bloated university law enforcement instead wastes our tax money by habitually harassing students.

Then there's the long-unenforced Amherst bylaw authorizing arrests for noise violations without prior warning. In the past month or so, a few friends have learned the hard way about the town's one-strike-and-you're-out policy. Being from western Massachusetts, I find this policy especially appalling and invasive, although I hope the dubiousness of its legality is clear to everyone.

In addition to warranting arrest for mere noise violations, the protocol does not offer the accused the opportunity to know that they are in violation of noise codes before being arrested. This means that charges are brought outside of codified standards and, instead, at the discretion of individual police officers. It also means that Amherst residents are forced to self-censor constitutionally protected activities in order to avoid falling into the undefined zone of "illegal noise." The town statute would likely be struck down if brought before a tribunal of Constitutional interpretation.

Yet it is the misconduct and brutality of the Amherst police that sickens me most. Two weeks ago, a good friend living at Alpine Commons was beaten and arrested by police despite his compliance with their belligerent orders. He was having a party for his brother's 24th birthday and there were about 35-45 guests, all over the age of 21.

Whether these are the actions of individual officers on power trips or local police departments either tacitly or explicitly encouraging such actions, they are illegal and unjust and they must cease.

The police came and without, warning or questioning, arrested him and two others, refusing to cite them their Miranda Rights and instead informing them simply of their right to "shut the f up." After nearly breaking my friend's handcuffed arm, one of the officers proceeded to choke him in the back of the police car for nine seconds while two fellow officers looked on. I know all of this because I have seen a witness' videotape of the incident.

Then this past weekend, three of my friend's neighbors, middle-aged citizens of Cape Verdean origin, were also arrested and brutalized as they had a family gathering. This time the police were courteous enough to warn them to turn their music down and disband the party in order to avoid arrest.

Less than an hour later, the police returned while there were about 10 people left in the apartment — in addition to two sleeping infants and one four-year-old child — and about 15 people in the parking lot preparing to leave. They immediately arrested a man in his mid-forties and, after pepper spraying the onlookers, arrested two others that protested the assault.

The people trying to leave were forced to flee into the apartment to avoid the attack. When they refused to open the unlocked door, the police kicked it in, shattering a window from the force of the blow, and began pepper spraying inside the apartment. The spray was so strong and wielded so recklessly that my friends in their upstairs apartment were coughing, and only tortured screaming could be heard from below.

Upon seeing the now-crying infants, the cops apparently realized they had made a grave error and left in a hurry with their three detainees. They did not apologize for the door, the trauma or the pepper spray, though they did call anonymously later in the night to see if the children were alright. In both cases, the police created crime rather than solving it, and then they arrested or assaulted anyone trying to point out the injustice.

So how do the police get away with such blatant lawlessness and brutality? One way is to hide behind easy-out, three month probation pacts that force students and others to consent to police reports in order to settle matters straightforwardly and painlessly. The true purpose of these pacts is to preclude brutality suits against the department. Another way is to beat up on college students and poor minorities that are unlikely to have the time or resources to pursue legal action.

A final technique is to provide misinformation about individual rights, whether it is refusal to provide the Miranda warning immediately upon detention or telling eyewitnesses that it is "illegal to film law enforcement officers in the state of Massachusetts." This is simply uncalled for and must be addressed by the town immediately.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SPECIAL THANKS TO GREEKS

This letter is to thank the wonderful and generous UMass community. More than 150 UMass students recently participated in the 10th annual Big Brothers Big Sisters Bowl-a-Thon. It was our most successful ever, capturing the best of the spirit of our community. Big and little brothers and sisters joined with students and community members to bowl, raise money and have a party for a program that embodies the notion of "taking a village to raise a child."

With the UMass community raising more than $8,000, the Bowl-a-Thon was a rousing success, raising all together more than $44,00 to support mentoring for children in Hampshire County. Not only did we raise money, we also had lots of fun. There were cheers and smiles all around, prizes won and even some decent bowling scores.

Special thanks to the Fraternities and Sororities who participated this year. The Greek community has been involved in the Bowl-a-Thon for several years now, coming out in large numbers to volunteer and make a big difference. Special appreciation goes to Kappa Kappa Gamma, Alpha Kappa Alpha, Delta Upsilon, Sigma Phi Epsilon, Alpha Epsilon Pi, Sigma Delta Tau, Alpha Chi Omega and Alpha Epsilon Phi, who sent teams who raised money and joined us with great spirit and enthusiasm.

This spirit exemplifies how both the Greek community and the community at large can interact in a mutually beneficial way. We want to publicly acknowledge, appreciate and thank the fraternity and sorority brothers and sisters for supporting our "little brothers and sisters."

Once again, on behalf of everyone at Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County, I want to thank all the participants and behind the scenes supporters who made this year's Bowl-A-Thon such an outstanding success.

Ashley Dennis
Community Outreach and Development Coordinator
Big Brothers Big Sisters of Hampshire County

MID EAST DIALOGUE A SUCCESS

We would like to take this opportunity to tell the campus community about a unique event that took place this week at UMass.

For the past seven weeks we, students and members from diverse religious, ethnic and political backgrounds, have met weekly to organize a dialogue session between local Jews, Arabs and Muslims on campus from UMass and the local community. On Tuesday evening, the fruits of our labor were displayed in "Crossroads," a well-attended dialogue between students focusing on religion, identity, culture and the political conflict in the Middle East.

This dialogue was intended to promote understanding, learning, free expression and the creation of safe spaces for that expression. As the evening began with icebreakers, the diverse group of students warmed up to each other and preliminary tensions began to fade.

Shortly after enjoying samples of Mediterranean foods the diverse group of students refocused and broke up into several dialogue groups based on where they discussed issues in the Middle East relating to the themes of Mid East identity, religion, culture and politics. The discussions were lead by student facilitators who presented prepared questions on the individual topics. This allowed for the creation of a safe environment where each student had equal time to share as well as listen. The structure and organized format of the dialogue allowed for all voices to be heard.

As the organizers and facilitators of this event, we were extremely pleased with the varied turn out. The participants expressed contrasting opinions that seemed to transcend religious, ethnic, cultural and national boundaries. On many issues, people of seemingly similar backgrounds disagreed on varying topics.

Towards the end of the evening, we formed a Middle Eastern drumming circle led by local world music performer/educator Michael DiMartino and created rhythms together, with one voice, in the spirit of dialogue and cooperation. The energy engaged the crowd and set differences aside as it unified people of different backgrounds and perspectives.

We closed the drumming circle and the evening with a song of peace in Hebrew and Arabic. We would like to take this opportunity to thank all of those who participated in and supported the event and reached out to others in the spirit of dialogue to promote understanding and hope for the future. We hope to engage the community in more events like and to inspire others to do the same.

Matt Bertuzzi
Anisa Kaigi
Ramzi Kanazi
Susan Moser (UMass Hillel)
Yousef Munayyer
Abby Robin
Victoria Roytenberg
Elena Zaurova

The good guy girls search for

Hannah Drake

Recently, The Daily Collegian has printed several articles about the lack of dating and excess of sexual pursuit among college students here at UMass. However, writers have failed to mention that real dating — the kind that goes hand in hand with the slight hope of falling in love — is out there, but it takes the right guy. Well, I'm going to describe to you girls exactly who that kind of guy is.

He's the guy who you probably don't know is interested in you, because he's not overzealous like that. He's nice and actually respects you, so he didn't take advantage of you the night you were drunk together and you had the fleeting idea that maybe you'd want to hook up with him.

You woke up the next morning, relieved that you didn't — it would have ruined the friendship, and what were you thinking, anyway? He's the guy who woke up the next morning and probably wished for a half second that he wasn't so damn nice, because he would have secretly loved to kiss you ... but not in those circumstances, so the half-second wish passes.

Remember that the good guys are just as afraid of rejection as you are — anybody who isn't doesn't really get rejected (a red flag,) or doesn't really care because he'll just go hit on somebody else (another red flag).

He's the guy who you probably talk to a lot, about everything. He's probably listened to you complain about how all guys want is to hook up, and how you hate it, and how you're done with relationships, and you're never letting yourself like someone ever again. He also knows that a week later, you'll be telling him about some other half-interested jerk that you can't figure out, who he knows will make you really upset a few weeks from now.

He's the guy who wants to tell you to drop the loser who can't realize how amazing you are, but doesn't because he knows that you probably won't listen, and also because it might reveal his feelings. So he just listens while you talk.

This isn't the guy who calls you up late at night saying, "Come over." This guy has too much respect for you to do that. This is the guy who pays enough attention to you that he remembers to ask how your test, or game or doctor's appointment went. This is the guy who asks about — and then really listens — to how your day went. He'll hold doors for you. He'll go shopping with you, even though he hates it. He's the guy who will never wonder if he'll get caught for what he's doing.

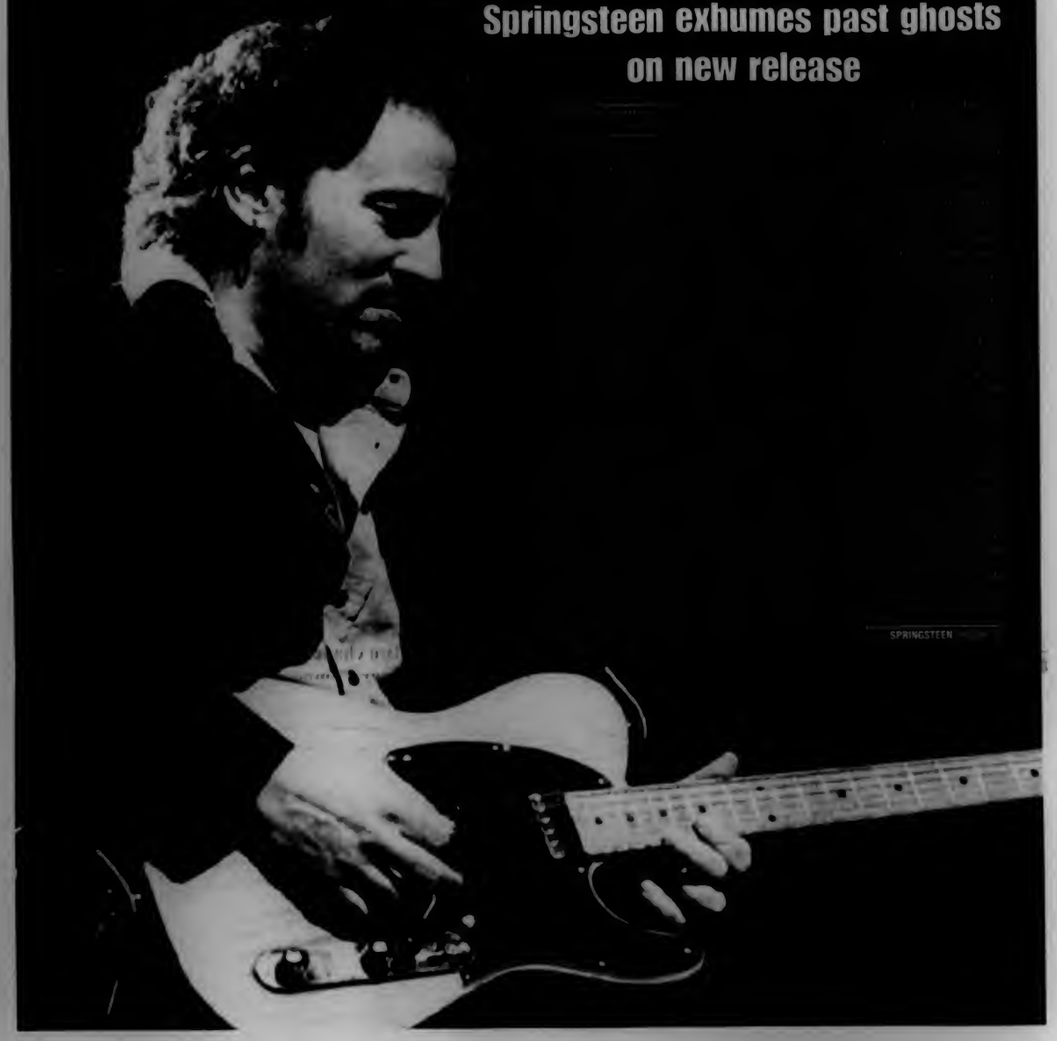
And guess what? He's not going to be the guy who hits on you at the bars. He'd probably let his overly confident buddy hit on you, because he knows he'd want the girl who isn't that easily swayed, anyway. He's not all about just hooking up (although everyone has their stories to tell,) and won't be the guy who tries to persuade you to stay for the "invite-only after party" at his frat house, which (surprise) happens to be in his room.

So girls, if you're looking for something a little more substantial than a few random hook-ups from the same guy, here's what I suggest. If you don't have the guy friend who's just waiting for you to finally look at him as more than a friend, then consider your best guy friend's friends, or ask your best guy friend to set you up. Or consider your friend's super-sweet boyfriend's friends; people generally group with similar people. Remember that the good guys are just as afraid of rejection as you are — anybody who isn't doesn't really get rejected (a red flag,) or doesn't really care because he'll just go hit on somebody else (another red flag).

Also, keep in mind that relationship success is dependent on three main things: attraction, timing and you both have to want (or at least be open to) a relationship. Yes, all three are crucial. Read: if he says "I don't want a relationship right now," it means: "I told you once, fair warning" — and no, just because he may act differently doesn't mean he's secretly changing his mind.

Additionally, guy friends with secret crushes: don't be afraid to take a chance and tell her how you feel. Don't let it be one of those, five years later, "I really liked you," "Oh wow, I didn't know, I really liked you too!" things. You're probably just the guy she's been looking for, anyway. She just might not know it yet.

Hannah Drake is a UMass student.



The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Dust Never Sleeps

Springsteen exhumes past ghosts on new release

Kent State seniors' designs show film's contrasts in fashion

By Kerry Clawson
Knight Ridder

Split personalities intrigue student fashion designer Jessica Fechner, whose senior line in tonight's Kent State University fashion show is inspired by the 1999 movie "Fight Club."

"I really liked the idea of beautiful, feminine detailing with a hard edge, with something unexpected," the St. Louis native said.

She's one of 24 seniors who was featured in the fashion school's "Portfolio 2005: The Silver Screen," held April 14 and 15.

In "Fight Club," a violent tale that explores the duality of human nature, Edward Norton is the buttoned-up narrator and Brad Pitt is the anarchist Tyler Durden. The narrator starts out wearing conservative corporate clothing, while Durden dresses much more flamboyantly.

That's how Fechner came up with a conservative brown wool skirt with inverted box pleats, featuring a violent burst of color inside from an abstract floral print that's revealed when the model walks.

In a nod to Helena Bonham Carter's character, Marla, who favors ripped-up vintage formal wear in the movie, Fechner also has mixed modern and vintage looks. That includes silk chiffon and charmeuse tops with peplums and French seams, and a vintage straw hat with a hand-created flower applique.

Fechner's tops were partly inspired by vintage lingerie and nightgowns: "It's very appealing to me, the things that can stand the test of time."

One of her luxe camisoles, with heavy pin-tuck details and seaming, is paired with a raw-edged hem for a deconstructed aesthetic. The gritty "Fight Club" design inspiration, not meant to be literal, translates on several levels.

"I'd rather look for more of a mental connection," Fechner said. "Your favorite clothing items are the ones that get beat up the most."

In creating fashion contrasts, the young designer said she always keeps her fashion customer in mind: "Women are more than one thing. You're not just girly and you're not just sexy and you're not just conservative."

Twenty-four of the school's 30 graduating design seniors were invited to take part in the fashion show, with final approval granted by design industry critics. Fechner, who spent $1,000 on fabrics for four outfits, worked throughout the school year with fashion design duo Ruben and Isabel Toledo. This is the third year the fashion school has brought design professionals in to help students hone their garments, from design conception to finished pieces.

"I think it's good to have an external viewpoint of what's going on in the industry," instructor Shelby Keener-Reid said of the industry critics.

The senior project really began at the end of the students' junior year, when professors introduced the movie theme and asked the students to research and work out sketches for their lines over the summer.

For Fechner, having two couturiers as critics was a positive, inspiring experience.

"They want real effort. They want ideas that showcase your work best," she said of the Toledos.

Funding for the industry critics is supported by a $400,000 endowment from Ronald Teare of Maple Heights.

This year's KSU design critics, including the Toledos, Eric Gaskins and R. Scott French, were inducted into the school's Fashion Hall of Fame. Gaskins, who trained in Paris with Hubert de Givenchy, celebrates the female figure with his designs, while French designs fun, creative women's wear.

Design approval and final selections by industry professionals heighten the quality of the show, said instructor Shammi Chowdhury, who teaches fashion show production.

"We want to emphasize to them (students) that just being in the show is a privilege – it's not a right," Chowdhury said. Critiques at the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York are much more brutal, she said.

Critics not only help students learn about finishing techniques, but also teach them about communication at every stage of the design process.

"You never know what kind of boss you're going to have or what type your clients are going to be," said Fechner, who will intern this summer in New York with designer Cynthia Rowley.

Model Sydney Sustarsic wears a design by Jessica Fechner at Kent State University's school of fashion design.

Eve makes good with a friend

Original Sin
Eve

What is the true meaning of friendship? Should the guidelines of friendship require unconditional love and acceptance for that person? Or does criticism and judgment toward a friend develop as a natural, expected necessity in the relationship?

I feel as though everyone has that one friend that is different. That one friend who will look up to you, depend on you, listen to you, and make you feel like the best and most important person they have ever met. And you love this person, because you can trust, expect, and help this person with knowledge they so desperately seek. But what happens when this person suddenly stops listening to your advice, stops seeking your approval, and becomes an independent without your help?

Do you get angry?

My best friend and I would answer 'yes'. Neither of us can understand why. Her best girlfriend had shed her dependence around the same time my girlfriend decided to shed hers. As expected we would find ourselves collaborating against them both for hours at a time. She would be angry at a new habit her friend had picked up, I would be wary of a new behavior my friend picked up, and we would both discuss reasons behind their actions as if we were certified therapists. However, we could never avoid one inevitable conclusion after our critiques: we are hypocrites.

We are just as guilty in our actions as they are, but for some reason, they don't feel the need to analyze us.

Is it because they fear confrontation? Or is it because they yield the attribute of a true friend? I have searched desperately to uncover these answers but they are nowhere to be found.

Our friendship with each other is also in itself different. We have both equally undergone years of remarkable character changes together without raising an eyebrow. I have seen her develop from an innocent, inexperienced girl, to an outgoing, knowledgeable woman. She has witnessed all of my personalities, flaws, and weaknesses, and never once questioned my judgment. For some reason, we are both purely, truly, unconditionally accepting of one another. We never criticize each other, we never fight, our arguments are resolved within minutes, and our brutal honesty toward one another is accepted rather than taken personally. We must have one of the healthiest friendships for two females and we have no idea why.

What makes or breaks that difference between friends? Maybe it is because we expect certain behaviors, trends, or characteristics from a friend the moment the connection becomes solid. The letdown of our expectations has caused us to become disappointed in people we care about, instead of allowing us to be constructive with our criticisms as true friends. I believe it is acceptable to voice an opinion or question a friends' decision, however, there is a point at which it is better to keep your mouth shut.

In the end, our friends will do what they want, they will act according to their mood, and they will choose what best fits their needs. We fell into a vicious cycle of disapproval, and only now have we realized the importance of at least trying to overcome our flaws—and leave our friends alone to overcome theirs.

Eve is a Collegian columnist.

ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Attention Seniors!

Congratulations to the Class of 2005 from your Alumni Association!

Visit the Alumni Association Table at Cap and Gown May 2-20 in the Textbook Annex. Get your FREE Young Alumni Guide and enter to win $1,000!

Join the Alumni Association for only $20 - Get two chances to win $1,000 and 1/2 off your Commencement Ball ticket!

UMassAlumni.com

You were. You are. UMASS.

Curb fat by getting picky at the machine vending machines, which almost always have more healthful options.

VENDING from page 6

"If you could find sugar-free yogurt and a piece of fruit, you would have a very healthy snack," Feldmeier says.

The cold machines also often offer milk, though rarely skim (your best choice). And if you have to get a sandwich from the machine, choose turkey or another light meat. Also, try wheat bread. If that's not available, Dove suggests you remove the top of the sandwich to reduce your carb intake by half.

Feldmeier says she'd rather see someone make a smart choice from a vending machine than skip a meal. "That's where you get into trouble. You are setting yourself up for failure. So in that respect, go ahead and grab something from the vending machine."

Of course, her best advice, she says, is to plan ahead and bring a snack from home so you are never faced with going to the vending machine.

"Vending machines are very habit-driven," Feldmeier says. "Plan ahead so you aren't stuck."

Dove says sometimes the problem isn't in making one choice from a vending machine. It's when you aren't satisfied by your choice and make two or three trips.

"The biggest issue is how much do you get from it," Dove says. "You are better off going once and trying to make a better choice. That way, you are in control, and the vending machine is not."

MAXIMUM Capacity SPORTS BAR

$500 Prize

Cinco de Mayo

May 5

Only 20 minutes from campus

1970 Memorial Drive Chicopee MA www.maximumcapacitybar.com

Amherst Computersmiths

Is your computer unhappy?

Call us – we'll fix it up and take your worries away. We come to you and specialize in quick turnaround. We also offer free loaner computers and late night emergency service.

Grand opening special:

The first hour of regular service is only $35!

(Special valid until May 25, 2005. *Additional fee applies for late night service.)

Phone: (413) 687-1665

http://www.amherstcomputersmiths.com

Vending-machine do's and dont's: surviving the cravings

By Amy Bertrand
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

ST. LOUIS — It's 3 a.m.. Your stomach is rumbling. You can't concentrate on your work because you need a sugar fix. Or maybe you have the munchies and you need something salty to sustain you.

The dorm vending machine shines like a beacon for your belly, calling you to it with promises you'll be satisfied.

But as you stare at it, you realize this is not the healthiest thing you can do. Or is it?

Vending machines across the country are making an attempt to include more healthful fare, but they are still chock-full of vending favorites, such as candy bars and potato chips.

Cathy Feldmeier, a registered dietitian at St. Anthony's Medical Center, says she was surprised at what she found in the hospital's vending machines. "Quite honestly, it was disappointing."

What she found were high-fat snacks such as mini-doughnuts and chocolate bars filled with caramel and nougat. What's worse, some of them were in oversized packaging, combining two or three servings in one selection.

Long blamed for some of the ills that plague overweight people, especially children, the vending-machine industry is trying to change its bad image.

The industry's trade association, the National Automatic Merchandising Association, recently launched a campaign to encourage healthful food choices, hoping to fend off efforts to remove machines from schools and to improve the industry's image.

The effort includes a color-coded rating system to indicate which foods are healthful choices and which should be eaten in moderation. Several vending-machine companies are beginning to label health-conscious choices for consumers.

Aramark Corp., which supplies vending machines for the St. Louis Public Schools, among others, uses a check mark to indicate "heart-healthy choices," such as baked chips, pretzels and peanuts.

"They are not the most popular choices," says Dana Browne, general manager for Aramark, who says that distinction at the schools goes to anything that's spicy. "But they do go."

Dennis Brockman, executive director at Aramark, says the healthful foods are "definitely the direction we are going in our vending. It's all about choice, and some people want to choose what's healthy."

Although many dietitians say nothing in a vending machine is going to be your best choice, some items in there are better than others.

"When you look at a vending machine, things always seem to be high-fat and high-sugar," says Merrill Dove, director of nutrition at Imagine Weight Loss centers. "You want to try to find something that is either low in fat or low in sugar. Pretzels (which are low in fat, but high-carb) are always a good buy.

"When a person is in this situation, when they have no other choice, it's OK to go to the vending machine. You just have to make allowances for what you did during the day. If you had a high-fat snack, have a low-fat dinner."

Some places offer refrigerated

See VENDING on page 7

COURTESY ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Vending machines shine like a beacon when your stomach is gurgling between classes or at night when studying. Try pretzels, or baked chips, that while are high in carbs are low in sugar and fat.

Come to The Scene Party

TODAY 11-4 at Student Union Lawn

Free! Food! Prizes!

TEXAS HOLD'EM

Poker Tournament

SATURDAY MAY 7th

GUARANTEED $10,000 1st PRIZE

Registration at 2:30 PM
Tournament starts at 4:00 PM

$200 Buy-in

First 160 players to register

Best Western Sovereign Hotel
Keene, NH

Pre-pay to reserve a seat

Name
Phone
Address City ST Zip
Email

Two ways to pre-pay:

1 Pay on-line with Pay Pal from Marauders web site www.maraudersfootball.org

See web site for tournament rules & details.

2 Mail check payable to "Monadnock Marauders" along with registration form to:
Marauders Football
PO Box 1810
Keene, NH 03431

For more information call: 603-355-7843

Note: Mailed checks must be postmarked by May 3.05

Sponsored by Monadnock Marauders Football Club

Domino's Pizza

AMHERST

Open 11AM to 4AM Daily

tel # 256-8911

3 medium 1 topping pizzas only $5 EACH*

Domino's Pizza

Bruce Springsteen spearheads a triumphant return to music

SPRINGSTEEN from page 6

visions of the woman he still loves. Though the song's explicitness is what has gained headlines, it is the visceral imagery of Springsteen's writing – juxtaposing the saddened memory of the past ("Sunlight on the Amaintlan, sunlight streaming through your hair") with the chilling sterility of the present ("In the Valle de dos Rios smell of mock orange filled the air") – and his brittle slide guitar work, that give it its lasting resonance.

"Silver Palomino," digs even deeper. A haunting, luminescent lullaby where a son recollects the image of his lost mother through the cascading beauty of a horse and its surrounding countryside. "Palomino" features some of Springsteen's most affecting acoustic playing to date – a mellifluous flamenco/blues hybrid that underscores the melody's supple beauty. It also contains some the loveliest metaphorical musings he has ever waxed: "Sixteen hands from her withers to the ground/I lie in bed and listen to the sound/Of the west Texas thunder roll/My silver palomino." On "Jesus Was an Only Son," Springsteen hearkens back to the Catholic imagery of his youth to resurrect a parabolic bond between mother and child. Its striking final verse, "Well Jesus kissed his mother's hands/Whispered, "Mother, still your tears/For remember the soul of the universe/Willed a world and it appeared," suggests a salvation for the lost souls who populate the rest of the record.

As if seeking some kind of inner-release from these agonizing tales, Springsteen unleashes a piercing falsetto trill that pushes his vocal register to the limit for the escapist, almost whimsical tracks "Maria's Bed" and "All I'm Thinkin' About." The gamble pays dividends; though comparatively lightweight, both have a playful offhandedness that extends the feel and scope of the record. The respite of the latter is especially welcome between the haunting ballads that close out the album, "The Hitter" and "Mataramos Banks."

In "The Hitter," as powerful a story as Springsteen has ever conceived - he takes on the roll of a boxer who continues to ply his trade dockside long after the ring lights have faded away. Here, he employs the minimal accompaniment that he used on much of the "Tom Joad" album, sacrificing aural embellishment and pop structure in order to make the listener focus on the words — a risky move that works due to the strength of the narrative. As with his best work, Springsteen melds the black and white of his characters into an all-encompassing gray, inevitably enveloping the listener as well: "Understand, in the end, Ma, every man plays the game/If you know me one different then speak out his name/Ma, if my voice now you don't recognize/Then just open the door and look into your dark eyes."

The harrowing album closer "Mataramos Banks" traces the journey of a border jumper who plunges into the Rio Grande in search of a better life on the other side. Moving from inescapable death ("Your clothes give way to the current and river stone/Till every trace of who you ever were is gone") to unbridled hope ("The lights of Brownsville, across the river shine/A shout rings out, and into the silty red river I dive"), Springsteen follows the journey in reverse — it's an ingenious technique: the loss grows infinitely more tragic with each passing line, punctuated by the solemn, repetitive and ultimately hopeful refrain, "Meet me on the Matamoros/Meet me on the Matamoros/Meet me on the Matamoros banks."

With "Devils and Dust," Springsteen has further solidified his standing within the American musical continuum that stretches from Johnson, Guthrie, Cash and Dylan. As their fervent inheritor, he has all but guaranteed his willingness to carry the torch, sweeping away the dust with every studied step that he takes.

ANDREW TAKE-TWO/MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN

Velvet Revolver hits Mullins

The worlds greatest supergroup Velvet Revolver hit the Mullins Center stage last night. The group, comprised of Stone Temple Pilots troubled front man, Scott Weiland and the remains of hard rockers Guns 'n' Roses, joined together in 2002. Revolver was originally scrutinized by the media, but they proved they have staying power with the release of their album "Contraband".

Pregnant?
Would you like to talk?
Information can help clear away the confusion.
We offer free, confidential counseling with caring counselors who understand your concerns. We provide information about your options so you can make the best decisions for your baby and you.
Open Adoption Available. Choose your baby's parents, meet them and stay in touch. Medical and living assistance available.
CALL 1-877-777-7774 toll free/24 hrs
E-mail:info@brightsideadoption.org
www.brightsideadoption.org
Brightside Adoption Resource Center
2112 Riverdale Road • West Springfield
413-827-4115

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors Westfield, MA 413-842-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

Choose your classroom...
Take summer online courses taught by the faculty of the Isenberg School of Management and have the flexibility of choosing when and where your class meets. Have a look at the abundant offerings for this summer!
Summer Session I: June 6 - July 14
Summer Session II: July 18 - August 24
Build your business skills by taking any of the many online business courses offered this summer.
SUMMER 2005 COURSE OFFERINGS

Accounting 221	Fin & Op Mgmt 250	Management 260	Marketing 301	Sch-Mgmt 197I
Accounting 222	Fin & Op Mgmt 301	Management 301	Marketing 412	Sch-Mgmt 210
Accounting 371	Fin & Op Mgmt 345	Management 314	Marketing 437	Sch-Mgmt 310
	Fin & Op Mgmt 359	Management 330		Sch-Mgmt 391A
	Fin & Op Mgmt 370	Management 365		Sch-Mgmt 497A

To find out more information, contact UMass Continuing Education at 545-3430
Register for courses by visiting umassulearn.net or call 545-3653 or 1-800-922-8211

Hit the books, then hit the beach!
- Day and evening classes start May 31st & July 5th
- Affordable resident cost is $136 per credit
- 5- or 10-week courses
- A great way to earn college credits quickly
- Credits are transferable to your school! (When you are a university or college student, or incoming college freshman)
- Wellesley, Framingham, and Ashland

Looking to get ahead in your course work? Short on credits and need to catch up? Or just looking for something satisfying to do this Summer? A MassBay Summer Session course is the way to go!
Don't sweat it.
Check out MassBay's Summer Session Courses in:
Business
EMT
English
Health
History
Lab Sciences (such as Anatomy & Physiology, Biology, Microbiology)
Math
Social Sciences
and other transferable courses!
Classes meet Monday-Thursday so there's plenty of time left for other Summer activities.
To register or obtain additional information, call 781-239-2703.
Call MassBay today at 781-239-2703 or go to www.massbay.edu
MASSBAY COMMUNITY COLLEGE
Start here. Go anywhere.

YOU CAN SLEEP WHEN YOU'RE 30
comedy CONNECTION HUKELAU
Caffeine Ginseng and Guarana
BEER REMIXED
PRESENTS
Pablo Francisco
Saturday, May 14th
at The Comedy Connection Hukelau in Chicopee
One show only at 7PM
Pablo has appeared on
• "Comedy Central Presents...Pablo Francisco"
• FOX-TV's "The Family Guy"
• NBC's "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno"
For tickets call (413) 593-5222
or order on-line at www.hukelau.com

Big East and ACC settle legal issues

FOOTBALL from page 12

critical investment in the UConn football program — its upgrade to Division I-A status — and the Big East football conference," Blumenthal said in a written statement.

A series of rulings and lawsuits ensued. The lawsuit against Miami and Boston College by the four Big East Schools remained standing and was headed to trial before the parties agreed to mediation.

"We pursued this case because the future of the Big East conference was as risk — the stakes huge for both state taxpayers and the university's good name," Blumenthal said.

The settlement was finalized April 27 in Rockville Superior Court. It discharges Boston College's obligation to pay a withdrawal fee required by the Big East constitution.

The Hartford Courant, the first to report the settlement, cited unnamed sources who said an additional $1 million of the settlement will essentially serve as Boston College's exit fee and the four Big East schools named in the agreement will share equally in the settlement. That provision was not included in settlement documents released Wednesday.

In a statement, UConn President Philip E. Austin and Athletic Director Jeff Hathaway said they were happy the lawsuit was settled.

"The state of Connecticut and the University of Connecticut have made a tremendous investment in the University's football program, and initiatlng this litigation was one part of a larger effort to protect that investment," the officials said in the statement.

Okafor picks up some new hardware

NEW YORK (AP) — Charlotte Bobcats forward Emeka Okafor won the NBA's Rookie of the Year award Wednesday, the first former college player to win the award in four years.

Okafor, the No. 2 overall pick in the NBA draft, led all rookies in scoring (15.1 points per game) and rebounding (10.9 rpg) and was second in his class behind Atlanta's Josh Smith in blocks (1.71). He also ranked second in the NBA with 3.8 offensive rebounds per game.

He ended his season with 47 games in double figures in both points and rebounds.

Okafor received 77 of the 126 first-place votes from a media panel. He finished with 514 points while Chicago Bulls guard Ben Gordon, Okafor's teammate at the University of Connecticut, was second with 433 points.

Gordon won the NBA's Sixth Man award on Tuesday.

Cleveland guard LeBron James and Phoenix center Amare Stoudemire, who both jumped from high school to the NBA, were the last two winners of the rookie award. Memphis forward Pau Gasol, won the award in 2002.

—Associated Press

Kerouac bobblehead set to be enshrined

LOWELL, — (AP) Ruth, Cobb, Mays, DiMaggio, Kerouac?

A bobblehead doll of Beat Generation author Jack Kerouac created as a promotion by the minor-league Lowell Spinners joined the collection at the Baseball Hall of Fame on Wednesday. He is believed to be the first literary figure so honored.

"The Hall of Fame's collections are rich and diverse, given baseball's history and role in helping to shape and define American culture," Hall spokesman Jeff Idelson said. "Having the Jack Kerouac bobblehead in our collection is important, given he's an American icon who had a deep passion for the game, which he shared in his writing."

Fans began lining up more than 7 1/2 hours before the first pitch game time for the Spinners' game on Aug. 21, 2003, when the bobblehead honoring the Lowell native was handed out to the first 1,000 fans. The demand forced the team to create another 500 bobble-heads, which helped raise more than $10,000 for Jack Kerouac Scholarships.

The mold has since been destroyed for fear of more being created without permission.

"In minor league baseball, the promotions play just as big of a role as the game itself," Lowell general manager Tim Bawmann said. "So to have one of your promotions be accepted into the Baseball Hall of Fame is a pinnacle achievement for us."

—Associated Press

UMass rocked by Vermont

BASEBALL from page 12

pushed the lead to 6-3 and left UMass looking for answers.

"Clearly, we didn't produce enough offensively," Stone said. "We can't afford to walk 10 people and have a chance to win."

UMass sent sophomore Scott McGovern to the hill to start the day, but he was quickly ousted after only 2 1/3 innings of work. McGovern allowed four hits, four earned runs and walked three people before being replaced by junior John Toffey in the third inning.

Toffey struggled with his control as well, making it a common theme for the afternoon. Toffey only lasted 2 1/3 innings before Vermont's fifth inning rally ended his outing. He let up four hits on three earned runs while allowing live walks.

Freshman Mike Menard replaced Toffey and had a calming influence for UMass as he went for 3 1/3 innings without allowing a hit.

Junior Matt Torra, who recently won Co-Pitcher of the Week for the Atlantic 10, has anchored the UMass pitching staff in the 2005 season. In his last outing against St. Bonaventure last weekend, Torra blanked the Bonnies with a complete game, two-hit shutout. It was his fifth complete game and second shutout of the season.

Sophomore Bill Rankin tied the UMass single season record for sacrifices against Siena on Monday with his 14th, pulling him even with Cullan Maunus who posted the record in 2003. Rankin went 0-4 with a walk in the leadoff spot against Vermont.

The Minutemen have the rest of the week to prepare for two games against Temple this weekend. Saturday's game starts at noon, as well as Sunday's, both in Philadelphia.

ANDREW TAKE-TWO/MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN

UMass senior pitcher Keith Doherty is 1-5 with a 7.88 ERA and one save on the mound in 11 appearances this season.

UM racks up awards

TENNIS from page 12

and the second March 28 after big wins over Richmond and Temple. She was also voted A-10 Performer of the Week on Feb. 21 and March 28.

"Our team is better because of her," Dixon noted.

Pozar also had a strong year for the Maroon and White. Coming in, Pozar was a heralded rookie out of Slovenia who looked to make an impact. This year her singles record stood at 16-9, mainly in the No. 2 slot. She also had a 15-10 doubles record when teamed with Spiess in doubles competition. On March 14 and 28 she was voted the A-10 Rookie of the Week.

"Masha stepped it up at the end of this second term," Dixon said. "She felt pressure in midseason to perform well, and I think it got to her. She really gained in confidence."

The highlight of the year for the freshman came in the A-10 semifinals against Temple. Pozar was able to defeat the Owls' No. 2 player Yura Kurashima. During the regular season, it took her teammate Spiess four-and-a-half hours to down Kurashima. In the tournament Pozar was able to do it handily in straight sets 6-4, 6-2.

The biggest surprise came with the naming of Edelstein to the team. Anybody who follows the Minutewomen knows the senior was the heart and soul of the team in 2005. However, that might not be as evident to an outsider looking in.

"Sasha was shocked," Dixon said. "I nominated her hoping people would take a look at her, but I wasn't sure whether or not she'd be voted on."

Although her record isn't as eye-popping as Spiess', Edelstein still enjoyed a stellar year for UMass. In singles competition, she compiled an overall record of 15-9, mainly in the No. 5 spot. She also teamed with junior Jana Bartolotti in the No. 3 doubles to go 13-7 on the year. Edelstein garnered A-10 Performer of the Week honors on March 21.

"Her play was so important to the team," Dixon said. "I was hoping [the voters] would look past wins and losses and see what she meant to us."

Great Natural Fiber Spring Clothing!
The Mercantile
11 East Pleasant Street
Amherst, Ma 01002
(413) 549-1396
And
108 Main Street
Northampton, MA 01060
(413) 584-1204

Little Black Dress
- Study for finals
- Pack dorm room
- Say good bye to friends
- Shop at little black Graduation

Perfect styles & accessories to dress up your memorable spring parties & graduation.
413-253-7727
98 N. Pleasant St
Amherst, MA 01002

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN
Is Looking For a Bright, Talented, Multitasking Wizard!
Now Accepting Applications For:
'HUMAN RESOURCES MANAGER'
*Freshmen and Sophomores preferred
*Great Resume Builder
*8.5 hours per week
Applications Available in Room 113 Campus Center Basement. Attn: Sandra Marquez
-Please Bring Resume-

Summer Move-Out
The Easy Way
Move and store packages
Starting at $99
for the Whole Summer!
• FREE Pickup
• FREE Dropoff
• FREE Boxes & Tape
5 COLLEGE Storage
888-455-MOVE
www.5collegestorage.com
$10 Off Summer Storage
Mention this ad and save $10 on your summer move-and-store package! We make moving out easy!
Offer valid on 10-box, 12-box and 16-box packages. Must sign up by May 15, 2005. Not valid with any other offer.
www.5collegestorage.com
5 COLLEGE Storage

UMass dropkicks Eagles

SOFTBALL from page 12

Sulick was due up after Cullington, but she didn't get a chance to go for her third homer of the day, as UMass coach Elaine Sortino opted to pinch-hit with Jasmine Edwards.

"I really did [want a shot at the third homer]," Sulick said. "I didn't understand it, but coach knows best. Jasmine's a great hitter, and she deserved to get some time too."

LaFogg set BC down in order in the fifth to lock up her 18th win of the season. LaFogg allowed only three hits and one run, while striking out five batters to bring her A-10 leading total to 189.

It was a fairly effortless performance for LaFogg, thanks to the run support her teammates provided.

"The team did a great job," LaFogg said. "They've been absolutely phenomenal every time I've stepped on the mound the last two weeks. It takes a lot of pressure off when you know your teammates are going to score tons of runs."

Sulick provided the most help to LaFogg, and despite seeing her playing time cut lately, she stepped back into her regular spot in the lineup with confidence.

"I haven't been in the lineup for about a week or two, so I wasn't really thinking," Sulick said. "I just wanted to hit the ball. I wasn't aiming over the fence at all, I was just trying to get base hits. And it just happened.

"It's nice when the coaches have confidence in you. You feel better going up to the plate. And I've been working on my mechanics so I feel a lot better."

"She was outstanding," Sortino said. "She picked up where she left off. She got the game-winning hit [Tuesday] and came up and belted two home runs today. You can't say much more about it. She was awesome.

"She went through a little bit of a spell, but she kept with it and kept working at it. She's a student of her swing, and she's got a great swing right now. She's really confident at the plate right now."

While Sulick led the offense with the two home runs and 4 RBIs, she was not the only batter to have a big day at the plate, as the Minutewomen pounded out 13 hits.

ANDREW TABLOTNY/COLLEGIAN

The Minutewomen completed a two-day sweep of two Boston schools this week. They beat BU 4-3 Tuesday and BC 9-1 yesterday.

Proctor went 3-for-3 with two runs scored and an RBI, while Morin, Kelley and Cullington each collected two hits on the day.

UMass has won 19 of its last 22 games and appears to be playing at its best heading into the A-10 Tournament which begins a week from today.

"I feel really good about the team," Sortino said. "They're looking really strong. That's what you hope for. You try to get a little bit better everyday. And this team's a little bit better than it was last week. It's significantly better than it was a month ago. And it's meteorically better than it was at the beginning of the season."

A-10 football ready to switch to CAA

By Larry O'Dell
Associated Press

RICHMOND, Va. — The Colonial Athletic Association will begin sponsoring football in 2007 when all 12 members of the Atlantic 10 football conference switch leagues, CAA officials said Wednesday.

The change will leave the Philadelphia-based A-10 without football for the first time since 1996. Five A-10 football schools already compete in the CAA in other sports.

"Every institution desires to have all its sports competing under the same conference banner, and there's no difference in this scenario," CAA Commissioner Thomas E. Yeager said at a news conference.

CAA officials always had an interest in adding football and sensed an opportunity after Hofstra, Delaware and Towson joined James Madison and William & Mary as football-playing members of the league earlier this decade, Yeager said.

Northeastern, an A-10 member in football competing in the America East conference in other sports, joined the CAA in June. That gave the CAA the six members needed to form a football conference.

Invitations were extended to the other six A-10 football schools, which accepted, keeping one of the nation's toughest Division I-AA leagues intact but with a new conference affiliation.

The teams will fulfill their contractual obligation to compete in the A-10 for two more seasons.

New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Northeastern, Hofstra, Maine and Rhode Island will compete in the North Division; William & Mary, Delaware, James Madison, Villanova, Richmond and Towson in the South Division.

"We didn't roll over and die," A-10 assistant commissioner Ray Cella said. "We tried to explain to the presidents the benefits of staying.

PLAN AHEAD FOR NEXT YEAR

Excellent location... 1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments-1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.

NEW PUFFTON VILLAGE

Office Hours: 8 am to 4:30 pm Monday - Friday
(413) 549-0145

Arthur Ashe still providing inspiration

By Charles Bricker
Knight Ridder

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla. — It has been nearly 30 years since Arthur Ashe defeated Jimmy Connors in the final at Wimbledon and forever changed the complexion of professional tennis. But only now, more than a generation later, is the game feeling the full force of Ashe's racial impact.

There have never been more blacks in organized tennis than there are today, and there's every reason to believe the numbers will rise in the years to come.

When Althea Gibson won the U.S. Open in 1957 and 1958, she was the only black American woman in the game. During Ashe's 12-year career, from 1968 to 1979, he was virtually the only black American man in the game.

Today, not only is the number of blacks on the pro tours at an all-time high, so is the small army of teenagers preparing to exit the junior ranks.

Venus and Serena Williams, James Blake, Mashona Washington, Angela Haynes, Chanda Rubin and Shenay Perry have established careers. Behind them is the next wave — Jamea Jackson, Jewel Peterson, Timothy Neilly, Donald Young, Scoville Jenkins, Phillip Simmonds and Marcus Fugate.

And behind them, just emerging as juniors, are three more major prospects — Asia Muhammad, 14, of Henderson, Nev.; Brittany Augustine, 13, of Northridge, Calif.; and Evan King, 13, of Chicago.

There is finally a black pipeline in tennis, and it's flowing freely for three major reasons:

—The profound influence Ashe had on the parents of the players that are out there today.

—The commitment from the United States Tennis Association to reach out to inner-city children with the financial support to train them and fund their travel.

—And, perhaps the greatest motivator, the prize money to be had in professional tennis.

It's a revolution," said former pro Kim Sands, who was on Key Biscayne in December to watch Neilly defeat Young in the final of the Orange Bowl junior tournament, the first time black teenagers have faced each other for a major junior championship.

"I'm still shaking. To see that match . . . to see those two guys out there. It was a spiritual experience," said Sands, who was the University of Miami's first black player before embarking on a 10-year pro career that ended in 1987.

Ernie Peterson, 60, one of the most enduring of Atlanta tennis coaches and father of Jewel Peterson, seldom saw a tennis court growing up in segregated Century, a small town in the Florida panhandle.

And then, in 1975, he witnessed the Wimbledon final on television.

"You didn't have to know anything about tennis," said Peterson. "Here was this black guy beating this white guy at his game. Beating Jimmy Connors, who speaks more smack than any player in the world.

"We all saw Arthur doing his number, every last one of us. And now, what you're seeing today are the kids of the kids who watched Arthur."

The phenomenal success of the Williams sisters has inspired and pushed black tennis players along.

"Venus and Serena opened everyone's eyes," said Sands, who oversees the biggest inner-city tennis program in Miami. "They came along, and they never changed their persona just to be more acceptable to everyone. They were more Afro-centric, and when black kids saw the beads and them just being themselves ... why wouldn't we be attracted to that?"

But what got most of these kids into tennis originally, long before the Williams sisters became international news, were their parents, who grew up watching Ashe.

"Arthur's influence will stretch for quite a long time," said Rodney Harmon, who in 1982, along with Ashe, became the second black player to reach the quarterfinals of the U.S. Open.

Harmon, who was the first head of the USTA's Multicultural Development program, is director of men's tennis for the USTA's High Performance Program.

He pointed out that tennis has always been part of the black community, with at least one professional every few years from Gibson to Ashe to himself to Zina Garrison, Lori McNeil, Sands, MaliVai Washington (who was Wimbledon runner-up in 1996), and finally to Blake and the Williams sisters.

But black players are proliferating because the USTA is putting out about $400,000 a year in grants to get quality instruction and travel funds for black kids who have the potential to be pros and because of neighborhood programs like First Serve, which is based in Fort Lauderdale.

First Serve is in 20 major cities in the United States, reaching thousands of inner-city children in a program that emphasizes academics as well as tennis.

"This is one of the most exciting times I can remember on the men's side of African-American tennis," said Harmon, who grew up on the same side of Richmond, Va., as Ashe and whose life was touched by Ashe along with the parents with whom he deals.

"Phillip Simmonds . . . a very good basketball player. But his father got him into the game because he loved tennis," said Harmon. "Donald Young . . . both his parents are coaches. They got him into tennis."

Ernie Jackson, father of Jamea Jackson, was three years into his career as an NFL cornerback when Ashe won Wimbledon. He would get his daughter into tennis one day.

CHRISTOPHER A. BRUNEAU/CHARLOTTE OBSERVER

Former tennis great Arthur Ashe opened the doors for current African American superstars such as Venus Williams.

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST

HELPING UNDERGRADS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS

Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students

Student & Workers Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord Tenant & Consumer Disputes.

CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Looking for a Job?
The Daily Collegian
is seeking energetic and creative individuals to fill fall 2005 advertising executive positions.

Sound like you?
Contact Kerry O'Grady
@ 545-3500 for more information

This year, get yourself a job where you meet great people and gain great experience!

KISS A SENIOR Goodbye

Send your favorite Seniors a
UMass Amherst Champagne Glass
full of Hershey Kisses to celebrate graduation!

Only $6.00 per glass

Available online until May 6, 2005 at www.UMassAlumni.com/students
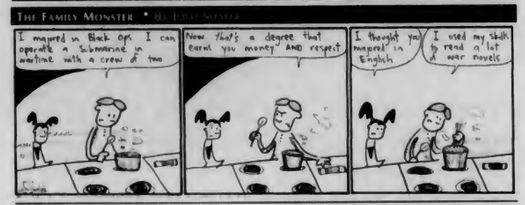
or at the
Student Alumni Association Table on the Campus Center
Concourse Tuesday, April 19 - Wednesday, May 11

GET FUZZY • By Darby Conley

LABRAT • By K. Mastro



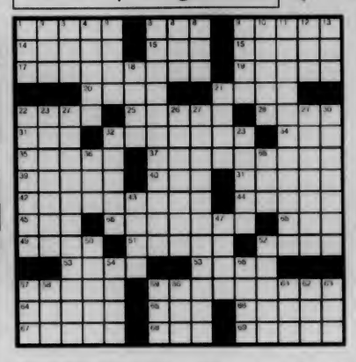
SAD ED • By Keith Tucker

THE FAMILY MONSTER • By Joe Sutton

THE FAMILY MONSTER • By Joe Sutton

Quote of the Day

"I'm just a fool/Learning loving somebody don't make them love you."



—Jack Johnson

ACROSS
1 Respond
6 NASA's ISS partner
9 Sliced again
14 Actress Woodard
15 Fall behind
16 Expunge
17 Tokie she's fancy
19 Packing heat
20 Weighty book
21 New thought
22 Coarse file
25 Jenna
26 Scott in a high court case
31 Kerouac's bote
32 Damascus populace
34 Grabbed a bite
35 Swedish automaker
37 Dutch capital
39 More chilly
40 Hanoi holiday
41 Feudal lord
42 Delaying departure
44 Wading bird
45 End hunger
48 Fans
49 Pique
49 Huskies' vehicle
51 Sound asleep?
52 Soothsayer
53 Teases
55 Brewer's grain
57 Burning
59 Possible to divvy up
64 Kitchen device
65 Bleach
66 Positioned accurately
67 Outer limits
68 Singer Grant
69 Transmits

DOWN
1 Squeaker
2 Actor Wallach
3 Shot's near
4 Firm and fresh
5 Legendary marksman
6 Enrichment
7 Pre-college exam
8 Time period
9 Take in text
10 Goofed
11 Goodwill among friends
12 Put into service
13 Ballplayer Williams
18 Dame's address
21 Fails to be
22 Vituperates
23 Not a people person
24 Breaking into sharp pieces
26 Allspice
27 Former hall country
29 Bric a brac shelves
30 Mother of Persephone
32 More achy
33 Tennis star Monica
36 ___ out (be a couch potato)
38 Oil-well device
43 Singer Diana
47 Hindquarters
50 Funereal piece
52 Long look
54 Hive dwellers
56 Oh, why not!
57 Is for two?
58 Passing craze
59 Baden-Baden or Bath
60 That guy
61 Hot-dog holder
62 Rain first
63 Asner and McMahon

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

The Moan and Dove
go abroad.
please.
just tell your lover not to wait.
themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte. 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

On Campus, Downtown, and on the web
Rao's Coffee
Masters of Your Caffeinated Destiny

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Yesterday's lunch date went along very nicely.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
You might want to zip your pants before you go to class with that hottie.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You need some caffeine to get your creative juices flowing.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Don't worry, it will warm up before the end of the year.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Your alarm clock annoys all of your neighbors, especially when it goes off for an hour.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You need to mail your friend that package before you forget completely.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Next semester you should not schedule yourself for any 8 a.m.s.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You should start studying for that final as soon as possible.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Your favorite American Idol is going to get kicked off because you're not voting.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
That bruise on your arm looks a bit like Abe Lincoln.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You know you wanna go bananas, like Gwen Stefani.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Maybe it's time to do laundry. People can smell you across campus.

UVC TV 19 - Umass' Only Student Run Television Station

Thursday - May 5th
5:00pm S.G.A. Night
7:00pm Umass News
7:30pm Umass News
8:00pm Sports Sunday - Final Episode
9:45pm Diary Pete
11:30pm Puerto Rican Night
1:30am S.G.A. Night

Friday & Saturday May 6th & 7th
7:00pm Umass News
7:30pm Umass News
8:00pm Sports Sunday - Final Episode
9:45pm S.G.A. Meeting 5/4
10:15pm Entropy 7
2:00am Umass News
2:30am Entropy 7

Sunday May 8th
12:00pm Tennessee Time
1:30pm Contemporary Indian Art
2:30pm Umass News
3:00pm Umass News
3:30pm TJ Fashion Show
4:00pm Contemporary Indian Art
5:30pm Twice upon a Time
7:00pm Contemporary Indian Art
8:00pm Sept. 11 Fashion Show
9:30pm Twice upon a Time

Don't Forget - UVC is now taking orders for 2005 Graduation videos and DVDs! Contact us for more information!

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Puffton 3 Bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@winn.com Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Buss, and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

AUTO FOR SALE

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, mnt. $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

EMPLOYMENT

Housekeeping, June, July, August. Flexible hours. $10.00/hr. Car needed. 549-1578

Yardwork, Landscaping, Handyman, June, July, August. $10.00/hr. Car needed. 549-1578

Painters Helpers Call 413-253-9457

Camp Counselors – Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply online at www.pineforest-camp.com

Make $75 taking online surveys www.moniker-author.com

EMPLOYMENT

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $8 - $12/hr. (888)277-9787. www.collegepro.com

Responsible college students wanted for Franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown (888)427-7672 Ext 445

Cleaning 2 days (8-2) and Saturday AM Hampshire Fitness $9.50 per hour and membership. Jason or Deb 256-6446.

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 o $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/x7.asp to apply.

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour; 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Pangea Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

EMPLOYMENT

Summer/Year-round Local franchise. Major healthy home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay. 587-9500.

Moving. Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Café. 60 Masonic St., Northampton.

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPrinting.com Call Dan 413-687-0020

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part Time until late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call: 800-343-6132 Student Housing Program, Conway, MA

HOUSE FOR RENT

Full Size bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition. $200 & buyer must pick up. (443) 904-6844

HOUSE FOR RENT

Hadley. 5 Beds, Large lot. September. $1575, plus utilities. Skibski Realtors 586-1827

4 Bedroom, Northampton for June. Double living room, enclosed side porch. $1300/month +utilities. Skibski Realtors 586-1827

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 Bedroom Newer home Laundry Hookups. Large yard 549-4270

House Hadley. Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms. Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $1750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7829

MISCELLANEOUS

www.hutchhats.com

Just Look Stupid

ROOMMATE WANTED

Roommate Wanted In House, $325 Call 413-687-4976

ROOMMATE WANTED

1 Bdrm in 2bdrm Brandywine May-Aug $480 Rent & dates negotiable. pmss@student.umass.edu

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992.

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

SUBLET

Room Available June 10th. Aug 31st in Amherst Center Call Noah 413-687-2365

Looking for someone to sublet your apartment this summer? Only 7 days left to advertise in the Collegian classifieds. Call 545-1995 today.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

UMass makes BC beg for mercy

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

It seems like every week a different player steps up for the Massachusetts softball team. Clearly, it is Pam Sulick's turn this week.

Sulick delivered the game-winning hit in Tuesday's 4-3 win over Boston University, and followed that up with two home runs yesterday in the Minutewomen's 9-1 mercy-rule win over Boston College at home.

UMass	9
BC	1

The win was the 30th of the year for UMass, marking the 14th straight year that the Minutewomen have won 30 games.

UMass (30-14-1 11-3 Atlantic 10) will look to add to its win total this weekend in a pair of doubleheaders. The team travels to Rhode Island on Saturday, and will host Senior Day against Quinnipiac on Sunday.

After coming from behind on Tuesday, UMass wasted no time taking control early yesterday.

Lauren Proctor led off the second inning with a double over the left fielder's head, setting the stage for Sulick. The senior designated hitter crushed a 2-2 changeup over the left-centerfield wall, giving UMass a 2-0 lead.

BC got a run back off of UMass starter Barb LaFogg in the third, but the Minutewomen kept the Eagles at bay with four runs in their half of the inning.

Amanda Morin led off with a double off the wall in center. KJ Kelley followed with a walk, and Maggie Fein came in to pinch-run. Denise Denis then moved both runners up a base with a perfect sacrifice bunt.

UMass' hottest hitter, Stacy Cullington, then came to the plate and slapped a single to right scoring Morin. Proctor then ripped the first pitch she saw back up the middle to put runners at first and second. The rally appeared dead after pinch-runner Kristi Stefanom was cut down attempting to steal third, but once again Sulick delivered.

Sulick connected on her second two-run homer of the day, hooking the ball just inside the left field foul pole to give UMass a 6-1 cushion.

UMass secured the mercy-rule win with three runs in the fourth inning. With one out, Hilary Puglia, Morin and Kelley hit three straight singles up the middle, with Kelley's hit plating both Puglia and Morin. After a strikeout, Cullington closed out the scoring with a double off the centerfield wall to drive in Kelley.

See SOFTBALL on page 10

ANDREW TAMULEVICH/COLLEGIAN

UMass softball pitcher Jenna Busa went seven strong on Tuesday to beat Boston University 4-3. The other half of the staff, Barb LaFogg, went the distance in yesterday's mercy-rule victory over BC.

They can win any type of way

Eric Athas

Winning teams are built around an explosive offense. Or is it the defense that wins championships? Maybe it's a coaching genius that is essential to any program. In trying to slap a cliche onto the face of the Massachusetts softball team, I have come up with several solutions, but no clear-cut choice.

The Minutewomen beat Cal State Northridge 2-1, so that proves they are a defensive group. But then again they crushed La Salle 15-1, which shows that offense is apparent.

If there is one aspect of the game that is the most simple to measure, it is certainly defense. If a team has a talented pitching game, it will show during virtually every contest. The Maroon and White certainly display this theory to its fullest.

Although the team's hitting has struggled at moments throughout the season, and fielding errors have become a deterrent as of late, the UMass aces have remained consistent.

Senior Barb LaFogg and junior Jenna Busa (maybe she doesn't count, because she hit a homerun Tuesday, but for clarity's sake, lets only call her a pitcher) have accounted for the team's pitching staff in 2005, and the two are both putting up some striking (no pun intended) numbers.

I honestly wouldn't be surprised if most of LaFogg's opponents are all at home crying right now. In 28 appearances, she has struck out an A-10-high 189 batters and boasts a 2.04 ERA on the season. Not only has she struck out more batters in the A-10 than anyone else, but the four pitchers behind her on the list have pitched in significantly more innings than her.

LaFogg's numbers, matched with Busa's 112 strikeouts and 2.27 ERA, make for a good one-two punch, as Busa is averaging 4.3 allowed hits per game.

It would be easy to say that both the offense and the defense have equally earned UMass coach Elaine Sortino 30 wins this season, especially since the Minutewomen have outscored their last 17 opponents by a whopping 116-41 runs. But UMass' all-time winningest, Hall-of-Fame and legendary coach even understands that when it comes down to it, defense is what really matters.

"Hitting comes and goes," Sortino said. "But defense wins championships."

One example that solidifies this notion is a lopsided weekend that took place in April. The Minutewomen swept St. Bonaventure on Friday, April 22, winning Game 1 by a margin of 9-1 and then proceeded to win the second game 7-1.

After putting up 16 runs against the Bonnies, UMass managed only four runs two days later, in two home losses against North Carolina State. Hitting came and then it went.

A second example of how the hitting game can be an enigma one day and palpable the next is UMass senior infielder/designated player Pam Sulick. Prior to Tuesday's comeback win against Boston College, Sulick registered 29 hits, one home run and 15 RBIs in 41 games.

After not playing for the majority of the contest, Sulick came off of the bench in the final inning and recorded the game winning RBI against the Terriers. It didn't end there, however, as Sulick cranked two homers and 4 RBIs in yesterday's 9-1 destruction of Boston College.

So there it is, I've made up my mind, it is actually defense that will be a softball team's best friend in the end. And it is defense that is the contributing factor for the Minutewomen. But there is no overlooking junior KJ Kelley's 10 homeruns and .396 batting average or senior Hilary Puglia's 34 RBI, or freshman Lauren Proctor's 43 hits.

Forget it. I give up.

Eric Athas is a Collegian Columnist.

Catamounts too much for UM

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's baseball team (9-29) found its offensive stride against Siena on Monday, scoring 15 runs on 16 hits, but it did not carry over to yesterday's match up with the Vermont Catamounts (20-13-1). The Minutemen only posted three runs on eight hits against UVM, which was not enough against a potent Vermont offense, as the Minutemen lost 7-3 on a tough day for the UMass pitching staff.

Vermont	7
UMass	3

"Basically, we struggled to get people out and that's not going to equal a win," UMass coach Mike Stone said.

It was Vermont's 51st victory in this long-standing series, which played its 110th game yesterday. UMass leads the all-time series 59-51.

The Maroon and White jumped out of the gate with a two-run top of the first inning but Vermont responded in the bottom of the frame with three of its own and never looked back.

The first two UMass batters went down to start the game before senior Jason Twomley reached base on an error by the UVM third baseman. Batting in the cleanup spot was senior Curt Szado, and he came through with a double down the right field line, scoring Twomley. A single in the next at-bat by sophomore Bryan Adamski scored Szado and gave UMass its only lead of the game.

The bottom of the inning spelled trouble for the Minutemen, as the first two Catamounts singled to put runners on first and second. An infield single loaded the bases for Vermont's cleanup hitter, and he cleared the bases with a triple, putting the Catamounts up 3-2, enough of a cushion for Vermont's pitching staff.

UMass would score in the top of the third when a single by sophomore Matt Weiner drove home Twomley, who had reached on an error by the second baseman. However, that would be the end of the UMass offense for the day.

The game slowly slipped away from the Maroon and White when, in the bottom of the fifth inning, UVM scored three runs, capped off by a two-run double. The scoring outburst

See BASEBALL on page 9

ANDREW TAMULEVICH/COLLEGIAN

UMass first baseman/outfielder Bill Rankin went 0-for-4 at the plate with a walk yesterday.

Travis Ford brings in his third recruit

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

In assembling his first recruiting class in Amherst, new Massachusetts men's basketball coach Travis Ford has already managed to land the point guard he needed in Chris Lowe and the shooter he coveted in James Life.

Now he's found a third recruit who can do a little bit of everything else.

Brandon Thomas, a 6-foot-6 200-pound guard/forward who played most recently at Long Island University, has signed a National Letter of Intent to play basketball for the Minutemen.

He will have two seasons of eligibility remaining, beginning in 2005-06.

"We are excited to welcome Brandon Thomas to the UMass basketball family," Ford said. "He is an incredibly talented and versatile player. We expect Brandon to be an immediate impact player for the upcoming season.

"He can play multiple positions including both guard and both forward spots. He is a proven Division I player who will be a factor for us."

Thomas, who chose UMass over Florida, Florida State, Notre Dame and DePaul, led LIU in scoring at 12.3 points per game and shot 51 percent from the floor in 2003-04 before deciding to transfer.

He did not play basketball last season while attending Santa Fe Community College in Gainesville, Fla.

"The atmosphere at UMass and in the town of Amherst is great," Thomas said.

"The coaches are very classy people who want to win. I was also impressed that they want to build lifelong relationships with their players and want the best for their players."

A native of San Antonio, Texas, Thomas played his prep ball for coach Mike Wacker at Converse Judson in San Antonio, leading the Rockets to the best back-to-back seasons in school history and averaging just under 21 points per contest as a senior captain.

Big East, ACC come to agreement

By Donna Tommelleo
Associated Press

HARTFORD, Conn. — The Big East and Atlantic Coast conferences have settled their legal differences over school defections with an agreement worth millions and adds nine interconference football games by 2012.

The presidents of Connecticut, Pittsburgh, Rutgers and West Virginia signed off on the agreement, which drops lawsuits between the conferences, their member schools and officers. Commissioners of both leagues also endorsed the deal.

The settlement, obtained Wednesday by The Associated Press, did not specify the monetary amount each Big East school will receive, but a UConn bank statement shows $1 million was deposited in the school's account on April 27 by the law firm charged with disbursing the settlement cash.

Calls seeking comment were left with ACC assistant commissioner Brian Morrison; Erik Albright, an attorney for the league; and Boston College.

Boston College will leave the Big East on June 30 and join the ACC on July 1. Miami and Virginia Tech left the Big East and joined the ACC for the 2004-2005 season. BC agreed in October 2003 to join the ACC. Syracuse had been courted by the ACC but opted to stay in the Big East.

The initial lawsuit over the ACC's expansion plans was filed in June 2003 in state Superior Court in Hartford. Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal accused Big East members Miami and Boston College of conspiring with the ACC to weaken the Big East by luring away some of its biggest football powers.

The Big East schools said they spent millions of dollars to upgrade their football programs based on the presumed loyalties of the departing schools.

UConn's football upgrade to Division I-A, for example, included a $90 million stadium.

"This resolution protects Connecticut's

See FOOTBALL on page 9

Atlantic 10 honors three UMass tennis players

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

It was only two-and-a-half weeks ago that the Massachusetts women's tennis team were hanging their heads after a devastating loss to Richmond in the finals of the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Now, three of the key members of this year's team have a reason to feel proud of their performances in the 2005 campaign. It was announced Wednesday that freshman Masha Pozar, sophomore Michele Spiess and senior captain Sasha Edelstein were all named to the A-10 All-Conference Team. Pozar was also awarded the A-10 Most Outstanding Performer of the Year award.

COURTESY KAREN WINDER

Masha Pozar was one of three Minutewomen named to the All A-10 team.

This marks the first time in its history that UMass had three women named to the All-Conference Team.

"All very deserving," UMass coach Judy Dixon said. "To have three players really gives a nod to the team we had this year."

Prospective members of the All-Conference Team are first nominated by their coaches, who also do a short write-up on their players to get them some exposure. Then all the coaches vote on who they believe should make the team. Coaches, however, are not allowed to vote for their own players.

It came as no surprise that Spiess was voted onto the team. She led the Minutewomen all year from the No. 1 slot. Overall, her singles record for the year stood at 24-5, including 20-5 from the No. 1 position.

"Michele had an outstanding year," Dixon said. "It is remarkable for her record to be so good, because playing in the No. 1 spot, she faced the other team's best talent every match."

Twice this past season, Spiess was voted the UMass/Dinn Bros. Athlete of the Week, the first coming on Sept. 21

See TENNIS on page 9

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Friday, May 6, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 133

ANDY TAFT/DAILY COLLEGIAN

The Scene on the Green

The Daily Collegian held "The Scene on the Green" event yesterday on the campus pond to publicize the release of its annual student-written, arts and living magazine "The Scene." For more Scene photos, see page 2.

SGA appionts two speaker positions

By Elizabeth Vargas
Collegian Correspondent

At Wednesday's Student Government Association meeting, the annual SGA S-1 Budget Act for the lisca1 year 2005-2006 passed after long debate with a vote of 27 to 10.

After the first meeting was adjourned, a second meeting to elect the Speaker and Associate Speaker of the Senate began. Seantors Sean Bliss, Kevin East, Ayotunde Onikoro, Colin Delargy and Brian Long were nominated for Speaker. Maxine Dube, Brian Whalley and Eric Magazoo were nominated for Associate Speaker. Both Kevin East and Eric Magazoo declined their nominations.

After the six nominees accepted their nominations, each gave a five-minute speech. Bliss opened his speech on a critical note, claiming "the senators [are] not doing their legwork." He spoke about his desire to begin each SGA meeting promptly at 7 p.m. as part of his hope to foster efficiency within the Senate.

On a controversial subject, each senator was asked about their intentions to recognize the seats for the ALANA Caucus and the Area Government in the SGA. Bliss's reaction was definite. "Whatever is in the by-laws will be enforced," he said.

Long, who will be a sixth-year senior next year, gave his speech next. He expressed that, as Secretary of University Polics for three terms, he dictated the need for experienced people in the SGA. He also continued to deny allegations that he would oppose President Pavel Payano at every turn.

When the question of the ALANA Caucus and Area Government seats came up, he expressed his desire to leave things as they are, and deny the constitutional seats for both.

Ayotunde Onikoro spoke next. He began his speech with an anecdote concerning his father, a senator in Nigeria. He

See SGA on page 2

Re-thinking textbook buy-backs

UMass student gets innovative to save students money

By Dan O'Brien and Kelly McGuire
Collegian Staff

When University of Massachusetts sophomore James Highsmith arrived on campus to begin his studies last year, he couldn't believe the price of textbooks.

"Textbooks are a huge expense," said Highsmith, a Cambridge resident who is now 21-years-old. After two semesters of "suffering" through what he claims are the high costs of textbooks, he came up with an idea.

Zoomassbooks.com was Highsmith's creation to combat the University's Textbook Annex's sales practices. He calls his Web site a "marketplace" where students can advertise used textbooks to be sold at prices that are much closer to the actual retail price of the book.

Currently, the Annex, as well as several other textbook retailers in Amherst, will buy back a student's used textbook at a price which is much less than what the student originally paid. One example of this occurred to a Daily Collegian staff writer, who originally purchased the textbook, "The Search for Life in the Universe," third edition by Donald Goldsmith and Tobias Owen. The book was originally purchased from Jeffrey Amherst Books at $54. The retailer offered to buy the book back for $7, despite the book's mint condition.

"It seems like there aren't any options," said Highsmith, referring to the textbook situation. "The school is not really watching out for its students, but is more concerned about its money."

He says his goal is simple.

"I just wanted a place to sell books at the price you bought them from," he said.

His idea has seemed to catch on. Zoomassbooks.com has a total 160,000 hits since November and currently has roughly 600 members reselling books.

University and Annex officials have yet to comment on the Web site, which was started

See TEXTBOOKS on page 2

MIS-AN BUNSTER/COLLEGIAN

UMass sophomore James Highsmith stands outside Memorial Hall Wednesday. His Web site Zoomassbooks.com is a new way for students to re-sell textbooks at retail prices.

Ex-FBI agent Connolly gets murder charge

By Curt Anderson
Associated Press

MIAMI — An ex-FBI agent already imprisoned for shielding Boston mobsters from prosecutors was indicted Wednesday in the 1982 murder of a former Miami gambling executive whose body was stuffed into the trunk of his Cadillac.

John J. Connolly Jr., 64, was charged in state court with first-degree murder and conspiracy for allegedly providing information that prosecutors said led to the death of former World Jai Alai president John Callahan.

Callahan had been shot twice in the head and a dime was placed on his chest, an underworld signal to others not to "drop a dime" or snitch on other mobsters, investigators said. His body was found in a parking lot at the Miami airport.

"I can tell you he's not guilty," said Connolly attorney Edward J. Lonergan. "I've known John since 1961. John is a good, good man and this is a sad, sad process. It's just very disappointing."

Investigators said Callahan was a financial adviser to Boston's Winter Hill Gang run by fugitive James "Whitey" Bulger, who is also charged in Callahan's murder. Also charged in the death are Bulger's top lieutenant Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi and alleged triggerman John V. Martorano, both of whom have cooperated with prosecutors against Connolly.

Connolly is serving a 10-year sentence in federal prison in North Carolina for convictions

See CONNOLLY on page 2

JAMIE LAUB/COLLEGIAN

Isenberg S.O.M. presents awards

The UMass School of Management held a banquet to present the Isenberg Awards at the Student Union Ballroom last night. The students could receive $10,000 for engineering research.

Romney against needle program

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney disagrees with the state Department of Public Health's push to legalize over-the-counter sales of hypodermic needles as a way to prevent the spread of infectious diseases among drug addicts, even as some law enforcement officials, long opposed to such a measure, appear to be changing their positions.

The health department's proposed legislation is championed by public health advocates, doctors, and substance-abuse experts, who maintain that it would reduce the spread of HIV, hepatitis C and other blood-borne infections.

A Romney spokesman said on Wednesday that the governor does not agree with the health agency's position.

"The position of the governor and the lieutenant governor is we don't want to do anything to that facilitates illegal drug use," spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom said. "If you allow addicts easy access to the tools of the trade, you are facilitating illegal drug use."

Fehrnstrom said it is too early to say whether Romney would veto a needle sale law if it crossed his desk.

About 39 percent of HIV cases in Massachusetts are linked to the sharing of needles. Massachusetts is just one of three states that do not permit the sale of hypodermic needles without a prescription.

Many prosecutors and some top police officials have long been opposed to over-the-counter sales of needles, which has contributed the bill's repeated defeats in the past decade.

But during hearings on Wednesday, Suffolk District Attorney Daniel Conley and Middlesex District Attorney Martha Coakley described how their views of needle sales have evolved over time.

The two prosecutors and a representative of the Boston Police Department described how they once saw the needle issue as a way to fight the war on drugs, but now see it as a way to fight the war on AIDS.

Such law enforcement support can only help the bill, said state Sen. Robert O'Leary, D-Barnstable, one of the bill's sponsors.

Before deciding to endorse the measure, Coakley said she talked to police officials in her district and discovered support for needle sales. She was also swayed by the needle exchange program in Cambridge. Police officials in that city say they have not seen an increase in drug crimes since the needle exchange program started in the mid-1990s.

Conley said he's ambiguous, but thinks society should fight the spread of disease.

Public health officials testified at the hearing that studies have demonstrated conclusively that the use of dirty needles and the number of HIV cases related to illicit drug injections dropped significantly in states that allow over-the-counter sales.

The proposed legislation includes a provision designed to ensure that diabetics and other people with medical conditions requiring the use of hypodermic needles will continue to have them covered by their health insurance plans.

— Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING
BOWL WEEKEND HITS O-HILL
A weekend full of events will entertain students.
PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
REMEMBERING YOUR CHILDHOOD
Reverting back to our childhood days as we enter into the real world.
PAGE 5

WEATHER
FRIDAY Mostly Cloudy 1164°, L40°
SATURDAY Showers, H57° L41°
SUNDAY Showers, H62°, L48°

SPORTS
ALMOST THERE
UMass men's lacrosse takes on Rutgers tomorrow.
PAGE 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief: Peter Foundas
Managing Editor: Mike Marzelli
Business Manager: Rich Pacheco
Production Manager: Cora Rosenberg
News Editor: Meghan Healy
Associate Manager: Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Page Editor: Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor: Michael Bassick
Daily Editor: Alyson Zillmann
Features Editor: Matthew Reid
Features Editor: Allison Edles
Sports Editor: Erika Loxley
Photo Editor: Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor: Bob McGovern
Copy Desk Manager: Kristen Weiss
Copy Desk Assistant: Marty Pappas
Design Manager: Josh Kaggans
Online Manager: Hetak Shah
Advertising Director: Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources: Sandra Marquez
Production Manager: Mark Spunzo
Assistant Operations: Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising: Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business: Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance: Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production: Rachael Bruno
Layout Assistant: Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living: Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living: Chris Gattara
Assistant News: Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News: Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo: Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports: Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports: Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently owned, operating as a nonprofit business. Founded in 1890 the paper began as Aggie Life. Before the College Signal in 1903, the Weekly Collegian in 1904 and the Bi-Weekly Collegian in 1950. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been printed since June 30, 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Matt Hicks

Photo Technician
Jamie Lau

Copy Editor
Meghan Healy

Production Supervisor
Amanda Allen

Production Staff
Tiffany Vandergeest, Tom Heslin

The Collegian's 'Scene on the Green' brings out students

Alex Demosthene/Collegian

Two UMass students race to the finish in the 'bungee run' at yesterday's Scene on the Green event, which attracted hundreds of students.

Jamie Lau/Collegian

Two students battle on the joust at the Scene on the Green yesterday. The event also featured free food to publicize the release of the Collegian's arts magazine, "The Scene."

SGA discusses issue of ALANA seats

SGA from page 1

stated his intentions to better engage the student body and to insure that Vice Chancellor Gargano will sign off on the SGA's motions. He suggested that Gargano should be questioned if he does not sign off on motions that benefit students.

On the question of the ALANA Caucus and Area Government seats, Onikoro said he would honor the seats because they were constitutional, but he said that he believes the ALANA seats to be unnecessary.

Next was Delargy. He stood true to some of his campaign promises, saying that he ran on a platform of stronger bonds between the SGA and the Student Activities Center, a stronger textbook rental system, and a stronger adherence to the by-laws. He said he was "a letter of the law kind of guy."

Maxine Dube, the current Associate Speaker running for re-election, said her main goal was to take some of the burden off of the Speaker, citing that these are the duties as listed in the by-laws. She also stated her intentions to reach out to the senators.

Next up was Brian Whaley for Associate Speaker. His plan was to attend many Senate Committee meetings and to set up a resource area in the SGA Office.

After the speeches, the Chancellor of Elections left the room to count the votes along with representatives from each candidate to monitor the count. The first round of voting revealed Maxine Dube was re-elected as Associate Speaker with 34 votes to Brian Whaley's four. Two more rounds of voting were needed to reveal Sean Bliss as the new Speaker of the Senate, winning by just three votes against Brian Long.

Zoomassbooks offers alternative

TEXTBOOKS from page 1

six months ago.

The University currently has a "no competition" clause in the contract with the Annex. Highsmith, who resides in the Central Residential Area, says he has gotten around this clause by establishing an off-campus post office box as the main address of his establishment.

There is no cost to go onto the Web site and browse the textbooks online. If a student sells a book, the company charges a small percentage of the profit, done by credit card, in order to keep the site running.

"I'm not really doing it for profit in anyway," he said.

Highsmith claims he has invested $1,500 out-of-pocket towards the Web site in the past six months, and has spent over $2,000 towards the site this academic year. Most of this money was spent on printing costs, Internet server space, office supplies and encryption security for credit cards so users' identities cannot be stolen.

Campus Design and Copy, located in the UMass Student Union building, has provided Highsmith with cheap prices to produce some 5,000 fliers promoting his updated Web site that will be posted this weekend.

The flier reads, "Monopoly is fun to play, but enough is enough," referring to the virtual monopoly the Annex has over textbooks purchased on-campus.

With 1,000 books already sold through the Zoomassbooks.com, business is pretty good, he says. However, he hopes to get more people interested in reselling books through his site.

Highsmith says he is re-launching his Web site today to include no pop-up advertisements and more straightforward instructions. He also says the site will be easier to navigate.

When asked if he was afraid of getting sued by the University or the Annex for possibly violating the "no competition" clause of the Annex's contract, he responded, "I'm not scared of being sued."

"I'm willing to play their (the University's) game," he said. "I'm providing a marketplace so students can contact each other instead of using the Annex."

Thus far, neither the University nor the Annex have contacted Highsmith regarding his Web site, which was first launched in November.

Deerfield murder suspect named

GREENFIELD (AP) — Prosecutors on Wednesday identified a 40-year-old handyman with a long criminal record as a suspect in the slaying of a pregnant convenience store clerk in Deerfield.

Dennis Bateman, of Greenfield, was named as a suspect in Brandy Waryasz's death during his arraignment at Greenfield District Court on an unrelated larceny charge.

Bateman was ordered held on $10,000 cash bail for allegedly burglarizing a liquor store about three hours before Waryasz's body was found on April 16, said Elizabeth Dunphy Farris of the Northwestern District Attorney's office.

Bateman, a self-employed landscaper and handyman, has not been charged with murder. His lawyer, Byron Caplice, declined to comment.

Farris would not say how Bateman was linked to Waryasz's murder, or whether there were other suspects.

Waryasz's mother, Ruth Cousineau, said she didn't know Bateman. "I don't want to know who he is," she said.

Bateman has served prison time for multiple breaking and entering convictions. He faces up to 20 years in prison on the larceny charge because of his extensive criminal history.

Waryasz, of Turners Falls, was seven months pregnant when her body was found lying on the floor at the Deerfield Sunoco Service Station by a customer. She'd been strangled and the cash register was missing. Her baby also did not survive.

—Associated Press

Terrorist bomb explodes in NYC

NEW YORK (AP) — Two small makeshift grenades exploded early Thursday outside a building housing the British Consulate, just as Britons went to the polls in a national election. The blast caused minor damage and no injuries.

Authorities said they had no clear indication the consulate, which shares the building with several other tenants, was a target. The blasts blew out a glass panel at the building's entrance.

Police were reviewing images shot by 17 security cameras at the building and other locations to try to identify possible suspects. One of the videos raised suspicions that one of the devices may have been thrown from across the street, police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said.

Kelly made an appeal for eyewitnesses to come forward, saying a female jogger, a bicyclist and a taxi were shown on tape around the time of the explosions.

"This is New York," he said. "It's 3:30 in the morning, yet there were people out on the street."

The devices used in the attack were described as replica grenades, normally sold as novelty items, that were stuffed with gunpowder and lit with a fuse.

"We don't know who the particular target was at this time," Mayor Michael Bloomberg said. "There were no threats or phone calls."

—Associated Press

Connolly charged in 1982 Miami murder

CONNOLLY from page 1

on racketeering, obstruction of justice and other charges stemming from his role in protecting Bulger and others from prosecution while simultaneously using them as FBI informants.

Connolly, a childhood friend of Bulger's in Boston, provided key internal FBI information to his mob allies in the killings of Callahan and at least three other people, said Katherine Fernandez Rundle, Miami-Dade County's state attorney. Connolly is not charged in any other murders.

"While John Connolly never actually pulled the trigger, it was his information that caused the death of John Callahan," Rundle said. "He was a law enforcement agent gone bad."

Flemmi, 70, pleaded guilty in February 2004 for his role in the slaying and was sentenced to life in prison. Flemmi, implicated in 10 other murders, was also sentenced to life last year after pleading guilty to killing another World Jai Alai executive, Roger Wheeler, who was shot to death in Tulsa, Okla., in 1981.

Fred Wyshak, assistant U.S. attorney in Boston who will assist in the Florida murder case, said Callahan was killed because he had paid $50,000 for the killing of Wheeler, who refused to sell the jai alai business to Callahan, and could tie members of Bulger's gang to that slaying. Callahan had been forced out of the business several years earlier because of suspicions about his mob ties.

"He was a weak link," Rundle said.

Acting on Connolly's information, Rundle said Martorano — the gang's favorite hit man — met Callahan at the airport in Fort Lauderdale, shot him and took him to Callahan's silver Cadillac Fleetwood, shooting him again when it appeared he was still alive. The car was then left at the Miami airport's long-term parking lot.

Wyshak said the indictment "represents the climax of a decades-long prosecution of the Winter Hill Gang" that could only be eclipsed by the capture of Bulger himself.

National News

Some hispanics demanding apology from runaway bride

By Erin Texeira
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — It took just hours for Jennifer Wilbanks' story to dissolve, and until Thursday for her to apologize. It turns out the runaway bride-to-be had not been kidnapped — much less by a gun-wielding Hispanic.

But among minorities, a white woman's tale of being victimized by a threatening man of color is unlikely to fade quickly, partly because it's happened before and taps into powerful stereotypes rooted in painful history.

"This speaks to how Latinos are perceived in society," said Lisa Navarette, spokeswoman for the National Council of La Raza in Washington D.C. "Americans only know minority communities, particularly Latino communities, through stereotypes, through images in the media. If people keep being portrayed as criminals — as undocumented immigrants or criminals or gang members — that's what we tend to believe."

Wilbanks was believed missing when she vanished days before she was to be married in a 600-guest affair in Duluth, Ga., population 22,000. She claimed last Friday night that she had been kidnapped in Atlanta by a Hispanic man and a white woman with a handgun, a story that quickly unraveled. Her admission that she had run away, overwhelmed by wedding pressures, prompted protests among local and national Hispanic leaders.

At one point, a Hispanic leader not only demanded an apology but said she should be made to perform community service in a Hispanic neighborhood. Now, Georgia authorities are debating whether to prosecute or sue her.

Such racial hoaxes are actually not rare, said Katheryn Russell-Brown, a law professor at the University of Florida, who wrote "The Color of Crime," a book documenting 67 such cases that occurred between 1987 and 1996.

"The majority of perpetrators were someone white falsely accusing someone black," Russell-Brown said. "You typically don't see the Hispanic criminal in terms of a hoax case, but she put this duo together and it's got this resonance. ... It's still this idea of a criminal element that is colored."

The stories "work because they tap into widely held fears about crime and about who one's likely attacker might be," she said.

In 1989, a Boston man, Charles Stuart, inflamed racial tensions when he claimed he and his pregnant wife, Carol, had been shot in their car by a black robber. Stuart turned out to be the culprit, throwing himself off a bridge as police zeroed in on him.

Five years later, Susan Smith of South Carolina drowned her two young sons, but claimed a black man had carjacked her and abducted her boys.

Such fabrications are rooted in the nation's troubled racial past.

Historically, the threat of black men victimizing white women has loomed large and powerful, and provoked many of the more than 4,700 lynchings in the decades between the end of the Civil War and the dawning of the civil rights era.

The peak came in 1892, with 230 killings, but continued well into the 20th century, according to the Tuskegee Institute, a one-time black college in Alabama that is now a National Historic Site. Most of those seized by white mobs and hanged were black men, but Native Americans, Asians, Jews and Hispanics also were victimized, experts said.

The threat also became part of the nation's fictional fabric, inspiring "Birth of a Nation," a seminal 1915 film in which a white woman is pursued by a lecherous black man, and "To Kill a Mockingbird," Harper Lee's classic novel about a Southern white woman who falsely accuses a black man of rape to cover up her flirtation with him.

Today, growing national anti-immigrant sentiment that feeds Americans' stereotypes of Hispanic immigrants stealing jobs and undermining the nation's prosperity made Wilbanks' story plausible, Navarette said.

"It's the new pariah," she said.

Harry Pachon, president of the Tomas Rivera Policy Institute in Los Angeles, added that new demographic shifts in Georgia — the state was barely 5 percent Hispanic as of Census 2000 — have led to simmering tensions: "It's a recently arrived immigrant community, so ... this increases the tension that's already there.

"It's not about one runaway woman."

FDA banning gay men from donating sperm anonymously

By David Crary
Associated Press

NEW YORK — To the dismay of gay-rights activists, the Food and Drug Administration is about to implement new rules recommending that any man who has engaged in homosexual sex in the previous five years be barred from serving as an anonymous sperm donor.

The FDA has rejected calls to scrap the provision, insisting that gay men collectively pose a higher-than-average risk of carrying the AIDS virus. Critics accuse the FDA of stigmatizing all gay men rather than adopting a screening process that focuses on high-risk sexual behavior by any would-be donor, gay or straight.

"Under these rules, a heterosexual man who had unprotected sex with HIV-positive prostitutes would be OK as a donor one year later, but a gay man in a monogamous, safe-sex relationship is not OK unless he's been celibate for five years," said Leland Traiman, director of a clinic in Alameda, Calif., that seeks gay sperm donors.

Traiman said adequate safety assurances can be provided by testing a sperm donor at the time of the initial donation, then freezing the sperm for a six-month quarantine and testing the donor again to be sure there is no new sign of HIV or other infectious diseases.

Although there is disagreement over whether the FDA guideline regarding gay men will have the force of law, most doctors and clinics are expected to observe it.

The practical effect of the provision — part of a broader set of cell and tissue donation regulations that take effect May 25 — is hard to gauge. It is likely to affect some lesbian couples who want a child and prefer to use a gay man's sperm for artificial insemination.

But it is the provision's symbolic aspect that particularly troubles gay-rights groups. Kevin Cathcart, executive director of Lambda Legal, has called it "policy based on bigotry."

"The part I find most offensive — and a little frightening — is that it isn't based on good science," Cathcart said. "There's a steadily increasing trend of heterosexual transmission of HIV, and yet the FDA still has this notion that you protect people by putting gay men out of the pool."

In a letter to the FDA, Lambda Legal has suggested a screening procedure based on sexual behavior, not sexual orientation. Prospective donors — gay or straight — would be rejected if they had engaged in unprotected sex in the previous 12 months with an HIV-positive person, an illegal drug user, or "an individual of unknown HIV status outside of a monogamous relationship."

But an FDA spokeswoman cited FDA documents suggesting that officials felt the broader exclusion was prudent even if it affected gay men who practice safe sex.

"The FDA is very much aware that strict exclusion policies eliminate some safe donors," said one document.

Many doctors and fertility clinics already have been rejecting gay sperm donors, citing the pending FDA rules or existing regulations of the American Society for Reproductive Medicine.

"With an anonymous sperm donor, you can't be too careful," said a society spokeswoman, Eleanor Nicoll. "Our concern is for the health of the recipient, not to let more and more people be sperm donors."

However, some sperm banks, notably in California, have welcomed gay donors. The director of one of them, Alice Ruby of the Oakland-based Sperm Bank of California, said her staff had developed procedures for identifying gay men with an acceptably low risk of HIV.

Gay men are a major donor source at Traiman's Rainbow Flag sperm bank, and he said that practice would continue despite the new rules.

"We're going to continue to follow judicious, careful testing procedures for our clients that even experts within the FDA say is safe," said Traiman, referring to the six-month quarantine.

5-year-old handcuffed in Ohio

CINCINNATI (AP) — Police officers accused of handcuffing a 5-year-old boy after a fight on a school bus have been suspended from police duties while the city investigates the allegations, authorities said.

Chief Tom Streicher assigned officers Douglas Snider and Kaneshia Howell to desk work Tuesday and took away their guns, police officials said. Mekel Finch, the boy's mother, sued the police department, the bus company and the driver in Hamilton County Common Pleas Court on April 29. She is asking for more than $50,000.

The lawsuit claims the driver improperly detained the boy — allegedly grabbing the child around the neck and wrapping her legs around him before calling for aid — after the boy was struck by another child on the bus Jan. 13.

The lawsuit also claims the boy was hiding under a seat when Snider and Howell arrived and put him in handcuffs "for an unreasonable amount of time." The child wasn't charged.

—Associated Press

Controversy for 'American Idol'

By David Bauder
Associated Press

Courtesy MSNBC.com

"American Idol" judge Paula Abdul is under fire for allegedly having a sexual relationship with a contestant, among other allegations.

NEW YORK — "American Idol" has kicked off contestants for concealing sordid secrets about their pasts — including Corey Clark, who now says he had an affair with judge Paula Abdul while competing two years ago.

Will Abdul be next?

Responding Thursday to Clark's accusations, Fox and the show's producers didn't mention Abdul's name and minimized the role of judges in choosing winners. But it's clearly a crisis for "American Idol," which has managed to shake off other challenges.

Ousted contestants, clogged phone lines that hindered voting, incorrect voting phone numbers that forced a do-over earlier this season, superior singers being suspiciously eliminated — nothing has derailed the "Idol" juggernaut, which was watched by an estimated 24.5 million people Wednesday.

"We have gone to great lengths and great expense to create a voting system that is fair and reliable," Fox said Thursday. "Judges may offer opinions, but viewers vote using their own subjective criteria, and it is the voters who ultimately determine each season's American idol."

There was no immediate comment Thursday from Abdul about Clark's claims on ABC's "Primetime Live," which were buttressed by phone records, a voicemail message, the testimony of his parents and friends and other circumstantial evidence. She has called Clark, who's almost 20 years younger than her and was kicked off "Idol" for not coming clean about charges he assaulted his younger sister, a "liar" and an opportunist with a new book and CD to sell. She has not specifically denied his charges, however.

"If there is a shred of truth that she messed around with a contestant, you won't see her as a judge next year," said Shari Anne Brill, a television analyst for the media buying firm Carat USA.

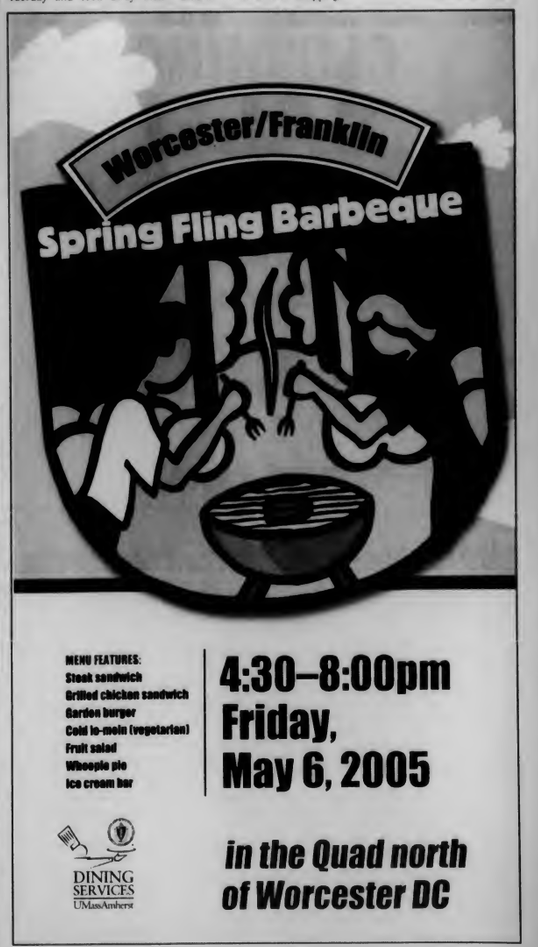
Still, Brill said, "The franchise will live on. They seemed to weather all of these other storms."

It would be far worse if, like during the 1950s quiz show scandals, nefarious backstage dealings influenced the outcome of the contest, said both Brill and Stacey Lynn Koerner, another representative of a company that advises advertisers where to place their commercials.

Research by Koerner's company, Initiative Media, indicates that Abdul is one of the top reasons why fans love "American Idol."

"It would be difficult to say how forgiving they would be," she said. "But given the fact that they are predisposed to love her, they could be very forgiving."

For needs to do some research about whether fans would accept Abdul being forced out, she said.



The former Laker girl and choreographer for Janet Jackson became a pop star and MTV favorite in 1989 with her danceable pop hits like "Straight Up" and "Forever Your Girl."

She was married twice, to Emilio Estevez and then clothes manufacturer Brad Beckerman, and divorced twice. She's been single since 1998.

For many years, Abdul fought bulimia and chronic pain related to dance injuries and accidents. After years of dealing with painkillers that she said sometimes made her "loopy," Abdul told People magazine in this week's issue that she's been feeling better with the help of a new medication.

She told People she's ready for a relationship, looking "for someone who wants to get to know me."

International News

Colombian officials upset with deportation of drug traffickers

By Kim Housego
Associated Press

IBAGUE, Colombia — Two American soldiers accused of arms trafficking emerged from jail Thursday and were handed over to U.S. officials, but a top Colombian official tried to delay their deportation, saying a treaty granting them immunity might be invalid.

Inspector General Edgardo Jose Maya's move reflected a widespread sentiment among Colombians that the two U.S. Army soldiers should face trial in Colombia. They were arrested Tuesday in connection with an alleged plot to smuggle more than 40,000 rounds of ammunition, possibly to outlawed right-wing paramilitary death squads responsible for the deaths of thousands of civilians.

Maya asked for a 24-hour extension before the two are deported so a 1974 treaty that purportedly gives them diplomatic immunity can be examined. The treaty might be superseded by Colombia's 1991 Constitution and other laws, he said.

"In defense of the letter of the law, this Public Ministry believes it is important to analyze the situation in the face of the treaties and the supremacy of the Constitution," Maya wrote in a letter to Colombian Attorney General Luis Camilo Osorio, a copy of which was obtained by The Associated Press.

The case is being closely watched by Colombians frustrated by accusations of lawbreaking by American soldiers. The U.S. has given more than $3 billion in aid to Colombia and the mission of U.S. troops here is to help stamp out drug trafficking and guerrillas. Hundreds of Colombians accused of drug trafficking have been extradited to the United States to face trial as part of President Alvaro Uribe's get-tough measures.

But Colombians were aghast in March when five U.S. soldiers accused of smuggling cocaine to the United States from Colombia were flown to their homeland and detained there. No details of that case have been publicly disclosed.

Ruben Arias, heading to his job as a supermarket cashier, said he hoped the two accused soldiers wouldn't "be taken out of the country, like the other Americans captured with the cocaine. Who knows whether they will ever face justice?"

"The gringos should be charged here in Colombia," said Jose Luis Villalobos, a 67-year-old retired engineer who was walking his dog.

The two American soldiers — identified as Alan Norman Tanquary and Jesus Hernandez — spent the night in a police holding cell in Ibague, a town of crumbling brick buildings in the mountains of west-central Colombia. On Thursday morning, they were hustled by authorities out a back door, eluding waiting journalists. Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman said they were headed to the U.S. Embassy in Bogota.

"The two U.S. soldiers are now in American custody and will be while U.S. officials attempt to ascertain more facts and determine how to proceed," said Whitman, who declined to comment on specifics of the accusations against the soldiers.

The two soldiers would be flown to the United States "in the next few days," a U.S. Embassy official said, adding that U.S. authorities were committed to a full investigation and would work with Colombian authorities.

Possible 9/11 terrorist caught

By Paul Haven
Associated Press

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — A Libyan seized in Pakistan this week was the fourth purported No. 3 leader of al-Qaida killed or captured since the Sept. 11 attacks, but the global dragnet has yet to reach up the terror group's hierarchy to the main prizes — Osama bin Laden and his right-hand man, Ayman al-Zawahri.

Pakistani and U.S. officials hope the arrest of Abu Farraj al-Libbi after a shootout in a graveyard Monday may change that. At least five other al-Qaida suspects have been detained in Pakistan over the past week, intelligence officials say.

If anyone knows the whereabouts of bin Laden, they say, it ought to be al-Libbi, who has purportedly been a close confidant since the early 1990s, even before the Saudi millionaire set up al-Qaida.

Pakistani Information Minister Sheikh Rashid Ahmed said authorities were "on the right track" to capture bin Laden, and others in the government echoed that sentiment.

A senior intelligence officer told The Associated Press on Thursday that al-Libbi had been in frequent contact with bin Laden and al-Zawahri in recent months and that Pakistani interrogators were grilling him on the terror chief's whereabouts.

CNN/BTESY CNN.COM

Abu Farraj al-Libbi, an alleged terrorist suspected in the 9/11 bombings, was arrested in Pakistan this week.

"Only two questions are being asked, over and over, and in different shifts: 'Where is bin Laden?' and 'What were your plans?'" said the Pakistani official, who has intimate knowledge of the interrogation and agreed to discuss it only if his name was not revealed.

Some terrorism analysts, however, doubt U.S. and Pakistani agents will get the answers they seek.

"Even if this man does give some information, the chances are that bin Laden's protectors would have already taken precautions to whisk their leader to a safer place," said Paul Wilkinson, chairman of the Center for the Study of Terrorism and Political Violence at the University of St. Andrews in Scotland.

There are also questions whether al-Libbi or anyone else is really al-Qaida's "No. 3" man.

"He's definitely close to the leadership, but I'm not happy with the No. 3 designation," said Wilkinson. "I think it is unlikely there is a numerical hierarchy after al-Zawahri, who is most certainly the deputy."

Iraqi suicide bomber kills 26

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — Iraqis seeking jobs with security forces were targeted once again Thursday when a suicide bomber with explosives strapped to his body mingled among hundreds of men and blew himself up in one of four attacks that killed 26 people.

The attacks are part of a surge of violence that has killed more than 200 since Prime Minister Ibrahim al-Jaafari announced his new government last week with seven positions still undecided.

Many recruitment centers, to prevent car bombings, have been turned into small fortresses surrounded by concrete blast walls and razor wire. But militants are striking back with an old weapon: the suicide bomber belt.

The Cabinet held its first meeting Thursday. Al-Jaafari aide Laith Kuba said the seven vacancies, including the key oil and defense ministries, would be filled by Saturday and parliament would be asked to vote on them Sunday.

In the deadliest attack, police said an insurgent blew himself up outside an army recruitment office a half mile from Baghdad's heavily fortified Green Zone, home to government offices, foreign embassies and U.S. forces.

At al-Yarmouk Hospital, the morgue was overflowing with mangled bodies after the blast. One man lay screaming on his bed — both his legs had been blown off.

—Associated Press

British Prime Minister Tony Blair re-elected to third term

By Robert Barr
Associated Press

LONDON — Tony Blair won a historic third term as prime minister Thursday but his Labour Party suffered a sharply reduced parliamentary majority in apparent punishment for going to war in Iraq, according to projections based on exit polls.

Such an outcome, if confirmed by the actual vote count, could set the stage for Blair to be replaced in midterm by a party rival such as Gordon Brown. As Treasury chief, Brown was widely credited for the strong economy that appears to have clinched Labour's victory, outweighing the bitterness many voters said they felt over Iraq.

The BBC projected that Labour would have a 66-seat majority, down from its 161-seat lead over the combined opposition in the previous House of Commons.

The station's projections had Labour taking 37 percent of the popular vote, the lowest winning share ever. The Conservatives, showing their first signs of life since losing power eight years ago, were estimated at 33 percent.

Such a result matched the "bloody nose" — a humiliation but not a defeat — that opponents had hoped to give Blair.

The left-leaning Guardian newspaper offered free clothespins to any reader who requested one after a columnist urged reluctant Labour supporters to put aside opposition to the Iraq war to back the party for its domestic policies.

"My reasons for not voting Labour would have been the war in Iraq, but apart from that I think the Labour Party and Blair have done fairly well and I can't bear the thought of the Conservatives doing well," chef Oliver Rowe said after voting in London.

CNN/BTESY CNN.COM

Prime Minister Tony Blair leaves with his wife Cherie after voting in Trimdon, England Thursday.

Nicola Wyndham, 33, who voted for Labour four years ago but switched to the Liberal Democrats.

"Iraq has been a big thing — trust," Wyndham said. "He has had eight years to make an impact and he really hasn't. There are still problems with health, education and crime."

The Conservatives, showing a new sense of discipline and purpose since the 63-year-old Michael Howard became leader two years ago, ran a hard-hitting campaign focused on immigration, violent crime and "superbug" infections in hospitals, contending that all were now out of control.

A big part of the Conservative strategy was to make it a referendum on Blair, urging voters to "wipe the smirk" off his face. Although Howard supported the Iraq war, he attacked Blair, accusing the prime minister of lying about intelligence and the legality of the invasion and lacking a plan to win the peace.

But Blair benefited from the Conservatives' even greater unpopularity and a perception that the opposition is less capable of handling the economy.

And the government's strong economic record — Britain's growth is high and unemployment low compared to much of the rest of the European Union — appears to have outweighed the resentments over Iraq. Labour is also credited with improving public services such as health and education through investment.

Never before has the Labour Party won three straight elections.

Still, William Jones, a political analyst at Manchester University, said a 66-margin would make governing difficult for Blair.

"Anything under 100 he is in for a tough time," Jones said. "Under 50 he will be in terrible difficulties — I think we will see him disappear very quickly."

Geoff Andrews, a political analyst at the Open University, said a group of about 50 rebellious lawmakers within the Labour Party could exercise greater influence.

"If Blair's majority falls below 60 then you are in an area where an organized minority would have a strong bargaining power."

Many Labourites have been bewildered that Blair, once a close ally of Bill Clinton, so swiftly became a close friend of President Bush.

The BBC and ITV projections, based on a survey of 13,000 or more voters in 115 closely contested districts, suggested Labour would win 356 seats, ahead of the Conservatives with 209. The Liberal Democrats, the only major party to oppose the Iraq war, were projected to win 53 seats — for them a disappointing gain of two seats. Other parties also won seats.

Counting in 645 Parliamentary districts was continuing through the night, and the winner would not be officially confirmed at least until Friday morning.

CLOTHING SALE!
TONS OF GREAT CLOTHING FOR GUYS & GIRLS FROM SOME OF THE HOTTEST RETAILERS.
"Brand Named"
Jeans, Shirts, Tees, Shorts, Jackets, Accessories
&
so much more!!
Located at
University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom
May 9th-12th
Monday-Wednesday 9am-9pm
Thursday 9am-3pm
Everything from $5-$20
(first quality, irregulars, returns)
COME BY & CHECK IT OUT!!
VISA MASTERCARD & CASH ACCEPTED
presented by
Retail Sales 101, llc.

AMAX STORAGE
EASY ACCESS OFF RT 91 IN HATFIELD
•OPEN 7 DAYS 7AM TO 7PM •SECURE
•CLIMATECONTROLLED •KEYLESS GATE
•MOVING SUPPLIES •SURVEILLANCE CAMERAS
CALL ABOUT OUR PORTABLE SELF STORAGE "SCOUTS"
WE'LL DROP IT OFF, YOU FILL IT, WE PICK IT UP AND SECURE IT.
RENT WITH A FRIEND AND SAVE $$
413-247-3030
164 West Street • West Hatfield
www.amaxstorage.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
EDITORIAL OPINION
FRIDAY, MAY 6, 2005
"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire
EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A modern 'American Girl?'

Erin McNamee

I tend to revert to childish behavior when I'm stressed out. I'm not talking about passing notes in class, playing dodge ball or making fart noises with my armpits. I'm talking about trying to feel like a child again in terms of being completely oblivious to the world around you. You know, that overrated state-of-being us graduating seniors wistfully refer to as "innocence."

I went home earlier this week for my first big job interview. After the interview, I was emotionally exhausted and cursing myself for being so stupid. Seriously, who/what convinced me to sign my soul over to the devil that is corporate America at the tender age of 22? Needless to say, I was a wreck, so I sought in vain for solitude in my childhood bedroom.

But my childhood bedroom isn't so childish anymore thanks to the "big girl" makeover it underwent a couple years ago. Gone are the pink walls, flowered stencil design and pinned-up pictures of Leonardo DiCaprio and Brad Pitt. Taking their places are classy black and white photographs of Paris, elegant white bedding and the open suitcase on the floor. Unfortunately, most of my childhood toys, dolls and books were banished to the attic, lovingly packed in air-tight containers in hopes that someday I'll have a daughter who will appreciate the My Little Ponies and Ken doll sans left leg (he lost it in "the war").

Unfortunately, most of my childhood toys, dolls and books were banished to the attic, lovingly packed in air-tight containers in hopes that someday I'll have a daughter who will appreciate the My Little Ponies and Ken doll sans left leg (he lost it in "the war").

Knowing my nostalgic side, I kept some of my beloved books in my room. The other night I decided to stop dissecting the interview over and over in my head and instead dig out some of those books to see if they still hold the same power over me now as they did when I was 6, 10 or 14.

I started and ended with the "American Girl" books. Surely most of us females fondly remember the many adventures of Molly, Samantha, Kirsten and Felicity (sadly, I never received one of the dolls). These characters, while admittedly idealistic, provide an inspiration to any girl who reads their stories. "The American Girls" are an once educational and inspirational, designed to be strong, intelligent, independent females who care about the world they live in during their respective time periods.

Molly is the character that many young girls today can probably relate to the most. With her father fighting in Europe during World War II, Molly and her family live in constant fear for his life and for the looming threat of air raids. Molly is inspiring because she doesn't just sit at home and feel sorry for herself — she goes out and tries to help her country. At school, she organizes a quilting club that makes blankets for soldiers; she participates in a drive to collect tin foil and bottle caps; and she helps her mother tend to a "victory garden."

What all the American Girls have in common is a great amount of spirit, compassion and an awareness of society; they are not content to just sit back and watch. This may sound cliché, but they actively try to make the world a better place.

This makes me wonder what an "American Girl" of the 19-80s, 1990s or 2000s would be like. What would her passions, social causes and concerns be? Would a 1980s doll have an over-processed perm and wear a "Material Girl" t-shirt? Would a 90s doll adopt a starving child for 10 cents a week during a "Beverly Hills 90210" commercial break? Would a doll from today be a supporter or detractor of the war in Iraq? Would she have voted for Bush or Kerry?

Reading through some of the "American Girl" books the other night made me realize that the stresses surrounding graduation and job interviews are rather trivial in the grand scheme of things. Before reading the books again, I had longed for that elusive feeling of childhood innocence, but now I realize that being oblivious to the ups and downs of the world is not a good way to be. Being in your own little bubble isn't going to help anyone, yourself included.

Unfortunately, younger generations of Americans are increasingly isolating themselves from the world. With the multitude of entertainment options at our fingertips and the various pressures of young adulthood, who has the time or energy to meaningfully contribute to society? Honestly, not many people, and this is a sad but undeniable fact.

So no, I wouldn't trade childhood innocence for my life experiences if you paid me a million dollars. On those days where I just want to pull the covers over my head and block out the world, I'll simply think, "What would Molly, Samantha, Kirsten and Felicity do right now?" Most likely they would put their game faces on and take whatever blows are dealt them with the utmost grace and dignity.

Erin McNamee is a Collegian columnist.

A change in driving behavior

Mike Anmuth

Last week I was driving in the Amherst area when the car in front of me was driving at an annoyingly slow pace. I figured the driver might have been lost, or looking for a particular street. However, as we both continued down the same road, the car did not pick up speed despite the change in the speed limit. I looked more closely through their rear view window and saw a bent elbow, hand oriented in the direction of the head and a mobile phone pressed firmly to the driver's ear.

Now, I must say I have exhibited this behavior myself at times. The cell phone rings and you're driving and it's easier to pick it up and keep driving than it is to pick it up and pull over to the side of the road. While I'm sure that I have angered those who have driven behind me, I have talked while driving, answered while operating a car and lacked to pull to the side even when using a hands free earpiece.

I realize that this isn't exactly safe behavior, even though many of us do the exact same thing. In fact, the New England Journal of Medicine found that the risk of an accident is quadrupled in the duration of the mobile phone call. With statistics like these, we should be compelled to hang up the cell phone and drive, or pull over to the side when the compulsion exists to talk on our phones.

Fortunately, I have never been in an accident involving a mobile phone, at least not as the person using the phone. I have been hit from behind while leaving a voicemail when stopped, but I don't think that necessarily counts as talking on the phone while driving. I have known people who have been involved in accidents concerning mobile phones, and often the cause of the accident is taking one's eyes off of the road for even one or two seconds.

Our risk for car accidents goes up by many factors, not just by talking on the phone but also by eating while driving, holding intense conversations with passengers or just having thoughts wander instead of paying attention to the road. If we can prevent car accidents by paying more attention to our driving, then we should.

Our risk for car accidents goes up by many factors, not just by talking on the phone, but also by eating while driving, holding intense conversations with passengers or just having thoughts wander instead of paying attention to the road.

Back to driving behind someone on their cell phone on a one lane road in Western Massachusetts, however, and how it is unnerving. While riding in this position, looking for a place along the road that allowed passing, the driver decided to end their call and almost instantly, their driving improved.

The speed of the car in front of me started driving the posted speed limit. The weaving motion that was caused by driving with only one hand improved noticeably and the experience as the car behind was much nicer. I can only relate to you the experience of driving behind someone else who was talking on his or her phone, as I have never ridden behind myself while on my phone. However, I can only assume that it is a maddening experience to the person who is tailgating me during that event.

With the finding given by the New England Journal of Medicine, one would think that using a hands free earpiece would alleviate some of the risks involved with talking on the cell phone while driving, particularly by alleviating one's hand from holding the phone.

The Journal did not find this to be true, and actually found that "units that allowed the hands to be free ... offered no safety advantage over handheld units ..." in terms of the relation between car accidents and the use of mobile phones. Many cell phone companies offer hands free earpieces as part of a safety package; but clearly, they do not make driving and talking any safer.

We cannot change the other drivers on the road, but we can change our own behaviors in the car, including not talking on our mobile phones, and if we did have to talk on them, pulling off to the side of the road is an acceptable alternative. As cell phones become ubiquitous in our society, the omnipresent issue of talking and driving is on the horizon. We owe it to ourselves and the other drivers to be safe on our mobile phones, and this columnist knows first hand how using a cell phone can be both a help and a hindrance in traffic.

Mike Anmuth is a Collegian columnist.

The souls of yellow folk: about individuality

Grace Chen

This column is part one of a three part series.

My friends in my hometown, Singapore, have always called me a "banana" — yellow on the outside but white within, a mocking term used to describe Chinese who are obsessed with Western culture, but who seem to have forgotten their cultural roots.

And as much as I've always protested to the stereotype, I continued to speak passionately about the individuality and straightforwardness of Western culture, which I've found more endearing than the over-emphasized civility in Chinese culture. "It's hypocrisy," I remember saying once to my friend about how Chinese civility and the prevailing pack-mentality. I argued, have so often led people to lie about things they did — things that are accepted elsewhere but became so undesirable when they did not go along with what other people were doing. In Singapore, they keep it under wraps for fear of embarrassment.

Things are surely different in the United States.

During the second week of my study abroad program at the University of Massachusetts, the professor for my newspaper features class wanted us to brainstorm story ideas for a Valentine's Day article.

The class began talking about dating. However, one female classmate sighed as she said, "Nowadays, people don't date anymore ... those guys just want to hangout and bring you to bed." She emphasized the word "hangout" as she threw a sarcastic glance at the males of the class. "There is no relationship involved!"

I laughed under my breath on hearing her, just in case I embarrassed my classmate. But it was hard because I thought that was the funniest thing about sex and relationships I had ever heard in my whole life.

Then, before the males could protest, the professor cut into the conversation and said, "What? That's the funniest thing I've heard in a long time!"

She continued: "I'm 50 and I still receive flowers on Valentine's Day."

"Hey, I share your sentiments," I thought silently.

But as the conversation got more passionate with some speaking openly about their sex lives and more people joining in, I found myself squirming.

While there are many conversations about sexual issues, sex before marriage is still condoned in my Asian culture. And, I was probably the only "known" one in my group of peers to think sex before marriage is OK ... at least in theoretical terms.

I found myself trying to avoid the glance of the others, fearing they would ask me to throw in my two-cents worth on my dating and sexual experiences.

"What will I say if they ask me?" I thought.

And then, and then ...

And then, the arrow was finally pointed at me.

"So Grace, what do you say about all of this?" the teacher asked.

I stared blankly at her face, and managed a few words:

"Yeah. Errmm ... Yeah."

The teacher shook her head and, mercifully turned to the class and said, "Man ... I don't know what you guys grew up with."

I learned that for all my affection for Western culture, I still have a lot to learn.

Grace Chen is an international student at the University of Queensland in Australia. She is doing a study abroad program with UMass and will return to her country, Singapore, at the end of the semester.

Mp3 sharing is not a crime

Todd Hanaburgh

The total manageability of mp3s has made them the new gods of music transfer and storage. Together, with the iPod and similar devices, the average person can now carry an entire music library in his back pocket. At home, I have over 26GB of mp3s. I used to have nearly one thousand CDs, but storing and managing them became a major frustration. I do not engage in file sharing as a general rule, not because I believe it's wrong, but mainly for the security and integrity of my PC, which also houses tons of other valuable info.

Most of the mp3s that are available for download or swapping are of questionable quality. A listener is often trying to get an idea of what a particular group or genre is all about before going out to buy an actual album. Who actually wants the entire Toto album that includes the cheesy rock classic "Hold the Line?" Where will the average person find the theme song to "Three's Company" or "Fraggle Rock" if not on some random mp3 swapping website?

The long and the short of it is that unless you are Britney Spears or J-Lo, mp3 swapping should not seriously impact the income of a recording artist.

I am a songwriter and self-proclaimed "audiophile," so I collect and record information that I convert into mp3s for storage. But as a musician, I don't see why there is such a fuss about mp3 swapping. My personal perspective and I know many artists (musical and otherwise) share it, is that we just want to produce our art and live unfettered by the impediments of the day-job.

We often hear figures and gigantic numbers from the record industry, such as so-and-so got $3.2 million to record this record and so forth, but what the average person doesn't realize is that the money is a loan from the record label to the artist. The artist then uses the money from sales of that album to repay the loan to the record label and in the end, only sees about five to seven cents per song on each album sold.

The long and the short of it is that unless you are Britney Spears or J-Lo, mp3 swapping should not seriously impact the income of a recording artist. But there are incredibly vocal groups out there protesting it anyway. All of these groups have another interest involved. At first I wondered why Metallica, of all the groups on Earth, would care about Napster and "illegal" file swapping, but as months and years went by, it became obvious to me.

The guys in Metallica have been at it since 1979 and were releasing underground metal for 15 years before they tasted fortune with the self-titled "black album" in 1991. Their major releases never made much money in sales, but there was a serious return on that 1991 release. Previously, their sound was cutting edge and for about 10 years, they were known as the fastest metal band ever. Their style had substance up until then, but since their subsequent releases "Load" and "Reload," they've obviously been making artistic sacrifices to God Money.

Here's how the plan works: Metallica realizes they misspent much of their success and money during their youth. They change their style to retain contemporary marketability, which naturally brings in new fans that scoop up their numerous releases, past and present. So the band gets a boost in all of their sales, from "Kill 'Em All" to "St. Anger" or whatever the newest piece is.

Alienated fans of yesteryear get to see them on tour where the band still plays time-honored favorites. From a capitalist perspective, it's very smart, but it all hinges on the idea that people continue to buy CDs. So naturally, when file swapping comes under the microscope, bands with strategies like Metallica's come out in opposition.

Recording artists should look at mp3 swapping as a cost-free promotional device. Most bands make their money on tour supporting an album from ticket sales and merchandising anyway. For example, The Grateful Dead and Phish are both bands that toured endlessly and made a good living on tickets and merchandise, but never had significant record sales or Top 40 hits.

So whom are you really hurting when you download or swap mp3s? Only the record company executives and/or dollar-grabbing gluttons preying on young minds that don't yet know what artistic integrity is. I say download and swap mp3s 'til your memory banks are full.

The time will soon arise when the record industry and artists come to conflict over control of material and the battleground will be the Internet. Mp3s and similar vehicles for transfer and promotion are now the key to the industry. The powers that be won't let them go uncontrolled.

Todd Hanaburgh is a Collegian columnist.

Interested in writing for ed/op? Don't be shy! Email us at: editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

FRIDAY, MAY 6, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Filling the Hill

Orchard Hill's annual Bowl Weekend offers fun for everyone

By Iain Jones
Collegian Staff

This weekend is Orchard Hill's annual Bowl Weekend, and the Orchard Hill Area Government has events planned for both Friday and Saturday that promise to make the event a memorable one.

Friday nights kicks off the festivities with the Annual Orchard Hill Bowl Dance from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. The theme this year is "80s Prom in the Jungle," since the vote for a theme was so close that they couldn't decide on just one. Dressing to the theme is encouraged, and the best dressed man and woman — by 80s standards — will be crowned Prom King and Queen. As if that weren't exciting enough, OHAG will also be giving away 80s necessities to the first 600 people who show up — the first 300 will get snap bracelets, and the next 300 will get glow necklaces.

Saturday, or Bowl Day, includes a jungle-themed carnival, complete with cotton candy, snow cones, a velcro wall and the ever-popular RA dunk tank, which allows residents to take revenge on their RAs for writing them up. BarbeqUMASS will be making food, and once you've had your fill of carnival games, you can check out the art gallery that will be set up in the Field classroom or the open mic event, featuring a pie eating contest at 12:30 p.m. and OHAG's version of the classic dating show "Singled Out" at 3:05 p.m. and students showing off their talents all day.

The Fill the Hill concert starts at 4 p.m. on Saturday and lasts until 11 p.m., and showcases seven bands with a diverse musical background. Singer-songwriters Sonic Dorito open it up, followed by the uptempo and sarcastic pop of the Self-Righteous Brothers, who have previously opened up for acts like Apollo Sunshine.

Next up is the punk rock foursome Letterday, whose well-constructed harmonies and hook-laden guitar lines provide a catchy background for their emotional lyrics. Following Letterday is Esthetic, a straightforward hard rock band from Chicopee.

Third from the top is Amherst's own Busted Vacuum, a "spacefunk rock and roll" jamband who play a guitar-heavy blend of rock and funk, with enough dance music influence to keep the audience on their feet. The next band, Roots Down Below, plays Sublime-influenced reggae and rock, with a little bit of hip-hop thrown in occasionally to keep things interesting.

The concert's headliner is another Amherst band, Becky Down Below, who come on at 10 p.m. They display a wide range of influences, drawing from rock, pop and soul to create catchy songs that will make you want to get up and dance.

Bowl Weekend runs from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. on Friday and from noon to 11 p.m. on Saturday, so be sure to stop by and some point and check it out, and help Fill the Hill live up to its name.

Sonic Dorito to kick off Fill the Hill

By Carey Zigouras
Collegian Staff

Sonic Dorito, the band set to kick off the Orchard Hill marathon of local bands, recently sat down with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian for an interview. The band consists of Chris Emery on vocals and guitar, Jared Berkow on guitar, Dan Tellier on bass, and Kevin Driscoll on drums. The Collegian sat in on an acoustic rehearsal session with Chris and Jared and discussed the process of creating their music. Talking about everything from their influences of the Doors, Dishwalla and Pearl Jam to how they come up with song lyrics, Sonic Dorito showed their passion for music and stirred up excitement for their opening this weekend.

The first question directed toward the band stemmed from an interest on the dynamic of working with others in the creative process while allowing room for personal expression. Chris, Dan and Kevin have been playing together for about six years from high school. After coming to UMass, they heard Jared play and invited him to join and he has been with the band for about eight months. The duo conveyed that the more you play with the people you're working with, the more you can read the other musicians. Listening to them play, it was obvious that Chris and Jared have a chemistry that can easily be heard on their song "Tomorrow's Too Late," which can be heard on the OHAG website. This is also an acoustic version, and although their Fill the Hill set will be a full-on rock show with the entire band, this track gives the listener a preview of their songwriting and sound.

On songwriting, Chris finds that personal experience is key for him to craft his lyrics. Songs for Sonic Dorito stem from no indefinite process, but are often a culmination of the entire band's thoughts. In regards to a question about whether the group started with lyrics and came up with a melody to match that or vice versa, Chris said that it was both. Songs sometimes spring from poems or writing already in the works, and things are changed to smooth out the songs, usually between everyone in the group.

The band's lyrics, while based on personal emotion, are not alienating in any way. Chris notes that people can interpret their songs as music with pop elements, but there are deeper meanings so that the lyrics can be interpreted in different ways. For example, the song "One Single Choice" is catchy, even for someone who had never heard the song before, and creates an interest in the layers of meaning they incorporate into their music. "One Single Choice" was constructed of lyrics that have philosophical, religious, and political undertones used as a metaphor for a relationship. The duo sum up their lyrics as, simply, designed to make you think.

With that, they turned to the music that reflects their words. As lead guitarist, Jared noted his influences: Joe Perry, Muddy Waters and Stevie Ray Vaughan. The band expressed their gratefulness to the blues flavor that Jared brought to the band. It is difficult to keep an improvisational, honest style to the guitar while maintaining fluidity with the rest of the band, but Jared pulls it off. He usually keeps two or three bars and fills in the rest, and this intuition and feeling were appreciated, as these elements are often missing in music today.

Overall, between Chris' sultry voice, Jared's amazing guitar riffs, and the bands creative chemistry, Sonic Dorito will rock the hill.

Students showcase their talents at Festival of the Arts

By Katie Huston
Collegian Correspondent

From 12 p.m. to 3 p.m. in front of the Fine Arts Center yesterday, crowds gathered to watch student performances and create art of their own as part of UMass's Second Annual Festival of the Arts.

The festival, sponsored by the Student Activities Center and Student Affairs and Campus Life, was created to highlight student talent at UMass and give student artists an opportunity to perform and share their work with the campus community.

A stage was set up in front of the Fine Arts Center where 16 students and groups took turns performing throughout the afternoon. The festival included RSOs, informal student groups, and solo performers.

Several dance ensembles took a turn onstage, including the Dynamic Motion Dance Team, Ballroom Dance, the Stage Crew Dance Team, and Rakkasah, a belly-dancing group. Students also performed improvisational dance on the lawn.

Solo musicians and music groups were also featured, including Seth Eberhardt-Ladd, who played guitar and sang, and the band Doc Ellis. Student poet Emily Y. Lime performed "Multiple Awakenings," and the RSO Asian American Students for Political Action put on a spoken word piece entitled "She Comes."

Mission: Improvable and the Not Ready For Bedtime Players also performed inside the Fine Arts Center lobby.

While last year the festival primarily featured performances, this year organizers hoped to make the event bigger and more participatory in nature by including interactive art as well.

The Craft Center sponsored stations set up around the plaza where students could make hemp and henna and make buttons. Golden Key taught participants to fold paper cranes, and students from the Art Department operated a pottery wheel. Tables were also set up where students could paint.

"We wanted to give students who may not have experienced a lot of art a greater opportunity [to do so]," said Erin Donnally, a clerical assistant for the Student Activities Center who was in charge of coordinating the event.

"We hoped students might find their inner artist, or maybe just have a little fun on a nice day and get to express themselves artistically."

Donnally also hoped to attract as many students as possible by holding the event in front of the Fine Arts Center. "We wanted to have it out on the plaza so when people are walking by between classes they'll be pulled in by the art—by the sounds, the sights, the smells," Donnally said.

The event also featured free popcorn and cotton candy. Decorations were donated by the Pride Alliance.

Freshman Aaron Daniels, who danced with the RSO UMass Amherst Body and Brain, really enjoyed the variety of performances, and felt like students

See FESTIVAL on page 8

COURTESY KATIE HUSTON

Yesterday, students at the Second Annual Festival of the Arts were able to show off their talents using a variety of mediums including water-based paints and origami.

Singer-songwriter's debut album infuses salsa with cabaret

By Carey Zigouras
Collegian Staff

Sylvie Lewis, the female answer to Rufus Wainwright, has debuted. "On Tangos and Tantrums," the singer/songwriter combines jazz, cabaret, and salsa into piano-infused songs with memorable melodies. Her music is heavily influenced by Cole Porter, Kurt Weill and Irving Berlin but it is her cast of characters and colorful songwriting that establish her individuality. Lewis was born in London and has lived all over the world. This record reflects the shards of her experiences through eccentric characters and stories. Even the CD jacket, rather than spelling the lyrics out, contain tidbits of stories, snippets of conversations she had with people, and even cocktail recipes.

Sylvie Lewis
'On Tangos and Tantrums'
Cheap Lullaby

The disc opens with "By Heart" which sounds like a lullaby. The lyrics, however, open the disc with a preview of the multi-faceted person singing rhetorical questions on the first track. The apparent innocence of the first track on which Lewis uses a sing-song softer voice is contradicted with questions such as "Think you're gonna make me cry?" Opening the disc with such a passive sound also sets up a nice contrast to the next track.

On "All My Exes," perhaps the strongest track on the album, Lewis shows her sense of humor and ability to create witty lyrics. The song is a story about her ex-boyfriend who is thrown a birthday party every year by all of his former girlfriends, to his delight. The tone is simultaneously sardonic and funny, which shows that she has edge but isn't overly-bitter.

The next few songs speed up with heavy salsa sounds, and then "Promises of Paris" will stop the listener. The airy harmonica and swaying piano create sounds that reflect the Parisian atmosphere. Lyrics such as "He was sitting by the exit sign/ I should have walked right past him/ I accepted the invitation, though I never would have asked him" demonstrate Lewis' appealing flirtatiousness."

The violin of "Valentine's Day" leads the song as if it is classical piece, and from there it unravels into a tango. Lewis' sultry vocals are highlighted in this track, which is actually a duet. This personifies the tango as a dance, as it is difficult to dance the tango alone. Lewis and her co-singer sing back and forth, sometimes in synch, others with one leading the other. The song then slows down as if it is the aftermath of the exhaustion when the dance has ended. Exemplifying her, originality, "Valentine's Day" shows how Lewis treats her songs as characters in themselves.

The album closes with "Old Friends," which is the expected ending for an album about relationships. It proposes the situation of contact post-termination and the difficulty of being friends after, yet with her humorous take of sipping tea together. This track shows the dichotomy of partnership, re-creating its amorous aspects and qualities of hatred. But her humor pokes fun at the drama of relationships while simultaneously representing the vulnerable emotions behind them. "Tangos and Tantrums" represents the grey area of female singer/songwriters who stick with one extreme of personality.

Singer-songwriter Sylvie Lewis, who combines salsa with a cabaret-style sound, may prove to be tough competition for jazz artist Norah Jones and Rufus Wainwright.

Nine Inch Nails singer's sound has become friendlier

By Jim Farber
New York Daily News

Hate. Anger. Alienation. Jealousy.

These are a few of Trent Reznor's favorite things. Or at least some of his most familiar things.

Since the start of his career as leader, and often sole member, of the industrial art-rock band Nine Inch Nails, malodorous emotions have served as Reznor's muse, not to mention as a lure for fans eager to have their worst feelings exorcised.

But what happens when a guy like Reznor starts to become happier?

That's the ironic dilemma he faced when constructing his latest album, "with teeth," the first new studio work under the NIN name in more than six years.

The CD, which comes out this week, is the first work Reznor has recorded since he quit a long addiction to cocaine and alcohol and began an examination of his life that shook him to his bones.

"I had to try to figure out who I am on this record," he explains. "Can I write sober? Did I destroy my brain? Did I have anything to say?"

Much of what Reznor says on "with teeth" doesn't sound different from what he has railed about for eons.

"I'm getting smaller and smaller and smaller and I have nothing to say," he complains in "Getting Smaller."

"Isn't anybody stopping me/Just how far down can I go?" Reznor yelps in "The Line Begins to Blur."

Reznor's proclaimed clarity can be more easily detected in his music. While "with teeth" retains NIN's cherished brutality, featuring his usual mix of metal/new wave/industrial riffs, there's more melody-making along the way. Also, you won't find the artier soundscapes that dominated NIN albums like "The Fragile" or "The Downward Spiral."

The changes made Reznor self-conscious at first.

"Sometimes the editor in me would stop and say, 'I don't know if this is right for Nine Inch Nails,'" he admits. "It was scary to include songs that were catchier and lighter. A 20-minute art epic is not scary because I know no one will make fun of it. But a song like 'The Hand That Feeds' had a melody that was pretty obvious. I had to ask why I was afraid to put it on. And I found that fear was not a valid reason."

In several lyrical passages Reznor angrily asserts that he no longer cares what other people think, which shows a greater confidence, if not greater peace of mind. It took much of his adult life even to get to that place.

Reznor says you can trace his cycle of loathing through his lyrics. "It was first me against the world,'" he says of his early work. "That turned into 'me against me.'"

Reznor began to isolate himself from people, cutting out friends, band members and lovers to focus entirely on a self-gratifying approach to making music. Recording became his refuge. Any problems that crept up, he medicated away.

"For most of my adult life I dealt with problems by not dealing with them," he says.

Reznor's serious addiction began around 1996, but he didn't admit to himself for years that his situation had become that bad.

"If you gave me a polygraph test back then and asked 'Are you an addict?' I would have said 'No,' and I would have passed," he says.

As a result, his substance abuse didn't begin to abate until more than five years had gone by. At a certain point, he realized something crucial had changed.

"It wasn't a question of maybe I should do this,'" he explains. "It was either get better or die.'"

After Reznor started to clean up, he took a few years off from music. "I didn't want to rush right back in," he says. He believed music-making could have become another form of avoidance.

In January 2004, Reznor began work on the new album. Though he found a fresh ease in working, he retained the old habit of playing all the instruments himself.

It remains to be seen how the world will react to a new NIN CD, not because the music is so jarringly different, but because Reznor has been out of the limelight for so long. The last time he and his band went out on the road, they headlined arenas like Madison Square Garden. For the new tour, Reznor will play smaller theaters.

Later this month, Reznor will turn 40, a dangerous age for someone who has defined himself by a kind of fury most associated with adolescence.

"I see people that are my age and I don't feel like them. One thing you learn in recovery is that your maturity gets slowed down at the point that you tuned out of life. So, technically, I'm about 33 right now," he says with a laugh.

Reznor acknowledges, however, that if his joy escalates, it may mean outgrowing the band, or at least their brand.

"If it ends up with me being a truly happy guy, it may be time to stop calling it Nine Inch Nails," he says. "I'll cross that bridge when, and if, it happens."

Write for Arts!
call 413-545-1361
or e-mail
arts@dailycollegian.com

Actor Don Cheadle makes point on his terms, issues

By Roger Moore
The Orlando Sentinel

"Hotel Rwanda" may have changed Don Cheadle's life. But he's not admitting it.

His phone is ringing. "But it always rang," he protests.

The offers are coming. "I work when I want to work, and I've always been very picky about what I want to do," he says.

OK. But how about his name turning up in the news? Surely picking up an Oscar nomination for playing a Rwandan hotel clerk who does the right thing when the genocidal chips are down changed the public Don Cheadle. We never used to hear about Cheadle on fact-finding trips with members of Congress, visiting Africa's crisis zones.

"The movie gave me an introduction to a world I didn't know about," Cheadle says. "You do a film like that and you learn the history. And while I knew that the continent had been raped and pillaged by all of Europe, and that colonialism had led to a lot of the problems in Rwanda, I had no idea of how that actually went down, how it continues to affect people there. It was shocking to learn."

He wasn't "radicalized" by the experience. But Cheadle was suddenly someone who cared a lot more about famines, civil wars and potential genocides, such as in Darfur, Sudan.

"I wouldn't have gone to Darfur had I not been changed by making Hotel Rwanda,'" Cheadle says. "I'd wanted to do stuff like that, but something would always come up, a job or whatever."

Now he makes a point of doing those things, "witnessing those problems."

Cheadle, 40, is a native of Denver who describes himself as a "granola-head, liberal kind of guy, from way back." He drives a Prius, the electric hybrid choice of the environmentally-aware. He does tai chi. "I'm very L.A.," he says with a laugh.

He wants to do movies that say something, which led him to "Crash," a film embraced by the New York critics for its message and its acting. "Crash," which opens Friday, is an ensemble drama about the hidden racism in us all, and the ways we have lost touch with the connections we have with one another.

The New Yorker's David Denby called it the strongest American film since "Mystic River," and singled out "Cheadle's soft-spoken intelligence" as "one of the most expressive elements in American cinema."

Still, it's an ensemble piece, something of a Cheadle specialty. He did "Boogie Nights," "Traffic," "Ocean's Eleven" and "Twelve." He says he likes things that way, but Baltimore Sun critic Michael Sragow wonders if Cheadle has had a real shot at leading-man status before now.

"Terry George, his director, told him he wasn't commercial enough to get 'Hotel Rwanda' financed," Sragow says. "He's not Denzel Washington or Will Smith ... But he is this outstanding character actor in the Robert Duvall-Gene Hackman-Alec Guinness mold. He's good, time after time. I think a lot of the outpouring of support for Rwanda' came from his fellow actors recognizing just how good he's been for so long."

Cheadle has been in the movies since mid-80s, and first gained notice on TV's "Picket Fences" and in a scene-stealing turn in 1995's "Devil in a Blue Dress," starring Denzel Washington. He can be edgy, as he was there, or sweet ("Boogie Nights," "The Assassination of Richard Nixon"). And he can be funny.

But he likes the serious stuff.

"I saw two scripts in 2003 that I wanted to do," Cheadle says. "One was 'Crash.' The other was 'Hotel Rwanda.'"

He embraced the way "Crash" "puts those issues of race right out there," he says. "The characters seem real ... I felt like if people were truthful, this is what they would admit to thinking. Sometimes, the people who come off as the most tolerant have the ugliest stuff buried down deep. They're the worst purveyors of stereotypes."

The film, written and directed by Paul ("Million Dollar Baby") Haggis, is filled with characters whose racism is hidden, until the right button is pushed. Cheadle plays a cop who's not above baiting his Puerto Rican girlfriend by calling her "Mexican" and making cracks about her "people" parking on the lawn.

"Being a black man in America, I've seen and been on the receiving end of a lot of things like what you see here," Cheadle says. But despite his "enlightened, educated, liberal upbringing," he's been on the dish-it-out side of racism, too.

"We'd play the game, 'Oh, those people are OK, but they smell funny,' or they eat funny foods'," he says, laughing. "And stereotypes don't come from nothing. This comic, Barry Sobel, used to do a bit where he'd go, 'OK, OK, so Asians aren't bad drivers. OK. So you never see 20 Mexicans jammed in a car together. Fine, fine. Black people don't talk back to the screen in movie theaters. Yeah, yeah, Jews never haggle to get the best deal.'"

Cheadle laughs.

"By the time he'd finish, he'd gotten to everybody. You have to laugh at that, because you have this recognition about yourself and others."

So Cheadle finds the whole race-baiting racism thing funny. He was willing to do the movie for its laughs.

"I don't like people who are different from me," he says, laughing. "No. Really. I'm not the least bit surprised when white people like country music, or Latinos park their cars in the front yard. I expect it. I never expected to like them!"

He's kidding. He says so. But the serious side of "Crash," and the funny one, are making the same point.

"Trying to keep that stuff in the dark and not admit our differences, that yes, we are like this or that, is wrong," he says. "These things have nothing to do with intelligence, which is what petty racists think. They do that because they're stupid.' We aren't. You aren't. So stop thinking like that."

FIVE SIDES OF DON CHEADLE

1. "Hotel Rwanda": The "reluctant hero," the best kind.

2. "Devil in a Blue Dress": The short street-tough who has Denzel Washington's back in 1940s L.A.

3. "The United States of Leland": The teacher who sees a book in his troubled, imprisoned student.

4. "Boogie Nights": The honest stereo salesman moonlighting in porn.

5. "Rosewood": The upstanding citizen who doesn't see the race riot coming.

Don Cheadle, has noticed an increase in phone calls from various filmmakers after starring in "Hotel Rwanda" (shown above). Cheadle's next film titled "Crash" deals with racial incidents after a car accident.

Festival's popularity grows

FESTIVAL from page 6

were welcomed and included. "Everybody that's been on has been really creative," Daniels said.

Although the festival was held primarily to showcase student talent, Donnally hoped that its nature and location would draw in other facets of the university community, like professors, staff, and administrators. According to Donnally, throughout the day, several university employees came out of SOM and Herter to stop by and check out the performances.

The idea for the festival was proposed last year by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano, and is funded by the Vice Chancellor's office. The event was organized by a committee of Student Activities Center staff and student volunteers who began planning for the festival in March.

This year the festival drew about 500 people. Donnally was very happy with the event's results. "The students had a good time and the performers were absolutely amazing," Donnally said. "We think it was a resounding success and the weather couldn't have been better."

A student tests her creativity while making a ceramic pot at the UMass Arts Festival.

The Daily Collegian

NOW HIRING FOR FALL 2005

- Comics Editor
- Copy Editors
- Finance Manager
- Human Resources Manager
- Circulation Manager
- Advertising Executives
- Photo Editor
- Photo Technician
- Photographers
- Graphic Artists

Contact Us at 545-3500 or Come Down to the Campus Center Basement to Pick Up an Application

Sox fans not charged

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON — No criminal charges will be filed against two Boston Red Sox fans who scuffled with New York Yankees outfielder Gary Sheffield. A court dismissed the case Thursday for lack of evidence.

The clerk magistrate said there was no probable cause to charge Christopher House and Matthew Donovan with the misdemeanor disorderly conduct charges sought by Boston police after the April 14 incident at Fenway Park.

"We're very pleased with the outcome, obviously," House's lawyer, Matthew McCarthy, told The Associated Press as he left the closed hearing in Boston Municipal Court.

Had the magistrate found probable cause, criminal charges would have been filed and the case referred to a judge.

House and Donovan, both of the city's Dorchester neighborhood, were ejected from the ballpark after House appeared to make contact with Sheffield as he chased Jason Varitek's triple into the right-field corner.

House reached over the 3-foot high fence, and Sheffield said he was struck in the face. Donovan apparently tossed a beer in Sheffield's direction.

Sheffield picked up the ball, pushed House, then threw the ball to the infield. Sheffield turned toward House but did not make contact with him again as a security guard jumped over the wall and stood between them.

House has denied making contact with the New York outfielder.

Police later filed applications for criminal charges, and the Red Sox revoked House's season tickets and banned Donovan from buying tickets this season.

"We've been cooperative with the Red Sox from the beginning," McCarthy said. "Hopefully at some point he'll get his tickets back."

House declined to comment after the hearing. As he headed into court he said: "I'm a private businessman. I intend to stay that way."

Donovan declined to comment.

Red Sox spokesman Charles Steinberg, said in an e-mail that the team's focus is "on maintaining a comfortable environment at Fenway for players and fans alike."

The Suffolk District Attorney's Office and Boston police did not comment.

New York Yankee Gary Sheffield was involved in a scuffle with Red Sox fans on Apr. 14.

Mullins rebounds after turmoil

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Jeff Mullins would like to forget his winter of discontent, and not just because record rainfall in Southern California made for countless dreary, soggy days at the racetrack.

He was punished when one of his horses had a positive drug test in January and he ticked off bettors by calling them idiots in March.

Now he's back at his fourth consecutive Kentucky Derby with long shot Buzzards Bay.

The 42-year-old trainer wasn't talking Thursday, except to say his attorney had advised silence because of pending legal issues.

"He's had a rough winter," said Bob Baffert, a three-time Derby winner who has been supportive of Mullins. "He asked me for advice and I told him, 'You just need to shut the hell up. Your only defense is you got to keep winning.'"

Mullins has done just that.

He finished second in the trainers' standings at Santa Anita's winter meeting, where Buzzards Bay gave him a third consecutive victory in the Santa Anita Derby. That punched the colt's ticket to Kentucky, where he jogged a mile over the Churchill Downs track for the first time Thursday.

Mullins didn't lose clients because of the positive drug test; in fact, Buzzards Bay's co-owner Bill Bianco is a member of the California Horse Racing Board.

The board filed a complaint against Mullins for conduct detrimental to racing after he insulted the wagering public while talking to a newspaper columnist, but it was later dismissed.

"He didn't shoot himself in the foot. He blew his foot plum off," trainer D. Wayne Lukas said. "He'd like to take that month out of his life, I know. He learned a lot from that."

Even after Mullins apologized in a television interview, bad feelings lingered among taunting fans, angry industry officials and some of his fellow trainers.

"There's no question that it didn't shine a very good light on a lot of the trainers and it definitely wasn't beneficial," said Ron Ellis, who trains in California and has Don't Get Mad in the Derby.

The year got off to a rocky start when one of Mullins' horses tested positive for an excessive amount of sodium bicarbonate. The milkshake-like mixture is suspected of masking other drugs in a horse's system and keeps the animal from tiring as quickly.

All the Kentucky Derby horses will undergo pre-race blood tests for milkshakes.

For 30 days, Mullins' horses had to appear in a detention barn for 24-hour observation before they ran. He was winning at a 28 percent clip before the positive test. During detention, he dropped to 13 percent before finishing the meeting at 22 percent.

"He's got a ton of horses, so it obviously hasn't hurt him much," Ellis said. "He dug himself a pretty deep hole. If he wins the Derby, they won't remember."

Mullins has worked his way up from racing's minor leagues in Arizona, Idaho, Utah and Wyoming to the ultra-competitive Southern California circuit.

The Murray, Utah, native won his first training title at Hollywood Park in 2003; last year, he earned $6.9 million in purses and won at a rate of 26 percent. He's the first trainer to win the Santa Anita Derby three years in a row.

"Jeff's an exceptional trainer," said trainer Roger Stein, who finished second to Mullins in this year's Santa Anita Derby. "I know he's been involved in controversy and I've told him he's a much better trainer than he is a speaker."

Lukas offered his endorsement, too, saying, "He's a good horseman. He knows what he's doing. He's got a great future."

The top three early favorites for Saturday's 131st Derby — Bellamy Road, Afleet Alex and Bandini — are all East Coast horses. The West Coast's top 3-year-olds — undefeated Declan's Moon and Roman Ruler — fell off the Derby trail over the winter because of injuries.

"That's unusual. Usually, the West Coast does put out a lot of good horses," Lukas said. "It's just one year. I don't think it will carry on."

Lukas, Baffert, Ellis, Craig Dollase and Warren Stute — all trainers with West Coast stables — have Derby horses, but some of them are here with ones they didn't figure on. The Derby's California entrants have some of the highest morning line odds in the field.

"It's a mistake to underestimate the Californias horses," Ellis said. "Maybe they aren't the flashiest of horses and they've kind of taken turns beating each other, so it might be a little bit deceiving. They might not be as bad as everybody thinks."

WRITE FOR SPORTS. CALL

(413) 545 - 0719

Hit the books, then hit the beach!

- Day and evening classes start May 31st & July 5th
- Affordable resident cost is $136 per credit
- 5- or 10-week courses
- A great way to earn college credits quickly
- Credits are transferable to your school! (When you are a university or college student, or incoming college freshman)
- Wellesley, Framingham, and Ashland

Call MassBay today at 781-239-2703 or go to www.massbay.edu

Looking to get ahead in your course work? Short on credits and need to catch up? Or just looking for something satisfying to do this Summer? A MassBay Summer Session course is the way to go!

Don't sweat it.

Check out MassBay's Summer Session Courses in:

Business
EMT
English
Health
History
Lab Sciences (such as Anatomy & Physiology, Biology, Microbiology)
Math
Social Sciences
and other transferable courses!

Classes meet Monday-Thursday so there's plenty of time left for other Summer activities.

To register or obtain additional information, call 781-239-2703.

MassBay Community College

Start here. Go anywhere.

JONES from page 10

some barn, complete with pine paneling above thickly padded walls — is videotaped to guarantee paternity. If there was a bathrobe hanging from a hook, the place would look like Hugh Hefner did the decorating.

"The tough thing with the schedule is making sure he doesn't get too tired," explained Margaret Layton, Three Chimneys' publicist. "He does have an occupation."

The race that turned Smarty Jones and his band of human brothers into instant celebrities will be run in nearby Louisville for the 131st time Saturday. Afterward, the winning horse will be draped with a blanket of roses and his jockey, trainer and owners interviewed on national television. Whether any or all of them connect with the sporting public the way Smarty Jones did remains to be seen.

But the odds are a lot longer than the 50-1 you can get at a betting window on the longest shot in the Derby field.

"I'm still not sure exactly why things happened the way they did," John Servis, Smarty's trainer, said over the telephone from Churchill Downs.

"But on the inside, it felt like we were part of a play that had already been written. You had this little, Pennsylvania-bred from a $10,000 sire who damn near killed himself before we could even point him toward the Derby. Meanwhile, the owner is in a wheelchair battling emphysema, and the rest of us are kind of blue-collar guys from Philadelphia.

"It was like we were a bunch of actors," Servis paused, "there just to sit back and enjoy the ride."

A year later, after the elation and a record win in the Preakness, then the staggering disappointment of a Triple Crown bid undone in the grueling Belmont, the principals in the drama are relatively healthy, happy and well off.

Servis and jockey Stewart Elliott, who were kings at tiny Philadelphia Park, but unknowns in racing's elite circles before the Derby, have ridden fame to better and more varied opportunities. Well-heeled clients now find their way to Servis' barn offering better prospects, and Elliott gets called to ride quality mounts at Monmouth Park and Aqueduct, both a step up racing's food chain from their gritty little base in Philly.

The duo nearly made it back to Churchill Downs this spring, but a poor showing by Rockport Harbor in the Lexington Stakes two weeks ago sidelined their star-crossed Derby candidate for the time being.

"It was disappointing, because it seemed like he had that something special, too," Elliott said, taking time out from a drive to Monmouth Park to answer his cell phone. "But it reminded me just how magical last year was, how everything that had to fall into place did."

Owners Pat and Roy Chapman are still wintering in Florida, back to keeping a much lower profile in the racing business. Roy, the blunt-speaking Philadelphia car dealer, continues to battle emphysema and turned 79 on Wednesday. The couple's sons, Mike and Randy, represented them at the Smarty party set up Thursday at Three Chimneys.

"None of us will ever forget it, and the topic comes up all the time," Mike said. "Just not every time we talk anymore."

None of the principals knows whether they'll ever see another horse like Smarty, nor even whether they'll run across one of his foals, which won't make their Derby debut until 2008. But all of them are hoping for just one.

"I feel like it could happen again, absolutely," Servis said. "It just feels like this play hasn't ended yet, like somehow, there's more to come."

After a successful 2004 Derby, retired stud Smarty Jones has been heavily pampered at a breeding farm in Kentucky. Jones earned a total of $7.6 million over his career.

Summer Move-Out
The Easy Way

Move and store packages

Starting at $99
for the Whole Summer!

- FREE Pickup
- FREE Dropoff
- FREE Boxes & Tape

5 COLLEGE Storage

888-455-MOVE
www.5collegestorage.com

$10 Off Summer Storage

Mention this ad and save $10 on your summer move-and-store package! We make moving out easy!

Offer valid on 10-box, 12-box and 16-box packages. Must sign up by May 15, 2005. Not valid with any other offer.

www.5collegestorage.com

5 COLLEGE Storage

Minutemen can take ECAC

MENS LAX from page 12

and boasts a .548 save percentage.

"They're a very formidable group," Cannella said. "They have one of the best goaltenders in the nation. They have a lot of experience. 10 seniors that are going to play on their Senior Day. A bunch of those seniors helped them go to two NCAA tournaments in the last three years. This is a really good group, so if we're not ready to play on Saturday at 1 o'clock, Rutgers will take it to us."

With only four wins for Rutgers this season, tomorrow's game could justify what was a disappointing year for the Knights.

"This is an opportunity for them, particularly their seniors, to end their careers on a bright note and be really happy about that," Cannella said. "They've struggled with some injuries this year, which hurt them tremendously. If they knock off UMass, it will have made their season, and we certainly have to be ready for that."

Cannella insisted, though, that with an ECAC championship on the line, his group must first concentrate on staying within itself.

"We have talked about [the ECAC crown], but more importantly, we want to be ready to play and play at the highest level we can," Cannella said. "When you do that, prepare the right way, go out there and play at a high level, everything else will take care of itself."

Note: Morris and defenseman Jack Reid were two of 120 players asked to try out for the 2006 U.S. Men's Lacrosse Team. Morris was one of 36 attackmen selected, and Reid was one of 36 defenders picked to try out for the national squad. Twenty-three players will make the team. The tryouts are from June 13-16 at the University of Maryland-Baltimore County. Morris leads UMass with 34 goals, 21 assists and 55 points. He is fourth in the nation with 4.33 points per game and fifth in the country with 2.75 goals per game. Reid leads the Minutemen with 49 groundballs and 31 caused turnovers on the 12th ranked defense in Division I.

ANDREW TARLOVSKY/COLLEGIAN

Junior Sean Morris, along with fellow junior Jack Reid, were recently selected to tryout for the 2006 U.S. men's lacrosse team. Morris leads UMass with 34 goals this season.

Lacrosse star had to travel a tough road

MORRIS from page 12

Marshfield High School dominated Massachusetts high school football during the four years Morris was on the team. The Rams won two state championships and sent a slew of players to Division I and I-AA schools.

Behind the success was Morris, who rushed for over 3,000 yards during his career. While in the backfield, he was also tabbed an All-State running back twice.

"I went to watch him play high school football and he was an absolute animal. He had a friend (Zach Giles) that got recruited to play at Notre Dame, who was like 300 pounds and you would see them standing next to each other and Sean's only 5'9 or 5'8," Cannella says. "He (Morris) was the toughest kid, pound-for-pound on the field."

Morris started getting letters from a laundry list of Division I-AA schools and had offers from the likes of Indiana, Northwestern and Maryland. He knew that he had options and could potentially play on a Division I stage, but he knew he wanted more.

Anywhere Morris went, he would have been a secondary option. Even with his hard work ethic and tough mentality, there was only so much a 5'9 kid could do against Division I football players. For Morris, the idea of not being the best was scary, so much that it pushed him away from football and towards lacrosse.

"I knew I could play football, but I figured I could do this (lacrosse) at the highest level. That's just kind of my personality, I always want to be on the top," Morris says.

With Morris making his decision to play lacrosse, it all came down to a matter of where.

Cannella was recruiting Morris hard, but it came down to a coaching preference and Morris decided to go play for Rutgers and then-head coach Bill Dirrigl.

Morris called Cannella and let him know about his decision. Cannella was upset that he lost the recruiting battle, but told Morris that if anything went wrong he always had a spot at UMass.

Something went wrong, real quick.

Before Morris could play one game under Dirrigl, he was let go, and Morris was alone. Every reason he had come to Rutgers was gone and he was hours from home, during one of the more trying times in a young man's life.

"When I was at Rutgers, Sept. 11 occurred and there were a lot of things going on. I thought to myself, 'What am I doing here?' I kind of felt alone most of the time," Morris says.

Morris sat out that season and transferred to UMass, maintaining four years of eligibility. He remembered what Cannella said, and at that point there was no other choice.

"Fortunately for us there was a coaching change at Rutgers," Cannella says. "He had to make a decision at that point and the first person he called up was me and I said, 'We'd love to have you.'"

Since arriving at UMass, Morris and Cannella have had a tight relationship. Cannella's mission for each of his players is to turn them into the best lacrosse player they can be by the time they graduate. For Morris, luck and illness have hindered this process.

Morris played in the last 14 games of the 2003 season, his freshman year, after sustaining an injury which caused him to miss the first two. Morris showed just what he was capable of in his first game for the Minutemen as he scored a hat trick against Navy.

The next season, Morris would play in four less games, after coming down with mononucleosis. Cannella mentioned that Morris was not in true "lacrosse shape" until the last game of the year.

Coming into this season, Morris knew there were many challenges ahead. Staying healthy, leading an offense, and getting back into the shape that would facilitate both. Yet, through the trials and challenges he has faced, Morris has risen to the occasion as he leads the team in both goals (34) and assists (21), en route to a 12-2 season, with a shot at the ECAC championship tomorrow.

"I think the challenges that I give him are only half the challenges he puts on himself," Cannella says.

As Cannella has watched Morris grow over the past three seasons, he sees more and more of himself. He, like Morris, was tenacious on the field and possessed that same switch, which controls his internal intensity.

"He's a hard-nosed player. You always look or players that remind you of yourself and he's the type of player I felt I was when I played," Cannella says. "I saw that in Sean in a way, especially since he's a small guy."

For Morris being compared to Cannella is one of the best compliments he can receive.

"I think we both have the same kind of attitude, we're both really intense people. We want the best for everybody all the time and I want the best for me all the time and my teammates. I've never seen coach play before, but I know he's scrappy, I know he's real scrappy," Morris says. "It's an honor to be compared to him, I guess he said it because I'm a little scrappy too."

As time winds down in the 2005 season, Morris has shown what happens when he is given the opportunity to shine. He has won games, decimated defenders, and embarrassed goalies, yet the whole time he's been nothing but modest of his accomplishments.

After scoring five goals in a 14-12 comeback victory over Hobart on April 16, Morris stood off to the side to talk to a few reporters. He laughed, smiled, and calmly answered every question sent in his direction.

It was such a different person than the one who had just cross checked a defender twice his size and went to score the ensuing goal. This guy was different, he was well out of game mode and on to the next challenge.

"It's just a switch," Morris says. "I do it on the field, but I try to use it all the time."

Softball season is winding down for UM

SOFTBALL from page 12

Haywood, who has recorded 12 RBIs, three homers, nine doubles and holds a batting average of .265.

Quinnipiac is coming off of a 5-2 loss against Fairleigh Dickinson and have won four of the previous six games. The Bobcats have fallen to teams such as UConn and Harvard this season, both of which were overcome by UMass.

Defensively, the Minutewomen will have to stop sophomore Sammi Allendorfer, who leads the team with 20 runs batted in and currently holds a batting average of .276.

Countering such weapons as Allendorfer and Haywood for the Maroon and White will be the pitching combo of senior Barb LaFogg (18-9) and junior Jenna Busa (12-5). Both pitchers will wrap up their best collegiate regular season careers Sunday, with LaFogg leading the A-10 in strikeouts with 189 on the season and holding an ERA of 2.04.

Busa is not far behind LaFogg, with a season ERA of 2.27 and 112 season strikeouts in 28 appearances. Sortino has depended on this duo to lead the team in 2005.

"Offense comes and goes," Sortino said. "And consistency and doing things right is going to win a game and win a championship."

While the Minutewomen work off of two aces, the Bobcats have a committee of pitchers. Junior Kim Norman leads Quinnipiac, with a season ERA of 3.05 and 71 strikeouts. UMass will also have to hit off of freshman Kristen Sheriff, who is good for a 3.65 ERA and 64 strikeouts.

The pitchers from both Quinnipiac and URI will be going against the No.2 best batting team in the A-10. This season, it has been junior KJ Kelley that has stepped up for the offense, and currently leads the team, and the A-10, in batting average, with a mark of .374.

Kelley also leads the Minutewomen in homeruns (10), slugging percentage (.775), doubles (12) and is tied for first with senior Hilary Puglia in RBIs, with 34 on the season.

Puglia is second, behind Kelley in all of those categories, with a .396 batting average, nine homers and 11 doubles on the season.

As of late, heavy hitting has been contributed by sophomore Amanda Morin, freshman Stacy Cullington and senior Denise Denis, who is third on the team in home runs with five. The slap-hitter for the team is sophomore Candice Molinari, who has become accustomed to advancing runners with her frequent bunts and steals this season.

In the previous two contests against BC and BU, senior Pam Sulick has stepped up, nailing the game winning RBI against the Terriers and registering two homers and four RBIs verses the Eagles. Kelley understands that ant player on the team can come in at any moment to make an impact.

"Simply taking care of the little things," Kelley said. "Making routine plays, catching fly balls. We know if someone goes down, someone is going to come in and get the job done just as well."

Jones enjoying life after Derby

By Jim Litke
Associated Press

MIDWAY, Ky. — The love allair hasn't cooled one bit.

A year after he set the nation's heart fluttering, Smarty Jones still possesses the looks, charm and self-assuredness of a champion. A movie is already in the works. And now, on top of all that, he's got ... the life.

Retired at stud on a breeding farm in the rolling hills near Lexington, barely an hour's drive east from the Churchill Downs racetrack where a Derby victory in 2004 catapulted Smarty Jones into America's sporting constellation forever, the 4-year-old chestnut spends his days lounging, lunching and — how to put this delicately? — loving.

Morning, afternoon and night.

"He's taken to his new career with gusto," said Dan Rosenberg, president of Three Chimneys Farm.

On this sun-splashed Thursday afternoon, Smarty Jones naps on the floor of a large stall that once belonged to Seattle Slew inside a handsomely decked-out barn along with five other distinguished stallions. Imagine the equine equivalent of MTV's "Cribs," or "The Real World," and you have the picture. He gets bathed each morning, eats when he wants, and roams a 2-acre paddock under the stars each night. He even has a two person-staff to handle the crush of mail and requests for strands of hair or straws of hay from his bed, and book his string of appointments.

Five days a week, every week, a single tour group numbering 25 comes through to see him up close, to gaze into the dark, lively eyes flickering beneath the fringe of hair that still falls across his face like a trademark. Up to three times a day during thoroughbred mating season, from mid-February through July (88 times so far; 111 by the end), a mare is ushered into a breeding shed to the south of Smarty's stall to be — as they say in the industry — covered.

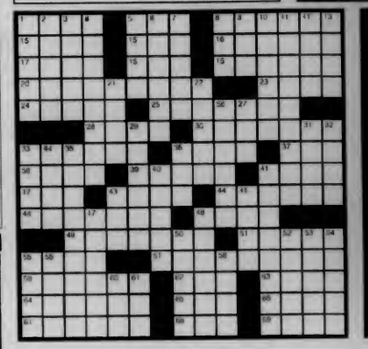
His stud fee is $100,000 per live foal, not bad for a horse who retired with $7.6 million in earnings, the third-best total ever. That's why mares have dropped by from as far away as Germany and Japan. Each session in the shed — actually another hand-

See JONES on page 9

ALL FIRED UP! creative FOOD & BEVERAGE
FEATURING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS

STUDENT SPECIAL
ALL YOU CAN EAT SUNDAY BRUNCH
$9.95
(Regularly $13.95)
48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
WWW.ALLFIREDUPHADLEY.COM

No Cals Last Call anti-hangover & nutritional drink No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbale's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-842-0150
Please Drink Responsibly



Shear Bliss
Holistic Full Service Salon
Book a fabulous cut and style or bee light and get a mini-facial!
460 West St., Rt. Amherst

ACROSS
1 Arcturus or Rigel
5 2 on the phone
8 More risque
14 Residence
15 Mrs. in Monterrey
16 Calendar of activities
17 Mellowed
18 Man with Dorothy?
19 Kind of call or toy
20 Faithful assistant
23 Herald of Easter
24 Scholarly composition
25 Extremely cold
28 Feel concern
30 Shock
33 Francs or Dahl
36 Drench
37 Bikini part
38 Thunderous
39 Vitality
41 Muffed
42 Fight a match
43 Isn't wrong?
44 Rancor
48 Trip
48 Counting gent
49 Reticence
51 Annoying
55 Filament
57 Game of X's and O's
59 Old sayings
62 Schuss
63 Damage
64 Maintains one's subscription
65 2,000 pounds
66 "Does
67 Manu fishing
68 Picnic pest
69 Philadelphia's City Hall figure

DOWN
1 Disgrace
2 Fourth wear
3 Prayer endings
4 Flustered with embarrassment
5 Italian wine region
6 Partnered game
7 Kiel or Suez
8 Worn cloth
9 Gone by
10 Wine storage site
11 Unforgettable
12 "East of
13 Deliver a diatribe
21 Meg or Jeri
22 Yokel
26 Rough
27 Aggravate
29 Speak abusively
31 On the house
32 Open wide
33 Clerical wear
34 Cheer
35 Lush
36 Friday's rank abbr.
40 Lifeless
41 Low risk common stock
43 6-pack muscles
45 Hemingway's nickname
47 Corporate combination
48 Summon hither
50 Scenic view
52 Fixed gaze
53 Islamic text
54 Country on the Red Sea
55 Aesop loser
58 Arabian Sea gulf
59 Delicate color
60 Flicks member
61 Opposite of NNW

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

This is your last chance to apply to be Comics Editor!

Don't miss out!

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Your wardrobe looks entirely different now that you've finally done your laundry.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Sometimes you have to give a song more than one shot before you like it.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
You should have been thinking ahead about all these things.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
A small white lie never hurt anyone. So keep up what you're doing.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
It's sad that as soon as you've finally learned something you have to move on.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
If you keep fearing people's criticism, you'll never get anywhere.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
This weekend is going to be nonstop for you. Get ready for some fun times.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Your house should definitely be pink. It'll match your tassels.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
It's a good idea to record all of the stuff that happens to you.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Do not forget the great revelation you had yesterday.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
Right now you'd give anything to see your best friend making monkey faces.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
You need to watch what you say in front of certain people.

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"The good life, as I conceive it, is a happy life. I do not mean that if you are good you will be happy — I mean that if you are happy you will be good."

—Bertrand Russell

Your chance at more fame than Paris Hilton.
Collegian Comics Editor
Submit your application by Sunday May 8.

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@verizon.net Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Htwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

AUTO FOR SALE

1991 BMW 325I grey 90000 miles $1400 425-443-7839

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, tint. $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

EMPLOYMENT

Painters Helpers Call 413-253-9457

Camp Counselors—Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Poconos Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pineforestcamp.com

License LIFE and HEALTH insurance representative for sales and services of existing accounts. Excellent training, great commissions, career opportunity. Fax resume to: 508-757-1200

Make $75 taking online surveys www.monkeyauthor.com

EMPLOYMENT

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $8 - $12/hr. (888)277-9787. www.collegepro.com

Responsible college students wanted for Franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown. (888)427-7672 Ext. 445

Summer/Beyond! Local franchise Major healthy home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay 587-9500.

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPrinting.com - Call Dan 413-682-0020

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nees. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

EMPLOYMENT

SUMMER IN MAINE
Males and females Meet new friends! Travel! Teach your favorite activity. Tennis, Swim, Theatre Tech, Canoe, Water-ski, Kayak, Gymnastics, Nature, Lacrosse, Archery, Theatre Costumer, Copper Enameling, English Riding, and more. TRIPP LAKE CAMP For Girls: 1-800-997-4347 www.tripplake-camp.com

Summer Jobs For The Environment
*$275 - $475 / Week
*Stop Global Warming
*Protect the Environment
Make a difference Work with MASSPIRG on a campaign to stop global warming. Career opportunities and benefits. Call Chris 413-256-6434

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until Late Spring; Then Full-Time thru late August. Call: 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

EMPLOYMENT

Cleaning 2 days (8-2) and Saturday AM Hampshire Fitness $9.50 per hour and membership. Jason or Deb 256-6446.

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring outgoing students for on-campus spokespersons positions. $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

Moving: Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe. 60 Masonic St. Northampton.

EMPLOYMENT

MAKE EXTRA CASH!!!
Make your own boxers! Sell T-Shirts to Sororities, clubs, and groups & make a commission on every sale. Guaranteed!!! Very easy. Bonus! Text 413-586-7133 or pmurf@umassmail.com

FOR SALE

Full Size bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition. $200 & buyer must pick up. (443) 904-6844

HOUSE FOR RENT

Hadley Close to UMass 5/6 beds on Newer home Laundry Hookups. Large yard 549-4270

House Hadley: Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage, 1 3/4 miles to UMass; $2750 plus utilities, Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

Hadley- 5 Beds, Large lot, September, $1575, plus utilities Skibski Realtors 586-1827

MISCELLANEOUS

www.hutchhats.com Just Look Stupid

ROOMMATE WANTED

1 Room in 3bdrm Brandywine May-Aug $450 Rent & dates negotiable pmuse@student.umass.edu

Roommate Wanted in House $325 Call 413-687-4976

SERVICES

Legal questions? We have answers. Student Legal Services Office 922 Campus Center, 545-1995

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. 511 Screening and Treatment. Affordable and Confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 5486002

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

SUBLET

Room Available June 10th-Aug 31st in Amherst Center. Call Noah 413-687-2165

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEEKEND

FRIDAY, MAY 6, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

On the brink of a championship

UMass men's lacrosse team can clinch ECAC with a victory

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

Three years ago, Massachusetts men's lacrosse junior Sean Morris made one of those key decisions that changed his life, and the lives of a whole slew of others.

He was a freshman at Rutgers, his campus of choice out of Marshfield High School in Massachusetts' South Shore. But it didn't work out.

Now, in the Spring of 2005, Morris is nearing the end of his third season with the Minutemen after transfering out of New Jersey's state school, and he is really making a convincing statement that he chose the right collegiate colors.

The Minutemen (11-2 4-1 ECAC) will travel down to New Brunswick, N.J. to take on the Scarlet Knights (4-8 1-4 ECAC) with a conference championship on the line for the Maroon and White.

UMass shared the crown with Georgetown in 2001 and won the conference outright in 2002, the year Morris took his hiatus from the lastest game on grass, because he knew he would be transfering back home.

UMass put itself into position to win the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference on April 23 when it leapfrogged Georgetown in the standings by taking down the visiting Hoyas, 13-12.

However, if Rutgers pulls off the upset, the winner of the game between Georgetown and Penn State on Sunday in the nation's capital will determine the winner of the league.

The strange thing is, this scenario played out the same way in 2003. But just as UMass had a deja vu experience against Syracuse last weekend, the Minutemen are trying to avoid a repeat nightmare tomorrow.

Two years ago, UMass made its way to New Jersey with the chance to claim its third consecutive ECAC banner, fresh off wins over Georgetown and Syracuse — the program's first win over the Orange in 22 years — and proceeded to fall down by six goals in the fourth quarter, and drop the decision 12-9.

And just last year, UMass had stuggled mightily from the injury bug and played host to Rutgers, again on the final day of the lacrosse calander, and upset the No. 10 Scarlet Knights 9-6. Though the Knights didn't have a conference championship on the line, they did back their way into the NCAA tournament with two straight losses and proceeded to get waxed at Princeton in the first round of the national tourney.

"Rutgers came up here, and they were on their way to the NCAA tournament, but UMass was a little bit hungrier than them," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Two years ago, we went down there. We just beat Georgetown and Syracuse, but Rutgers was much hungrier than UMass.

"You have to make your guys aware of both of those situations. It is in the past, but hopefully some of our guys who have experienced both of those games know what we're talking about and can get themselves ready to play."

The Knights, who are riddled by injuries this year, are led by junior goalie Greg Havalchak, who has allowed 9.50 goals per game

ANDREW TSAO/DAILY COLLEGIAN

The UMass lacrosse team can take the ECAC as it will take on Rutgers tomorrow in the final game of the regular season.

See MENS LAX on page 10

Morris' "switch" is what makes him a force among monsters

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Everybody has a mental switch. You can see it in a person's eyes as they flip it on ... they change right there in front of you. It's just a simple flick and they're gone, off to somewhere else deep inside their own mentality. However, once it's on, only a select few can turn it back off.

Sean Morris is one of these people.

Before every game that Morris puts on his maroon and white jersey for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, he flips this switch on and turns everything else off.

There is little other option for a 5'9" kid constantly doing battle with athletes that dwarf him in size, but for Morris, every game is another opportunity to show that he's the best and this switch is his greatest weapon.

"He's a competitor and he wants to prove that he's one of the best out there. Time in and time out he does that," UMass coach Greg Cannella says.

For his entire life, Morris has always been a little smaller than the kids that he played against. Growing up in Marshfield, a small beach down just south of Boston, Morris played with his brother Nick (who is four years older than him) and other neighborhood kids.

Morris' neighborhood was always packed with children playing sports after school. Everyday he would go home, get ready, and compete against guys that were almost always bigger than him.

"Growing up with my brother and growing up around older kids, I was always the little runt. I always had to fight my way through every time I played with them," Morris says. "I don't tell him enough how much I appreciate what he did for me."

What Nick and his friends did was create one of the hardest working athletes on the UMass lacrosse team.

Cannella knew this from the first time he met Morris.

Between Morris' sophomore and junior year in high school he came out to Amherst to hang out with some friends. Morris was torn between his two athletic passions; football and lacrosse, and decided he would stop by Cannella's office.

"He actually came in before we saw him. As an underclassman he had some friends that went to UMass and he came into the office to talk and I really liked him," Cannella says. "I said, 'I'll come see you play this summer,' and when I did I was like, 'wow!'"

Morris went to the New England Premiere Camp in New Hampshire that summer, where he would compete against some of the best talent in the country. Cannella kept his promise and showed up alongside then assistant coach Andy Shay.

Cannella knew immediately that he had found a special player. Morris, who was one of the smaller attackmen at the camp, was keeping up with and dominating some of the best and biggest talent around.

Cannella needed to see more, so he went to see Morris play some football.

SCOTT TSAI/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Sean Morris has a tendancy to overcome opponents much bigger than him in stature. He attributes this to his ability to turn on his mental switch.

See MORRIS on page 10

Minutewomen will play four

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

With 45 games and almost three months in the books, the Massachusetts softball team (30-14-1 11-3 Atlantic 10) is preparing for its final four games of the regular season. The Minutewomen will travel to Rhode Island in a double header today at 3 p.m. and will host Senior Day Sunday in a double header against Qunnipiac at noon.

The Maroon and White have outscored its opponents 39-9 en route to winning its previous six contests and recently clinched the second seed in the upcoming A-10 tournament.

This past week has consisted of two home stands against Beantown opponents — Boston College on Tuesday and Boston University on Wednesday — in which UMass demolished both teams.

The game against Quinnipiac will take place at the UMass Softball Complex, where the Minutewomen have lost only three out of the 45 contests this season. UMass coach Elaine Sortino finds that home games are desirable, but not essential to the success of UMass.

"It's nice to play in the surroundings in which you practice," Sortino said. "It's an advantage to know your field and know the wall."

Today will mark the final regular season conference game against the eighth-ranked team in the A-10, Rhode Island. The Rams are coming off of an upset victory over the Connecticut Huskies on Apr. 29 1-0. Despite the recent win, the Rams have fallen to seven of its last nine opponents.

Rhode Island will utilize pitcher Jamie Hughes, who leads the Rams with an ERA of 5.09 and has recorded 62 strikeouts this season. At the plate for URI this season has been Nicole

See SOFTBALL on page 10

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Senior Pam Sulick has come up big for the Minutewomen lately, amassing two home runs and four runs batted in throughout the past two contests. UMass will travel to Rhode Island today to take on the Rams.

Baseball prepares for Temple

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts baseball team travels to Philadelphia this weekend to take on Temple in a three-game series at Amber Field. Saturday will feature a doubleheader starting at noon and will wrap up the series with a Sunday game also at noon.

During a two-game road trip this week, the Minutemen (9-29 3-12 A-10) exploded for 15 runs and 16 hits in a 15-10 victory over Siena on Tuesday, but dropped a 7-3 decision to Vermont on Wednesday.

On Tuesday, freshman catcher Bryan Garrity went 4-for-5 with three RBIs in the Minuteman win that snapped Siena's nine-game winning streak. Sophomore shortstop Bryan Adamski continued his tear during the second half of the season with three RBIs on a 3-for-5 afternoon. Freshman Andy Tuetken contributed with a hit, an RBI and scored three times.

After tying their season high 15-run effort, the Minutemen left seven men on base in their losing effort to the Catamounts. Both teams had eight hits, but Vermont worked their way to nine walks while UMass could only muster two free passes.

"Well, we're getting better," UMass coach Mike Stone said. "I still see us in situations where we could take more advantage of the situations. We couldn't get much worse since we were hitting under .200, but things are getting better."

UMass has raised its batting average since snapping a 12-game losing streak that lasted from Mar. 16 to Apr. 17, though it has remained inconsistent.

"I think we react to different pitchers that we face," Stone said. "That's part of it. It's really hard to put your finger on it. I know people are trying to execute. Sometimes it just doesn't work, but I think it's more facing people who have command of their pitches. And sometimes [the players] lose their focus at the plate."

The Owls (10-28 3-12 Atlantic 10) are coming off a heartbreaking 11-10 loss against Villanova Wednesday. In the bottom of the ninth, Temple sophomore pitcher Chris McCafferty threw the ball away while trying to get the runner at first, which allowed the winning run to cross the plate.

Temple features a solid power-hitter in senior right fielder Pete Colon, who went 2-for-4 with three runs and two RBIs in the Villanova loss. Colon is hitting .270 with 10 home runs and 23 runs batted in.

"Colon is a pretty good hitter," Stone said. "He hit a home run against Torra last year. Torra had a no-hitter going into the top of the seventh when Colon hit an opposite field home run. He's legit and has 10 home runs on the year. Colon is really the only kid that would stand out."

Junior ace Matt Torra, who pitched a two-hit complete game shutout against St. Bonaventure in front of Red Sox General Manager Theo Epstein, will open up the series in the first game of Saturday's twin-bill.

Torra had two strikeouts against the Bonnies and picked up his third win of the season. He was named co-UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week last week along with men's lacrosse star Jeff Zywicki.

The Pittsfield native has given up only 10 earned runs in 10 starts, but has only received one solid run support effort in the 13-1 victory over Fordham. Excluding the 13-run effort, Torra is receiving only 1.7 runs per game from the UMass offense.

Last season against Temple, Torra pitched a complete game one-hitter while allowing one run in a 6-1 victory.

"We expect him to pitch well every time he goes out there and really take charge of the game," Stone said. "He knows how to pitch. He's a much tougher competitor than he has been in the past. So, we are just looking for the same from him. It is unfortunate that we don't get runs for him."

The Minutemen have struggled in close games, losing 10 out of 11 one-run contests. Though they did not commit an error against Vermont, the Maroon and White have 66 errors in 38 games this season.

"One thing we haven't done and I'm waiting for to happen, is the team to really have a feeling of confidence that things are really going well and we are clicking on all cylinders," Stone said. "It has been that way for this entire season and probably three-quarters of last year. I've been hoping and waiting for that to appear sometime soon."

Jeremy Demers will pitch the second game for the Minutemen on Saturday, while senior captain Keith Doherty will pitch Sunday.

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Monday May 9, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 134

Dining Services to receive award after 5-year wait

By Meaghan Geisler
Collegian Staff

After five years, the University of Massachusetts Amherst Dining Service has finally taken home a gold medal from the national Loyal E. Horton Dining Awards contest for residence dining halls.

The Loyal E. Horton Dining Awards, contests for residence hall dining, is hosted by the National Association of College and University of Food Services. For five years UMass has come in either second or third place, but this year that all changed. UMass took home a gold medal in the multiple concepts category and a silver medal in theme dinners. They will be given their awards at the NACUFS annual national conference in July in New Orleans, La.

"Everyone at the dining services is so delighted. Everyone worked very hard all year and were awarded in a very competitive program that included schools such as, the University of Connecticut and the University of New Hampshire," said UMass Dining Services Director Ken Toong about the victory.

Toong has been the director of dining and retail food services at UMass for six years now. He is very proud of the dining services accomplishments. "We are honored to receive this award, it is great for UMass, but the best is yet to come, we want to continue evolving."

For this year's multiple concept theory they chose to go with the theme, "Everything's on the table." Every year their presentations are judged on a certain criteria. This year's criteria was based on menu selection, merchandising and presentation, marketing, nutritional soundness, and overall impression. Their multiple concepts can be seen in any dining hall. At UMass the students are offered a wide selection in the dining halls, where they can choose anything from sushi to pasta.

For the theme dinner category they chose to present this year's Halloween dinner, which consisted of 6,500 lobsters, 1,000 pounds of steamers, 600 pounds of steak, 1,500 pounds of chicken fingers, and 1,200 portions of eggplant. In each dining hall they also had entertainment such as fortune-tellers, magicians, and ghost-story tellers. The judging criteria for this category was the same as the multiple concept category, except they did not judge on nutritional soundness.

In order to enter the competition, UMass' dining services must put together a package that includes pictures of their presentations, ingredients of foods, and a letter including what has been done differently in the current year. Once this is all put together they send in the package to NACUFS where they hold the judging.

See DC AWARD on page 4

Rezoning eliminates potential frat housing

By Dan Koffman
Collegian Staff

At the Amherst Town Meeting on May 2, the east end of Olympia Drive was rezoned leaving the University of Massachusetts with no future further undeveloped fraternity land in the town.

The rezoning, made possible by Article 18 of the planning board, changes the land from being designated as fraternity residence land to neighborhood residence land.

Amherst used eminent domain to take the 27.59 acre property from a private trust in May of 1987. The town cited acquiring permanent conservation land and creating affordable housing as the primary reasons.

The University and town have tried numerous times since the town acquired the land to put a plan in place for affordable housing that would be tailored towards UMass students, such as housing for married students. Nothing concrete ever came out of these talks, and so the town decided to move ahead on its own.

The rezoning does not mean that affordable housing will be built on the land anytime soon. No timetable has been put in place for such an occurrence and no one has shown great interest in developing the land.

"There's always been talk about doing something [on Olympia Drive]. The town meeting has always supported the idea," said Paul Bobrowski, Planning Board chair. "But the town can't afford to do it. We have to find a partner or developer to come in and do something. There's a lot of ways to do it."

Some within the community are worried about the possibility of affordable housing and fraternity housing eventually being alongside one another.

"I support completely the establishment of affordable housing in Amherst," said Morris Singer, a UMass student who also represents Precinct 4 of Amherst at Town Meetings, "but now there seems to be little or no consideration on behalf of the planning board on what the edge would look like between the University land and the affordable housing cluster."

"It's not just about fraternity housing and how the fraternity members would feel living next to affordable housing, it's also in consideration for the future occupants of the affordable housing cluster," said Singer, whose precinct includes all of the Southwest Residential Area of UMass.

MEGAN PRINTER/COLLEGIAN

The land near the Sig Ep fraternity located near Olympia Drive is slated to be used by the Town of Amherst to build affordable housing units.

The University has talked about building a fraternity and sorority park on Olympia Drive adjacent to the rezoned land, but not much has been heard of this plan recently. Michael Gargano, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life at UMass, has said in the past that the park would help to enliven the Greek presence across campus.

Fraternity housing can only be built on land already designated for fraternity use. Because of no undeveloped land being able to be used for fraternity housing and because a fraternity park is on the backburner for the foreseeable future, many fraternity members will be faced with having to live on campus.

Last Wednesday, UMass trustees voted to pursue the purchase of five fraternity houses along North Pleasant Street. The five homes, which have been up for sale since January 2003, are spread over 1.82 acres and worth collectively $1.8 million, according to Amherst officials.

Alpha Tau Gamma owns the entire property on North Pleasant Street, but the fraternity moved to Sunset Avenue last year. Currently renting the houses are Alpha Epsilon Pi, Pi Delta Psi, Zeta Beta Tau, Lambda Phi Epsilon, and Sigma Psi Zeta, the lone sorority house of the group.

If UMass does buy the property, which would presumably be turned into classrooms or offices, then these fraternities would be faced with having their members live on campus. Some fraternity functions would be able to still occur on campus, according to leading fraternity members, but parties would be impossible.

A public hearing was held on Article 18 on March 30. The standard public comment and discussion period followed and then the article was voted on by the Planning Board. The board voted unanimously to recommend that Town Meeting adopt Article 18.

Gov. proposes loan to fund construction

BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Mitt Romney has proposed that the state borrow nearly $1 billion to fund various construction projects, including rebuilding the backlogged State Police crime lab and improving public colleges, The Boston Globe reported.

The $950 million bill doesn't detail each project, but leaves it to state agencies to devise appropriate plans. The bill now goes to the Legislature, which will review and amend the proposal.

The bill follows public complaints that some of the state's most important jobs were being compromised by inadequate facilities. Just last month, officials revealed that it took more than eight months for the State Police crime lab in Sudbury to process a DNA sample that led to an arrest in the murder of Christa Worthington, who was killed in her Cape Cod house in 2002.

Romney's bill proposes $125 million to rebuild and enlarge the lab, which has long been criticized as too small and inadequately staffed.

"It's going to be a big step forward to mitigate what has been really a substandard operation," said Eric Kriss, Romney's administration and finance secretary.

The proposal also allocates $15 million to upgrade the chief medical examiner's office, which is being investigated for allegedly sending the wrong set of eyeballs out for testing during a 2003 autopsy and misidentifying a fire victim's body, which was later cremated. Last month, Romney installed a new leader in the office, Dr. Mark Flomenbaum.

Romney's bill allots $150 million for state and community colleges and another $150 million for the University of Massachusetts system, where students, faculty and administrators have complained about the condition of campus buildings.

—Associated Press

Officers replaced in wake of student's death

BOSTON (AP) — An elite police unit that shot pepper-spray pellets at revelers following a Red Sox win last year, killing 21-year-old student Victoria Snelgrove, has replaced a quarter of the officers in the squad, including all the command staff.

Some of the officers of the mobile operations unit, including former Commander Robert R. O'Toole Jr., transferred out during the death investigation. Others have been on leave due to injuries suffered since the shooting.

The roughly 50-member squad, which includes a sniper, dive, and SWAT teams, has a reputation as a tightly disciplined and cohesive unit. The unit has been under close scrutiny since Snelgrove died on Oct. 21 after Boston eliminated the New York Yankees.

Though only three officers shot the pepper pellet guns during the fray, all have felt the effects of the death, said Superintendent Robert Dunford, who's overseen the unit since Superintendent James Claiborne was transferred in February.

"I'm quite sure these guys felt under a cloud," Dunford said. "They've had a very stressful year."

On Monday, the city paid a $5.1 million settlement to Snelgrove's parents.

The spotlight on the unit is likely to increase with the release in coming weeks of results of an independent investigation into the death. An internal investigation is also pending.

The independent probe will cover the department's tactical planning for handling post-game disturbances, an accounting of what each officer did, decisions about purchasing weapons, and officers' training for those weapons.

Not all of the unit members had been trained on every crowd control weapon at their disposal, Dunford said this week. In the future, all members will be trained on all weapons.

Police Commissioner Kathleen O'Toole said this week that the department will boost training, and will catalog officers' training and certification.

Former U.S. Attorney Donald Stern, who is chairman of the panel, said police across the country will be looking at the commissions recommendations.

Patrolman Rochefort Milien, who was certified to use the weapon, fired the pellet that hit Snelgrove in the eye and killed her. Robert O'Toole and Patrolman Samil Silta, neither of whom had been training in using the pepper pellet guns, also fired that night.

O'Toole was put on desk duty after the death, and was later removed from head of special operations. O'Toole's retirement was announced Monday along with details of the settlement.

—Associated Press

JON BITSY JOSTO/HERALD-NEWS

Boston Police have replaced several officers from an elite unit in the wake of the death of Victoria Snelgrove, pictured above.

Costs could delay construction of schools

BOSTON (AP) — Completing hundreds of school construction projects will cost the state $1.3 billion more than it anticipated, a discovery that could force dozens of cities and towns to wait more than two years to break ground on new projects, officials said.

State officials planned to spend $4.2 billion to finish building roughly 420 schools, but State Treasurer Timothy Cahill said he was surprised to learn that the state's share of the construction costs has swelled to an estimated $5.5 billion.

"We knew that the problem was much bigger than it was reported," Cahill told The Boston Sunday Globe. "We didn't know it was this big."

The state imposed a moratorium on new school construction projects in 2003. That restriction was scheduled to be lifted in 2007.

But the new cost estimate, which comes from the newly created Massachusetts School Building Authority, means some cities and towns may have to wait longer to start building schools.

"The authority cannot fund projects that it doesn't have the money to fund," said the agency's executive director, Katherine Craven, who attributed the rising construction costs in part to the price of manual labor and building materials, including steel.

The news disappointed many local officials, who already have waited years to start building new schools.

Arlington, for instance, is waiting for the state's approval to rebuild at least two 1950s era elementary schools, which have outdated heating and electrical systems.

"They're a big concern," said Arlington School Committee member Paul Schlichtman. "We've got the plans all drawn. We're ready to submit at a moment's notice."

Some critics said the state should do more to control costs. The Newton Taxpayer Association is calling on the city to spend $65 million to renovate Newton North High School instead of replacing it at an estimated cost of $104 million.

— Associated Press

COURTESY WIKI

The higher-than-expected costs of school construction is one of the issues to be discussed at the Massachusetts State House soon.

Two arrested at Holocaust memorial

BOSTON (AP) — Two people were arrested Sunday at an event to commemorate the liberation of Nazi concentration camps, where white supremacist protesters clashed with a crowd angry at their presence.

Shireen Chambers, 36, of Dorchester, and Jerome Higins, 25, of Everett, were both charged with affray and disturbing the peace, police Officer John Boyle said.

Chambers, who is white, is accused of striking Higins, who is black, in the face during a brief confrontation across the street from Faneuil Hall, where the Holocaust remembrance event was being held. Higins then allegedly spit in Chambers' face and hit her with a sign, police said.

Chambers was pulled from the crowd and dragged away by police as she yelled racial epithets. She was not in the designated holding area where the white supremacists staged their protest.

Ten to 15 members of the Arkansas-based White Revolution arrived in downtown Boston about an hour after the start of the event to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Nazi concentration camps and the 10th anniversary of the New England Holocaust Memorial in Boston.

The group was escorted by hundreds of police officers on foot, motorcycle and horseback, to a holding area across from the event.

The officers, many in riot gear, formed a barricade between the protesters and about 100 people who angrily shouted at them to leave Boston.

—Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING
VELVET REVOLVER STOPS AT UMASS
Alternative groups rock at the Mullins Center on Wednesday.
PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
A DIFFERENT PERSPECTIVE
An exchange student voices the stereotypes she has encountered.
PAGE 5

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H67°
TONIGHT Cloudy, L32°
TOMORROW Sunny, H76°, L48°

SPORTS
CHAMPIONS!!!
UMass beats Rutgers to win its third ECAC championship in lax.
PAGE 12

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marinelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Matthew Reid
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Loxley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Promotions Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brimser
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently funded, operating on advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967, The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call weekdays between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Peter Foundas

Photo Technician
Alex Demosthene

Copy Editor
Matt Elder

Production Supervisor
Samantha M. Nielsen

Production Staff
Jamieson Melbourne, Kait Rowe

Ex-Clinton finance director faces trial

By Paul Chavez
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Campaign donations made more than four years ago at a celebrity-studded Hollywood gala have led to a federal criminal trial against a former finance director for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton that could hamper her future campaigns.

The trial set to open Tuesday focuses on a lavish August 2000 political party at a Tony Brentwood estate that drew dozens of A-list guests and performers, including Brad Pitt, Jennifer Aniston, Cher, Diana Ross and Muhammad Ali.

Clinton hasn't been linked to charges that the cost of the event was vastly underreported, but Republicans will be watching for any ammunition they can use against the Democrat, considered an early front-runner for the 2008 presidential nomination.

David Rosen, who was Clinton's finance director during her 2000 U.S. Senate run, faces three counts of filing a false statement. An FBI agent speculated in an affidavit that Rosen was trying to duck federal financing rules so the campaign would have more money to spend on other expenses.

Rosen pleaded not guilty in January. He could face up to 15 years in prison and $750,000 in fines if convicted.

The party, called a "Hollywood Gala Salute to President William Jefferson Clinton," included both a dinner and a concert. About 350 people accepted invitations to both, which cost $25,000 a couple. About 1,200 people purchased $1,000 tickets just for the concert.

Many people got complimentary tickets and campaign reports never gave a full accounting of the total money taken in. However, organizers reported raising nearly $1.1 million for a joint committee benefiting Hillary Clinton's Senate campaign and the national and state-level Democratic parties.

Rosen, 40, reported the event was underwritten by about $400,000 worth of "in kind" contributions — goods and services provided for free or below cost — but Peter F. Paul, a three-time convicted felon who pleaded guilty in March to securities fraud charges, has told prosecutors he gave the campaign at least $1.1 million for the affair.

Paul has filed a lawsuit claiming he bankrolled the gala on a promise that former President Clinton would become a "goodwill ambassador" for his Internet media company. He is ready to testify against Rosen, according to his attorney, Joseph Conway.

Another of the event's organizers, the man who corralled the celebrities, said Rosen was a "decent person" who faced a devil's choice: risk getting fired by exposing the gala's skyrocketing tab or cover up its true cost.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.)

"David I don't think deserves to go to jail," co-organizer Aaron Tonken said in a recent interview from prison, where he is serving 63 months for unrelated charges of defrauding charities of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Tonken believes the Federal Election Commission should line Hillary Clinton's campaign.

To build its case, the government enlisted Raymond Reggie, a prominent political consultant whose sister is married to U.S. Sen. Edward Kennedy. Prosecutors have not named Reggie, but two sources familiar with the case said he is the "cooperating witness" identified in court documents.

During a secretly recorded conversation with Reggie in September 2002, prosecutors said Rosen made incriminating statements they will introduce at trial. Reggie pleaded guilty last month in Louisiana to unrelated bank fraud charges.

More controversy for Bolton

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The top Democrat on the Senate committee considering the nomination of John R. Bolton as United Nations ambassador scolded Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Saturday for ignoring Democratic requests for additional information about the embattled nominee.

In a curt letter to Rice, Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., reiterated his requests for State Department documents related to charges that Bolton tried to bend or ignore government intelligence findings that did not suit his hard-right ideology.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is scheduled to vote on Bolton's nomination on Thursday. Biden repeated a warning to Rice that Democrats could hold up the vote if they are not satisfied they have investigated Bolton fully.

Biden acknowledged that the State Department sent the GOP-led committee a large number of documents last week from Bolton's four-year tenure as the department's arms control chief. But the documents answered only requests from the committee's Republican chairman, and ignored what Democrats wanted to see, Biden wrote.

"In particular, the unfulfilled portions of the request relate to the nominee's reported efforts, in speeches and testimony, to make statements that went far beyond what the intelligence would support," Biden wrote.

"What I seek to determine is whether these documents demonstrate a pattern of conduct that calls into question the nominee's fitness to serve as U.S. Representative to the United Nations," he said.

A copy of the letter was obtained by The Associated Press.

Biden said that in her public remarks about the Bolton nomination fight last week, Rice implied "that you do not believe you have a duty to respond to requests from the minority."

Biden also complained about a bureaucratic impasse over Bolton's acknowledged pursuit of

Courtesy MSNBC.com

U.N. Ambassor nominee John Bolton names of U.S. officials whose communications were secretly recorded by the National Security Agency.

The new national intelligence chief, John Negroponte, may allow the spy agency to brief some senators next week on Bolton's unusual request for names and details of the secret intelligence intercepts, but it is not clear how many Senators would receive the information or how detailed it would be.

"I recognize that this information is not under your direct control, but it relates to the consideration of the nomination," Biden wrote.

Detroit mayor proposes tax of 2 percent for fast food

By Sarah Karush
Associated Press

DETROIT — Would you like fries with that? Either way, the Detroit city treasury would like a bite.

Faced with a $300 million budget hole, Mayor Kwame Kilpatrick is hoping people in this already heavily taxed city won't mind forking over a few extra cents for their Big Macs and Whoppers.

Kilpatrick wants to ask Detroit voters to approve a 2 percent fast-food tax — on top of the 6 percent state sales tax on restaurant meals. The mayor says consumers will barely notice the extra cents at the cash register, but critics say the tax would unfairly burden the poor and hamper economic development.

"Just tell him we're going to go to Bloomfield Hills to McDonald's if he puts a tax on it," said 16-year-old Ebony Ellis, referring to an affluent Detroit suburb, as she and four friends ate at a Golden Arches in Detroit. The high school classmates eat at McDonald's every day after school because their schedule doesn't leave them time for lunch.

Other cities and states have special taxes on prepared food, and some have tried "snack taxes." In New York, Assemblyman Felix Ortiz has proposed a 1 percent tax on junk food, video games and TV commercials to fund anti-obesity programs.

But if approved, the Detroit tax would be the country's first to target fast-food outlets, the National Restaurant Association said. The tax would apply to anything sold at a fast-food restaurant — even salads.

Opponents have been quick to call it a "fat tax" in this city dubbed the nation's fattest in 2004 by Men's Health magazine. Detroit fell to No. 3 for 2005.

City officials say the proposal, part of the draft budget Kilpatrick presented to the City Council last month, is more about Detroit's financial health than anything else.

Big Macs could be the next item to get taxed in Detroit, Mich. The mayor there wants to implement a 2 percent tax on fast food.

Although the tax would not come close to fixing Detroit's financial problems — officials predict it would bring in $17 million in the next fiscal year — every dollar counts in a city already bracing for mass layoffs and service cuts.

Enacting the tax would likely require a change in state law, potentially a tough sell in the Republican-controlled Legislature. The next hurdle would be persuading Detroit voters.

Young people and senior citizens are big consumers of fast food and would bear an unfair share of the tax's burden, some critics contend.

"It's really going to fall upon poor people harder," said Robert Wassmer, a professor of public policy and economics at California State University, Sacramento.

The restaurant industry says the idea is also unfair to businesses.

"We think it's extremely counterproductive to say to those people who have provided jobs, who have provided growth, 'We're going to levy on you a special tax that we don't levy on anyone else,'" said Andy Deloney of the Michigan Restaurant Association.

But Kilpatrick insists an additional 2 percent — a nickel on a $2.50 Big Mac — would have little effect on the pocketbooks of the average resident or the competitiveness of Detroit eateries.

And the fact is, there aren't many options.

"With Detroit, you're kind of grasping at straws because the tax base is so tapped into," Wassmer said.

The city currently has five major revenue streams: state revenue sharing, an income tax, property taxes, a tax on its three casinos and a utility tax.

Michigan law limits Detroit's ability to raise income and property taxes, and high taxes are already cited as a major reason people and businesses have fled the city, further depleting the tax base.

In a study by the District of Columbia comparing Washington and the nation's biggest cities in 2003, Detroit had the 10th-highest tax burden for a family of four with an income of $75,000. State and local taxes combined totaled 11 percent, according to the study.

Bring these back and get pennies on the dollar.

Bring these back and get $250 in discounts on travel, DVD movies, software, and more!

Here's all you need to do:

> Return your Comcast cable box, remote, and/or Comcast-provided modem to your local Comcast Payment Center (visit www.comcast.com to find the Payment Center near you).

> Go to www.comcast-ne.com/students and register for your $250 rewards card.

> When you receive your rewards card via mail, you'll have exclusive access to a website marketplace with tons of deals, including travel, DVD movies, magazines, software, and more! It's that simple!

Comcast.

A special message for state employees

YOU DON'T BUY A NEW CELL PHONE WITHOUT COMPARING FEATURES. THIS IS YOUR HEALTH.

Study The Plans.

If you're an employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, you have until May 13 to select your health care plan for the coming year. We think you should know there are more factors you ought to consider in making that choice than just the monthly deduction from your paycheck, factors like whether a plan will steer you away from your community hospital and the doctors you and your family know and trust. This is about your health, after all. It's in your best interest to take a close look at your options, because if you don't know what you're signing up for, you could be surprised later to learn that you've picked a plan that's wrong for you and your family.

We've put together a chart that we hope will provide an easy basis for comparing the various plans available to you. This chart is designed to spell out what each plan does and does not offer. We encourage you to pay close attention to column three, which shows the level of access each plan offers to your community hospital, Cooley Dickinson. You should also take a close look at column four, which shows whether each plan offers full access to the major medical centers in Boston.

Health Plan (including basic life insurance)	Unrestricted Choice[2]	Access to Cooley Dickinson Hospital	Access to Major Boston Hospitals	Monthly Employee Premium Contribution[1,4]
Commonwealth Indemnity Community Choice Plan	○	●	◐	Individual: $74.80 Family: $172.95
Commonwealth Indemnity Plan with Catastrophic Illness Coverage	●	●	●	Individual: $148.64 Family: $337.61
Commonwealth Indemnity Plan without Catastrophic Illness Coverage	●	●	●	Individual: $120.77 Family: $272.97
Commonwealth Indemnity Plan PLUS	○	●	◐	Individual: $88.15 Family: $203.19
Harvard Pilgrim POS	●[5]	●	●	Individual: $86.29 Family: 207.07
Health New England	○	◐[6]	◔	Individual: $68.37 Family: $167.78
Navigator PPO by Tufts Health Plan	○	◐[7]	◐	Individual: $82.90 Family: $199.04

● Yes
○ No
◐ With patient deductible based on tiering plan. Access to many services at some hospitals may carry a higher patient co-pay.
◔ Only if prior authorization is granted by Health New England. If authorization is granted, there is a $200 inpatient deductible.

1. The Fallon and Neighborhood plans, which are available to state workers, have been left off this chart because they are not in the Cooley Dickinson service area.
2. A no icon (empty circle) in this column indicates a plan that uses tiered co-payments to steer patients to certain hospitals, or that otherwise restricts members' ability to choose the hospital at which they receive treatment.
3. The rates on this chart are intended to be representational. These specific rates apply to employees hired on or before 6/30/05 who earn $30,000 or more a year. For a plan-by-plan breakdown showing your rates, visit our Web site, www.cooley-dickinson.org
4. You must make your annual enrollment decisions based on current contribution percentages, knowing that these could change after the Commonwealth's annual budget is finalized.
5. Requires a $400 inpatient co-pay at all hospitals.
6. Tiering system requires highest co-pays for all inpatient, MRI and CAT Scan services at Cooley Dickinson.
7. Tiering system requires lowest co-pay for OB/GYN services, middle co-pay for pediatrics, and highest co-pay for adult medical/surgical services at Cooley Dickinson.

The state offers its workers plans that don't have tiering systems. It also offers tiered plans that support getting your care at Cooley Dickinson. You do not have to sign on to a plan that steers you away from your community hospital. We encourage you to make an informed decision on this important matter. To learn more about your health care plan choices, talk to your plan administrator, or talk to us or your health care provider. Visit our Web site, www.cooley-dickinson.org or call us at (888) 554-4CDH (4234).

You can choose a plan that steers you to Springfield, or one that lets you decide with your doctor if you'd do better at Cooley Dickinson and/or the major Boston medical centers. Why leave it up to them?

Making a great community better.

Cooley Dickinson Hospital
Dartmouth-Hitchcock Alliance

30 Locust Street ✦ Northampton, Massachusetts ✦ (413) 582-2000 ✦ www.cooley-dickinson.org

A special message for state employees

The Less We See Of You, The Better

Choose A Health Plan That Helps You Stay Healthy

If you're an employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts getting ready to choose your health plan for the coming year, you need to know that some of the plans on your menu will make it more expensive for you to get treatment at Cooley Dickinson. You also might find that you have to switch doctors if you select one of those plans. We urge you to take a close look at what you're signing up for before the May 13 deadline.

It's not that we're anxious to see you at Cooley Dickinson. In fact, the way we see it, one of our most important jobs is to make sure you spend as little time here as possible. Keeping people healthy (and out of the hospital) is a major part of our mission as a community hospital. Another is making sure you're well cared for when circumstances do bring you to the hospital.

At Cooley Dickinson, we are committed to meeting the most critical needs of the friends, neighbors and family members who are our patients. We believe the top criteria in our mission are quality, cost and access.

QUALITY

• Cooley Dickinson has higher nurse staffing and puts more nurses at the bedside. Unique and recognized nurse recruitment efforts have allowed CDH to reduce agency use of staff, and recruit and retain qualified nurses. Studies show that putting more nurses at the beside translates to better patient outcomes.

• Cooley Dickinson focuses on preventive care. For example, we fund a congestive heart failure program for patients after hospitalization, keeping patients healthy and out of the hospital at our expense. We also fund exercise and diet interventions in primary schools to prevent early onset diabetes and other diseases.

COST

• At Cooley Dickinson, we keep your overall health care costs down by focusing on keeping you healthy. Our hospitalization rates are among the lowest in the commonwealth. And average hospital stays here are shorter than they are elsewhere. HMOs tell us that our approach results in lower health care costs per member per month. All of this improves the health of greater Hampshire County residents.

• By keeping you out of the hospital we not only reduce your need for hospital care, but also decrease disruption of your personal and work life, keeping your expenses down and reducing potential lost wages.

ACCESS

• People choose to live in our region because of the quality of life here. And part of what brings them here is knowing they will have access to great health care.

• Cooley Dickinson services – diagnostic imaging, blood and specimen testing, rehabilitation services – are available at the Amherst Outpatient Center as well as at the hospital in Northampton. Other services are available at sites throughout the region.

• Your doctor, and the doctors closest to you, are affiliated with Cooley Dickinson. We provide access to a broad network of local physicians.

• If you or a family member requires hospitalization at Cooley Dickinson, you have access to our comprehensive network of physicians and specialists. Our patients also have the benefit of being treated close to home and family, which studies show results in shorter recovery times.

The state offers its workers many plans that do not hinder your access to Cooley Dickinson. You do not have to sign on to a plan that steers you away from your community hospital. We encourage you to make an informed decision on this important matter. Talk to us or your health care provider before you choose a plan. Visit our Web site, www.cooley-dickinson.org or call us at (888) 554-4CDH (4234) for more information.

You can choose a plan that steers you to Springfield, or one that lets you decide with your doctor if you'd do better at Cooley Dickinson and/or the major Boston medical centers. Why leave it up to them?

Making a great community better.

COOLEY DICKINSON HOSPITAL
DARTMOUTH-HITCHCOCK ALLIANCE

30 LOCUST STREET ✦ NORTHAMPTON, MASSACHUSETTS ✦ (413) 582-2000 ✦ www.cooley-dickinson.org

Dining Services wins award

DC AWARD from page 1

Martha Monaghan, the Special Events manager of the dining services, has been working at UMass for 36 years now. Monaghan explained, "the contest is like a scrapbook of everything the dining halls do all year and we are very proud."

For many workers such as Luanne Herrick, who is both a chef and acting assistant manager, the past five years have been a long wait for this victory. They have repeatedly watched UMass enter this program and never take home first place. "It's exciting that we got over the hump of it and be able to finally come in first place," said Herrick.

One of the things that the dining halls did differently this year was add mystery shoppers, student ambassadors, student greeters, and entertainment to the dining halls. The mystery shoppers and student ambassadors fill out suggestion cards and give the dining halls advice about what could be done differently.

Toong explained that the mystery shopper is something that not a lot of schools have implemented yet, and he feels this is something that gave UMass an edge over their competitors. When students were asked about the recent awards, there seemed to be mixed feelings about it.

Freshman Kristen Clark from Marblehead usually eats at the Hampshire Dining Hall in Southwest. "I don't mind the food, but I don't think it's excellent, they always seem to have the same things," she said. "UMass doesn't compare to other schools I have been to."

Toong explained that he feels students want more of a restaurant type atmosphere when they are eating in the dining halls, this is one of the things he wants to work toward in the upcoming years.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

UMass Dining Services Director Ken Toong takes a bite out of a pretzel after winning a Superbowl bet in February.

Brett Sweeney, a junior at UMass from Lawrence, lives in the Southwest Residential Area and has an unlimited meal plan.

"I think they are alright, they are not for everyone, but I enjoy them personally," he said of the dinning hall food. Sweeney added that out of all of the dining halls he prefers Worcester.

Gina Sanders is a sophomore at UMass from California. She usually eats at both Hampshire, where she likes the dinners, and Franklin where she likes the lunches. "I don't hate eating in the dining halls, but it's not something I enjoy either," she said. "I don't like sushi or anything like that, so I just try and stick to the main meals."

Toong's plans for this upcoming year include renovating the Berkshire Dining Hall located in Southwest. At the end of the fall 2005 semester he will close the dining hall down for renovation and reopen it in August.

"I believe a good dining program can help enhance campus life, we need to continue having new menus, and adding things to the dining halls like entertainment. We want to give the students what they want."

He hopes to have new lighting installed, new food concepts and a different set up for the food. Toong is planning on expanding the salad bar and giving the students more of a presentation when they have their food made. He wants to have more chefs doing the cooking or baking right in front of the students.

After Berkshire is done he plans on renovating both Hampshire in Southwest and Franklin in Central. Toong eventually wants all the dining halls to be as updated as Worcester in Northeast.

N.C. Pastor apologizes after attempting to remove members

By PAUL NOWELL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WAYNESVILLE, N.C. — Calling it a "great misunderstanding," the pastor of a small church who led the charge to remove nine members for their political beliefs tried to welcome them back Sunday, but some insisted he must leave for the wounds to heal.

The Rev. Chan Chandler didn't directly address the controversy during the service at East Waynesville Baptist Church, but issued a statement afterward through his attorney saying the church does not care about its members' political affiliations.

"No one has ever been voted from the membership of this church due to an individual's support or lack of support for a political party or candidate," he said.

Nine members said they were ousted during a church gathering last week by about 40 others because they refused to support President Bush. They attended Sunday's service with their lawyer and many supporters.

Chandler noted their presence in his welcome to the congregation, saying, "I'm glad to see you all here. ... We are here today to worship the Lord. I hope this is what you are here for."

But Chandler's statement and his welcome didn't convince those members, who were voted out, that things would soon change, and some called for him to resign.

"This all started over politics and our right to vote for whoever we wanted to," said Thelma Lowe, who has been attending the church for 42 years. She and her husband Frank, a deacon at the church for 35 years, were among those voted out.

"Things will never be the same here until he leaves," she said.

The ousted members have said Chandler told them during last year's presidential campaign that anyone who planned to vote for Democratic nominee Sen. John Kerry needed to leave the church in the mountain town about 125 miles northwest of Charlotte.

"He needs to leave," said Marlene Casey, 42, a lifelong member. "A lot of blood, sweat and tears have been shed by the people he told to leave."

Added Lewis Inman, a deacon at the church who said he was voted out Monday: "He could have apologized and made everything right. He's not man enough."

Chandler invited all church members to attend a business meeting on Tuesday. "This should all be cleared up by the end of the week," he said in an interview after the service.

Chandler said he and his wife have received calls from around the nation — some of them threatening — since his politics in the pulpit made national news.

His actions also drew criticism from other Baptist clergymen in the town.

"This is very disturbing," the Rev. Robert Prince III, who leads the congregation at the nearby First Baptist Church, said Saturday. "I've been a pastor for more than 25 years, and I have never seen church members voted out for something like this."

Some members of his congregation, however, voiced their support for Chandler on Sunday.

"He's a wonderful, good old country boy," Pam Serafin said as she walked into the church. "There are always two sides to every story."

CHERRY HILL GOLF COURSE
Rt. 63 North Amherst
256-4071
COLLEGE SEASON PASS - $350
COLLEGE FRESHMAN - $175
GOOD THROUGH THE ENTIRE 2005 GOLF SEASON.
STUDENT DISCOUNT ON GREEN FEES.
THE HARP
Irish Pub
Provides food and beverage.

Spring Specials
$5 OFF Style Haircut
$15 OFF Any Foil Highlite
*With Andrea Only
Starting at $30
FREE Eyebrow Waxing
With any other salon service
Exclusively at: 549.5610
Styles by Deborah
65 University Drive, Amherst (413) 549-5610
Now also featuring hairstyling, manicures, pedicures and body waxing.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

MONDAY, MAY 9, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The souls of yellow folk – our pseudo imagination

This is part two of a three part series.

Grace Chen

Let us recede to the time when people thought Earth was flat.

Cosmo, the Christian monk who came up with the first world map, said that the world is a flat parallelogram. He explained that the earth is twice as broad as it is from east to west, in comparison from the north to the south.

We shall now move on temporarily.

The myth about Singapore being a part of China was finally re-vealed to the Unites States two weeks ago on the Oprah Winfrey Show.

I was so determined to not even miss a glimpse of my country on television that I sat glued to the black box even before the "Around the World" series begun. The series showcased the lifestyles of a variety of women from different countries.

The segment on Singapore had once again relied classically on a very common angle of portraying my country as one with nothing else but strict laws.

I was anticipating certain high profile Singaporean celebrities like Fann Wong (who played Jackie Chan's sister in the movie, Shanghai Knights) to maybe sashay down Boat Quay and show off the Merlion. The Merlion is a very prominent local statue of a lion with a fish tail. It is Singapore's very own version of the Statue of Liberty.

I was also expecting Oprah Winfrey to showcase Orchard Road, the epicenter of every woman's destination when in need of retail therapy — a shopping hub. More imperatively though, I felt without a doubt that omnipotent Winfrey would point out to the world that Singapore is situated on the tip of the Malay Peninsula and, not somewhere in China (as mistaken by many of my American counterparts).

I was right, but only to a certain extent. I screamed for a retake at the end of the show.

The segment on Singapore had once again relied classically on a very common angle of portraying my country as one with nothing else but strict laws; one that fines people for chewing gum, for not flushing the toilet after use and for spitting in public.

With reference to Cosmo's world map again, imagine the reaction of people when they were informed that the earth is flat. I tried picturing myself as one of them and my reaction was an adverse one when my own mother informed me of this fallacious piece of information. I told her that if that was the case, then I would be contented to stay put at our tiny three-room flat, as venturing out would just be too risky.

People tend to fictionalize reality in their heads from the limited information they get.

I remember after telling one colleague at the UMass bakery that Singapore does practice the punishment of sentencing people to death should they be carrying heroine that exceeds the weight of a quarter coin. In response, he went around telling the rest of my workmates that my country hung pickpockets.

On another occasion, I had a friend exclaiming, "Oh, I know Sing-apore!"

"I remember the Michael Fay incident."

"Your country caned him just for spitting out chewing gum?" he asked.

Of course, this worked the other way around too. I remember before I set off for my exchange here to America, I had the impression that I was venturing into a color-hating, gun-fighting, pick-pocketing country. Obviously now, I realized that would barely be a proper definition at all.

My pseudo imagination of the United States was mostly a result of Hollywood movies and dramas. After watching "Cold Case" and "The Texas Chainsaw Massacre," I decided I needed to spend some time on "googling" for "things I should take note of" about the U.S. before I set off. The searches returned results that advised one to not walk near the roads nor the buildings when one is on the sidewalks; to never stand behind a car, to always walk as quickly as possible and to always carry two wallets (a bogus one, just in case) in their bags.

I told my mother about all these findings, and the evening before I left for the United States, she stashed me with $200 and told me to get some pepper spray as soon as I reached the JFK airport.

Our pseudo imagination usually locks us in our trifling mindsets, making us think off beam on certain subjects. This would include how fortunate we are for not being in any other part of the world, where chewing gum would carry a jail sentence or where gun wars and rapes happen habitually in broad daylight. Therefore, I'm glad I tried to find out more. What about you?

Grace Chen is an international student at the University of Queensland in Australia. She is doing a study abroad program with UMass and will return to her country, Singapore, at the end of the semester.

Enlightenment through education

Ramzi Kanazi

For most of my life I cared little for politics, distancing myself from anything that even remotely resembled "the news," especially newspapers. I had way more important things to do. Besides, who wants to waste their time reading about all the terrible occurrences in the world? Those can stick with you — not to mention the residue of the paper — after you finish reading it. It's too bad that we can't just forget the events in the newspaper as easily as we can wipe the residue off.

Sometimes the news and politics just come to you. They're on television, the Internet, in magazines and worst of all, people talk about them. Who wants to talk about politics? Like Brittany Spears is pregnant (I think). You see, there are way more important things to talk about.

Well, eventually, the news sucked me in. Around the start of the second intifada (Sept. 2000), the description for the current situation in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, I remember hearing about the "brutality of the Palestinians." Now, I grew up in America as an American, but in heritage, I'm Palestinian. I never really thought too much about it, but I began to wonder about those brutal people, so I looked to the news to learn a little more. I will get to that shortly, but first, I would like to explain my position.

I was raised with some ideas about Palestine. My family explained that we used to live there. We used to have orange groves, but after the war in 1948 and the creation of the state of Israel, we were forced to leave. I thought it kind of sucked, but I didn't care very much; who needs oranges when you have Nintendo?

During the first Gulf War, I remember how patriotic my town was. Everyone tied yellow ribbons around anything they could find. Even pets wore yellow ribbons, and I wanted one too. The radio constantly broadcasted Arab jokes, and my friends told them — in front of me. I laughed, uncomfortably, but I did not feel like ostracizing myself. Besides, I did not know too many Arabs, and I am American.

As a freshman in high school, an upperclassman asked me about my heritage, and I responded that I am Palestinian. Then he asked if I wanted to throw him into the sea. I thought, "Why would I want to do that?" He is Jewish, and apparently, all Palestinians want to throw the Jews into the sea. I wished to have nothing to do with my heritage.

We used to have orange groves, but after the war in 1940 and the creation of the state of Israel, we were forced to leave. I thought it kind of sucked, but didn't care very much; who needs oranges when you have Nintendo?

Then the second intifada started, and the Middle East took the spotlight, again. Those brutal Palestinians were terrorizing innocent Israelis. This time I felt like investigating the matter, so I looked to "the news." Actually, I searched online to get some perspective on the issue, and I learned that many educated people believe that the media was misreporting the events on the ground, that it was the Israelis who fit the description of brutality. It turns out that both sides can determinedly exhibit their brutality, but could one be more wrong or right?

America has strongly supported Israel and its position for most of its existence, and I'm Amer-ican. I wanted a yellow ribbon.

However, as I learned more about the historical context of the conflict, coupled with the fact that my family was expelled from the country, I found difficulty in accepting the American position. While the mainstream media tried to demonize people who threw stones at tanks, it failed to explain that those tanks rolled through Palestinian neighborhoods.

The news offers little coverage of the horrors of Israeli occupation. Soldiers demolish houses with American bulldozers. They kill children with shots to their heads and chests. Palestinians cannot travel freely, and discriminatory laws prevent many diaspora Palestinians from entering Israel or the Occupied Palestinian Territories. The Israeli government is annexing more Palestinian land by building its wall through the territories, and despite Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's, "Gaza pullout plan," illegal settlements continue to expand. International Human Rights groups bemoan the state's practices, and have been since its inception.

The media often illustrate Palestinian brutality, but neglect that Israel has taken nearly everything from them, from land and lives to dignity. Additionally, the government of Israel continues to implement discriminatory policies against them under a façade of security. Israel relies on discriminatory policy, so that it can remain a Jewish state. Otherwise, the indigenous Palestinian population will threaten its "democracy."

To this day when I watch the news, I am reminded of my formative years. I cannot forget, and am constantly reminded of, the media bias and the culture that instilled patriotism and attempted to codify anti-Arab images in my mind, but, with education, I have repositioned my stance on the subject. Now, as an American and a Palestinian, more educated on the Middle East, I have chosen to speak out.

Ramzi Kanazi is a Collegian columnist.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

A THANK YOU FROM THE FIRE DEPARTMENT

We are writing this letter to thank the UMass community of faculty, students and staff for your support. The Amherst Fire Department's Student Force (Engine Co. 3) organized and ran the Boot Drive to support the Muscular Dystrophy Association. With your help, we raised over $2,100 for the MDA. This would not have been possible without generous contributions from all that donated. We raised above and beyond our goals in the three days we collected at the Campus Center (May 3-5). We truly thank you for your support.

Joshua Abbott
Engine Co. 3, AFD

TEXTBOOK PLAN UNORIGINAL

I had to chuckle when I read the article on "Re-thinking textbook buy-backs" featuring the "innovative" idea for a web-based textbook marketplace that James Highsmith came up with. I'm glad he's got the Website running, and it looks great, but the idea is not exactly new. The textbook exchange Website I put together at the University of Texas at Austin while I was a grad student there (texbooks.com) was the first of its kind and predates it by almost a decade.

Emery Berger
UMass Assistant Professor

TIGHTER ADMISSIONS STANDARDS A PLUS

As a UMass alumni and an alumni of the Commonwealth's community college system, I read with interest an article in the Boston Globe regarding the Student Government's concern about UMass admissions standards. Come on guys, everyone benefits from tighter admissions standards at the university's flagship campus. Tougher admission standards, coupled with quality academic performance, improve the reputation and standing of the University. In other words, all of our degrees are of a recognized and respected level of quality.

First, the argument that new admissions standards are unfair to lower income students and students of disadvantaged ethnic backgrounds is erroneous. I am not going to argue that the Commonwealth's secondary education system is necessarily equitable to all students from all backgrounds. But that is where the problem lies. If students are not getting an adequate secondary education such that they cannot qualify for admission to the Amherst campus, then talk to the local school committees or to the legislature.

Dumbing down admissions standards is not the answer. Also, the Commonwealth's community college system is designed to provide a bridge to the universities. If an individual cannot get into UMass on their first try, maybe they should consider the local community college. Not only is it significantly cheaper than UMass, if you complete an associate degree from a state community college with a certain GPA, you are guaranteed admission to UMass.

If you graduate with a 3.0 or better, in most academic programs, you also receive a 30 percent discount on tuition at the state university. So quit complaining. The system may not be perfect but at least you are not in Mississippi. In my opinion we should focus on the fundamentals. If everyone started from an even playing field, then the tougher standards would not even be an issue. So start there. By the way, congratulations to all graduating students. I wish you the best of luck for the future.

Neal Taylor
UMass alumni

A STUDENT APOLOGIZES

I just wanted to take a minute to apologize for my actions last year while on the UMass campus. I acted disorderly after consuming too much alcohol, which ultimately resulted in police action. Believe me when I tell you it was not worth it. Just one night of excessive drinking can have far reaching consequences, so I urge all of you to learn from my mistakes as I sure have.

Alcohol related incidents that stay on your permanent record will affect you for years to come, as future employers will not look very kindly on someone with an alcohol abuse problem. Don't wait until you get in trouble with the law to learn to act responsibly. So as the school year winds down and parties are more abundant, remember that going out and getting drunk can lead to more than a bad hangover.

Kevin McNeil
UMass student

Historical inevitability

Michael Marceline

Texas has now taken its place in the long line of states denying legal recognition of marriage between partners of the same sex. Considering that the Supreme Court only two years ago had to force the state to throw out its medieval anti-sodomy laws, it is surprising that Texas was not the first state to enact such legislation.

Meanwhile, here in Massachusetts, proponents of equal protection under the law are working to strengthen the marriage rights of same sex couples.

America is not a single society, never has been, never will be. Every city, country, state and region has its own social structure and is more or less advanced on the societal evolutionary ladder.

To do so, they are overturning an antiquated law that was passed to protect other states from the unseemly prospect of having to recognize bi-racial marriages hastily consecrated in one or another of the many Boston drive-thru chapels. Mitt "Guy Smiley" Romney has threatened to use this law against same sex couples from other states seeking to marry in Massachusetts.

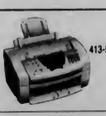
Plus, in the last election, voters elected even more representatives who support same sex marriage to the state legislature, judging by the sides taken in the present social battles by different states. John Edwards's assertion of yesteryear that there are two Americas seems undeniably correct. There's the America of the Texas (R) and the America of the Massachusetts (D), right? Wrong. Actually, the number of Americas that exist are innumerable and borders do not limit them. America is not a single society, never has been, never will be. Every city, county, state and region has its own social structure and is more or less advanced on the societal evolutionary ladder.

It just happens that with nearly 400 years of civilization under its proverbial belt, New England is the older, wiser region in this nation. It also helps that the region is, by and large, richer and more developed than the South. The South, unfortunately, had the nasty job of cleaning up after a messy little Civil War not too long ago and their social stratum before the war was clearly delineated between "patricians" and "plebeians" and the Mid West where the farming industry has been in decline for decades.

This is not to say that there are not cities, regions and counties in these just as advanced or that there aren't underdeveloped areas in the Northeast. The point is that all of America's societies simply need time to catch up socially and economically. Once they do, same sex marriage will be legal in every state. It may, in fact, take just a generation. When those who are college-aged now are running this country, the controversy surrounding equal marriage rights will seem like a sick joke.

Actually, it should seem like sick joke now. Societies evolve institutions for survival. Marriage has been a survival tool to propagate the species. Imagine the earth 5,000 years ago when the human race was a wee tyke riding around the plains of Africa on its stone wheeled tricycle. Can you imagine a pregnant female left to fend for herself? She'd be lion food in about five seconds. So, our species developed a little instinct called love.

Sexual acts became about not just reproduction, but bonding. This bonding kept partners together so the man could assist the woman who was limited by the extra weight and responsibility that came with carrying and caring for children. Today we are forced to survive, not in the wild world of beasts, but in the vicious capitalistic system. We need partners, not only to satisfy our desire to be loved, but to team up financially for economic survival.



Homosexuality has always existed among humans and many other animals. It is not going away and it is not some decadent lifestyle choice, but an intrinsic quality. So, to rail against its existence and to resist the evolution of a social institution in the face of social change is, at best, futile and at worst, detrimental to the fabric of society.

Michael Marceline is a UMass student.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

editorial@dailycollegian.com

413-545-3699

Letters to the Editor
113 Campus Center
Amherst, MA 01003

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

MONDAY, MAY 9, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Early into Velvet Revolver's nearly two hour set at the Mullins Center on Tuesday night, a black curtain dropped down from behind the drums to reveal a huge sign that read "Rock & F—in' Roll". Just prior to that, frontman and former Stone Temple Pilots singer, Scott Weiland, announced that the night was all about, well, "Motherf—ing rock'n'roll." And as the band ripped through a blistering set that contained nearly all of their debut album, "Contraband," as well as a few choice covers, it was perfectly clear that Velvet Revolver had hit the mark. Of course, few in the audience expected less; along with Weiland, the band is comprised of Slash, Duff McKagan and Matt Sorum, better known as the backing band of Guns 'n' Roses, and second guitarist Dave Kushner, who has bounced around between many bands during his career.

Though unlikely, the pairing of Weiland — who comes from one of the bands that defined the grunge revolution that was the antithesis of decadent stadium rock — and the band that backed Axl Rose — the man most representative of the pre-grunge rock scene — works surprisingly well. From the first notes of the opening song, "Sucker Train Blues," the band was full of unrelenting energy and an obvious joy to be on stage.

Though Velvet Revolver may be a big-name stadium rock act, they seem to care much more about the music itself than most bands that make it to that level. This may be bombastic radio rock but it's certainly not one-dimensional "corporate rock."

While the musicianship, especially Slash's fiery solos and huge riffs, is not to be overlooked, on closer inspection it is Weiland's energy and lyrical depth that really makes Velvet Revolver something special. However, it is odd that Weiland himself seems to be the first to downplay the seriousness of his subject matter. An infamous recovering drug addict who has also struggled with alcohol and has nearly seen his marriage crumble, Weiland dedicated "Superhuman" to "Sex, drugs, rock 'n' roll and you nasty ladies." Sound like a fist-pumping anthem? Well, musically it is, but the chorus is a simple, blunt statement about the pain of the generic rock lifestyle: "Cocaine, alcohol, lady-lay, withdrawal." Doesn't sound as much fun as Weiland's description.

While the ballad "Fall To Pieces," which is dominated by a very Guns 'n' Roses-sounding guitar line, was the requisite "sensitive" moment of the set, which was otherwise dominated by hard rockers, most of Weiland's lyrics are set in a similar tone. Whereas Stone Temple Pilots wrapped Weiland's struggles in either dirty grunge or delicately psychedelic pop, Velvet Revolver has determined that scuzzy arena-rock provides the best balance. While there is no use comparing the bands, Velvet Revolver is on to something; meatheads can mosh and throw up devil signs to the deafeningly loud music and people looking for something more can find it in Weiland's often cryptic lyrics.

While the band's combination of styles and moods seemed to please the crowd, a lot of the biggest cheers came when Velvet Revolver dipped into their respective back catalogues. Early into the set, the STP classic "Crackerman" was played to great delight. Later on, the Guns 'n' Roses rocker "It's So Easy" was met with an even higher level of elation. And though an encore performance of the Guns 'n' Roses song "Mr. Brownstone" was met with cheers and applause, it was the STP song "Sex Type Thing" that seemed to get the greatest reaction. The particularly epic rendition found Weiland making his way up to the stands, surrounded by security, of course, and leading the stadium in a chant of the narrator's predatory mantra: "Here I come, I come, I come, I come."

Covers aside, the band proved to be well-loved, as the crowd sang along to all the songs, including standouts like "Big Machine," "Do It For The Kids," and "Dirty Lil' Thing." It was in these songs especially that the juxtaposition of Weiland's vulnerable, confessional lyrics and the madcap energy of the music and the performers created a very unique and special atmosphere. Following "Set Me Free," the song that introduced the world to Velvet Revolver, the band left the stage before returning for an acoustic performance of Pink Floyd's "Wish You Were Here" and their own song "You Got No Right," which, with its subtle instrumentation, sounds like it would be more at home alongside Weiland's solo work the released the trippy, underrated "12 Bar Blues" in 1998. Following another encore break, the band took the stage once again to perform "Mr. Brownstone" and their hit single "Slither," and the band indeed went out with a bang.

There was one weak spot in the night, however, aside from the aforementioned instance of Weiland seemingly disavowing his own lyrics, which came shortly before Velvet Revolver took the stage. While rock shows have long been tied to corporate sponsorship and other blatantly un-rock-'n'-roll activity, the organizers of the tour have very possibly hit a new low in advertising. Right before Velvet Revolver took the stage the hanging video screens began to flash images that shortly materialized into a 5-minute advertisement for Robbie Knievel's new show. The fact that the booming music behind it was Velvet Revolver, and the fact that the song was "Sucker Train Blues," which the band would start playing just a few minutes later, was more Spinal Tap funny then irritating.

While concertgoers have had to suck down subtler — and even not-so-subtle — advertisements, the practice of airing an actual commercial before a show is deplorable and very anti-rock. Velvet Revolver may not be indie-art-punks starting a revolution but nonetheless, they should be far above this type of corporate shilling. While the band's claim to be real rock music was backed up by great songs and a great performance, this sort of lame tie-in definitely put a dent in their bid for authenticity.

'Prince of Darkness' chronicles the days of Ozzy Osbourne

By Patrick Rennick
Collegian Staff

In general, musical compilations are meant to give an impression or summary of an artist's career. In addition, these collections generally reinforce a positive image of the artist. Unfortunately, this does not apply to Ozzy Osbourne. Although "Prince of Darkness," the newest compilation from the former Black Sabbath vocalist, sums up the Ozzman's career quite well, it also brings to light a genuine representation of his later years.

Ozzy Osbourne
'Prince of Darkness'
Epic Records

Over the course of Ozzy's extensive career, he has fronted what many argue was the most influential heavy metal band of all time. He also led an impressive solo career with a slew of noted musicians including Zakk Wylde of Black Label Society, former Faith No More drummer Mike Bordin and the late guitarist Randy Rhodes. Following a long drought in creativity after his initial success in the early '80's and a persisting battle with drug and alcohol abuse, Ozzy began a steady downward spiral, falling out of favor with many longtime fans.

In 1996, Ozzy gained a generous portion of media attention for the beginning of his annual "Ozzfest" tour, featuring the likes of speed-metal kings Slayer, the Brazilian metal ensemble Sepultura, and the former frontman of The Misfits, Glenn Danzig. Ozzy's 2001 release, "Down to Earth," was his first album in six years and was also met with considerable acclaim from the popular music culture. In 2002, Ozzy became something of a pop icon when MTV launched a reality show, "The Osbournes," featuring Ozzy, his wife Sharon, son Jack and daughter Kelly.

"Prince of Darkness" is a 4-disc set that features a diverse range of Ozzy tracks in addition to newly recorded material. A 60-page booklet was also included with the collection featuring several new photos of Osbourne and an overview of his career.

The first two discs of the set contain the classics from Black Sabbath as well as Ozzy's solo efforts. In addition to the familiar songs, "Crazy Train," "Iron Man" and "No More Tears," there are also several demos, unreleased live tracks and B-sides.

The third disc, labeled "Oddities and Duets," is a comprehensive collection of Ozzy's collaborations over the years. Dedicated fans and collectors are sure to get a kick out of some of the more bizarre tracks on the disc, such as the theme song to the reality television show "Dog the Bounty Hunter," a cover of "Born to be Wild" featuring Miss Piggy, and, of course, the awkward rendition of "Staying Alive" by the Bee Gees in which Ozzy shouts, "All aboard the disco train!"

The fourth and final disc in the "Prince of Darkness" set features newly recorded covers of the Ozzman's favorite songs. Keeping with tradition, Ozzy has enlisted the help of several famous musicians, such as former Alice in

See OZZY on page 8

COURTESY OZZYNET.COM

'Prince of Darkness' is a retrospective of the musical mayhem of the infamous Ozzy Osbourne.

Gaming PCs head towards mainstream

By Rex Crum
MarketWatch

When video game player Matt Cerny describes one of his computers, he speaks in the same exuberant language that an auto enthusiast might use for a tricked-out muscle car.

"It has an AMD 2400 2-gigahertz processor, 1 gigabyte of RAM and a 256-megabyte ATI video graphics card," said Cerny, a technician with Geek Squad, a computer support and services shop in Dallas.

The translation for Cerny's geekspeak? His machine is one fast mother.

The PCs used by Cerny, 27, and other gamers aren't built for word processing or sending e-mail. They're also not the kind consumers can easily spot browsing through a Sunday newspaper supplement or a big-box electronics store.

These systems often come in odd colors such as "cyborg green" and "conspiracy blue," and with high price tags: A custom-built model can cost $5,000.

Still, the market for these costly, powerful machines — now dominated by small private firms with such names as Alienware and Voodoo Computer — has gotten the attention of large PC makers such as Dell Inc. and Gateway Inc.

"Dell has recently become a company to watch," said Rob Enderle, president of the Enderle Group, a technology industry research firm. "They purposely designed some new computers for the gaming market."

While PC companies are always trying to expand their customer base, they're not really making a market share play by building machines that aren't appealing to most buyers. Because of their prices, such souped-up computers appeal only to a small segment of users.

One of the main motivations for PC makers is that it gives them a way to test their technology.

"Games are a real benchmark for high-performance PCs," said Ketan Pandya, marketing manager for Dell's Dimension products.

To begin to understand how Dell might profit from a market that is the antithesis of its broad consumer focus, think of the benefit to Ford or Chevrolet when one of its cars wins a NASCAR race.

Consumers like Cerny, who prefer processors made by Advanced Micro Devices to those made by its larger rival, Intel Corp., push PCs to their ultimate performance limits as they play games such as "Doom 3," "Half-Life 2" and "Counter-Strike."

With the growth of the video gaming business, they could be the leading edge of a much bigger market.

"The customers who are into gaming are, obviously, the early (technology) adopters," said Brian Joyce, director of marketing at Miami-based Alienware.

Just as Dell and others are trying to reach gamers, small companies like Joyce's are trying to broaden the reach of their machines. "Much of what we create competes with the major (computer) guys, so we're trying to appeal to the home and office folks," he added.

While gaming PC firms are relatively small in the scheme of the PC market — Joyce estimates Alienware will do $150 million in revenue this year, compared with Dell Inc.'s annual revenue of about $50 billion — the impact of the high-end gaming machine on the computer market is evident in releases from the likes of Dell and Gateway.

Those big companies are taking pains to present their machines as more than for games.

"We think the ability to have a great gaming experience out of the box is important, but these computers are also great for everything else you'd want to do," said Marc Demars, Gateway's senior director of desktop PCs.

Gateway recently added to its gaming PC line with the 7426GX notebook that runs on Advanced Micro Devices' Athlon 64 3700+ processor and costs $1,550. Gateway also moved to drive down the cost of gaming PCs even further with its new eMachines T6212 computer that costs $580 and runs on AMD's Athlon 64 3200+ processor. Both systems also come with ATI Technologies' Radeon graphics processors.

Dell touts its entries into the gaming arena, the $2,999 Dimension XPS desktop, which can carry up to 4 gigabytes of memory and runs graphics processors from either Nvidia Corp. or ATI Technologies, as well as its $2,337 Inspiron XPS notebook, which can potentially have 2 gigabytes of memory.

"We also see these as much more than gaming PCs," said Dell's Pandya.

With such discrepancies in prices and the varied technology inside the case, there's a growing a debate over what really makes a computer a "gaming PC." The definitions and versions of such computers can vary as widely as the systems themselves.

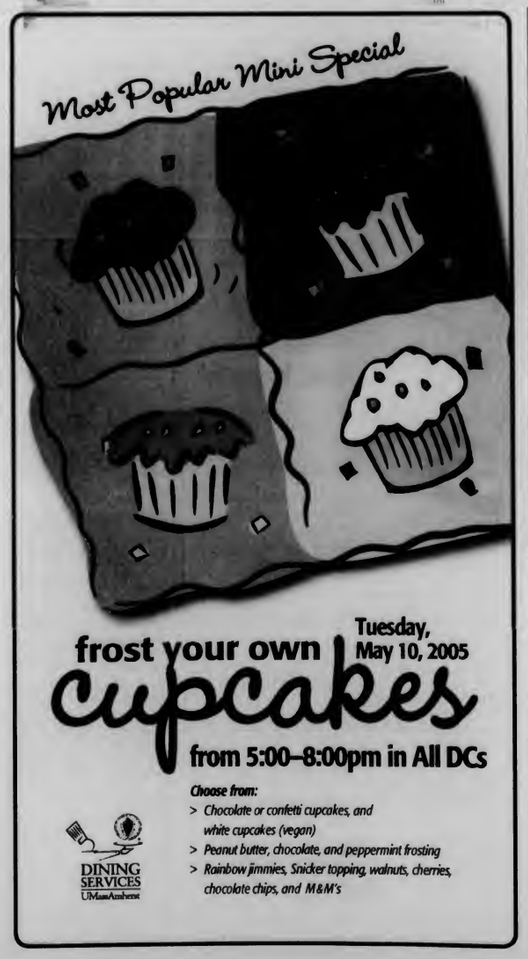
NexTag Inc., a San Mateo, Calif.-based comparison-shopping company, ranks what it calls the "most popular" computers based on a combination of sales and sales leads from reports by its several thousand merchant partners. For NexTag's purposes, a gaming PC has to have a processor speed of at least 3 gigahertz, a minimum of 512 megabytes of RAM and a high-end graphics card, such as those from Nvidia and ATI.

Garth Chouteau, public relations director for NexTag, said that based on the company's criteria, Dell's Dimension XPS machines are the first and fifth most-popular gaming PCs. However, Apple Computer's Power Mac and iMac G5 systems claimed the No. 2, 3 and 4 spots, but Apple doesn't even market those machines as gaming computers.

Industry analysts say branding is what gaming PCs are really all about. How a high-end video game runs on a box is considered an accepted gauge of a computer's performance. By pumping what's under the hood, and demonstrating how well that computer can play a game such as "Doom 3," PC makers can show off their wares and stoke demand for their more-powerful machines.

"It's more of a marketing ploy than anything else," said Brooks Gray, an analyst with Technology Business Research. "The gaming market is relatively small, but PC vendors are trying to capture more of it because they see it as expanding their home entertainment presence."

However, the attempts of the hardware behemoths to carve out a piece of the gaming PC market don't appear to be dissuading the specialty firms from what they see as their mission, driven by pride in providing a one-of-a-kind product.



"I don't buy that a $600 machine is a gaming PC," said Alienware's Joyce. "It's just not nearly as good as what we do. Everybody has something they are willing to pay a premium for, and for most of our clients, that's gaming."

COURTESY ALIENWARE

Big name companies like Dell and Gateway are starting to cater to the high end gaming market dominated by Alienware and Voodoo Computer. PCs in this range can cost as much as $5,000.

Rent One of Ours
No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers
POTTERS
• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks
• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated
at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center
549-RENT (7368)
On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

Recommended by Chef Willie
(PRE-ORDER PLEASE)

Gourmet Box Lunches
Let us prepare your last meal at UMass!

Gourmet box lunch includes:
Signature Sandwich (choices below) on Artisan bread, a bag of Terra Chips, a cup of fresh fruit salad, UMass spring water and a specialty brownie

Chicken Chimichurri
Served on sun-dried tomato bread – grilled chicken breast, baby bib lettuce, vine-ripened tomatoes, roasted red and yellow peppers, caramelized onions, and creamy Asiago mayonnaise.

Beef Chimichurri
Served on sun-dried tomato bread – grilled flank steak, baby bib lettuce, vine-ripened tomatoes, roasted red and yellow peppers, caramelized onions, and creamy Asiago mayonnaise.

Greek Salad Wrap
Wrapped in a soft Spinach Tortilla – marinated eggplant, spinach, cucumber, vine-ripened tomatoes, roasted red and yellow peppers, caramelized onions, black olives, and feta cheese.

Price:
$12.95 each – Bonus: Order 5 sandwiches or more and receive a UMass Commencement Ball Cap valued at $20.00.

How to order:
It is easy. Order online at www.umass.edu/diningservices or call us at (413) 545-2472.

Where to pick up:
Gourmet Box lunches can be picked up at the Stadium Food Court

DINING SERVICES
UMassAmherst

'House of Wax' proves painful for audiences

Cuthbert, Hilton, Murray, Van Holt performances fail to bring experience back to life

By John Snodgrass
The Lantern

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Give the people gore. Lots of it and by the buckets. Give them decapitations, impalings and blood-soaked floors.

This seems to be the thought process behind Hollywood and its recent batch of scary movies. In other words: to hell with legitimate scares, let's just chuck organs on the screen and hope that the audience gets grossed out.

Gross outs aren't scary and neither is "House of Wax."

A "remake" of the 1953 film of the same name starring Vincent Price, "House of Wax" follows a group of college age kids on their way to the biggest college football game of the year. Along the way, one of group's cars runs into trouble and the kids decide to split off into two parties so that some can go to the game and others can fix the car.

Forced to hitch a ride to the closest town, Carly (Elisha Cuthbert) the stereotypical horror film smart girl, and her weenie boyfriend Wade (Jared Padalecki), begin to ponder whether they made the right choice of staying to fix the car.

Upon entering the town (which looks more like a cheesy studio backlot) the two young lovers decide to explore the town's famous House of Wax, while waiting for the town mechanic Bo (Brian Van Holt) to finish attending a funeral. On closer inspection, the two students realize that not only are the amusement house's occupants made out of wax, but the building is as well.

Meanwhile, the rest of their party decides to head back and meet up with Carly and Wade when it becomes evident that traffic is going to keep them from making the game. The two groups now decide to meet back up, fix the car and camp for the night.

When Carly and Wade don't show up at the planned meeting spot, Carly's recluse brother Nick (Chad Michael Murray) and his dimwit friend Dalton (Jon Abrahams) go into town looking for them. This leaves Paige (Paris Hilton), Carly's best friend and her boyfriend Blake (Robert Ri'chard) all alone at the campsite. How cliche.

Then again, this whole film is cliche. It's predictable, drawn out and boring. The majority of the "scares" consist of characters getting cut, gouged, beat, clipped and shot with arrows. It's the carnage over creativity technique and it fails miserably.

This film is poorly acted (in some scenes Hilton is the best thespian), poorly shot, poorly written and poorly directed. It's soundtrack is mind numbing (consisting of nothing but bad rock songs from five years ago) and its only funny moment consists of Abrahams' character filming Hilton in the middle of a "pseudo-sexual act." The movie then abuses this little gag and continues to work in shots consisting of people filming Hilton via a camcorder. It was funny once, all the times afterward are just annoying.

"House of Wax"
Directed by Jaume Serra
Starring Paris Hilton Elisha Cuthbert
Warner Brothers
Rated R
105 mins.

Despite all these problems, this movie is still almost bearable. Almost. It's so stupid and idiotic that it does become comical, but only for very short periods of time. This is enough to keep the film just watchable enough that no one walks out. That all changes however when the movie reaches its "climatic" ending and every ounce of viewability goes out the window.

The last 20 to 25 minutes of this film are horrendous. This film has the most ridiculous and asinine ending since "The Ninth Gate." Watching this thing unfold is more painful then pushing red-hot pokers through your eyes. And about as entertaining. What makes this ending even worse, however, is the fact that the audience sees it coming the entire film.

This movie is a travesty. It should not have been made and it should not be viewed. It is terrible. Dismemberment does not equal horror. It's only there to be shocking and to cover up the fact that no one on this project knows what they're doing (with the exception of the special effects and makeup people).

Do not go see this movie. Do not rent it. If there is a film worth seeing and this movie is being played in the same multiplex, go to a different theater.

'House of Wax' fails to provide audience with entertainment despite plentiful gross-outs and teenage horror movie cliches. The movie premiered this past weekend to a negative critical response.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY
COLLEGIAN
Is Looking For a
Bright,Talented,
Multitasking
Wizard!

Now Accepting Applications For:
'HUMAN RESOURCES MANAGER'
*Freshmen and Sophomores preferred
*Great Resume Builder
*8.5 hours per week
Applications Available in Room 113 Campus Center Basement. Attn: Sandra Marquez
-Please Bring Resume-

CLOTHING SALE!
TONS OF GREAT CLOTHING FOR GUYS & GIRLS FROM SOME OF THE HOTTEST RETAILERS.
"Brand Named"
Jeans, Shirts, Tees, Shorts, Jackets, Accessories
&
so much more!!
Located at
University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom
May 9th-12th
Monday-Wednesday 9am-9pm
Thursday 9am-3pm
Everything from $5-$20
(first quality, irregulars,returns)
COME BY & CHECK IT OUT!!
VISA MASTERCARD & CASH ACCEPTED
presented by
Retail Sales 101, llc.

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE
UMASS, AMHERST
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Hit the books, then hit the beach!
Looking to get ahead in your course work? Short on credits and need to catch up? Or just looking for something satisfying to do this Summer? A MassBay Summer Session course is the way to go!
• Day and evening classes start May 31st & July 5th
• Affordable resident cost is $136 per credit
• 5- or 10-week courses
• A great way to earn college credits quickly
• Credits are transferable to your school! (When you are a university or college student, or incoming college freshman)
• Wellesley, Framingham, and Ashland
Don't sweat it.
Check out MassBay's Summer Session Courses in:
Business
EMT
English
Health
History
Lab Sciences (such as Anatomy & Physiology, Biology, Microbiology)
Math
Social Sciences
and other transferable courses!
Classes meet Monday-Thursday so there's plenty of time left for other Summer activities.
To register or obtain additional information, call 781-239-2703.
Call MassBay today at 781-239-2703 or go to www.massbay.edu
MassBay Community College
Start here. Go anywhere.

Osbourne begins to show age

OZZY from page 6

Chains guitarist Jerry Cantrell, former Mountain guitarist Leslie West, and pedal steel wizard Robert Randolph, among others. Some of these covers work surprisingly well, such as King Crimson's, "21st Century Schizoid Man" and a metallic rendition of Mountain's, "Mississippi Queen." Yet, others, such as John Lennon's "Working Class Hero" and the Rolling Stone's "Sympathy for the Devil" are simply not up to par.

In his later years, Ozzy Osbourne has gone from a revered heavy metal godfather to a tired ghost of a legend. "Prince of Darkness" outlines this transformation quite well. While there is certainly some interesting material lying within this compilation, after the second disc there is hardly any musical merit to speak of, making "Prince of Darkness" more of a novelty than a meaningful release.

Looking to express yourself?
THE ART INSTITUTE OF BOSTON AT LESLEY UNIVERSITY
IN 2005!

NAILS
Walk-ins Welcome
Summer Special!
$5 off any manicure or pedicure*
expires August 1
*with coupon only

LaFogg and Busa shine

SOFTBALL from page 12

collected on the day. Sulick then followed with a double to right-center. Proctor stopped at third, but was able to score when the cut-off throw got away from the second baseman.

Senior Jasmine Edwards then walked and sophomore Candice Molinari drove in a run with a single over the shortstop's head. A failed suicide squeeze attempt by senior Hilary Puglia resulted in the first out of the inning. With Puglia at first and Molinari at third, UMass pulled off the first of two successful double steals in the inning.

A groundout by Morin advanced Puglia to third and junior KJ Kelley followed with a walk. Denis drove in two runs with a double to left that was affected by the swirling winds. After freshman Stacy Cullington reached on an error, the final run of the inning was scored on the second double steal.

LaFogg then set the Bobcats down in order in the fifth to secure the mercy-rule win. LaFogg struck out seven on the day to bring her A-10 leading total to 207.

After the Senior Day ceremonies between the two games, Busa took the mound and picked up right where LaFogg left off. She allowed only three walks en route to recording her third career no-hitter.

UMass got on the board with a run in the first. Morin walked with one out and scored when Denis bunted and the throw by Quinnipiac's pitcher sailed over the first baseman's head and into right field. Denis was credited with a hit on the play, extending her hitting streak to 11 games.

In the second, UMass tacked on four more runs to take a 5-0 lead. Proctor led off with a walk, and junior Kristi Stefanoni was hit by pitch to put runners at first and second. Molinari then singled to right and Proctor scored from second. Stefanoni came around to score when the throw got past the catcher.

One batter later, Puglia drilled her 10th home run of the season over the wall in left-center.

Junior pitcher Jenna Busa pitched two no-hitters in a row this weekend, blanking both Rhode Island and Quinnipiac.

UMass went scoreless for the next two innings before scoring three times in the fifth to lock up its second mercy-rule win of the day.

Proctor drew yet another walk with one out, and Busa followed with a single to center. Stefanoni knocked in one run with a double down the leftfield line. Junior Amanda Acampora then came in to pinch-hit, and ended the game with a two-run double to right.

Busa (14-5, 2.11 ERA) finished the regular season at the top of her game, as she went 11-1 in her last 13 starts of the season.

"Jenna is really starting to feel what she needs to do out there," Sortino said. "There aren't too many things that are distracting her from what she needs to do. She's really matured a lot on the mound."

"I had the same feeling that I had on Friday, so that gave me a huge boost of confidence," Busa said. "I basically focused one pitch at a time and I wasn't focused on a no-hitter, so I think that was a key to the success."

On Friday, UMass beat up on URI, with Busa leading the way both at the plate and on the mound.

Busa, who has only been in the batting lineup for two weeks, went 3-for-3 with two home runs and six RBIs in UMass' 9-0 win in the second game. Busa also recorded her first no-hitter of the weekend, allowing five walks in the five inning game.

"When I was warming up I felt really good," Busa said. "Although I had five walks, it was a mixture of bad calls by the umpire and me getting a little frustrated. That didn't hold me back. The madder I got, the harder I was throwing."

In the first game of the day, LaFogg allowed two runs on four hits, while striking out 11.

The offense provided plenty of run support, led by the heart of the order. The 3-4-5 hitters (Kelley, Denis and Cullington) combined to go 9-for-12 with seven RBIs and five runs scored. Kelley homered in each game, raising her team-leading total to 12, one shy of the single-season school record she set last year.

UM seniors dominate in the end

SENIORS from page 12

Sulick, who each had two at bats, two hits and two RBI is their final game at the UMass Softball Complex.

Sulick has been coming up big for UMass as of late, ending a comeback victory with an RBI against Boston University on May 3 and hitting two homers the following day against Boston College. Sulick, who made the transition from west coast to Western MA four years ago is excited to return to California after this season.

"I'm glad to go back to California, but I'm really sad, and its going to be hard. It's been a great class, we've bonded a lot," Sulick said. "Every senior day has been pretty special and it's nice that some of our alumni came back. Every senior day is nice, especially when you win at home."

Denis, who had her best collegiate season in '05, recorded five homers, 35 RBI and a batting average of .363. There is no question about whether Denis is thinking about the post season, but separating from her team is in the back of her mind.

"It will probably hit me, you know, when we finish up at the World Series," Denis said.

For Sortino, she is focused on the post season, but watching her team go has a major impact on her.

"It's hard for me to see them come through and what they grow into and to think that this is their last home game," Sortino said. "I love that they're free and lose, have great pride in their tradition and they really want to pass the legacy on. All of these kids are legitimate contributors so their legacy is our tradition."

UMass scoring burst halts Temple

BASEBALL from page 10

score.

Sophomore Travis Munsey then singled to move Teutken to third and stole second during the ensuing at bat. It was a perfect set up for sophomore Anthony Santos, with runners on second and third. Santos delivered with a base hit to right-center field, scoring both runs and giving the Minutemen a 3-1 lead.

UMass coach Mike Stone cited the team's timely scoring burst.

"We had timely hitting because we came back from behind at the end of the game," Stone said.

Senior Keith Doherty had a solid performance on the mound for UMass, pitching eight innings, allowing five hits and two runs while striking out seven. Junior David Sullivan came in to shut down the Owls for his first save of the season.

The opening game of the series on Saturday was highlighted by Torra's outstanding performance, but early run support from the UMass bats helped to put the game out of reach.

The Minutemen scored one run in the second inning and added to that in the third with three more, all that Torra would need.

The top of the third inning started off with three consecutive singles by the Minutemen. Freshman Ryan Franczek, freshman Bryan Garrity, and senior Jason Twomley recorded the hits, with the final hit by Twomley scoring Franczek. Twomley then stole second and a throwing error by the catcher allowed Garrity to score from third while Twomley moved in behind him. A sacrifice fly scored Twomley and gave UMass a 4-0 lead.

In the second game of Saturday's double-header, the Minutemen scored all of their runs in the fourth inning, but it was not enough to get a win against the Owls.

Santos began the inning with a single through the left side. Franczek walked and Twomley reached on an error to load the bases. Another error by the shortstop allowed senior Curt Szado to reach base and Santos to score. Another error allowed Adamski to reach base while scoring Franczek and Twomley. A groundout by sophomore Matt Weiner scored the fourth and final run for the Minutemen.

Temple scored runs in the second and third innings, and that was plenty for the Owls.

In the bottom of the second inning, Temple's Dan Brady and Dan Lafferty led off with back-to-back singles. The bases were loaded after Frank Nunan was hit by a pitch. A sacrifice fly scored Brady and a single by Justin Cooper put the Owls up 2-0.

In the bottom of the third inning, Temple took a commanding lead, putting four runs on the board with doubles by Lafferty and Nunan.

CASH FOR YOUR BOOKS
Sell the your textbook whether you're done with it or not Receive up to 50% of your purchase price.
Jeffry Amherst College Store
253-3870
Located between La Veracruzana and Jeffery Amherst Bookshop in Downtown Amherst

To the World's Best Customers
Thanks!
You helped UMass Dining Services strike gold.
We were selected by NACUFS (National Association College University Food Services) as the
1st Place Winner
2005 Loyal E. Horton Dining Awards Contest
in the category of
Residence Hall Dining – Multiple Concepts
In addition we were the 2nd Place Winner
in the category of
Residence Hall Dining - Theme Dinner
Halloween Lobster Special
(remember what a fun time we had?)
But wait... the best is yet to come, Go UMass!

UMass takes ECAC crown

MEN'S LAX from page 12

about the top-to-bottom power of the conference, rather than rest on his team's laurels.

"It's great to be champions of the ECAC because the conference is so competitive. Each and every week you go out there you're playing a quality opponent," Cannella said. "You look at it over the course of the season and it's a great accomplishment."

Rutgers and the Minutemen were both without the services of their starting keepers. UMass keeper Bill Schell was out with an injured hand and was on the sidelines with a cast on his right hand. The Scarlet Knights had suspended their All-American goalie Grey Havlichak for violating a team rule.

The Minutemen started sophomore Efosa Guobodia while Rutgers had Tyle Tarrar in the cage.

Both goalies stepped up to the occasion with Guobodia tallying 14 saves and the victory, while Tarrar had 15 including several point blank shots from the UMass attack.

"He did a heck of a job and he's a great leader," Cannella said of Guobodia.

"I was a little bit nervous at first, but the first couple stops that out, you know? You get your first shot you get a save then you can play," Guobodia said.

The Minutemen were in command for most of the game, but the slow down offense the Scarlet Knights played made each offensive possession particularly valuable for UMass. Rutgers only won one quarter when they shut out the Maroon and White 4-0 in the third frame.

UMass put up eight goals in the first half, while Rutgers put up four. The Minutemen would not get on the board again until Morris broke the ice with 11:13 left in the game to put the score at 9-6.

"They just played ball control," Morris said. "We were sitting there, me, Jeff (Zywicki) and Gene (Gene Tundo) and we're like 'are we ever going to get the ball?' It was so slow. Our defense played great, it was a testament to them, but at the same time, they were slow."

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Senior Gene Tundo had an assist in the Maroon and White's 13-7 victory over Rutgers on Saturday.

The Scarlet Knights had some extra incentive to be fired up as Saturday's game against the Minutemen was Senior Day at Rutgers. The Scarlet Knights have nine seniors.

Rutgers senior Robert Morris came out on fire and netted two goals in the first nine minutes of the game to give the Scarlet Knights a 2-0 lead. UMass went on to rattle off three consecutive goals, one from Morris and one from Zywicki.

"It was a hardcore game and Rutgers put up a good effort, we knew they were going to. It was senior day, it was their last game and they wanted to go out on a high note," Reid said. "Last year we came out on our senior day and went out on a high note against them when they were the ranked team."

Right after the game Cannella yelled at his team for arguing with the Rutgers sidelines. After he talked about being "first class" he congratulated his team on the victory.

"We lost our cool there for a second and he was getting fired up at us," Reid said. "He always finishes on a high note and he's really proud of what we've done this season."

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse team poses with the ECAC championship trophy after defeating Rutgers on Saturday. The Minutemen have won the ECAC championship three times, all under Greg Cannella.

Guobodia shines in win

GUOBODIA from page 12

said. "He had his opportunity to step up, and he did. We were confident in him. When Billy went down, we were like, 'Alright now, it's E's turn to go.' He stepped right in and played the way we expected him to play."

Jack Reid, the Maroon and White's defensive leader, agreed but also said the defensive unit wanted to ensure that Guobodia had a triumphant day between the pipes.

"It was a little different [not having Schell in the game], but we got used to it real quick this week," Reid said. "E is a great goalie. He's an intense individual so it was great to have him behind us. The defense wasn't worried at all. We all wanted to step up and make his first start a successful one."

When time on the clock began to wind down in the fourth quarter, Rutgers began to put on more and more pressure and picked up its offensive intensity.

Rutgers cut the score to 9-7 with 10:34 to play, but a four-goal spurt by the Minutemen and timely saves by Guobodia quelled any chance of a comeback, as he stopped three shots in the final 90 seconds and a total of five in the final frame.

"Efosa was solid in the goal," Cannella said. "He made some great saves when we really needed him to."

"I never felt pressure," Guobodia said. "I was confident in the system. I believe in the system, believe in what the coach does. I just go out there and play the game."

It helped that he had a tenured veteran on the sideline to help him out, to. Guobodia took advice from Schell during the game, whether it was advice on clearing the ball or just goaltending in general.

"I've grown up a lot just from watching [Schell], being around him," Guobodia said. "He's definitely like a big brother on the team."

"Billy hurt his hand, so I had to step up. I've been preparing the whole week. Everybody put confidence in me, and that was the biggest thing, confidence."

That, and an ECAC championship riding on the line, at least.

But with that, with all of the pressure, with all of the Division I lacrosse intensity left on the field and with everything else that comes with replacing a legendary goalie in the last game of the regular season, what was the last thing Cannella said to him?

"Coach said, 'Just go play ball, go play ball,' and that's what I did."

He played ball, and he won an ECAC championship while he was at it.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Sophomore goalie Efosa Guobodia recorded his first career win against Rutgers on Saturday.

UMass takes two from Temple

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's baseball team (11-30 5-13 A-10) visited Temple over the weekend and won two of three in the three game series in Philadelphia.

The Maroon and White began the series with a doubleheader on Saturday starting at noon, and the rubber match was Sunday starting at the same time. UMass split the games with Temple on Saturday by winning the first game 5-0 and dropping the second 6-4. The Minutemen took the series on Sunday by beating the Owls 3-2, riding a three-run ninth inning to seal the victory.

UMass will travel to Maine on Tuesday to face the Black Bears and will travel to Central Connecticut State on Wednesday.

The Minutemen picked up their 10th and 11th victories on a weekend that featured a complete game shutout in game one by junior Matt Torra. The performance brought his season earned run average down to a slim 1.13 and gave Torra his third shutout of the season. Torra allowed only three hits while striking out eight and walking none.

In the final game of the series on Sunday, the Minutemen stormed back in the ninth after being down the entire game to steal the victory from the Owls. All three of the UMass runs came in the ninth as the Minutemen picked a good time to catch fire.

Sophomore Bryan Adamski started things in the last frame with a single up the middle. After the second out was made on a fly ball to the outfield, Adamski forced the action and stole second. All freshman Andy Teutken had to do was put the ball in play, as an error by the Owls allowed the tying run to

See BASEBALL on page 9

HEY SENIORS!

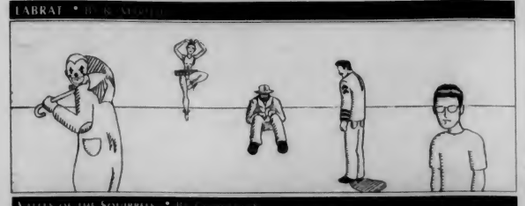
NEED NEW WHEELS TO GET TO THAT NEW JOB?

UMassFive, the Official Credit Union of UMass Amherst Students, has teamed up with Enterprise Car Sales to offer you high quality used cars at fantastic low prices with low rate Credit Union financing.

If you are a graduating senior who has already accepted a job offer and are in the market for a new set of wheels, then the UMassfive Enterprise Car sale is for you. Even if you are not a member, you can still join before you graduate. Just apply online at www.umassfive.org to be pre-approved.

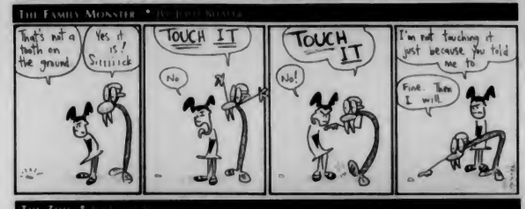
WHY BUY FROM ENTERPRISE?
No Haggle Pricing.
Certified Vehicles
All Vehicles Below Book Value.
Money Back Satisfaction Guarantee.
Powertrain Warranty, Service Contracts and Roadside Assistance.

UMASSFIVE COLLEGE FEDERAL CREDIT UNION
800.852.5886
www.umassfive.org



INCREDIBLE ONE DAY EVENT:
Date: Saturday, May 14th
Time: 9 a.m. to 2 p.m.
Place: UMassFive at 200 Westgate Center Drive in Hadley (next to Applebee's)
Over 60 late model, low mileage vehicles available on-site!
Preview the inventory at www.ecars.com.

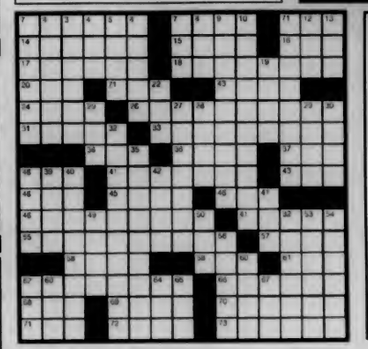
WANT TO SWEETEN THE DEAL?
Get pre-approved, use your UMassFive financing to buy a vehicle during the Sale and we'll make your first car payment up to $500. You'll make no payment until July 30th!



BE AHEAD OF THE GAME!
Get pre-approved before the sale and your car purchase will be a breeze. As an added bonus, we'll give $25.00 in FREE GAS to all pre-approved buyers!
Apply online today at www.umassfive.org to be pre-approved. You can also preview the inventory at www.ecars.com.

Enterprise 1-800-car sales

Quote of the Day



"She's gonna listen to her heart/It's gonna tell her what to do/She might need a lot of loving/But she don't need you."

—Tom Petty

ACROSS
1 Nag
7 Sunday sass
11 Nocturnal bird
14 Ms. Broomer
15 Merino acronym
16 Female deer
17 Doing up, as shoes
18 Boxer of "Atlantic City"
20 Lennon's love
21 Tree syrup
23 Class dance
24 Cut and splice
26 Permanence
31 Merchant's figures
33 Out of the blue
34 Got a bite
36 Singer Braxton
37 Put a strain on
38 Santa's helper
41 Current measuring device
43 Hog home
44 Sound dowsh?
45 Amphitheater row
46 __ of Marmara
48 Mini-chambers
51 Blind snips
55 Like some cigarettes
57 Close violently
58 Operatic tune
59 Hanoi holiday
61 Stage signal
62 Headlong rusher
66 Capital of Columbia
68 Victoria's Secret offering
69 Hearing sign
70 More hackneyed
71 Work on a sampler
72 Actress Garr
73 Lookout

DOWN
1 Swanky digs
2 Actress Plummer
3 Shirt-s back
4 Babs
5 Immoral deeds
6 Grand totes
7 Flaw
8 NASA partner
9 Military aircraft
10 Rings of fat
11 Sundries
12 Pursue with passion
13 Writer Deighton
19 Words to Nanette
22 Mom-and-pop org.
25 Sri Lankan drop
27 Tailor
28 Horsehair shade
29 Scram
30 "Da Ya Think I'm __?"
32 Most majestic
35 Something given off
36 Light tan
39 Mom-madness sufferer
40 Much ado about nothing
42 Deal (out)
47 Gore and Haig
49 Deep, slimy soil
50 Solidify
52 Author of "Little Women"
53 Less slack
54 Ad smuggled
56 Outstanding loans
60 Made hasta
62 Hwy. radios
63 East
64 Jug handle
65 Hitler's stat
67 Rummy game

Find today's answers online
www.dailycollegian.com

Only three days left to submit a comic this semester !
collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
Spring is Here!
Come in and get the attention you want!
•Free haircolor consultations
•We specialize in Multi-Color Highlighting and eyebrow shaping
•Facial and Body waxing
Walk-ins Welcome
Mon-Fri 10-6
Sat 10-4
253-1200
401 Main St.
Downtown Amherst
$2 OFF BLOWOUT
1/2 PRICE PERM
With this COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
You might have missed your calling. You would have been the world's best librarian.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Don't let all that gossip get you down. Gossip is no good.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Sometimes what you need is the advice of an old friend.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
You don't want to know what went on in your room this weekend.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You are most definitely wearing two completely different socks today.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Relationships are too much bother. Who needs them anyways?

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
What you need tonight is a good, old-fashioned dance party.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You should develop a strong bond with your professors.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Your voice will keep changing throughout the day.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Everything that you know is about to change soon.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
There is nothing more magical than a shopping experience at TJMaxx.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Hopefully you didn't trip over your feet this weekend.

$$$ Build your business with our business. Place your ad here, in The Collegian. $$$

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

Pufffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValley Estates@worry.ass.um Now open Saturdays 10-1

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

AUTO FOR SALE

1991 BMW 325I grey 90000 miles $3400 425-443-7839

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, tint. $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

EMPLOYMENT

[Lifeguard] Brandywine Apts. Needs a certified lifeguard. Full time. Must work some weekends. $9.00/hr. Call 549-0600. Or stop by office.

Responsible college students wanted for Franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown. (888)427-7672 Ext. 445

Summer/Beyond: Local franchise Major healthy home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay 587-9500.

EMPLOYMENT

Painters Helpers Call 413-253-9457

Camp Counselors – Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply online at www.pineforest-camp.com

License LIFE and HEALTH insurance representative for sales and services of existing accounts. Excellent training, great commissions, career opportunity. Fax resume to: 508-757-1200

Make $75 taking online surveys www.monkeyauthor.com

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $8 - $12/hr. (888)277-9787 www.collegepro.com

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour, 35-40 hours per week, June 22 - August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

EMPLOYMENT

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
Campus fundraiser is hiring out-going students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 - $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/jobs.asp to apply.

Summer Jobs For The Environment
$425 - $475 / Week
Global Warming
[redacted]
Conservation and Research Jobs Call 1-[redacted]

Moving. Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

EMPLOYMENT

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe, 62 Masons St. Northampton.

MARKETING/SALES
Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPrinting.com - Call Dan 413-662-0020

Administrative Assistant for Teen-Bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call 800-344-6432 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience nec. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

FOR SALE

Kegerator For Sale. All connections and 2 Q32 tanks Full Fridge $125 978-501-4397

Full Size Bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition. $200 & boxer must pick up. (443) 904-6844

HOUSE FOR RENT

Expect to have few rentals coming up? Call during summer Skibski Realtors (413) 586-1877 Northampton

House Hadley. Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Baths/sms. Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $2250 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

MISCELLANEOUS

www.butchbats.com

Just Look Stupid

ROOMMATE WANTED

Roommate Wanted in House, $325 Call 413-687-4976

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth control, and Emergency Contraception, STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 548-9992

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

ROOMMATE WANTED

Room Available June 10th, Aug 31st in Amherst Center. Call Noah 413-687-2365

Room in Northampton Close to Downtown Rent $600 Nego. 413-230-1068

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTSMONDAY

MONDAY, MAY 9, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

CHAMPIONS

Minutemen take third ECAC title

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

PISCATAWAY, N.J. — Since March 26th, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has done everything right.

After losing to Loyola 6-5 on that Saturday afternoon, the Minutemen (12-2 5-1 ECAC) went undefeated in the ECAC, won their 20th New England Championship, and then defeated long time rival Syracuse 14-13 in overtime on April 30.

Then, on Saturday, everything came together one more time as UMass won its third ECAC championship with a 13-7 victory over Rutgers (4-9 1-5 ECAC).

With the victory, the Maroon and White have set itself up for a NCAA playoff game against Syracuse at Garber Field on Sunday.

"There's a lot that went into this. We're not done by any means, but this is a big part of our season," UMass attackman Sean Morris said. "We're happy we got this, we're definitely happy. The season is over, now it's the postseason and its do or die."

UMass	13
Rutgers	7

Morris had five goals on the game, including two in the fourth quarter. His five goals tie a career-high for Morris, who scored five against Hobart College on April 16, in UMass' 14-12 victory.

The Minutemen were led by Jeff Zywicki and Morris in the fourth quarter, who combined for four of UMass' five goals in the period; Zywicki had four goals in the game. Brett Garber also added a goal in the period with just over six minutes left to play in regulation.

Zywicki's four-goal performance gives him 94 career goals for the Minutemen, ranking him 11th all time.

UMass has played Rutgers in the final game of each of the last four seasons. The Minutemen won all but one game during those meetings, with the Scarlet Knights winning 9-8 in 2003. The loss cost UMass the ECAC championship that season.

Jack Reid, who was a freshman on that team, remembers the game and was relieved that the Minutemen came home with the title.

"It feels great, we've been close. We were in the running last year, we had a chance my freshman year but we lost to Rutgers," Reid said. "We've been close, so it's a nice day to finally get it."

UMass coach Greg Cannella, who has led the Maroon and White to each of their three ECAC championships, has been harping on the importance of each game this season. Even after winning the championship, Cannella was quick to talk

See MEN'S LAX on page 10

The Minutemen celebrate after their 14-13 victory over Syracuse on April 30. UMass defeated the Scarlet Knights of Rutgers on Saturday afternoon to win the ECAC championship, its third ever.

Guobodia saves the day for UM

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

PISCATAWAY, N.J. – It was a game that culminated an entire season's worth of preparation.

It was the last day of the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's regular season schedule. Thirteen games down, one to go.

In the middle, there had been five conference clashes. The Minutemen had won four of them, including a victorious effort over Georgetown on April 23 to put them into place for Saturday's 60 all-important minutes of lacrosse.

This one had everything on the line for the Maroon and White, an ECAC Lacrosse League championship, an NCAA tournament first-round home game, a 12-win season.

It was supposed to be senior goalie Bill Schell's final regular season contest, and it would have been an opportunity for him to win his second conference title.

But it didn't happen. Schell suffered a broken right hand last week just a few days before the Rutgers game.

Enter backup sophomore goalie, Efosa Guobodia, his two career saves and zero career starts.

He had been in net for three relief appearances this season, for a total of 20 minutes, 31 seconds. Last year, he made two relief efforts, manning the cage for 3:55 of game action.

On the sideline, Schell stood in a black UMass hooded sweatshirt and a cast that reached just below his right elbow. With him were his 54 starts, 40 wins and 535 saves, good enough for fourth-best in UMass' all-time record books.

Guobodia, in the meantime, was busy just trying to rid the butterflies that had haunted his stomach from the time he woke up until the 8:34 mark of the first period, when he made his first save, turning away a hard, low shot from the stick of Leif Blomquist, the Scarlet Knights' leading scorer.

The second-year netminder, whom his teammates simply refer to as 'E', would go on to make 13 more saves through the course of the game, and his total of 14 tied Schell with the most a UMass goalie has made in one game this season.

And they were more than enough to earn him his first career win, as UMass breezed through Rutgers 13-7.

"We had confidence in [Guobodia]," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "We watch him everyday in practice. He does a heck of a job. He's a really good leader. I have no problem with confidence with Efosa going out there. Going in, everyone had confidence in him."

Confidence wasn't anything the Minutemen were lacking on Saturday, especially in terms of their goalie.

"He's been great all season," attackman Sean Morris

See GUOBODIA on page 10

UMass gets three no-hitters

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Staff

No-hitters are supposed to be rare occurrences in softball, as evidenced by the fact that the Massachusetts softball team hadn't recorded a single no-hitter in its first 45 games, despite having two dominant pitchers.

But in this weekend's four games the UMass pitchers incredibly threw three.

Senior Barb LaFogg, who came within one out of a perfect game earlier this year against Dartmouth, tossed a no-hitter yesterday against Quinnipiac in her final home start. Along with coming on Senior Day, the no-hitter also served as a nice birthday present for LaFogg, who turned 23 yesterday.

Not to be outdone, junior Jenna Busa didn't allow a hit in either of her starts this weekend, no-hitting Quinnipiac (19-27-1) in the second game yesterday as well as Rhode Island (8-35 3-11) on Friday. Busa helped her own cause against URI with two home runs and six RBI.

UMass (34-14-1 15-3 Atlantic 10) coasted to four mercy-rule victories behind the strong pitching performances, beating URI 12-1 and 9-0, and finishing the regular season with a pair of 8-0 wins against Quinnipiac.

With the regular season over, the Minutewomen now direct their focus to the A-10 Tournament which begins on Thursday at Fordham. UMass is the No. 2 seed and will face Saint Joseph's (21-19 8-6 A-10) in the first round on Thursday at 2 p.m.

The postseason couldn't come at a better time for the Minutewomen, as they are playing their best softball of the season. UMass has won 23 of its last 26 games, and is currently on a 10-game winning streak.

"The team is in a really good place right now," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "They get a little bit better everyday, and right around now you want to be playing well and we are. Championship week starts this week, so this is it."

Despite the cold and rainy weather, there was a good crowd gathered at the UMass Softball Complex to celebrate Senior Day yesterday, and LaFogg treated the fans to the first of two dazzling pitching performances.

"I went into today like this was basically my last game," LaFogg said. "I held nothing back, and I had nothing to lose. Those are the kind of days when I pitch my best."

"It's a storybook finish for her," Sortino said. "She's had so many near-misses, I was happy for her to get it."

LaFogg (20-9, 1.99 ERA) breezed through the overmatched Quinnipiac lineup, allowing only one base runner on an error in the fourth inning.

UMass scored single runs in the second and third innings, before blowing the game open with a six-run fourth inning.

The first run was scored by senior Denise Denis, who led off the second with a walk and came in to score on senior Pam Sulick's bloop single down the leftfield line.

Senior Hilary Puglia stroked a one-out double to the left-center gap in the third and scored on sophomore Amanda Morin's single up the middle.

UMass then sent 10 batters to the plate in the fourth, and was aided by wildness and shaky defense from Quinnipiac.

Freshman Lauren Proctor led off with a walk, one of four she

See SOFTBALL on page 9

Freshman infielder Sarah Hurd gets ready for a ground ball at third base. Hurd was a pinch runner for the Minutewomen during their three-game series this weekend. The Minutewomen won all three games.

Seniors dominate for Minutewomen

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

As graduating students across the nation begin to say their "good-byes" to friends that they've made over the past four years, there is one tightly knit group that has to deal with the departure of much more than just acquaintances.

Yesterday, in front of relatives and UMass alum's, The Massachusetts softball team said its "good-byes" to five seniors that will be departing from Amherst this spring.

In the final 2005 regular season contests, seniors Denise Denis, Jasmine Edwards, Barb LaFogg, Hilary Puglia and Pam Sulick were presented after Game 1 of a double header against Quinnipiac as part of the Senior Day ceremonies.

Emotion was apparent as UMass coach Elaine Sortino experienced her 26th Senior Day.

"Well I've pretty much been emotional since I woke up this morning," Sortino said. "You know, I feel these are kids that I've kind of watched grow up."

Just as Sortino was able to watch her team develop over the years, she was also able to watch her crew sweep the Bobcats on a day in which the Minutewomen did not surrender a single hit at the UMass Softball Complex. The seniors were pleased that they were able to end their careers on a high note.

"It definitely hit me when I walked out with my parents," Edwards said.

For pitcher Barb LaFogg, Game 1 capped off a roller coaster of a career. After a brief stint at Seton Hall, the Hampshire Regional star returned to western Massachusetts and joined the Maroon and White. After sitting out a season and playing sparingly in 2004, LaFogg entered the 2005 season on a mission.

"She's an incredible kid, she's incredibly loyal, she's thrilled to have our uniform on and we're thrilled to have it on her," Sortino said. "I don't think she understands that second part. She always says, 'thank you for letting me play,' and I always say, 'thank you for playing here.'"

With the regular season in the books, LaFogg finished strutting an ERA of 1.99 and struck out an A-10-high 207 batters, while ending with a bang.

In Game 1 yesterday, which also happened to be her 23rd birthday, LaFogg registered seven strikeouts, while pitching her first no-hitter of her career. LaFogg agrees that all of the seniors have something to prove.

"I think we are all on the same boat and we have nothing to lose and something to gain," LaFogg said. "So we can just put it on ourselves and have those types of mentalities and we'll do absolutely fine."

Another senior who continues to focus on the A-10 championships is former A-10 Player of the Year, Puglia. The shortstop, who recorded her 10th homer in Game 2 yesterday, is honing in on what has to be done in the post season.

"We still have a lot of season left, so I guess it really hasn't hit me yet," Puglia said. "We definitely want to push it to the limit, this is our last chance."

Two was the lucky number yesterday for seniors Denis and

See SENIORS on page 9

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Tuesday, May 10, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 135

UMass program to help substance abusers

By Brian Duffey
Collegian Staff

Health Educator Diane Fedorchak, has started a program for students at the University of Massachusetts who are sober or are interested in getting sober.

Fresh and Sober is a "work in progress" that began taking shape a year ago. Every other Tuesday, students come together to share their experience and concerns in a confidential setting. Fedorchak encourages any student who is in recovery or is concerned about their drinking or druggging to attend. The final meeting of the semester will be at 5 p.m. today at University Health Services in room 302.

The primary focus of this program is to bring students who are troubled by their alcohol or drug abuse and students who are in recovery together. Fedorchak stated that the sober members of this program are individuals who are involved in a 12-step program. These students were all unable to control their drinking and/or drug usage in the past and have found a way to remain sober.

Fedorchak believes that it can be difficult for sober students to adjust to the social climate of the University. Despite the large numbers of UMass students who do drink to get drunk and regularly use illegal drugs, she said, "Not everyone here drinks and not everyone gets drunk."

Fedorchak is also concerned with the message the University and the faculty sends regarding alcohol. Members of 'Fresh and Sober' have expressed concern about the way in which professors speak about alcohol consumption.

Some of the inspiration for this program came from an incoming student in recovery, who had contacted Fedorchak. She said she felt compelled to build a place where students in recovery could come together to form a community. Fedorchak thinks that it is important for students who are struggling with addiction issues to realize that members of the UMass community are staying sober and have found another way of life.

Fedorchak stressed that the meetings include, "Talking in a non-judgmental, non-confrontational way; just sharing." She reiterated that all people and the information they share at each meeting is kept confidential.

As a health educator, Fedorchak says that her main responsibility is to offer a, "harm-reduction approach, to provide people with the facts to lower their risks."

She pointed out that alcohol and drugs are just two dangerous areas; sex, food, and stress are also issues that can cause major problems. Bedtime Players, a Health Education theatre troupe, puts on a series of short skits regarding issues like alcohol, drugs, and sex. The performances are done in the residence halls throughout campus.

Fedorchak said that Fresh and Sober includes more than just the biweekly meetings. She receives phone calls from students who are concerned about their habits. She also receives calls from concerned parents. Fedorchak considers herself to be an advocate for students who are in recovery and students who are looking to make a change. She is also working hard to distribute related informational brochures and booklets around campus.

"The more materials out there, the more they will call," she said.

Diane Fedorchak can be reached at 577-5188. All conversations are confidential.

Tanning is still popular, despite dangers

By Hinlan Wong
Collegian Correspondent

As the sky clears and the semester ends, University of Massachusetts students seem to be aware of the risks of skin cancer, but many are continuing to tan themselves, despite apparently lethal dangers.

In turn cases of melanoma, a deadly form of skin cancer, is on the rise, according to the World Health Organization, especially in places where people are fairest-skinned: North America, Australia, New Zealand and northern Europe. The WHO reports that one in two forms of cancers found in people in the United States are skin-related, while around the world, the figure is one in three — a difference of 50 percent.

The causes of the increased risk on this continent are, without doubt, tanning, according to the American Cancer Society. But the risks of tanning may be worth it, according to several UMass students.

Vinny Russo, a sophomore majoring in history said, "When you tan, you feel better about yourself. In the winter you turn to that pasty white color; it just doesn't look healthy."

During the summer Russo is a full-time lifeguard at Lexington Park and Recreations pool. Although this will be his fifth year working at the pool, Russo said he does not frequently wear sun block to protect himself. He says he is fully aware of the possible effects but is not worried about melanoma.

"If I'm not going to get burned, I'm not concerned with it (cancer)," said Russo.

Because he does not burn easily, Russo said he is unlikely to contract melanoma.

On the other hand, Russo does remind the young children he guards to wear sunscreen.

"The children just aren't old enough to make educated decisions I am making," he said. "I am fully aware of the health risks."

Melanoma is the most deadly form of skin cancer but is completely curable if treated early.The two main causes of melanoma remain over-exposure to the sun and the use of tanning beds, according to the American Cancer Society.

The WHO recommends that children under the age of 18 not use a tanning sun bed. Massachusetts state law says that no one under the age of 18 can use a sun bed without written consent by a parent or guardian, and no one under 14 can use a sun bed unless accompanied by a parent or guardian.

The cancer risks, however, haven't stopped Julie Wong, a sophomore from Boston majoring in Hospitality, & Tourism Management, who said she went to a tanning salon just before a recent trip to Florida.

Tanning beds are a cultural phenomenon, attracting many high school and college-aged people. However, the beds pose a cancer risk.

"Tanning makes you look toned," said Wong. "I don't want to look white; I want a nice healthy tan, not pasty."

Wong said she also knows the risks of the tanning salon and sunbathing.

"Cancer is a scary thought, but I do it anyway," she said. "It's just like people who smoke. It doesn't affect me unless I know a friend or family member gets skin cancer from the sun," she said. "I'm addicted to sunbathing in the summer, not the tanning bed. You feel better after you go to the beach, compared to a tanning salon."

Melissa Pappas, a sophomore majoring in communication, said she likes to sunbathe, recreationally scuba dive, snowboard and play in the UMass marching band. While outside, she said, she often goes without sunblock, or uses only SPF 15.

"I love the sunshine, that vitamin D. I just can't get enough," Pappas said. "No one in my family has ever had it. Skin cancer

See TANNING on page 4

Students seeking high interest loans

By Jamie Mason
Collegian Correspondent

Hundreds of University of Massachusetts students squeezed by the increased costs of their education are taking on new debt to finance it, often in the form of higher-interest alternative loans, according to the UMass Amherst financial aid director.

Five years ago, UMass students took out about $1.5 million in such loans, according to Ken Burnham, director of financial aid. This year it's $12 million, some $10.5 million more.

The seven-fold increase is the latest sign that students are being pushed financially in higher education across the board, Burnham said

"In the 1999 to 2000 school year, students' alternative loans averaged $5,600," said Burnham. "During 2004-2005, the average was $8,600."

Not only are the amounts being borrowed increasing, but also the numbers of students taking out such loans.

"Five years ago about 250 students at UMass were taking out alternative loans, today, it's over 1,440, almost six times as many," said Burham. "Some 1,050 of the 1,440 are in-state residents, the other 350 are out-of-state residents."

According to the UMass Office of Institutional Research, fees have increased by $3,715 in

See LOANS on page 4

Journalist investigated for fabrication

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An investigation over the sourcing and accuracy of news stories by a freelance journalist at a leading Internet news site concluded that the existence of dozens of people quoted in the articles could not be confirmed.

Wired News, which publishes some articles from Wired magazine, paid for the review of stories by one of its frequent contributors, Michelle Delio, 37, of New York City. It was expected to disclose results late Monday.

The review determined that dozens of people cited in articles by Delio primarily during the past 18 months could not be located, said one person familiar with the report's conclusions. This person said nearly all the people who were cited as sources and who could not be located had common names and occupations and were reported to be living in large metropolitan regions.

Wired News' editor in chief, Evan Hansen, confirmed those conclusions Monday. "I wouldn't dispute any of that," he said.

None of the information attributed to the disputed sources was considered significant. The disputed quotations typically supported details elsewhere in the articles.

Delio said Monday the investigation "concluded that my stories did not contain fabricated news, that key information in all the stories checked out and that all primary sources were located." She said she regretted not keeping contact information for all her sources.

In a private e-mail Delio sent to Wired News executives last month and obtained by The Associated Press, she said she wanted to "present my side of this sad saga."

"I don't understand why my credibility and career is now hanging solely on finding minor sources that contributed color quotes to stories I filed months and years ago," she wrote. Delio said that among hundreds of articles she wrote for the organization, there "isn't one story that contains fabricated news."

Wired News and Wired Magazine are separately owned and do not share office space or staff, but Wired News publishes Wired Magazine's content online.

The review for Wired News was carried out by Adam Penenberg, a Wired News columnist who teaches journalism at New York University. Penenberg exposed fabricated articles in The New Republic by Stephen Glass in 1998 while Penenberg was a writer for Forbes.com. Glass was fired.

An earlier fact-checking investigation of articles Delio wrote for the online edition of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Technology Review magazine also found problems. That publication hired a journalism professor, Susan Rasky of the University of California, Berkeley, to review stories by Delio it published on its Web site between December and March. The review last month concluded that just three of 10 stories Delio wrote could be verified, and all 10 were pulled from Technology Review's Web site.

A writer who wrote articles for "Wired News" and "Wired Magazine" is currently under investigation for fabricating stories.

Spring has sprung!

The trees around the campus pond are in full bloom on Monday, a reminder that spring is in full swing around the Pioneer Valley. Temperatures are expected to reach at least 70 degrees today.

White supremacists clash with crowd at Holocaust memorial

By Brooke Donald
Associated Press

BOSTON — White supremacists clashed with an angry crowd outside Faneuil Hall, where Holocaust survivors and their families were commemorating the liberation of Nazi concentration camps.

Two people were arrested during Sunday's confrontation in downtown Boston, officer John Boyle said.

On the 60th anniversary of the Allied victory in Europe, survivors, their children, and grandchildren lit white candles inside the historic meetinghouse to commemorate the estimated 6 million Jews killed by the Nazis during World War II. Germany's consul-general to New England, Wolfgang Vorwerk, spoke of his country's role in the massacre.

Ten to 15 members of the Arkansas-based group White Revolution arrived for their scheduled demonstration and were escorted by hundreds of police officers on foot, motorcycle and horseback to a designated protest area across the street. Officers, many in riot gear, formed a barricade between the protesters and about 100 people who angrily shouted at them to leave Boston.

At one point, the crowd opposing the white supremacists surged forward, causing police to use their batons to keep them at bay.

A scuffle arose outside the protest pen when Shireen Chambers, 36, of Dorchester, allegedly struck Jerome Higins, 25, of Everett.

Police said Higins, who is black, retaliated by spitting in the face of Chambers, who is white, and hitting her with a sign. Chambers yelled racist epithets as she was dragged away by police. Boyle said at least one officer was injured while attempting to arrest Chambers.

Both were charged with disturbing the peace. A judge ordered Chambers to be evaluated at a mental health center following her arraignment Monday in Boston Municipal Court, a court clerk said. Higins is scheduled to be arraigned Tuesday.

Gov. Mitt Romney, who attended the Faneuil Hall event, said he was disgusted by the presence of the white supremacists.

"Today of all days, to have white supremacists come here from Arkansas, is most disappointing," he said. "I wish they'd go back home where they came from and bury themselves under the rocks that they crawled out from."

ARTS & LIVING
ORLANDO BLOOM
The 'Rings' star tries his talent in 'Kingdom of Heaven.'
PAGE 6

EDITORIAL/OPINION
HARD TO LIVE WITH MEAN GIRLS
Males prove easier housmates and friends.
PAGE 7

WEATHER
TODAY Pt. Cloudy, H70°
TONIGHT Clear, L48°
TOMORROW Sunny, H73°, L52°

SPORTS
LATE SEASON REBOUND
UMass men's baseball wins weekend series.
PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martarelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Claris Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marris Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kiggains
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Frecaut
Human Resource Sandra Marquez
Promotions Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Adviser Charlie Higgins
Asst Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is independently financed, operating and advertising revenue. Founded in 1890, the paper began as Aggie Life during the College Signal in 1907, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and the Two Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published daily since 1967. The Collegian has been broadsheet since January 1994. For advertising rates and information, call 413-545-3500 between 8:30 a.m. and 5:30 p.m.

Production Crew
On staff today

Night Editor
Erika Lovley

Photo Technician
Megan Brinster

Copy Editor
Megan Healy

Production Supervisor
Nick Belanger

Production Staff
Tom Heslin

William Weld not seeking N.Y. Gubernatorial seat

By Michael Gormley
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. — The same day former Massachusetts Gov. William Weld said he was interested in running for governor of New York, an internal memo issued to partners in his investment firm discounted any such bid.

The two-paragraph memo from Leeds Weld & Co. to its "limited partners" stated, in part: "While it has always been Bill's practice never to say never, 'Bill is not running for governor of New York or for any other office." The memo, a copy of which was obtained by The Associated Press on Monday, said Weld "is full-time engaged in the business of Leeds Weld & Co."

There are no signatures on the memo but it shows it came from Jeffrey T. Leeds and Weld.

The memo was obtained from a source who provided it on condition of anonymity.

A spokesman at Leeds Weld & Co., a private equity investment firm where Weld is a partner, didn't immediately respond to a request for comment.

On the day of the memo, April 26, state Republican officials said Weld was considering running for governor or for the U.S. Senate representing New York, where he was raised and moved back to in 2000. Later that day, Weld said he was seriously considering entering the 2006 New York governor's race if fellow Republican George Pataki does not seek a fourth term.

New York Magazine on April 26 reported that Weld has been telling associates that GOP leaders approached him about running. State GOP Chairman Stephen Minarik has said he hasn't met with Weld.

Minarik "has not sat down with Bill Weld to talk about any race. This is nothing more than media-driven speculation," said Ryan Moses, executive director of the state Republican Committee.

Pataki has not yet announced if he will seek a fourth term next year. Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, a Republican, may also run for governor but an aide has said Giuliani is too busy with private business interests to run for governor.

Former Mass. Gov. William Weld (R.)

Democratic state Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has announced he's running for governor.

If Weld ran for U.S. Senate, he would face Democratic incumbent Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Sam Houston is the only two-state governor in history, having served as governor of Tennessee from 1827 to 1829 and Texas from 1859 to 1861.

Bush joins world leaders in remembering Allied victory

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

MOSCOW — In a once-unthinkable setting for a U.S. leader, President Bush took a place of honor on Red Square amid symbols of Soviet power Monday and saluted the greatest military victory of an empire formerly regarded as America's most-threatening enemy.

Tanks rumbled on the streets and warplanes screeched overhead as Bush and his wife, Laura, joined a long list of presidents, prime ministers and dignitaries at a grand parade celebrating the 60th anniversary of the Allied victory over Nazi Germany. The Soviet Union paid the heaviest price of all the triumphant allies — nearly 27 million soldiers and citizens killed in what is remembered here as the Great Patriotic War.

President Bush meets Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili at a Georgia airport on Monday, shortly after arriving from Moscow.

Ten years ago, President Clinton boycotted Moscow's military parade on the 50th anniversary of V-E day to protest Russia's brutal military campaign in Chechnya. Clinton waited in his hotel, emerging later for talks with Boris Yeltsin. But Bush showed no reluctance, eager for Vladimir

See BUSH on page 4

Congress looking to toughen gang laws

By David Crary
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The rapid spread of vicious street gangs such as MS-13 is causing alarm in cities and suburbs nationwide, igniting bitter debate about how best to combat the threat and inspiring a comprehensive anti-gang bill in Congress.

The measure is depicted by supporters as the only effective way to counterattack gang violence, and assailed by critics as an overreaction that could clog both federal courts and adult prisons with youthful offenders, most of them minorities.

Sponsored by Rep. Randy Forbes, R-Va., the bill moved swiftly through the House Judiciary Committee last month and is scheduled for a House floor vote Wednesday. It would turn many gang—related violent offenses into federal crimes punishable by mandatory sentences of at least 10 years, expand the range of crimes punishable by death, and enable U.S. prosecutors to try 16- and 17-year-old gang members as adults in federal courts.

"These aren't petty hoodlums," Forbes said. "They're cutting people's heads off, doing counterSurveillance on police. ... They're trained in a type of violence we've not seen heretofore."

In Virginia recently, gang victims have been hacked by machetes and had fingers cut off. Affiliated gangs in Central America are suspected in several recent beheadings of young women.

The bill's supporters include the National Sheriffs' Association and the Fraternal Order of Police, the nation's largest law enforcement union. If approved, it would move to the Senate where Sens. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) and Orrin Hatch (R—Utah) have introduced a bill combining tough anti-gang measures with new funding for crime prevention programs.

Opponents include numerous high-powered civil rights groups — the NAACP, the American Civil Liberties Union, Human Rights Watch and others. They cite FBI findings that serious youth crime is declining, say states — not the federal government — can best address the gang problem and worry about long—term consequences for teenage offenders sent to adult prisons.

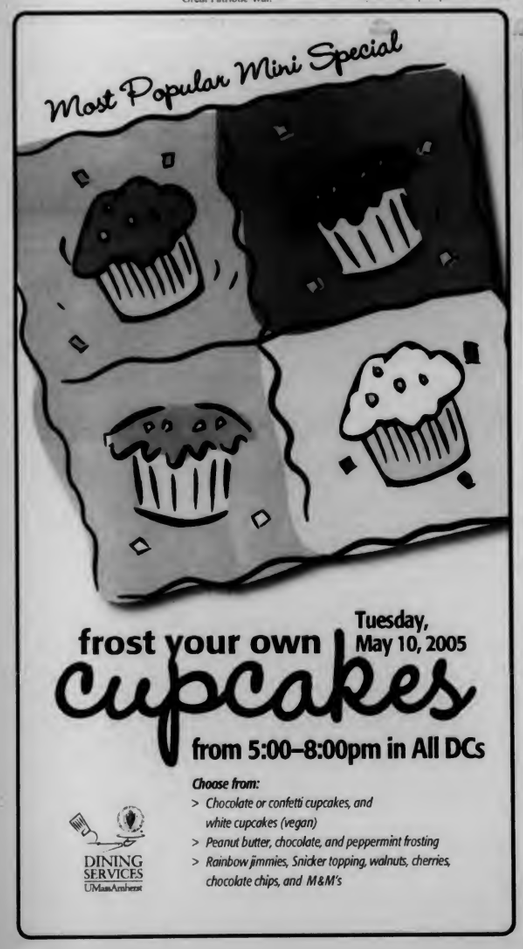
"We too want to do something about gang violence," said Angela Arboleda of the National Council of La Raza, a Hispanic civil rights organization. "But punitive measures that lock up youths with adults is not a smart approach."

Arboleda says that Forbes' measure _ which the congressman has nicknamed "The Gangbusters Bill" — "is one of the worst bills we've ever seen."

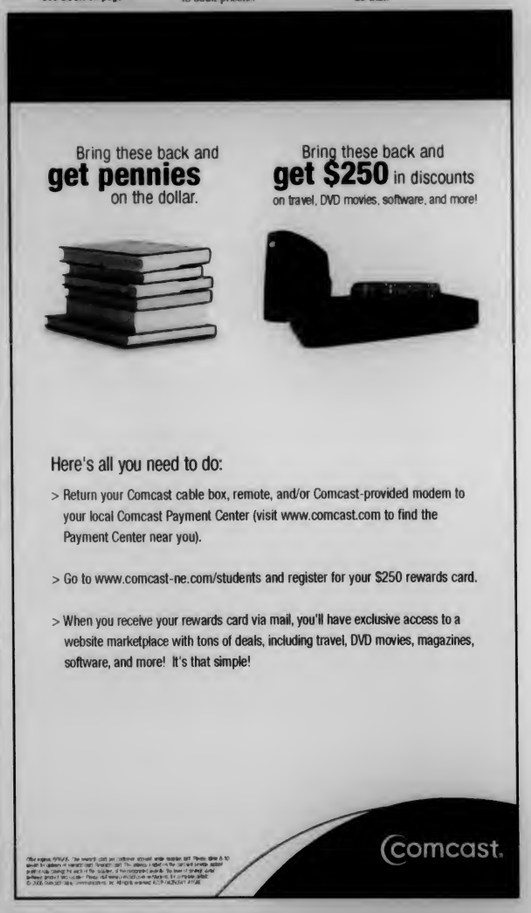
According to Forbes, street gang membership in the United States has grown steadily to more than 750,000, outnumbering police officers. He said a federal approach is needed because gangs like MS-13 — the Central American-influenced Mara Salvatrucha — have spread to many states.

"They're organized; they have a board of directors inside prison and outside prison," Forbes said. "Even while in prison, they recruit teens, even down to elementary school."

Critics of the bill say state and local police agencies could escalate the fight against such gangs under existing laws. They also say the Bush administration and Congress have cut back social programs that could deter youths from joining gangs in the first place.



"Because there are alarming stories about gang violence, members of Congress are under pressure from constituents to offer solutions," said Morna Murray of the Children's Defense Fund. "The fear makes it hard to focus on crime prevention. 'Tough on crime' sells, but it doesn't work."



The bill's opponents include some conservatives who question the concept of federalizing law enforcement tasks traditionally handled by states.

"It's better that it stays state law — that's the true conservative position," said Rep. Robert Inglis, R-S.C., the only Republican opposing the bill when the Judiciary Committee approved it on an otherwise party-line vote.

Forbes said of Inglis, "He's a nice guy —but he's dead wrong."

"In the past, these gangs were in just one area — now they have networks across the country," Forbes said. "We want to create enforcement teams that will do six or seven month investigations, and then have trials that will bring whole networks down. States can't do that."

A special message for state employees

YOU DON'T BUY A NEW CELL PHONE WITHOUT COMPARING FEATURES. THIS IS YOUR HEALTH.

Study The Plans.

If you're an employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, you have until May 13 to select your health care plan for the coming year. We think you should know there are more factors you ought to consider in making that choice than just the monthly deduction from your paycheck, factors like whether a plan will steer you away from your community hospital and the doctors you and your family know and trust. This is about your health, after all. It's in your best interest to take a close look at your options, because if you don't know what you're signing up for, you could be surprised later to learn that you've picked a plan that's wrong for you and your family.

We've put together a chart that we hope will provide an easy basis for comparing the various plans available to you[1]. This chart is designed to spell out what each plan does and does not offer. We encourage you to pay close attention to column three, which shows the level of access each plan offers to your community hospital, Cooley Dickinson. You should also take a close look at column four, which shows whether each plan offers full access to the major medical centers in Boston.

Health Plan (including basic life insurance)	Unrestricted Choice[2]	Access to Cooley Dickinson Hospital	Access to Major Boston Hospitals	Monthly Employee Premium Contribution[3,4]
Commonwealth Indemnity Community Choice Plan	○	●	◐	Individual: $74.80 Family: $172.95
Commonwealth Indemnity Plan with Catastrophic Illness Coverage	●	●	●	Individual: $148.64 Family: $337.61
Commonwealth Indemnity Plan without Catastrophic Illness Coverage	●	●	●	Individual: $120.77 Family: $272.97
Commonwealth Indemnity Plan PLUS	○	●	◐	Individual: $88.15 Family: $203.19
Harvard Pilgrim POS	●[5]	●	●	Individual: $86.29 Family: 207.07
Health New England	○	◐[6]	◔	Individual: $68.37 Family: $167.78
Navigator PPO by Tufts Health Plan	○	◐[7]	◐	Individual: $82.90 Family: $199.04

● Yes
○ No
◐ With patient deductible based on tiering plan.
Access to many services at some hospitals may carry a higher patient co-pay.
◔ Only if prior authorization is granted by Health New England.
If authorization is granted, there is a $200 inpatient deductible.

1. The Fallon and Neighborhood plans, which are available to state workers, have been left off this chart because they are not in the Cooley Dickinson service area.
2. A no icon (empty circle) in this column indicates a plan that uses tiered co-payments to steer patients to certain hospitals, or that otherwise restricts members' ability to choose the hospital at which they receive treatment.
3. The rates on this chart are intended to be representational. These specific rates apply to employees hired on or before 6/30/03 who earn $35,000 or more a year. For a plan-by-plan breakdown showing your rates, visit our Web site, www.cooley-dickinson.org
4. You must make your annual enrollment decisions based on current contribution percentages, knowing that these could change after the Commonwealth's annual budget is finalized.
5. Requires a $400 inpatient co-pay at all hospitals.
6. Tiering system requires highest co-pays for all inpatient, MRI and CAT Scan services at Cooley Dickinson.
7. Tiering system requires lowest co-pay for OB/GYN services, middle co-pay for pediatrics, and highest co-pay for adult medical/surgical services at Cooley Dickinson.

The state offers its workers plans that don't have tiering systems. It also offers tiered plans that support getting your care at Cooley Dickinson. You do not have to sign on to a plan that steers you away from your community hospital. We encourage you to make an informed decision on this important matter. To learn more about your health care plan choices, talk to your plan administrator, or talk to us or your health care provider. Visit our Web site, www.cooley-dickinson.org or call us at (888) 554-4CDH (4234).

You can choose a plan that steers you to Springfield, or one that lets you decide with your doctor if you'd do better at Cooley Dickinson and/or the major Boston medical centers. Why leave it up to them?

Making a great community better.

COOLEY DICKINSON HOSPITAL
DARTMOUTH-HITCHCOCK ALLIANCE

30 LOCUST STREET ✦ NORTHAMPTON, MASSACHUSETTS ✦ (413) 582-2000 ✦ www.cooley-dickinson.org

A special message for state employees

The Less We See Of You, The Better

Choose A Health Plan That Helps You Stay Healthy

If you're an employee of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts getting ready to choose your health plan for the coming year, you need to know that some of the plans on your menu will make it more expensive for you to get treatment at Cooley Dickinson. You also might find that you have to switch doctors if you select one of those plans. We urge you to take a close look at what you're signing up for before the May 13 deadline.

It's not that we're anxious to see you at Cooley Dickinson. In fact, the way we see it, one of our most important jobs is to make sure you spend as little time here as possible. Keeping people healthy (and out of the hospital) is a major part of our mission as a community hospital. Another is making sure you're well cared for when circumstances do bring you to the hospital.

At Cooley Dickinson, we are committed to meeting the most critical needs of the friends, neighbors and family members who are our patients. We believe the top criteria in our mission are quality, cost and access.

QUALITY

• Cooley Dickinson has higher nurse staffing and puts more nurses at the bedside. Unique and recognized nurse recruitment efforts have allowed CDH to reduce agency use of staff, and recruit and retain qualified nurses. Studies show that putting more nurses at the beside translates to better patient outcomes.

• Cooley Dickinson focuses on preventive care. For example, we fund a congestive heart failure program for patients after hospitalization, keeping patients healthy and out of the hospital at our expense. We also fund exercise and diet interventions in primary schools to prevent early onset diabetes and other diseases.

COST

• At Cooley Dickinson, we keep your overall health care costs down by focusing on keeping you healthy. Our hospitalization rates are among the lowest in the commonwealth. And average hospital stays here are shorter than they are elsewhere. HMOs tell us that our approach results in lower health care costs per member per month. All of this improves the health of greater Hampshire County residents.

• By keeping you out of the hospital we not only reduce your need for hospital care, but also decrease disruption of your personal and work life, keeping your expenses down and reducing potential lost wages.

ACCESS

• People choose to live in our region because of the quality of life here. And part of what brings them here is knowing they will have access to great health care.

• Cooley Dickinson services – diagnostic imaging, blood and specimen testing, rehabilitation services – are available at the Amherst Outpatient Center as well as at the hospital in Northampton. Other services are available at sites throughout the region.

• Your doctor, and the doctors closest to you, are affiliated with Cooley Dickinson. We provide access to a broad network of local physicians.

• If you or a family member requires hospitalization at Cooley Dickinson, you have access to our comprehensive network of physicians and specialists. Our patients also have the benefit of being treated close to home and family, which studies show results in shorter recovery times.

The state offers its workers many plans that do not hinder your access to Cooley Dickinson. You do not have to sign on to a plan that steers you away from your community hospital. We encourage you to make an informed decision on this important matter. Talk to us or your health care provider before you choose a plan. Visit our Web site, www.cooley-dickinson.org or call us at (888) 554-4CDH (4234) for more information.

You can choose a plan that steers you to Springfield, or one that lets you decide with your doctor if you'd do better at Cooley Dickinson and/or the major Boston medical centers. Why leave it up to them?

Making a great community better.

Cooley Dickinson Hospital
▲ Dartmouth-Hitchcock Alliance

30 Locust Street • Northampton, Massachusetts • (413) 582-2000 • www.cooley-dickinson.org

Students still flock to tanning booths despite cancer dangers

TANNING from page 1

does not hit close to home."

Pappas said she likes the tan she receives from sunbathing and her various outdoor activities, and like Russo, she rarely gets sunburned while outside.

"I'm Mediterranean olive," she said. "Some call it 'olive'. I call it 'hot'!"

The sun can cause some serious health risks, according to Philip C. Nasca, professor and associate dean for graduate education in the UMass School of Public Health and Health Sciences.

"While you're young, tanning looks good," said Nasca. "But as the years progress, the skin, as a direct result of tanning begins becomes damaged and leathery." Nasca urged students to use common sense when in the sun.

"All things in life need to be in moderation," he said. "The sun is a good source of vitamin D, but only in moderation."

Nasca recommends that people being exposed to the sun follow the directions to re-apply an application of sun block of SPF 30.

"Laying out in the sun for two hours at a time doesn't make any sense," Nasca said.

It's particularly dangerous for people who have sunburned early, he said. A person is more susceptible to melanoma if, as a child, he had severe sunburns. The sun may damage a child's skin to the extent that the body is unable to sufficiently repair it.

Nasca said the problem with tanning salons is they are not sufficiently regulated or inspected and as a result, tanning booth timers or other controls may not be up to par. He recommends that if you cannot be dissuaded from tanning, go to a place that specializes in it. A place that may have more to lose by using shoddy equipment, as compared to a establishment with a single tanning machine.

The Collegian contacted five establishments in the Amherst area with tanning equipment for comment for this story, but none returned calls.

Massachusetts state law requires the posting of a list of health dangers at tanning salons. Parental signature is required for minors, but parents do not need to be present and if a person is under the age of 14 may use a tanning device if accompanied by an adult.

The New York State legislature is considering a bill similar to Massachusetts law regulating tanning salons, but with more restrictions. Under New York's proposed bill, any child under the age of 13 would be prohibited from using public tanning equipment, people between the age of 14 to 18 would be required to have a parent or guardian present at the signing for permission to tan and any person over the age of 18 would have to sign to acknowledge the dangers of using tanning equipment.

Stephanie Fung, a UMass freshman from New York City majoring in accounting, said, "I don't think there should be restrictions in New York. It's just the same as smoking at the age of 18. People still smoke under-age; the law is not going to change anything."

Fung said that while living in New York last year, she did at least six sessions in a tanning salon.

"Who doesn't tan? Who doesn't want to look good," she asked. "Isn't that what it comes down to?"

Fung said she stopped going to a tanning booth because it costs too much, but she still goes sunbathing. If the tanning salon were cheaper she said, she would definitely continue going.

"The second you turn pale, you want to stay tan," she said. "People are naive, everyone knows it's bad for you."

High tuition drives students to seek high-interest loans

TUITION from page 1

the last five years for in-state students and $4,494 for out of state students. Tuition has increased by three percent in the last year. Next year's in-state tuition will be $2,640, out-of-state students will pay $9,937. The total in-state tuition for 2005 will be $9,557, out of state will pay $18,006.

"Students borrowing through alternative loans has increased significantly," said Burnham. "It is a statewide and national phenomenon, this is not just at UMass."

"The reason for this is very simple, the cost of education is growing. Tuition and fees are rising nationally. This, along with the economy, inflation, and the increased cost of living are pushing more students to their financial limits," said Burnham.

"There is a rising population of parents having children later in life, and they have retirement to think about," said Burnham. "So parents are putting more burden on their children to pay for the cost of higher education."

An alternative loan, Burnham said, may be defined as a private educational loan offered to a student to supplement financial aid in addition to financing the cost of education.

Almost anyone may take out an alternative loan for their education, Burnham said, and such loans are not necessarily need-based. However, students and their parents usually take out alternative loans only after federal loans, which tend to cost less, have been taken out to the maximum amounts.

Bush, world leaders remember liberation of Nazi Germany

BUSH from page 1

Putin's help in the war on terror and problems in the Middle East, Iran and North Korea.

Bush watched goose-stepping soldiers and flags emblazoned with the Soviet hammer and sickle that recalled the days of communist rule. He sat beside Putin on a reviewing stand next to Lenin's tomb.

White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Bush was not uncomfortable with the trappings. Bartlett said it "demonstrates how far we've come in the world" after the collapse of the Soviet Union and the end of the nuclear-tinged standoff of the Cold War.

Despite sharp exchanges in recent days about Russia's retreat from democracy, Bush and Putin decided to emphasize their friendship rather than their disputes during the wartime anniversary. But tensions were likely to flare anew when Bush visits the former Soviet republic of Georgia and delivers a speech Tuesday praising its democratic progress.

Georgia is the last stop on a four-country trip that included visits to Latvia and the Netherlands.

Georgia's leader, Mikhail Saakashvili, boycotted Monday's ceremony to protest Russia's refusal to quickly withdraw two Soviet-era military bases it maintains in his country. He has asked Bush to intervene in what he calls "one of the last legacies of the Soviet totalitarian domination in this part of the world."

"This visit is support for our pursuit of democracy and a direct recognition of the role that Georgia, along with Ukraine, is playing in weakening Russia's imperial ambitions," lawmaker David Berdzenishvili said ahead of Bush's arrival.

In Moscow, Bush met privately with leaders of private groups dealing with problems of AIDS, human rights, ecology issues and other areas. He told them he has good relations with Putin, and said that only people who have a good relationship can have good collaboration, said Svetlana Kotva, a lawyer for an organization for handicapped people.

Bartlett said Bush was not glossing over differences with Putin but that this was an occasion to honor Russia's sacrifices. Bartlett said the best way to be effective with Putin was through a constructive, personal relationship.

The president also visited the staff at the U.S. Embassy, then met privately with 10 American and 10 Russian veterans of World War II. He thanked the veterans and told them they set an example for others by their willingness to face tyranny and defeat the Nazis, said White House spokesman Scott McClellan.

Bush typically is the center of attention at home and abroad. But he surrendered the spotlight to Putin in Moscow. Bush made no comments in public and simply joined in gatherings of leaders at the celebration.

McClellan said the most moving part of the parade for the president was when the old, Soviet-era trucks rode by with World War II veterans inside, waving and holding roses.

Attention Seniors!

Alumni Association

Congratulations to the Class of 2005 from your Alumni Association!

Visit the Alumni Association Table at Cap and Gown May 2-20 in the Textbook Annex. Get your FREE Young Alumni Guide and enter to win $1,000!

Join the Alumni Association for only $20 - Get two chances to win $1,000 and 1/2 off your Commencement Ball ticket!

UMassAlumni.com

You were. You are. UMASS.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

Editorial Opinion

Tuesday, May 10, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

Editorial@dailycollegian.com

Hard to live with mean girls

Stacy Kasdin

Recently I've been looking a lot at ads for people trying to find housemates. When I (hopefully) get a job I'm going to have to find somewhere to live, and rather than move into my own place and then try to find someone to share it with, I'm looking for a place already all set up with an open room. My criteria is pretty simple: I'd like somewhere that isn't too pricey, with internet and cable TV, I'd like there to be some sort of public transportation to my workplace near-by, and I'd like my housemates to be male, or at least a combination of males and females.

I have no interest in living with only females. For most of my childhood my closest friends were all girls, but not always the same girls. I switched best friends about once a year. Ildiko and Summer moved away, Elizabeth ditched me for someone she found more deserving of her friendship; Nicole used me, betrayed me, and turned all my friends against me. Rebecca stayed behind in eighth grade while I moved on to ninth grade in a different school.

Here in college, my closest friends are all male, and we've had a closer friendship than I've ever had with any of my close female friends of the past.

When I got to high school my group of friends became slightly more co-ed, although it was still predominantly female. I ended up spending most of my time with my one close male friend and one female friend who was a self-proclaimed tomboy.

Here in college my closest friends are all male, and we've had a closer friendship than I've ever had with any of my close female friends of the past. I've been attributing this to that fact that I'm older now and able to have more mature relationships, and sometimes simply to bad luck and falling in with the wrong crowd in my younger days. However, according to the Associated Press, a recent study done at Brigham Young University has confirmed that the reason I get along better with boys is that girls are often inherently mean. This study found that, "girls as young as 3 or 4 will use manipulation and peer pressure to get what they want." So I'm not imagining it!

Researchers call this behavior relational aggression, and say that girls use it to maintain their social status, but until recently it was only recognized as a behavior of adolescent or older girls. In this study they asked 328 preschoolers which kids were more likely to start fights, which were the most popular and which were the most physically aggressive. They discovered that even in preschool there is a social hierarchy. I don't remember preschool well enough to confirm whether or not this was occurring back in the 1980s, but as someone who has been working extensively with children for the past 10, and someone who was a child not so long ago, it doesn't surprise me.

According to the Associated Press, co-author of the study, Craig Hart, said relational aggression can include such things as, "leaving someone out to telling their friends not to play with someone to saying, 'I'm not going to invite you to my birthday party.'" In my past relationships with girls I have experienced all of that and more, and know many others who have as well. Although I have experienced conflicts with my male friends, I have never experienced anything quite like that. Even though someone may bother them I have never witnessed them deliberately leave someone out or hurt someone's feelings without apologizing.

Granted, this is not the case with all males. Maybe I just found a particularly great group of guys. However, having experienced close friendships with people of both genders and compared them, the girls tended to be much cattier, and much more likely to deliberately hurt someone in order to teach her a lesson or gain power or control in a group. Furthermore, just as this type of aggressive behavior is found in some males it is also not present in some females. Although I have not had created any very close relationships with females in the past few years, I have certainly met some who were very kind to me and everyone that I saw them interact with. Although we did not develop an extremely close friendship, I saw the future potential for one, though given my past experience it would have taken some time for me to feel comfortable in the relationship.

So I'm willing to give girls a shot again and try a co-ed living situation once I find a job, but I'm not risking living with all girls. At least not yet, and not before I get to know them first. And it's nice to know that all that "bad luck," wasn't just my imagination, wasn't just me, and quite possibly wasn't bad luck at all, but simply social scientific fact.

Stacy Kasdin is a Collegian columnist.

The souls of yellow folk– so long and thanks, UMass

Grace Chen

I arrived on the UMass campus on Jan. 24 — two days before the start of the spring semester and the day after Northeast had been dumped with over 20 inches of snow.

I am from a warm, tropical climate where temperatures have never fallen below 80 degrees Fahrenheit, and the idea of a snowstorm just did not sit well with me. I was vacationing in London when that happened, and was told by the United Airlines that I might have to "standby" at Heathrow Airport until the next day. Boy, was I bothered … I was worried I might miss the falling snow.

I had never seen snow in my entire life and the idea of white, beautiful, flying, fluff from a Hollywood romance flick made me really excited about the storm.

Then I had to face reality. The "white, beautiful flying fluff" was now "white, ugly soaring bluff." I sometimes missed lunches and dinners altogether, just to avoid the humiliation of having the snow hit my face. I preferred to huddle under the cheap down blanket I bought from Target. I started doing my assignments in bed, and I blamed the cold whenever I dozed off and did not get them done on time.

It was not until the end of March that I began to lament the lost time. I came back from my spring break to a campus cleared of snow. Ducks had started to swim in the pond and squirrels were hopping around. One time, I even encountered a raccoon, the size of my two-year-old Shi Tsu, who stopped for a few moments three feet away from me before scurrying off.

The snow came back a couple of times, but that did not bother me. I was making more friends now and was getting to know my dormmates better.

Americans are very generous. Besides the fact that they're willing to hold the door for you, there would always be someone who would organize certain dorm gatherings where ice cream, pizza and hot dogs were provided for free. There were a few occasions when random dormmates would take out what they called, their "prized possession" — something in the form of dried grass, which they offered to me. Even now, I'm still bewildered about why they like it so much. I've always found it smelly and never took the offers. But I suspect that special grass made them quite happy — though they told me they took it to help them sleep better.

Thank you, UMass, for embracing me and my culture, for tolerating my rants against you and for making my stay enjoyable. So long now.

Flowers started blooming recently, and temperatures actually hit 90. That was the week people took out their sunbathing mats and played football and volleyball in the fields. I remember walking across the lines and lines of girls clad in bikinis and felt I was back on a particular beach in Singapore. I returned to my dorm to count the days; I realized there were only four weeks more.

Last Monday, I found a familiar note on my door: "Summer closing information … have a safe and enjoyable break." Of all the talks we had in class about approaching deadlines of major assignments, about possibilities after graduation and about the semester ending, they never really hit me as hard as the note did — I'm leaving soon.

The 16-week study abroad program that had seemed never-ending will end tomorrow. But before I bid farewell, please allow me to say thank you. Thank you, UMass, for embracing me and my culture, for tolerating my rants against you and for making my stay enjoyable. So long now.

Grace Chen is an international student at the University of Queensland in Australia. She is doing a study abroad program with UMass and will return to her country, Singapore, at the end of the semester.

Bush's stem cell policy is fair

David Lawrence

In a televised speech on the night of Aug. 9, 2001, President Bush announced a compromise that made activists and lobbyists unhappy on both sides of the stem-cell debate: Federal funds could be used in research on already existing embryonic stem-cell lines, but no new lines could be created for the time being.

With Bush's decision made, one side complained he was condoning the destruction of life for research and allowing research on unwilling humans, while the other lamented that existing cell lines would not be enough. In making lobbyists from the left and right unhappy, he in fact struck a perfect balance between two sides of a difficult issue.

Bush's 2001 decision did not put religion before science, nor did it ignore the ethics of the situation. He chose to tread carefully in attempting to reconcile "the potential for incredible good — to improve lives, to save life, to conquer disease" offered by embryonic stem-cells, with a duty "to foster and encourage respect for life in America and throughout the world." He didn't exclusively cater to his religious convictions — he showed willingness to compromise on the anti-embryonic stem-cell research position originally taken in his campaign.

Many have lost sight of the political climate in which Bush created the stem-cell policy that is so often derided today. Indeed, I've heard Bush's stem-cell policy invoked as an example of his religious dogma. For those who would proffer this argument in spite of the circumstances of his decision, let me quickly clarify some of the facts.

Under the Clinton administration, no embryonic stem cell research was funded federally. Funding for this research didn't exist under any previous administrations. It was not until George W. Bush announced his new policy that the government began sanctioning ESC research. Bush's new policy, though characterized as restricting research, in fact encouraged it for the first time.

Bush's policy allows for stem cell research to be carried out. This is a fact that often falls by the wayside. The compromise offered by Bush merely limits scientists to studying the existing lines of stem cells. For now there are enough to investigate most fundamental questions regarding how these cells function and are controlled. The existing stem cell lines are only limiting, when researchers require DNA-matched stem cell lines. Research is not yet developed to the point where this is necessary.

There are currently many scientists researching various aspects of embryonic stem cells and investigating their potential benefits. Until scientists better understand how to control these cells to achieve the benefits, and avoid possible adverse consequences (such as cancer), they will not be introduced into people; so it is not necessary at this stage to have DNA-matched stem cell lines.

It was not until George W. Bush announced his new policy that the government began sanctioning ESC research. Bush's new policy, though characterized as restricting research, in fact encouraged it for the first time.

Bush's plan calls for research to be done on the existing lines until more is known about the comparative benefits of adult versus embryonic stem cells, and we have more time to consider the ethical issues surrounding if and how to obtain embryonic stem cells.

Though the existing cell lines show some problems, such as feeder cell contamination, most research has not progressed to the point that this poses a serious problem. With a few exceptions, research remains concentrated on very basic questions of cell differentiation for which the existing lines are adequate. For the time being the most limiting aspect of this research is our lack of knowledge of how to grow and control these cells. When this research progresses further, this policy may be adjusted.

Finally, it is unlikely that embryonic stem cells derived from unused embryos would be directly useful in clinical applications because of immune rejection of the implanted cells. Stem cells, though they can differentiate into many different cell types are genetically different from the host that they are implanted into, and will be attacked as foreign by the immune system.

The only way to avoid this would be to use embryonic stem cells that are genetically identical to the host, and the only way now known to obtain those would be by harvesting them from a clone of the host created specifically for that purpose. In other words, many ESC applications would require creating a clone for the sole purpose of destroying it. Such clone-on-demand treatments raise moral questions, which it seems prudent to approach slowly and deliberatively.

During the 2004 election, the Kerry camp tried to paint a harsh picture of Bush as a radical Christian putting his religious beliefs before the good of all and the progress of science. They were relatively successful in doing so because few people actually know the facts about stem cells and stem cell research. The fact is that stem cell research is going on right now, because of Bush's policy. The fact is that if new lines will definitely be useful, the policy can be updated to reflect that. Bush angered the religious right by compromising his religious beliefs and allowing any stem cell research to be done. Our president acted not as a religious fanatic, but as an intelligent and compromising politician.

David Lawrence is a Collegian columnist.

What we've been fighting for

Yousef Munayyer

I began writing for this paper shortly after September 11, 2001. Four years and many columns later, my column comes to an end in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Through this time, I have tried to voice my perspective in the pages of this paper. This perspective, the view of an Arab Palestinian, is hard to find in the media today, yet here at the university level, I was given permission to narrate and for this I am grateful.

Looking at the world around me I can see that an Arab or Palestinian perspective is not welcome. In fact, there are many people who wish to silence writers like myself because they know they will be exposed and their interests will be harmed. As long as print media continues its struggle to survive amidst lower sales it will continue to produce a product for sale and will move further from reporting on the realities which concern us and I, for one, will resist this.

To my critics, who upon reading my opening lines may have already said, "good riddance to bad rubbish," I say "thank you." Thank you for reading my column. Thank you for entertaining my ideas. There are certainly people who disagree with me very strongly but they still read. I respect them the most and I know that I have contributed to planting the seeds of change in their minds and cracking the edifice of propaganda up-on which their understanding relies.

I wonder when is the next time a Palestinian perspective will be consistently voiced in the pages of this paper. I can only hope that the pen I lay down is picked up by others who are willing to ask the difficult questions.

Often I am asked why I write about similar topics and how I can be so persistent. Often I am asked why I do not write about anything "good". There are simple answers to these questions. Perhaps most importantly is that the media dominated society we live in gives so little room for a perspective like mine. It is necessary to do all that is possible to be heard.

Also, there are two images that hang above my desk that stare me in the face as I write every week. The first is a character image from a political cartoon. The image is of a barefoot child holding a sword with his back facing me. The tip of this sword is a fountain pen reminding me that even the weak have powerful weapons in print. Adjacent to this image is a line written in Arabic calligraphy from an Iraqi poet that reads "My ink is black. Do not ask me to draw a rainbow." It is hard to focus on the miscellaneous rights when there are so many wrongs which need to be corrected first. Besides, we write about what is wrong because we want change and if everything were right there would be no reason to criticize.

We can never forget that we are in a constant struggle to make the world a better place. If we go through life without challenging the status quo, the generations that follow us will start years behind in a world, which could have been better. The burden falls on us to strive for principles that are in the interest of the greater good. Equality, freedom, education and human rights, the great goals our society has yet proven it has the courage to fight for and we must be the catalyst for this change.

We must ask the difficult questions because they will not ask themselves. Every human struggle for freedom from oppression is our struggle. Be it the Palestinian struggle or the struggle for equality in the United States, they are all fights we should be sharing in because if we do not oppose oppression as it happens under our watch we have become the oppressor.

We must ask why so few people control so much wealth. We must ask why certain nations are dictating standards they themselves do not follow. We must ask what has led a man to die for what he believes in. We must ask what the interests of each party involved are. We must ask why "they" hate "us". We must ask who "they" are and perhaps even more importantly we must find out who "us" really is.

As I close my last column I begin to think of the future of the debate on this campus. I wonder when is the next time a Palestinian perspective will be consistently voiced in the pages of this paper. I can only hope that the pen I lay down is picked up by others who are willing to ask the difficult questions. I hope that others will resist those who wish to silence them, by crowding people and perspectives behind racist walls. All that is for certain is that as this last column comes to an end the struggle only continues.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian columnist.

Write for Ed/Op...voice your opinion!
Editorial@dailycollegian.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

'KINGDOM OF HEAVEN' CRUSADES TO THEATERS

By Nancy Meiler
Daily Trojan Staff Writer

HOLLYWOOD — Orlando Bloom signed on to play the lead role in a French nincompoop named Crusader in Ridley Scott's 12th-century epic, Kingdom of Heaven, purely because he was attracted to the Universal cyclopedias in the film.

Aside as an adult Bloom's character, Balian, learns that the Crusader knight Godfrey of Bouillon (played by Liam Neeson) is his father.

It was an all-too-familiar opportunity for the 28-year-old actor, who last starred as nonsense in Legolas in the "Lord of the Rings" trilogy.

It's interesting how subsequently, these same two characters — Bloom, who grew up in Canterbury, in southeast England, learning that his father was the local [illegible] Bloom later [illegible] at his father's address. Mr. Bloom, who was one of Harry's [illegible] was very absent. Harry and his mum, who lives [illegible] Bloom when Harry was very ill.

[illegible] father [illegible] which [illegible] Bloom [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Bloom [illegible] knew [illegible] dad. Harry [illegible] Mum [illegible] Bloom [illegible] Rings [illegible] Bloom [illegible] Bloom [illegible] Bloom

Jesse Metcalf, one of the male stars of the hit television show, "Desperate Housewives", has helped the shows male actors gain recognition in the Hollywood spotlight. He plays John, a 17 year old gardener who becomes involved with co-star Eva Longoria's character, Gabrielle.

Desperate' guys: The anatomy of a look

By Wendy Donahue
Chicago Tribune

Before she shops for the clothing, "Desperate Housewives" costume designer Cate Adair imagines a real man behind each male character, and takes pleasure in the task.

"Let's be honest: They're a pretty good-looking bunch of guys," she said. "It's not very hard to come to work."

Here are some of the labels behind the looks.

CARLOS SOLIS, GABRIELLE'S HUSBAND

Profile: "He's newer money, the story has told us that. He has a lot of taste. He's always coordinated and cares about how he looks."

The labels: Ted Baker and Hugo Boss. "Those lines have some splash to them, but they're still very elegant," Adair said. "I suspect the character, if I was to do more of back story, he probably has a specific salesman and walks into the best stores and says 'I need six suits,' and they put it together for him head to toe. My interpretation would be Gabrielle supplements that." His jeans are designer, mainly True Religion. "They're just a great men's jean," Adair said.

MIKE DELFINO, HUNKY PLUMBER

Profile: Low-key. "The character isn't drawing attention to himself but he's still incredibly sexy."

The labels: Button-front Levi's and, "if anyone thought that a T-shirt is just a T-shirt, it's not, believe me," Adair said. "We've been through a lot. There's one particular cut of Banana Republic T-shirt that works beautifully on him, the fitted cotton stretch, not quite so thick (as some), and it comes in beautiful heather tones, which look gorgeous with (his) eyes. I love him in those sort of heathered greens and moss colors. We're also introducing some Carhartts (work clothes). You'll find them in uniform shops, real service people wear them. But they can be a fashion statement."

TOM SCAVO, FATHER OF A BROOD

Profile: "He really is the fabulous all-American guy, a working guy who likes to play ball with the kids in the front yard. He and his wife, Lynette, are the couple on the street who are very happy. They can't keep their hands off each other. So it seemed natural that she'd steal his baseball jerseys and shirts. He'll wear a striped Nordstrom shirt in one episode, and then she'll have it on over J. Crew jeans in another."

The labels: Lots of Nordstrom's private label. "He's a good Nordstrom character. And some J. Crew. We figure he probably doesn't spend a lot of time in stores shopping. Lynette probably does a lot through catalogs for more casual stuff because they're not going to take four kids around the mall on the weekend."

JOHN, LAWN BOY AND BOY TOY

Profile: "The biggest challenge is making him look a little younger." He's supposed to be a teenager, but the actor is in his mid-20s. So Adair opts for polos, rugbys with stripes or tank tops, for an "earnest" look.

The labels: True Religion jeans, Gap cargo pants, striped Penguin polos. "When he's looking more hip, I.e Tigre T-shirts are always good. If you're really careful you can get those little tigers off." (ABC is careful about product endorsement.)

REX VAN DE KAMP, BREE'S HUSBAND

Profile: "He's a doctor. We know his wife is a Republican, not that I don't have friends who are trendy Republicans. But he's a little more country-club careful."

The labels: "I use a lot of Nordstrom on him, the nice private label. He also looks good in Hugo Boss, it's cut beautifully for him. I've used some Armani, the more classic cuts, on him."

SELLING MY BOOKS FOR CASH CHANGED MY LIFE. BUT INDIVIDUAL RESULTS MAY VARY.

Get cash for your books.*

ADDITIONAL BUYBACK LOCATIONS:

TEXTBOOK ANNEX
5/09/05 to 5/13/05 9:00 AM - 6:00 PM
5/14/05 11:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/16/05 to 5/19/05 9:00 AM - 5:00 PM
5/20/05 9:00 AM - 4:00 PM

CAMPUS CENTER CONCOURSE
5/09/05 to 5/11/05 9:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/12/05 to 5/13/05 9:00 AM - 6:00 PM
5/14/05 11:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/16/05 to 5/19/05 9:00 AM - 5:00 PM
5/20/05 9:00 AM - 4:00 PM

HAMPDEN LOBBY
5/14/05 11:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/16/05 to 5/19/05 10:00 AM - 5:00 PM
5/20/05 10:00 AM - 2:00 PM

follett
UMASS AMHERST
University Store and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619
THE ISLAND BOOKSTORES
Visit us at efollett.com between 4/15/05 and 5/27/05 and enter to win $5,000!

The Umass Daily Collegian arts department is looking for writers. If you are interested please call 545-3161 .

Hit the books, then hit the beach!

- Day and evening classes start May 31st & July 5th
- Affordable resident cost is $136 per credit
- 5- or 10-week courses
- A great way to earn college credits quickly
- Credits are transferable to your school! (When you are a university or college student, or incoming college freshman)
- Wellesley, Framingham, and Ashland

Looking to get ahead in your course work? Short on credits and need to catch up? Or just looking for something satisfying to do this Summer? A MassBay Summer Session course is the way to go!

Don't sweat it.
Check out MassBay's Summer Session Courses in:

Business
EMT
English
Health
History
Lab Sciences (such as Anatomy & Physiology, Biology, Microbiology)
Math
Social Sciences
and other transferable courses!

Classes meet Monday-Thursday so there's plenty of time left for other Summer activities.

To register or obtain additional information, call 781-239-2703.

MASSBAY COMMUNITY COLLEGE
Start here. Go anywhere.

Committe is flawed

HOWE from page 12

the Hoyas' home field.

This dropped Georgetown to third place in the conference and proved to be its second loss in three games.

So what does this committee do with these two teams?

Well, Georgetown is rewarded by dropping down in the standings and losing on its own home field by earning the 6-seed in the 16-team tournament and gets a date with a struggling Army squad.

UMass, however, stays at No. 8 and will welcome Syracuse to Garber Field for the second time in 15 days on Sunday afternoon at 1 p.m.

Wait, it gets better.

The Orange have been to the Final Four each and every single one of the last 22 years and are also the defending national champions.

If the Minutemen are able to get past the tournament juggernaut known as Syracuse, they will travel to Baltimore for the quarterfinals. Since the NCAA is trying to level the tournament playing field, all quarterfinal games are being played at neutral sites that were predetermined before the season started.

Oh, hold on about that one.

Providing Marist doesn't hand No. 1 Johns Hopkins its first loss of the season, the Blue Jays will be waiting eagerly for UMass (or Syracuse) to arrive at Homewood Field.

Oh, now I know why Homewood Field sounds so familiar.

It's actually the strip of land on the Hopkins campus where the lacrosse team has won a school-record 34 consecutive games. It's the 110-by-60-yard mass of land that attracts upwards of 8,000 screaming fans, and it is a place where no player on the current roster has ever lost.

So, throw the word "neutral" out the window.

To add to this, Towson, which was never ranked higher than 11th all season, came out of nowhere and jumped ahead of the Minutemen to gain the No. 7 seed. Towson won a grand total of one game over a tournament team, a 9-8 victory over Delaware on Sunday to win the Colonial Athletic Association championship.

The UMass men's lacrosse team has upset teams such as Georgetown, Syracuse and Hobart this season.

But here is where that starts to make sense.

Wayne Edwards, Towson's Director of Athletics, served on Sunday's selection committee.

There is nothing like tooting your team's horn while lounging at completely serious and objective meetings to determine the fate of each Division I team in America, especially when your team has a journey resume as impressive as Jessica Simpson's SAT scores.

Look, I'm not saying that there was a giant conspiracy theory created by the selection committee to ruin UMass' under-appreciated season.

What I am saying, though, is that the individuals on this selection committee are being trusted by millions of people to do their job to the best of their ability.

And right now, I don't believe this is happening.

Jeff Howe is a Collegian Columnist. He can be reached at jeffhowe@DailyCollegian.com

UM has found success in 2005

CREW from page 12

race the conditions favored us, it was a strong tailwind and we're a very light crew."

The Eagles finished a full seven seconds behind the Maroon and White at 6:40.77, to finish in second place.

In the lightweight eight division, the Maroon and White were able to finish in fourth place behind Ohio State, Marist, Villanova and the winners, Ohio State. The Minutewomen checked in with time of 7:44.57.

Due to inclement weather, the junior varsity four and novice races were all canceled this weekend.

"It was a little bit disappointing in that all of our boats did get a chance to race," Dietz said. "The way they run it at a regatta like this is that all of the races on Saturday were canceled, then on Sunday they started some of the races and when the boats started to sink they'd cancel the race."

UMass is off this weekend as it sits and waits to see if it will be selected to compete in the NCAA Championships that are taking place in Sacramento, Calif., beginning May 8th.

Even though the Minutewomen won both the A-10 and ECAC Championship, they are still not guaranteed an automatic birth in the NCAA. The way those work is they are set up as a team championship, with two varsity eight races and a varsity four.

"The best we can hope for is an at large bid for the varsity eight," Dietz explained. "[Crew] is basically a walk-on sport here at UMass, it's hard to get twenty plus athletes that are really at the highest caliber."

For the race, the NCAA invites twelve teams for the race and offer four at large bids for schools like UMass. However, there are about 70 teams that didn't make that team competition who are vying for those four bids.

"If we're ranked third or fourth in our region, we may be considered for the one of the at-large bids," Dietz said.

Long-shot surprised everyone

By Beth Harris
Associated Press

LOUISVILLE, Ky. — Giacomo didn't earn too many supporters with his shocking Kentucky Derby victory, starting with Hall of Fame trainers D. Wayne Lukas and Bobby Frankel.

Lukas said the 131st Derby was "the most bizarre of all."

While giving Giacomo a chance of winning the Preakness on May 21, Lukas agreed with Frankel that the colt won't sweep the Derby, Preakness and Belmont Stakes.

"You can chisel this in stone: There will not be a Triple Crown winner," Lukas said Sunday. "We got too many good horses that will upset the apple cart. The Preakness will be just as unpredictable. With all respect to the horse, (Giacomo) is beatable. He was beatable all spring."

Giacomo, who went off at 50-1 odds, had one victory in seven previous races before winning Saturday in the second-biggest upset in race history.

"You wouldn't think he's a Triple Crown horse. You got to like the horses who didn't fire in the Derby to win the Preakness," Frankel said, referring to 5-2 favorite Bellamy Road and Afleet Alex.

Frankel's horse, High Limit, finished last; he was badly cut and bled, but not injured seriously enough to rule him out of the Preakness.

Giacomo can expect to see some of the same rivals and a few new ones in Baltimore in two weeks.

Nick Zito's best finish among his five entries was seventh by Bellamy Road, owned by New York Yankees boss George Steinbrenner. Zito was clearly subdued Sunday, but resolved to try again in two weeks.

"We'll send something there. I don't know what," he said.

Also expected for the 1 3-16th-mile Preakness is third-place Afleet Alex, who will ship to Baltimore on Wednesday.

"It's a little shorter race, it's in our backyard and if he runs with the same courage, they will have to outrun him like they do most times. We have a heck of a shot," trainer Tim Ritchey said. "He came out of the race well."

Closing Argument is likely to challenge Giacomo again, too.

"We don't like to run back in two weeks, but this is not a normal situation, so we will probably be in Baltimore," trainer Kiaran McLaughlin said. "He came out of the race great and looks super."

Also possible for the Preakness are: Don't Get Mad (fourth in the Derby), Wilko (sixth) and Going Wild (18th). Trainer Todd Pletcher's duo of Flower Alley (ninth) and Coin Silver (12th) were on the list of maybes.

The likely newcomers are Scrappy T, Malibu Moonshine and Hal's Image.

"25 Days in Iraq: A Comic's Journey"
Comic Tom Irwin will be performing his one man show - full of humor, tragedy, and truth - at Tower Theaters on May 12th at 9pm and 11pm.
Tickets are $10.00
Don't miss this unique experience! This is Tom Irwin's only stop in Massachusetts!
For information or reservations call 533-FILM

South Hadley's Tower Theaters
533-FILM
www.westernmassburners.org
For more information about Tom Irwin, go to www.optruth.org

Spring Specials
$5 OFF Style Haircut
$15 OFF Any Foil Highlite
*With Andrea Only
Starting at $30
FREE Eyebrow Waxing
With any other salon service
Exclusively at: 549.5610
Styles by Deborah
65 University Drive, Amherst (413) 549-5610
Now also featuring hairstyling, manicures, pedicures and body waxing.

Softball has tradition

DUGGAN from page 12

right the past four years, as has Sortino's teams during her 26 year run at UMass.

This year's team is the latest installment in Sortino's long line of accomplished teams. UMass (34-14-1 13-3 Atlantic 10) finished the regular season on Sunday and now will look to capture its 17th A-10 Tournament Championship beginning on Thursday at Fordham University. If the Minutewomen win the A-10 Tournament they will lock up their 11th straigh NCAA Tournament appearance.

To see how UMass was able to get to this point, all one needs to do is look to Sortino's three principles.

Of the three values Sortino stresses, the team has struggled the most with playing excellent defense. It's not that UMass doesn't have good defensive players. It's just that there have been games when the team didn't seem focused, and the result was an abundance of errors.

The worst defensive game of the year for the Minutewomen came on May 3 in a game against Boston University. Somehow UMass managed to win the game 4-3 despite committing six errors.

Since that defensive nightmare, the Minutewomen have played better defense, allowing only five errors in their final five games. The improved defense didn't happen by accident. Sortino worked the team hard in practice and the results have followed.

While it took the defense almost three months to begin to show consistency, Sortino's highly touted offense has been producing since day one.

Sortino's lofty prediction that this would be one of the best offensive teams she has ever coached raised eyebrows considering that she has coached some very talented offensive teams. The thing that set this team apart in Sortino's eyes was its depth.

Players such as sophomore Candice Molinari are preparing for the A-10 championship on Thursday.

Hilary Puglia and KJ Kelley were both expected to be major contributors on offense this year, and they have not disappointed. Puglia has led the way (literally) all year. Batting in the leadoff spot, she reached base in an incredible 43 of the 47 games she played in. She boasts a .345 batting average, while providing some pop at the top of order with 10 home runs.

Kelley has had a monster year, posting an A-10 leading .397 batting average, and a team-best 12 home runs. The all-time school home run leader is in the top-10 in almost every offensive category in the A-10.

While Sortino anticipated that these two would have big years, it has been the production from players like Amanda Morin, Lauren Proctor and Denise Denis that have taken the offense to another level.

Morin started the year in a terrible slump, sporting a batting average under .100 over a month into the season. Somehow the sophomore worked her way out of the slump and hasn't stopped hitting since. She managed to raise her batting average to .280, and has reached base in 26 straight games.

Proctor entered the lineup on opening day, and hasn't left, starting all 49 games. The freshman outfielder has kept her spot thanks to her solid hitting, as she has been near the top of the A-10 in batting all year.

Denis moved into the starting lineup in her senior season and began the year as one of the team's hottest hitters. She finished the year as strong as she started it, carrying an 11-game hitting streak into the postseason. Her .363 batting average is second only to Kelley's on the team.

While these players have been prolific hitters all year, there have also been a number of other players who have stepped up when called upon and come through with clutch hits.

Sortino has emphasized defense and offensive depth all year, but her biggest focus has been on the team's improvement. She continually said that all she was looking for from her team was improvement from day-to-day.

This aspect of her coaching style is extremely familiar to Bill Belichick's one game at a time approach. Sortino's team is so focused on each day of practice and each game that it doesn't get caught up in winning streaks and postseason scenarios.

After playing a tough non-conference schedule early in the year, UMass found itself with a .500 record (11-11-1). The low point of the season came in a doubleheader sweep at the hands of A-10 rival Fordham on April 4. Since that time, UMass has won 23 of the 26 games it has played. The Minutewomen will carry a season-long 10 game winning streak into the A-10 Tournament, where they will get a shot at revenge against the top-seeded Fordham.

This year's team has bought into Sortino's system and has positioned itself to make some noise in the postseason. Now all it has to do is play good defense, have a balanced offensive attack and take things one game at a time.

Come to think of it, it shouldn't be too hard for this team to do that.

Dan Duggan is a Collegian Columnist.

DIVISION OF CONTINUING EDUCATION
Conservation Law Enforcement Officer TRAINING PROGRAM

This program qualifies graduates for seasonal law enforcement positions in environmental agencies, such as national, state, and local parks.

The program includes over 334 hours of instruction in (among other topics):

- Law Enforcement Techniques
- Firearms Training
- Detention and Arrest
- Defensive Tactics
- Crime Scene Management
- Search and Seizure
- Accident Investigation
- Federal Law and the U.S. Code
- Patrol Procedures
- Defensive Driving

Up to six undergraduate credits available during Spring 2006 semester.

2005-2006 INFORMATION:

SCHEDULE:
Saturdays and Sundays:
September 10-11, 24-25; October 8-9, 22-23; November 5-6, 19-20; December 3-4, 17-18, 2005. February 4-5, 18-19; March 4-5, plus Monday-Saturday: January 2-21 and March 13-18, 2006.
All sessions meet 8:00 a.m.-5:00 p.m.
Registration deadline/confirmation: September 2, 2005, or until class fills.

Registration materials and more information are available from:
Program Coordinators
Division of Continuing Education
University of Massachusetts
100 Venture Way, Suite 201
Hadley, MA 01035-9430
(413) 545-2484
progcoord@contined.umass.edu

MLB impacts homers

STEROIDS from page 12

"I don't know how much steroids had to do with it," Reds reliever Kent Mercker said. "Maybe the pitching got better."

Several players and managers cited the absence of San Francisco's Barry Bonds.

"I think if Barry were playing, you'd probably have that nine percent," Minnesota manager Ron Gardenhire said.

"The best hitter in baseball is on the DL," added Florida Marlins third baseman Mike Lowell. "I can't say it's steroids or the pitching. It might be a combination. If it was down 30 percent, I would say, Whoa, we've got to look at something.' Nine percent is a minimal variation."

Minnesota outfielder Shannon Stewart was among those who cited better pitching as the cause for the drop.

"There are guys that know how to make the ball move a little bit. To me, guys don't throw straight balls anymore, so it's a little tougher to hit the baseball," he said. "All it takes is a big swing and the ball's going to be out of the yard. That's all it takes, a good swing on that ball. That has nothing to do with steroids."

With the MLB investigating steroid abuse amongst players, home run numbers have decreased during the 2005 season.

Houston manager Phil Garner thinks pitching is a big part of it.

"We went through a period where we saw guys coming up to the big leagues who were throwing 87, 88, 89 mph. Now I see a bunch of guys coming up throwing 92, 94, 95," he said. "There might have been a drop in legal supplements, too...I'm seeing smaller players. It's unlair and wrong to assume that guy was on steroids, because supplementation can help too, and it's all legal."

Washington Nationals outfielder Jose Guillen judges by his own experience.

UMass fairs well at Atlantic 10

TRACK from page 12

he cleared the bar at 6-foot-four inches. In the long jump, Godinho recorded a jump of 22 inches to finish fourth.

Other notables for UMass were senior Ion Korhonen in the 1,500 meter run, senior John Iacobson in the 800 meter run and freshman Tyler Gasper in the javelin.

Korhonen, who was named 2005 Indoor Track Scholar-Athlete of the Year, finished in fifth place in the 1,500m. He crossed the line with a mark of 4:06.43, behind runners from Duquesne and La Salle. Joseph Fedorowicz, of La Salle, won the race with a time of 4:03.01.

In the 800m run, UMass' Iacobson finished just out of the top five, coming in sixth place. He ran the race in 1:56.09. La Salle's Patrick Nash won the race, finishing two seconds ahead of Iacobson at 1:54.44.

Gasper's javelin throw of 187 ft. gave UMass a meet-high 14 points in the event. His throw was good enough to finish in fifth place.

Over the weekend, the women scored a total sof 76.5 points. In all, the Minutewomen had 13 competitors finish in the top five of their respective events.

Starring for the Minutewomen was sophomore Katelyn O'Toole. Freshman Kristen Bakanowski and junior Ashley Creel. Bakanowski and O'Toole both finished in the top three in their events.

O'Toole competed in the high jump for the Minutewomen this weekend. She turned in a season-best mark of five-feet-five inches to finish in a tie for second place with Kristen Mlesky of Duquesne.

The 2005 A-10 Indoor Pole Vault Champion, Bakanowski, finished third in the event over the weekend. Both Bakanowski and Dusquesne's Allison McCartney were able to clear the bar at 10 feet, 11.75 inches. However, McCartney accomplished the feat first and therefore finished ahead of Bakanowski.

Creel also competed in the High Jump competition and finished right behind Bakanowski in fourth place. Her jump fell two inches short of her teammate's at five-foot-three inches even.

Singh wins Wachovia

By Keith Parsons
Associated Press

CHARLOTTE, N.C. — Sergio Garcia stood transfixed in front of a television set in the media tent, watching Vijay Singh beat Jim Furyk on the fourth extra hole in the Wachovia Championship.

Somehow, in a tournament that was his to lose, Garcia had done just that Sunday at Quail Hollow. He was eliminated on the first hole of the playoff after he three-putted for bogey.

"They say you learn more from your losses than your wins," he said. "And I've got a lot from this week to learn."

Singh and Furyk did their part, too.

Both shot 6-under 66s to equal the low round of the day, then matched each other par for par through three playoff holes. Finally, Furyk blinked, dumping his drive into the creek down the left side of the 18th fairway on the fourth extra hole.

With Furyk left scrambling for bogey, Singh saved par from the sand for his third victory of the year. And Garcia became the fifth player in PGA Tour history to lose a six-shot lead in the final round — the first since Greg Norman in the 1996 Masters.

At least Garcia finished with a 72. Nine years ago in Augusta, when Norman had a six-stroke lead over Nick Faldo, the Australian closed with a 78 and lost by five.

"Sometimes it's harder to play with a big lead," Singh said. "You don't want to lose the tournament. If the guys are catching up... you start to get a little nervous. But we played well."

Furyk birdied two of the final three holes in regulation, holing a 7-footer on the 18th to get into the playoff. But the third time he played the 18th was his downfall — he pulled his tee shot into the creek, took a penalty drop and laid up, then saw his fourth shot carom off the flag and into the rough.

"Just getting that close and not winning, sometimes it's a lot worse than finishing 11th," Furyk said.

Imagine how Garcia felt.

First, he squandered his six-shot lead in 12 holes. Then he got the lead back with consecutive birdies, only to slip into a tie when he went for the pin on the peninsula-green at the par-3 17th, went into the water and made bogey.

He three-putting from 45 feet on the first extra hole, missing a 6-footer for par.

"Unfortunately, the putts just weren't too good," Garcia said. "The second putt, I just didn't commit to it."

Even Singh tried to give this one away.

After four straight birdies at the turn to take a two-shot lead, he flubbed a chip behind the par-5 15th, turning birdie into bogey, and needed more help from Garcia to get into a playoff. The 25-year-old Spaniard delivered with his bogey on the 17th by going at the flag with a 7-iron.

"It was the perfect club. I just didn't hit a good shot," Garcia said. "I couldn't get the job done."

Singh likely won't earn enough points to replace Tiger Woods at No. 1 in the world, although he'll get that chance next week in the Byron Nelson Championship.

Nothing went right for Woods all week, even when he was finished.

After an eagle on the 15th and closing with a birdie, PGA Tour rules officials determined that he should not have moved a fence out of his way on the 10th hole after he pushed his drive to the right. It was damaged when the gallery joined in to help, and Woods received a two-shot penalty.

That turned his 69 into a 71 — leaving him in a tie for 11th — and he left the scoring trailer without comment.

Masters runner-up Chris DiMarco closed with a 66 to finish fourth, his third consecutive finish in the top five. Phil Mickelson was 9 under through 15 holes until dropping three shots over the final two holes for a 66 to tie for seventh.

No one expected the winner to be in doubt, with Garcia solidly in control of his game through three rounds. But after he missed a slippery 10-foot birdie putt on the first hole, he lipped out a 30-inch tap-in and made bogey.

Stadlers are bonding with golf

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

CONCORD, MA — Craig Stadler won an unexpected prize with his victory in the Bank of America Championship: A whole new view of fatherhood.

While Stadler was winning the golf tournament at Nashawtuc Country Club last summer, his son Kevin was picking up his first win on the minor-league Nationwide Tour, a victory that helped him earn a promotion to the PGA Tour. Since then, they have had a chance to play together in four tournaments, and now the elder Stadler is watching his younger son, Chris, learn the game.

"From a dad standpoint, it couldn't be any better," the eldest Stadler said when he returned to the course here Monday for media day.

The 1982 Masters champion, Stadler won 13 times on the PGA Tour and six other tournaments before joining the senior set. He was rookie of the year on the Champions Tour in 2003 and the player of the year last year, when he won five tournaments.

Stadler's victory in Concord was a memorable day because, even as he was signing the winning scorecard, Kevin was winning a playoff in the Lake Erie Charity Classic. Bob and David Duval are the only other father-and-son pair to win PGA-sponsored events on the same day.

"It was a phenomenal day all around," Craig Stadler said.

Kevin Stadler's victory helped him earn his 2005 PGA card. He has earned $167,265 on tour this year, with his best finish a tie for ninth in Tucson; he probably needs around $700,000 to keep his card for another year.

His father has joined him at four events, going out together on practice rounds and getting paired up at Pebble Beach for the tournament. But that might not be the best thing for Kevin's confidence.

"I beat him every week and I know that kills him," Stadler said, conceding that his son shot better at Pebble Beach, but they both missed the cut "so it doesn't count."

"He's brought it up, so he's obviously thought about it. But there's nothing I would love more than finishing 20th and seeing him finish top five," Craig said. "I'm not going to let him beat me, and he wouldn't want me to."

Stadler said he doesn't plan to play any more events this year on the main tour, so Kevin can have it all to himself. Stadler has also caddied for Kevin twice and both times his son played well, including a victory in his pro debut in the 2002 Colorado Open.

"I'm two-for-two and I think it is going to stay that way," Stadler said.

With no more playing with Kevin and no more caddying for him, either, Stadler turns to Chris. The 24-year-old just started playing last May and already has a good, strong swing, his father said.

"I had a ball caddying for (Kevin) and I had a ball playing with him. Now I'm having just as much of a ball doing the same thing with Chris," Craig Stadler said. "It's something new and different. He's loving the game."

Stadler will defend his Bank of America title on the 6,729-yard, par-72 Nashawtuc course June 24-26. This year marks the 25th anniversary of the Champions Tour, and the event in Concord is the only regular stop that has been around since the beginning.

As part of the celebration, the Bank of American Championship has invited all 18 different past champions back; only two have yet to commit.

The tournament has also retired its crystal trophy in favor of a bronze statue of a Revolutionary War Minuteman that better captures the flavor of the region. Each of the past champions will be given one of the new trophies.

NO OTHER PLACE IN THE WORLD OFFERS A SUMMER LIKE THIS.

The Summer Intensive Program in the Arts at The New School

SUMMER WRITERS COLONY • THE NEW YORK ACTOR
INDEPENDENT FILM • ART NEW YORK

June 6 - 24, 2005

Enroll for up to six credits in a three-week intensive program. Immerse yourself in the art and culture of New York City through daily classes supplemented by workshops, studio time, gallery tours, theater visits, and more. Writers, artists, filmmakers, actors, publishers, and critics will be your instructors for a unique academic experience. Housing is available.

Intensive Foreign Language Institute in Arabic and Chinese also available.

For more information call:
(800) 862-5039
or visit:
www.nsu.newschool.edu/summer

New School University
The New School
Greenwich Village, New York

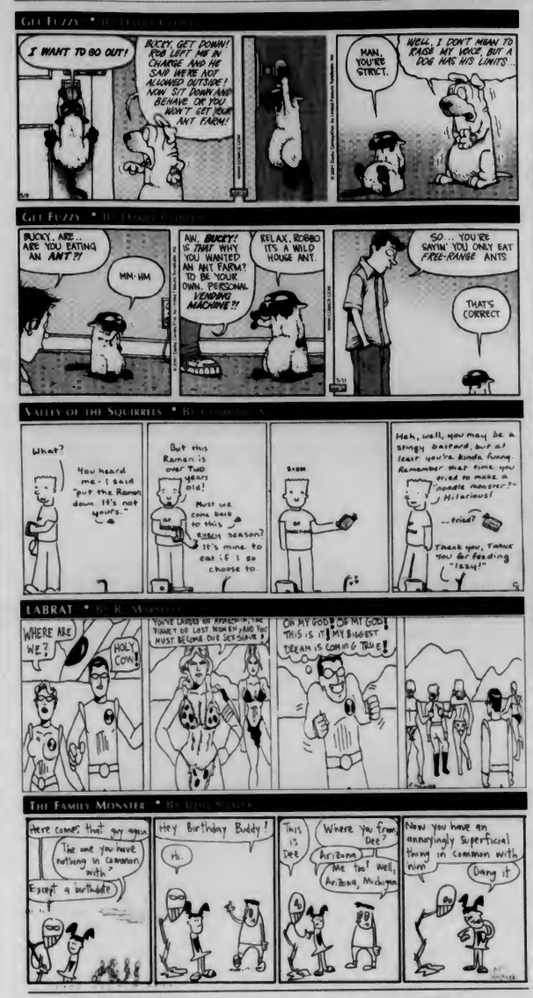
Only in New York. Only at The New School.

AMAX STORAGE

EASY ACCESS OFF RT 91 IN HATFIELD

•OPEN 7 DAYS 7AM TO 7PM •SECURE
•CLIMATECONTROLLED •KEYLESS GATE
•MOVING SUPPLIES •SURVEILLANCE CAMERAS

CALL ABOUT OUR PORTABLE SELF STORAGE "SCOUTS"
WE'LL DROP IT OFF, YOU FILL IT, WE PICK IT UP AND SECURE IT.
RENT WITH A FRIEND AND SAVE $$



413-247-3030
164 West Street • West Hatfield
www.amaxstorage.com

KISS A SENIOR Goodbye

Send your favorite Seniors a
UMass Amherst Champagne Glass
full of Hershey Kisses to celebrate graduation!

Only $6.00 per glass

Available online until May 6, 2005 at www.UMassAlumni.com/students
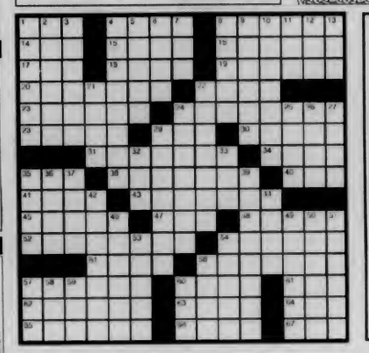
or at the
Student Alumni Association Table on the Campus Center
Concourse Tuesday, April 19 - Wednesday, May 11

Quote of the Day

"When we walk away from one thing/ We're just moving toward the next."



—Addison Groove Project

ACROSS
1 Venomous snake
4 Exchange
8 Old hags
14 Definite article
15 Possess
16 Attack verbally
17 Harden
18 Stravinsky or Sikorsky
19 Ultimatum alternative
20 Invigorate
22 Two squared
23 Required
24 Pseudonyms
28 Passion
29 Go wrong
30 Special delivery bird
31 Alphabet units
34 No sweat
35 Perform
38 Enunciation
40 Driving gadget
41 Gorcey and McKern
43 Peeped
45 Bread ingredient
47 Election victors
48 Jerry and Mae
52 Skilled in many ways
54 Point the finger at
55 Hollow tooth
56 Lowered oneself
57 Deli meat
60 Minute particle
61 Sch. grp.
62 Intl. assistance grp. for kids
63 Solitary
64 D-Day craft
65 Diner or lunchroom
66 Washington's item
67 Wide shoe width
DOWN
1 Greek goddess of wisdom
2 Black eye
3 Paired
4 Trenched in fear
5 Carried on
6 Stratford's river
7 For each
8 Sing like Bing
9 Second showings
10 Stuffed oneself
11 Score of zero
12 Golfer Ernie
13 Understand
21 Fan-mail recipient
22 Alternatives to bridges
24 Feign
25 Castle protector
26 Scottish Gaelic
27 Hebrides isle
29 Engraving
32 Involuntary spasm
33 Bribe
35 __ Romeo (Italian car)
36 Prison quarters
37 Implement
39 Recent arrival
42 Outermost portion
44 Art
46 Wanderer
49 Priest
50 African fly
51 Calm
53 Bring together
54 Make amends
56 Pack away compactly
57 Instigate litigation
58 Santa __ winds
59 Ignited
60 Pub choice

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NOW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
May Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles: Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Outdoor Deck Open
WED. •Breakaway soL
THU. •Apollo Sunshine
FRI. •Irish Seisiun
Sat: •Savoy Shuffle
No Cover!
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. - N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

Amherst Hairstylists
Caren's Place
Spring is Here!
Come in and get the attention you want!
•Free haircolor consultations
•We specialize in Multi-Color Highlighting and eyebrow shaping
•Facial and Body waxing
Walk-ins Welcome
Mon-Fri 10-6 Sat 10-4
54-1200
40 Main St Downtown Amherst
$2 off haircuts and/or 1/2 price haircut with this COUPON only
www.carensplace.com

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
The key is not to freak out. No matter what happens, don't freak out.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
Act fast — you're running out of time to get to know that certain person.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Today one of your friends is going to come out of hiding.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
As Uncle Jesse would say, "Have mercy!"

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
You should start planning your weekend festivities now.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
You are so busy, you don't even have time to be reading this right now.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
You should feed your turtle another Dorito.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
Just because you can't see them, doesn't mean they can't see you. Close the shades!

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
It's not easy, but somehow you manage to say the wrong thing every single time.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Remember, you owe your shoot friend a tall favor.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
The last thing anyone wants to hear about is how drunk you were.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
Any one can do that, but you're the only one who can do it in style.

Only two days left to submit a comic!

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-0600

3 Bedroom Puffton Apt
Starting June 1st $1285
Heat and Water included
Contact Lindsay 781-789-4988

Puffton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449.

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High speed internet included. Washer/Dryer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

APARTMENT FOR RENT

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@comcast.net Now open Saturdays 10-1

AUTO FOR SALE

1991 BMW 325I grey 90000 miles $3400 425-443-7839

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, tint. $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

EMPLOYMENT

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
Campusfundraiser is hiring outgoing students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 o $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cfrasp to apply.

EMPLOYMENT

[Lifeguard] Brandywine Apts. Needs a certified lifeguard. Full time. Must work some weekends. $9.00/hr. Call 549-0600. Or stop by office.

Camp Counselors – Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply online at www.pinebrook-camp.com

License LIFE and HEALTH insurance representative for sales and services of existing accounts. Excellent training, great commissions, career opportunity. Fax resume to: 508-757-1200

Moving: Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE) Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour; 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

Painters Helpers Call 413-253-9457

EMPLOYMENT

Responsible college students wanted for Franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown. (888)427-7672 Ext 445

Summer/Beyond. Local franchisee-Major healthy home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing Lucrative pay. 587-9500

Summer Jobs! In the Environment

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $8-$12/hr. (888)277-9787 www.collegepro.com

EMPLOYMENT

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necs. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part time, Full-time www.GetzedPrinting.com Call Dan 413-682-2020

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until late Spring. Then full-Time thru late August. Call 800-343-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

Make $75 taking online surveys www.moolyeah.com Counter help. Part time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe 60 Masonic St Northampton

FOR SALE

Kenmore Ice Sale. All connections and 24 CO2 tanks. Full Fridge $125 978-501-4397

Full Size bed for sale 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition $200 & Power must pick up (443) 904-6844

HOUSE FOR RENT

Expect to have few rentals coming up. Call during summer Sibiski Realtors (413) 586-1827 Northampton

House Hadley. Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

MISCELLANEOUS

www.butchbutts.com

Just Look Stupid

SERVICES

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Questions about our lease/security deposit deductions? Questions about subletting/assigning leases? Questions about the condition of your next house or apartment? Contact the Student Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center, 545-1995

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING. Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst 548-9992

SUBLET

Room Available June 16th, Aug 31st in Amherst Center. Call Noah 413-687-2365

Room in Northampton Close to Downtown Rent $600 Nego 413-230-1068

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS TUESDAY

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Lacrosse selection committee unfair towards UMass season

Jeff Howe

Throughout the season, we kept hearing the talk.

The Division I men's lacrosse polls didn't really mean too much. No one besides the fans and media paid any attention to them. The coaches and athletes just didn't care.

In due time, the NCAA Tournament selection committee would right any wrongs that were in the polls. Justice would eventually be served.

It's just too bad that everyone fell for that trap.

It isn't that anyone was lying or those voices were there to mislead us.

It is, however, that those voices were wrong.

The polls were usually irrelevant, and they always sparked some kind of a debate.

But the selection committee turned out to be worse.

In fact, the NCAA Tournament selection committee is a complete joke.

The brunt of this argument has to do with the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team, a team I spent the last three months covering.

On March 26, UMass dropped a 6-5 decision down at Loyola, but since then, the Minutemen haven't lost a single game and have spent very little time even trailing their opponents.

They have rallied off seven consecutive wins, knocking off three teams that are now in the tournament in the process (Penn State, Georgetown, Syracuse).

Since the dawn of April, they handed the Nittany Lions their last loss in 2005, won their 20th New England championship, upset No. 3 Georgetown and No. 7 Syracuse and won the ECAC championship.

UMass has lost two games all season — by a combined two goals. Eleven days before its loss to Loyola, the Maroon and White were tripped up 10-9 by tourney-bound Albany in New York.

Here is where it gets sketchy, though.

The Minutemen were the eighth-ranked team in the country heading into last weekend. Georgetown was No. 7. (Remember that both teams are in the ECAC and that UMass beat the Hoyas 13-12 on April 23 in Amherst.)

The Garber Gorillas drop-kicked Rutgers in New Jersey on Saturday, 13-7, to win the ECAC crown. The next day, Penn State held off Georgetown 13-12 in overtime on

See HOWE on page 9

ANDREW TASH/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Sean Morris led the UMass lacrosse team in goals with 39 on the season. The Minutemen will host rival Syracuse again this Sunday.

Minutemen rebound

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team will look to carry the momentum of their first series victory when they travel to Portland, Maine for a 3 p.m. game against Maine.

After struggling through most of the season, the Minutemen (11-30 5-13 A-10) have rebounded in the latter part of the season and have won five out of their last nine games. This past weekend they won two out of three games in their series against Temple.

The current UMass batting average of .246 has risen .048 since their average was .198 going into the UConn game on April 12. The UMass bats have also awaken during crunch time, as the Maroon and White scored all three of their runs in the ninth inning in their 3-2 win over Temple Sunday.

"We're definitely getting better," head coach Mike Stone said. "We won a real good come from behind game this weekend. [Sophomores] Anthony Santos and Travis Munsey have been coming through in the clutch and [sophomore] Bryan Adamski has been getting on base. Freshmen Ryan Franczek, Andy Tuetken and Bryan Garrity are all getting their feet wet. We're getting valuable experience."

The first win of the weekend for the Minutemen was led by junior ace Matt Torra, who threw his second straight complete game shutout. Torra was named the Atlantic-10 Pitcher of the Week for the third time this year.

The Pittsfield native leads the A-10 conference in earn run average (1.13), opponents batting average (.174) and strikeouts (87). No hitter has been able to hit a home run or triple off him this year.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Sophomore Bill Rankin and the UMass baseball team look to add to its series defeat of Temple.

Torra has worked his way into being considered one of the best pitchers in UMass history.

"He's got to be right up there with [Seattle Mariners pitcher] Ron Villone," Stone said. "Matt has created a lot of interest within scouting directors. When you just dominate in seven innings, it makes a lot of people interested in him."

The Black Bears (27-13 10-5 America East) ranks second in the America East standings, but has the best overall record among their conference opponents.

Maine features seven players over .300 and five players with 20 or more runs batted in. Sophomore left fielder Ryan Quintal leads the team in two offensive categories, BA (.360) and RBIs (32). The Manchester, NH native sits in the clean-up spot.

There is plenty of firepower around Quintal. In the number three spot in the batting order, sophomore Joel Barrett is hitting .348 with six homers and 31 RBIs. The lead-off spot, however, has the most power in the line-up with senior Greg Creek hitting eight home runs. Creek also has a team-leading .451 on-base percentage.

To finish the offensive charge, the Black Bears have a pair of speed demons on the base paths that are both hitting over .300 in freshman Curt Smith (10 stolen bases) and junior Joe Hough (20 stolen bases).

Smith was also America East Rookie of the Week for the fourth time. Smith batted .417 for the Black Bears in three games at Stony Brook. He scored two runs and drove in four. He is also second on the team in hitting with a .351 average.

"I think they are very good team, but you can't be intimidated," Stone said. "We won't back from anybody. They're a good team and they will be a real challenge for us."

Sophomore right-handed pitcher Chris Lloyd earned his second start of the year after his performance against Siena.

"He's a fastball pitcher with a good curveball," Stone said. "Hopefully, his experience from last week will carry over to this week."

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Senior Keith Doherty has 31 strikeouts on the season. The team will play Maine today at 3 p.m.

Sortino built legacy

Dan Duggan

After 26 years as coach of the Massachusetts softball team, Elaine Sortino could probably fill a book with all of the phrases she has used to talk about her team and what it needs to do to be successful.

This year the Hall of Fame coach has said three things repeatedly about her team.

The first thing Sortino said is something that almost every coach says: defense wins championships.

The second thing Sortino has said pertains specifically to this year's team: that the Minutewomen would be one of the best offensive teams she has ever coached, highlighted by its depth.

And the final thing Sortino has said from the beginning is that she expected her team to improve everyday, and if it did that then it would be a strong team by the time the postseason began.

While Sortino has been spouting these beliefs all year, the interesting thing has been seeing her players buy into what she says. Often times as the season went on interviews with players resulted in answers remarkably similar to what Sortino had said.

This may seem like a minor event, but it shows that Sortino's players have bought into her system and believe she knows what is best for the team. If you need any evidence of how powerful having a team believe in its coach is, just look at a certain football team in Foxboro that trusts its coach in any situation. That team has done all

See DUGGAN on page 9

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Junior catcher KJ Kelley is one piece of UMass coach Elaine Sortino's legacy. Kelley was recently honored as the A-10 Player of the week.

Track dominates

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's track and field teams each had a competitor take home an Atlantic 10 title this past weekend in Richmond, Va. at the A-10 Championship Meet.

On the women's side, junior Christina Huff won her first league title in the 100 meter dash, as her team finished seventh. The men finished sixth, with senior Mike Carr winning the javelin event.

Huff's time in the race was recorded at 12.07 in her second sprint, which is a season best for her. In the preliminary race, on Saturday, she finished second but was able to step up her performance on Sunday to take the event.

Carr's throw of 204-foot-nine inches was his second best mark of the season. Earlier this year he was able to record a throw of 209 ft. even. He has already qualified to compete in the IC4A Championships.

Overall, the men's team recorded 61 total points on the weekend, 16 of which were recorded by junior James Godinho for a team high mark. He competed in the 400-meter dash, the long and high jump competitions.

In the 400m, Godinho just missed all-conference honors, finishing in fourth place with a time of 47.78. He also finished fourth in the high jump where

See TRACK on page 10

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

The UMass track team has been on a roll lately, with athletes such as Kristen Bakanowski contributing to the success.

Crew racks up achievements

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's crew team's trophy case is filling up more by the week. Along with winning the Eastern College Athletic Conference National Invitational Rowing Championships, the Minutwomen broke the course record and set a new Metro Cup record at Regatta State Park in Worcester, Mass. this past weekend.

The win marks three straight years that UMass has won the ECAC crown. This came just two weeks after the Minutewomen successfully defended their Atlantic 10 title for the 10th straight year.

UMass' varsity eight squad beat out the likes of Boston College, Colgate, San Diego and Rhode Island. The record-setting time for the Minutewomen checked in at 6:33.69.

"That will probably stand for about 20 years," UMass coach Jim Dietz said. "They very rarely ever get a tailwind in Worcester."

Members of Minutewoman varsity eight included sophomore Ellen Maskrey, senior Lea Jakobsen, junior Gabrielle Papineau, sophomore Hannah Brewster, junior Stephanie Hopf, junior Katie Berger, senior Faith Harkins, junior Catherine Gariepy and sophomore Kristina Ferraro on coxswain.

"The team is getting much faster week by week, they're picking up a lot of speed," Dietz said. "Coming into this

See CREW on page 9

HR numbers are down

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — In the first year of toughened steroid testing, home runs are down in the major leagues for the first time since 2002.

Florida Marlins pitcher Todd Jones doesn't think it's a coincidence. He's convinced there's a connection.

"Unfortunately I do. I hate it, but there has been a correction made in the system, and the numbers are going to suffer for a couple of years," he said Monday. "I hate to admit it because I didn't want to. I'm as disappointed as any fan would be that it's going to end up showing to be the truth. But it's got to be good for the game to get back to an even playing field. I just didn't realize how deep it was."

An average of 1.97 home runs were hit in games through Sunday, down 8.8 percent from the 2.16 average in the first five weeks of last season, according to the Elias Sports Bureau. It's the lowest level for the first five weeks since 2002's 1.93 average and below the 2.14 average of the last decade.

"I think five weeks is too short a statistical sample to draw any conclusions," said Bob DuPuy, baseball's chief operating officer. "There are a myriad of factors that could influence that, including the cold and wet spring training we had in Florida, the weather in the first few weeks of the season."

But Los Angeles Angels bench coach Joe Maddon, who has been in professional baseball since 1975, thinks testing "could be tied to it somehow."

"I don't know exactly to what extent, but you see people maybe not as big as they had been in the past or don't look as strong as maybe they had been in the past," he said. "Some balls are hit pretty well, but they're not carrying like maybe they had in the past couple of years. So, just being a thinking person, and you know what's been going on, you have to tie them together a little bit."

Runs per game are down 5 percent, from 9.72 to 9.23, and hits declined 3.1 percent, from 18.37 per game to 17.80. The major league batting average dropped from .265 to .261.

"I don't think that's necessarily the cause," Tigers closer Troy Percival said of steroids. "And I only say that because being in Detroit, I've never seen weather being this cold day in and day out all the way through the central part of the country and the East Coast."

There have been exceptions. Pitchers on the Cincinnati Reds gave up a major league-high 49 homers in their first 30 games. They are on pace to break the team record of 236 they set last year, which was three short of the NL record.

See STEROIDS on page 10

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Wednesday, May 11, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXIV Issue 136

Thousands may lose grant

By Jamie Mason
Collegian Correspondent

It is projected that some 3,000 UMass students may begin losing their Federal Perkins Loans this fall because of President Bush's new budget that seeks to cut the loan program, although increase in some cases money available in Federal Pell Grants.

The loss of the Perkins loans would mean about a quarter-million dollars less in financial aid through that program for UMass students next year, according to the UMass Financial Aid Office, while there is no assurance that the Pell program will, in fact, be increased.

"Normally we have had $2.7-$3 million to distribute in Federal Perkins loans in a year," said Ken Burnham, the director of financial aid.

At present, the funding for the Perkins loan comes in two forms. The first is from repayment of old Perkins loans-students who take out the loan pay it back, and those paybacks are redistributed to other students as new loans. The second form is from what have been, until now, annual allocations to the program from the Federal government.

According to Burnham, "Under the new proposal, the repayment money from the Federal Perkins loan has to be given back to the Federal government, rather than redistributed to the students." Although this won't go into effect just yet, it would ultimately require institutions to return all former allocations of Perkins loans to the Federal government, he said.

The piece of the proposal that would go into affect in the fall would stop the annual federal allocations for Perkins loans. This would leave only repayment money available for new loans. On the UMass campus, this means students would lose a total of $241,000 in Perkins loans next year.

Although the Perkins loan program has been around since the '50s, the Bush budget proposal would mean, "a return of many, many millions of dollars, which will abolish the loan program as we know it," Burnham said.

Alana Melanson, a sophomore journalism major who works in the financial aid office, said the changes will cost her, as well as many others.

"I will have to get a bigger alternative loan next year because I won't have the Federal Perkins loan," she said.

The Perkins loan can be used

See PERKINS on page 2

New Library shop dubbed the 'Procrastination Station'

The small café in the W.E.B. DuBois library will remain nameless no more. The contest to pick a name for the café has ended and a winner chosen: The Procrastination Station.

The contest consisted of over 60 different entries according to Leslie Schaler the communication assistant of the Communica-tion and Development Depar-tment of the library. After all the entries were handed in the library administration narrowed the field down to ten, then the library staff narrowed the choices even further to five.

The final decision was handed over to the students of which over 200 voted. The Procrastination Station received twice as many votes as any other choice. The other four choices were No Food Beyond this Point Café, Café DuBois, Take a Break Cafe, and Perk 'n Circ (as in circulation).

Kryssi Jacobson, an Aninul Science major from Boxford Massachusetts, was the student who submitted the winning name. Being a regular in the library she frequents the café often and when she heard that most of the entries that had already been submitted were boring she decided to come up with her own name.

"I didn't think that it would be popular, but I guess it was," said Jacobson. "it was actually more of a joke."

For entering the winning name Jacobson wins a month of free coffee. "I was really excited about the coffee," said Jacobson upon finding out that the cafe will be named the Procrastination Station. "I thought it was kind of cool that everyone will be calling [the cafe] that, but it was more the free coffee."

In addition to the café there are many other major renovations going on in the library. New comfortable seating has been added to the second floor and more is planned for the lobby. Carpeting as well as a stand-up coffee bar and new service desks are also being added to the lobby. New self-check out machines have also just been added.

—Dan Terk

ANDREW TASH/DAILY COLLEGIAN

Students put off studying and wait in line at the new snack shop, the "Procrastination Station", in the library.

Country tightens lab supply security; UMass takes actions

By Erik Rotthmayr
Collegian Correspondent

Laboratory suppliers and laboratories across the country are tightening security to insure dangerous materials aren't used to create a bio-weapon — and though the materials secured at UMass may not be as dangerous, UMass officials are taking no chances here, either.

The potential for danger looms, partly because access to potentially sensitive materials is only a click away, they say. Several companies online offer new or refurbished lab equipment for sale. Fume hoods, test tubes and petri dishes to culture mediums are available from various companies across the United States.

"This is common, everyday lab, catalog stuff," said Dan Cooley, Associate Professor of Plant Pathology in the UMass Microbiology Department. Biological supply houses offer "everything from temperature-controlled incubators to petri dishes, and nutrients necessary to culture organisms," that could be used, in combination, to produce a potential threat.

For example, in the American Type Culture Collection catalogue, a number of organisms that are listed by the Centers for Disease Control as bioterrorism agents, are available for sale. Cholera, Rocky Mountain spotted fever and E. Coli are a few agents listed on the Web site.

Since 9-11, however, ordering the organisms may not be so easy. An account must be set up, for example, with American Type Culture Collection (ATCC) before any organisms are purchased. Certain materials require a federal permit issued by the Office of Public Health and Safety. Some require one or more permits before distribution. Customers are notified when orders are received without the necessary permits and are given two months to supply the permit before orders are cancelled.

All such materials in the United States are subject to an array of regulation by the federal Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, Energy, Health and Human Services, Interior, Justice, Labor, State, Transportation, Treasury, and the Environmental Protection Agency, and the non governmental International Air Transport Association according to the CDC (http://www.cdc.gov/od/sap/).

According to David Pollack, a graduate student working in Morrill lab on chlamydia, "ATCC does a very good job of controlling what gets out. We can't even get strains of chlamydia because of control procedures. You can order anything, but they won't always sell it to you."

At UMass labs, such organisms are kept in a minus 80-degrees-Celsius freezer or in liquid nitrogen.

"You have to know what to look for and where," Pollack said. In addition, some samples need specific media or nurture to survive, according to Dmitry Kuksin, another graduate student at the Morrill lab.

The best defense against unwanted taking of materials is lab personnel knowing each other, Pollack said. If someone unfamiliar comes around, people ask questions, he said. Signs are posted on the doors with information about what materials are being used in the lab. Organisms listed on the lab signs range from chlamydia and E. Colt to arboviruses, arthropod borne viruses that include Colorado Tick Fever and Ross River. After 6 p.m., the lab is locked down, Pollack said.

"Nothing is leaving this place. We keep inventory and after hours this place is under lock and key," he added.

On campus, the Environmental Health and Safety Department is responsible for campus safety and for reviewing any operations that can pollute the air, water, and environment, including biological operations. The biological safety program of the department is concerned with protecting laboratory personnel and the environment from biohazardous and carcinogenic substances.

According to James Field, hazardous materials control manager for Environmental Health and Safety, "Safety is the number one thing. We maintain strict inventory control, and track of where organisms are. Some of the labs on campus don't allow you inside unless you are authorized by the federal government. There are all sorts of precautions for safety measures," said Field.

Not too much is kept on campus that can affect humans, and security is being strengthened around those that do, Field said. Environmental Health and Safety is looking into the cost of card-key locks for some labs to keep track of who's going in and out, he said.

See LAB on page 2

Independent filmmaker introduces her film to SOM

By Mike Sances
Collegian Staff

Around 40 people attended the screening of a documentary film on the lives of female Palestinian prisoners Thursday evening in the School of Management.

"Women in Struggle," the first film from director Buthina Canaan Khoury, chronicles the experiences of four former political prisoners, all of them jailed for participating in an armed resistance against the Israeli occupation.

Consisting mostly of interviews with the four women, whose experiences in prison date back to the 1970's, the narration is frequently set to a backdrop of footage of the occupied territories of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Khoury, the film's director, was on hand to introduce her work, warning the audience that what they would be seeing would be "heavy."

Many of the women, for example, recounted graphic descriptions of torture while undergoing interrogation.

Trying to recall the worst part of her interrogation, one woman says that it would have to be when her questioners produced her father and tried to force him to sleep with her.

"I was worried he would die" from the trauma of the experience, she says, "that something major in him would die."

Two women featured in the film, Aysha and Rasmieh Odeh, are both in their fifties. Sentenced to life, they were released as part of a prisoner exchange program that began in 1985, ultimately serving 10 years each. Also shown is Rawdah Basir, in her late forties, who served eight years with "Extravaganja," has a political history oriented toward marijuana's decriminalization and legalization.

With the support of the Cannabis Reform Coalition of the University of Massachusetts, Amherst voters approved a non-binding referendum March 28, 2000 that directed local police to "deprioritize" marijuana enforcement and also urged lawmakers to repeal anti-marijuana laws. The measure passed 1,659 to 981. In 1976, Amherst Town Meeting approved a measure calling for marijuana's legalization.

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Buthina Cannan Khoury introduced the screening of her film last Thursday in SOM.

Terry Bulatta, the fourth woman featured in the film, says she has been in and out of prison several times.

Terry recalls the beginnings of her political career, when she was involved in student demonstrations in which the Palestinian flag was raised, a practice outlawed at the time.

The backgrounds of the other women sometimes involved violence.

"To be honest with you, I have done it all," says Rawdah in the film, admitting that after the 1967 war that began the occupation, her family's home became a "central point for resistance fighters."

Imprisoned after a failed bomb plot killed one

See WOMEN on page 2

Local politician wants to decriminalize and legalize pot

By Georgia Kelley
Collegian Correspondent

SPRINGFIELD — A Tenth Hampden District republican candidate for state representative wants to decriminalize and legalize marijuana in Massachusetts.

George Vazquez, a University of Massachusetts Amherst alum, said that cannabis should be legalized for medicinal and personal purposes.

In an interview, Vazquez said that alcohol is a more destructive drug than marijuana.

"I've never heard of someone ripping off their parents or selling themselves to get high," Vazquez said. "You're not hurting anyone when you smoke a joint."

Vazquez said that the state would benefit from the decriminalization and legalization of marijuana.

"It's just like cigarettes," he said. "Do you know how much the state makes off of cigarettes in excess tax — around 41cents a pack. Why can't we do that for marijuana?"

Vazquez said that in his judgment, the nefarious effects some attribute to marijuana are overrated.

"Some studies say that marijuana burns you out. I don't believe that," Vazquez said. He noted "The Compassionate Use Act" that Californians passed in 1996 that legalized marijuana for medicinal purposes.

"You can get a note from your doctor that prescribes you marijuana, head down and pick it up," Vazquez said.

Although he said he has never smoked pot, Vazquez said that everyone should have the right to do so if he or she wishes.

"It's all about life, liberty and property, not what you smoke or ingest," he said. "Liberty, Liberty, Liberty."

Vazquez also expressed strong feelings about privacy issues surrounding cannabis.

"Smoking in the privacy of your own home is one thing," he said. "You own it, you should be able to do what you want. For example, I don't want the cops to be able to just barge in if they smell marijuana or see a bong on your table," he said.

Vazquez said new anti-marijuana commercials recently put out by the Office of National Drug Control Policy and the Partnership for a Drug-Free America are intemperate.

"It's all propaganda," he said. "It's instilling fear across the nation."

Vazquez, a Republican lost to incumbent Rep. Cheryl Rivera, D-Springfield 5,867 to 2,323. He said he will run again in the 2006 election, partly on the issue of legalizing marijuana. This time, he said he plans to raise more money and avoid comments like those he made in 2004 when he said his opponent had a "lesbian agenda."

The Amherst community, which celebrated cannabis April 23 on the Amherst town common

COURTESY UNKNOWN

Local Republican George Vasquez wants to decriminalize pot.

Massachusetts man fakes cancer illness

BOSTON — A man accused of fabricating letters in an attempt to secure $6 million in credit for his employment placement company now faces revocation of his bail for allegedly producing another fake letter — this one claiming he has terminal cancer and is close to death.

Michael W. Alcott, 45, of Scituate, indicted in September on federal charges of bank fraud and making false statements to financial institutions, was originally planning to plead guilty last month, according to the U.S. attorney's office.

Instead, he told the court that he wanted to reconsider his plea because he had cancer.

He presented to the court a lengthy letter on Massachusetts General Hospital letterhead from a radiation oncologist that said he had prostate cancer that had spread to his lymph nodes.

The letter also said Alcott had a "0 percent survival rate beyond two years" and that "any further stress into Mr. Alcott's life will only serve to lessen the amount of quality time that he has left."

Alcott admitted to a court officer that he did not have cancer and was taken into custody on Monday after Judge Patti B. Saris ruled that the letter was a fake.

Alcott's attorney, Kevin Barron, said while his client does not have cancer, he does have a variety of other illnesses, which he did not specify.

Officials at Massachusetts General Hospital declined comment while they looked into the incident.

A hearing on full revocation of bail has been scheduled for next Monday.

—Associated Press

ARTS & LIVING
FAMILY GUY RETURNS TO FOX
Fans celebrate as new episodes air every sunday.
PAGE 8

EDITORIAL/OPINION
JOURNALISTIC INTEGRITY QUESTIONED
With recent attacks against journalistic accuracy, how will the media persevere?
PAGE 6

WEATHER
TODAY Rain, H70° L 41°
TONIGHT Sunny, L 41°
TOMORROW Partly Cloudy, H68°, L49°

SPORTS
A UMASS TRADITION
Brett Garber is the third generation of Garbers to leave their mark on UMass men's lacrosse.
PAGE 14

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Marzelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
Night Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Copy Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Loxley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Advertising Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kuggans
Finance Manager Hirak Shah
Accounting Clerk Virginie Precourt
Human Resource Sandra Marquart
Production Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Operations Linda Wallack
Assistant Advertising Josh Greenberg
Assistant Business Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Events Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Graphics Advisor Charlie Higgins
Asst. Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Asst. Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brenster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

Students may lose grant

PERKINS from page 1

to help any eligible student with need, whereas the Pell grants help only the most needy students, said Burnham.

Some 4,400 students at UMass receive Federal Pell grants, Burnham said. While that number probably won't change, he said, the federal budget proposal would increase the maximum Federal Pell grant by $300 a year, from $4,050 to $4,350.

But getting more money from the Pell Grant won't be easy, either, Burnham said, because of changes in what families will be expected to pay.

"How the Expected Family Contribution (EFC) is calculated has been changed," Burnham said. "In Massachusetts, the change increases the Expected Family Contribution, so [fewer] people will be eligible for the Federal Pell Grant, whose eligibility ranges from $0-3,850," said Burnham.

In the past, students who received the Federal Pell grant usually would have been in the lower expected family contribution range; "the more needy of the needy," Burnham explained.

"With the Expected Family Contribution calculation changing," he said, "the least needy of the needy may fall out of grant packaging. Financial aid will pick up these students and replace the lost Pell with institutional grants [that UMass comes up with from other sources]. So these students will see less Pell, but more institutional money," he said.

The problem, he explained, comes in that the financial aid department has used the Perkins loan to help students, for one, to buy new computers; it is used in almost all cases of computer appeals, Burnham said.

A student can be eligible for additional student loans to help students purchase a computer when they fill out a budget appeal form stating the additional expense of the computer and providing documentation of the cost of the computer.

"Utilizing loan funds for this may be more difficult," Burnham said. "I anticipate we will run out of Perkins loans, but alternative loans [those taken out, at higher interest rates, from banks and other lenders] will be available as a means to buy computers."

Until now, the department has also used the Perkins loan to help students going abroad.

To do so, Melanson said, "we increase your loans through the Federal Perkins loan because you can't use your work study money when you are abroad."

Burnham said, "We hope that we will be able to continue helping students going abroad because there are not a tremendous amount of students [who go]. This year was difficult because we ran out of financial aid money three-quarters of the way through the year."

The financial aid available for students is increased for those going out-of-the country for school because they usually have more expenses than a traditional UMass student. Because the Perkins loan may now be less available, the financial aid office may have a harder time doing so, he said.

Burnham does not want to lose the Federal Perkins loan because, "we want as many tools and variety of aid in our toolbox to help as many students as possible."

"We like the increase in the Federal Pell grant, but not the elimination of the Federal Perkins loan," Burnham said.

"In the past the government has increased the Pell without taking away the Perkins loan. The Pell grant will help the higher need students, but will not replace the lack of the Perkins loan."

Sailors found hundreds of miles off coast of Va.

PORTSMOUTH, Va. — One of two sailors washed overboard in rough seas hundreds of miles off the Virginia coast was pulled to safety on a merchant ship early Monday and the body of the other was found soon afterward, the Coast Guard said.

Lochlin Reidy, 58, of Woodbridge, Conn., was found about 400 miles east of Virginia Beach about 4 a.m. after a C-130 Coast Guard plane saw a strobe light in the ocean and flew over the area to check on it, said Officer Krys Hannum, a Coast Guard spokeswoman.

She said Reidy was found wearing a life jacket with the light and was taken aboard the Sakura Express, a Panamanian-flagged tanker that was one of four merchant vessels searching for the men since early Sunday.

The body of Thomas Tighe, 65, of Patterson, N.Y., the boat's captain, was discovered at 5:45 a.m. and was recovered by the crew of the Sakura Express, the Coast Guard said.

The tanker, with Reidy and the body of Tighe on board, was scheduled to sail into Boston Harbor around 9 a.m. Tuesday. A Coast Guard response team was scheduled to meet the tanker in the harbor, about 3 miles from shore, and return to Boston.

—Associated Press

UMass tightens security

LAB from page 1

In addition, a campus institutional biosafety committee reviews activities of a potentially hazardous nature.

According to Maureen C. O'Leary, biosafety and environmental program head of Environmental Health and Safety, "After 9-11, I think all labs have increased their security in some respects. The select agent program has become much stricter."

For example, when filling forms to conduct laboratory work on campus, a student must check off appropriate notices when using biohazardous materials. The forms are intended, in part, to notify Environmental Health and Safety what materials are being used and helps to track the different organisms on campus. Lab users must also send in a form detailing what they're working with before they start the work, said O'Leary.

"If any of the organisms pose a threat to the environment or people, they contact me, and there's a biohazard form to fill out. I do lots of discussions with them about their research and about disinfecting materials and working with dangerous substances like blood and body fluids," she said.

UMass labs run up to biosafety level two, said O'Leary. On the biosafety scale, four is the highest and one is the lowest, according to the National Institutes of Health.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Andrew Tamalynas
COPY EDITOR
Chris Gazzara
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Cory Rosenberg
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nate Freedman, Josh Wenner

School of Management views independent film

WOMEN from page 1

fighter but no one else, Rawdah is unapologetic about her past transgressions with the Israeli army, contending that, at the time, all peaceful means had been exhausted. The occupation, moreover, had not been achieved through "demonstrations and petitions."

Today, all of the four women have chosen other paths, though they still view them as methods of resistance. Rasmieh, for example, works as a lawyer; Aysha is an artist.

"I used to think that I could change humanity," she says, recalling her earlier, more militant days. "Now I know that I can't change humanity, but I can change this paper, and instead of it being blank it will be something of my making."

In the discussion that followed the film, many audience members expressed admiration for the women. "I just love them," said one woman of the former prisoners, calling Khoury's film "a beautiful tribute to them and to the human spirit."

Asked what persuaded her to pick these four women in particular, Khoury said that out of 39 hours of film, accumulated over four years spent filming in the occupied territories, these four stood out in terms of dignity and perseverance. As for the age, she said that "the older the women are, the wiser they are to deal with the suffering."

There are currently 7000 Palestinians in Israeli jails, according to the New York Times. 108 are women.

Khoury, who was born and raised in Taybeh, a West Bank town famous for its beer, was educated in filmmaking and photography in Boston. Thursday's showing marked the close of a three-month tour of her film around the country.

Khoury said that the reactions from audiences in the United States differed from those in Europe, where the film has been shown in Belgium, Spain, Germany, and Italy, and will soon be shown in France. The European audiences, said Khoury, tended to be more affected by the film, while in the States viewers typically "are not much aware" of the plight of Palestinian prisoners.

The goal of the film, she said, was to help raise awareness of issues of human rights in the occupied territories.

Class isn't over yet.
Students enjoy the summer weather in front of the Student Union yesterday. The weather is expected to be more of the same this week.

National News

Father suspected in girls' slaying

By Anna Johnson
Associated Press

Laura Hobbs, right and her best friend Krystal Tobias both eight years old, were found dead next to a ravine on Mother's Day.

ZION, Ill. — Arthur Hollabaugh says he had searched through the night for his missing granddaughter when he spotted something in bushes part way down a ravine: a child's bicycle.

Minutes later, he said Tuesday, his son-in-law, Jerry Hobbs, was screaming that he had found the bodies of his 8-year-old daughter, Laura Hobbs, and her best friend, Krystal Tobias, who disappeared together on a Mother's Day bike ride.

"I went and I seen them from a distance," Hollabaugh, 51, told The Associated Press. "It was clear they were laying there."

Laura and 9-year-old Krystal were stabbed repeatedly and left a few yards off a wooded bike path near their homes in this small city near the Wisconsin line. On Tuesday, a memorial of flowers and balloons marked the area where the bodies were found a day earlier.

Police weren't commenting on the case Tuesday morning, but Hollabaugh said investigators were questioning his son-in-law and had also talked to Laura's siblings about Hobbs.

Donald Meadie, assistant commander of the Lake County Major Crime Task Force, confirmed late Monday that Jerry Hobbs had been questioned but said there were no suspects.

He declined to comment further.

Hollabaugh said Hobbs had just returned to the area about a month earlier to reunite with Laura's mother after serving time in a Texas prison.

"Jerry just got out of prison for aggravated assault and I think they're holding that against him," Hollabaugh said.

"I don't think he did it."

Hobbs could not be reached for comment Tuesday; Hollabaugh said he was still with the police.

Police searched the family home and Hollabaugh said they took measurements of his shoe soles.

"They went through our stuff, took clothes," he said, adding that they took the computer to see if the girl had been on any Internet chat rooms.

Grief counselors were being brought to Beulah Park Elementary, where the girls were best friends in the same second grade class.

The pupils just read "Charlotte's Web" and "A Taste of Blackberries," both of which deal with loss, school superintendent Constance Collins said Tuesday.

"I think that those stories will serve as an excellent backdrop for what we're going to have to deal with today," she told ABC's "Good Morning America."

The girls' bodies were discovered in Beulah Park about four blocks from the school on Monday shortly after dawn. Police said no weapons were found and there was no evidence of sexual assault.

Zion, along Lake Michigan, was founded in 1901 by a religious faith healer as a utopian community.

It has about 22,000 residents but retains a quiet, at times rural feel despite being on the edge of both the Chicago and Milwaukee metropolitan areas.

Laura Unrein, who lives near Beulah Park, said the area where the bodies were found is well known as a place to avoid.

The heavily wooded park has a paved bike path, a ravine and trails made by mountain bikes.

"There have been incidents of kids beating up people and taking their wallets and park rangers have had to shoo people out of there for hunting illegally," she said, adding that it's also a popular hangout for teens to drink.

The parents of one of the girls had reported her missing about 8:50 p.m. Sunday, about two hours after she was expected home, Police Chief Doug Malcolm said.

The parents of the other girl called shortly afterward, and authorities with rescue dogs began searching.

Lake County Coroner Richard Keller said it appears the girls were killed where their bodies were found; there was no evidence of sexual abuse.

"They were best friends. When one left, the other left. They were always together," said Unrein.

The killings stunned this town about 45 miles north of Chicago, prompting police and Beulah Park Elementary School officials to escort children directly onto buses at the end of the school day.

"I know that they were very sweet girls," said Julie Dobnikar, who teaches second grade at the school, adding that the girls' teacher is "very distraught right now."

Federal Court scuttles lawsuit against Cheney

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A lawsuit seeking to force Vice President Dick Cheney to reveal details about the energy policy task force he headed and the pro-industry recommendations it made was scuttled Tuesday by a federal appeals court.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit unanimously found that two private groups that sued Cheney failed to establish that the federal government had a legal duty to produce documents detailing the White House's contacts with business executives and lobbyists.

The lawsuit, filed by the Sierra Club and Judicial Watch, alleged that energy industry officials effectively became members of the task force, while environmental groups and others were shut out of the meetings. It also argued that the task force was a federal advisory committee with an obligation to publicly disclose its operations.

The appeals court disagreed.

"There is nothing to indicate that non-federal employees had a right to vote on committee matters or exercise a veto over committee proposals," it said. The court ordered a lower court to dismiss the case.

Cheney's energy task force was not an advisory committee and "it follows that the government owned the plaintiffs no duty, let alone a clear and indisputable or compelling one," said the opinion by Judge A. Raymond Randolph.

Cheney's task force met for several months in 2001 and issued a report that favored opening more public lands to oil and gas drilling and proposed a range of other steps supported by industry.

The recommendations formed the basis of the energy legislation now before Congress.

The Bush administration has succeeded in keeping secret the influence that the energy industry had in crafting the government's energy policy, David Bookbinder, a senior attorney at the Sierra Club, said.

"The decision is not going to be helpful in assuring open and accountable government," Bookbinder said.

In January arguments before the appeals court, Justice Department lawyer Paul Clement argued that forcing the White House to produce any documents about the task force would be an "unconstitutional and unwarranted intrusion on the executive branch and its internal functions."

Clement said task force members may have sought information from industry officials, but private parties had no official policymaking role. As long as the official makeup of the task force was limited to government officials, he said, federal open government laws cannot require that records be made public.

The appeals judges agreed with his reasoning, saying participation by outsiders in meetings would not be enough to make someone a member of the committee.

"When congressional committees hold hearings, it is commonplace for the Senate or House members of the committee to bring aides with them," the court said.

"The same is true when high-ranking executive branch officials serving on committees attend committee meetings. They, too, commonly bring aides with them. An aide might exert great influence, but no one would say that the aide was, therefore, a member of the committee."

Last year, Democrats hoped the Supreme Court would uphold an earlier ruling by the appeals court and force the administration to reveal potentially embarrassing details about its relationship with energy company executives — including former Enron Corp. chief executive Ken Lay — ahead of the November election.

The high court sent the case back on a 7-2 vote, saying there was a "paramount necessity of protecting the executive branch from vexatious litigation."

Vice President Dick Cheney.

To the World's Best Customers:

It has been a pleasure to serve you.
Good luck on your exams!

To the Seniors, we wish you well in your future endeavors.
To everyone else, we look forward to serving you again.

www.umass.edu/diningservices

DINING SERVICES UMass

SELLING MY BOOKS FOR CASH CHANGED MY LIFE.
BUT INDIVIDUAL RESULTS MAY VARY.

Get cash for your books.*

ADDITIONAL BUYBACK LOCATIONS

TEXTBOOK ANNEX

5/09/05 to 5/13/05	$ - $ PM
5/14/05	11:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/16/05 to 5/19/05	9:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/20/05	9:00 AM - 2:00 PM

HAMPDEN LOBBY

5/14/05	11:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/16/05 to 5/19/05	10:00 AM - 4:00 PM
5/20/05	10:00 AM - 2:00 PM

efollett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.
*Current market value applies.

UMASS AMHERST
University Store
and Textbook Annex
Phone: (413)545-2619

Visit us at efollett.com between 4/15/05 and 5/27/05 and enter to win $5,000!

International News

Bus bomb result of increased violence

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — U.S. forces hunting down followers of Iraq's most wanted terrorist pushed into a lawless region near the Syrian border Tuesday after meeting unexpected resistance from insurgents hidden in remote desert outposts along the southern banks of the Euphrates River.

Marines fought house-to-house Monday against dozens of well-armed insurgents firing at them from balconies, rooftops and sandbagged bunkers in the border town of Obeidi and surrounding villages, the Los Angeles Times reported.

As many as 100 militants have been killed since Operation Matador, one of the largest American offensives in Iraq in six months, began Saturday night in Qaim, 200 miles west of Baghdad, the military said.

At least three U.S. Marines have been killed in the offensive, which involves more than 1,000 Marines, sailors and soldiers backed by helicopter gunships and fighter jets.

A Los Angeles Times reporter embedded with U.S. forces said 20 American troops were wounded, but the U.S. military could not immediately confirm that.

Gunmen kidnapped the governor of Iraq's western Anbar province Tuesday and told his family he would be released when U.S. forces withdraw from Qaim, relatives said. Gov. Raja Nawaf Farhan al-Mahalawi was seized as he drove from Qaim to the provincial capital of Ramadi, his brother, Hammad, told The Associated Press.

The offensive comes amid a surge of militant attacks across Iraq, often targeting security forces and civilians, since the new government was announced April 28.

Two car bombs exploded in Baghdad, killing at least seven people and wounding 19, police said. Three American soldiers were among the injured, the U.S. military said.

It also said three U.S. Marines were killed in central Iraq on Monday, one by a homemade bomb in Nasser Wa Salaam, 25 miles west of Baghdad, and two others by indirect fire in Karmah, 50 miles west of the capital.

Marine Capt. Jeffrey Pool said troops built a pontoon bridge across the Euphrates on Monday and pushed into the northern Jazirah Desert, a largely unpatrolled area near the Syrian border.

"This is an area which we believe has been pretty heavy with foreign insurgents from many different areas — Syria, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Palestine," Lt. Col. Steven Boylan, a spokesman for U.S. forces in Iraq, told The Associated Press late Monday. "That's a fairly porous area of the border because of the terrain. It is very difficult."

A burning bus in Baghdad leaves dozens injured. This incident in one of the latest in increased insurgent attacks in Iraq.

Residents reported fighting Tuesday in Obeidi, 185 miles west of Baghdad, and the two nearby towns of Rommana and Karabilah. Speaking by telephone, they said frightened residents were fleeing the Qaim area.

"It's truly horrific, there are snipers everywhere, rockets, no food, no electricity," Abu Omar al-Ani, a father of three, said from Qaim on Monday night. "Today five rockets fell in front of my house. ... We are mentally exhausted."

Pool said insurgents had tried to launch a counterattack Monday night 4 1/2 miles from U.S. Camp Gannon in Qaim. They attacked a Marine convoy with small arms fire, rocket-propelled grenades, roadside bombs and two suicide car bombers, Pool said.

Korea accusing U.S. of making a fuss

By In-Young Bang
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — North Korea accused the United States on Tuesday of "making a fuss" by notifying allies of the communist nation's possible preparations for a nuclear test, and maintained it would stay away from international disarmament talks.

However, the North didn't confirm or deny it was planning such a test.

"The United States is making a fuss saying that it was notifying the International Atomic Energy Agency, Japan and other related countries of its own opinion that our republic may conduct an underground nuclear test in June," the North's main state-run Rodong Sinmun daily wrote in a commentary, according to the country's official Korean Central News Agency.

The newspaper said Washington was branding North Korea as a "nuclear criminal" in order to stifle the country. It also said the Bush administration wasn't behaving normally and that the North "cannot deal with" Washington.

U.S. officials said last week that spy satellites show possible preparations for North Korea's first-ever nuclear weapons test, including the digging and refilling of a large hole at a suspected test site in northeastern Kilju along with the apparent construction of a reviewing stand being erected some distance away.

North Korea claimed in February to have nuclear weapons, and international experts believe it has enough plutonium to build about six bombs. The North also recently shut down a nuclear reactor, a move that could allow it to harvest yet more plutonium.

Pyongyang has refused to return to six-nation disarmament talks since last June, after three rounds ended without any breakthroughs. U.S. officials have said the deadlock can't go on forever and that other moves might be required — believed to include seeking sanctions in the U.N. Security Council.

On Tuesday, the North claimed Washington was to blame for the stalemate in the talks, which also include China, Japan, Russia and South Korea.

"Our country did everything (that) we could do to solve the problems with the highest flexibility and tolerance through the previous six-party talks," Rodong Sinmun wrote.

Over the weekend, the North appeared to soften its position on returning to talks by saying it wasn't demanding direct meetings with Washington outside the six-nation negotiations.

In Washington on Monday, State Department spokesman Tom Casey noted the United States had previously spoken directly with North Korean officials within the context of the six-party talks and said "we would certainly continue that practice" if Pyongyang returns to the table.

Meanwhile, China on Tuesday rejected the use of sanctions to prod North Korea to return to six-nation talks, saying Beijing's political and trade relations with its neighbor should be kept separate.

Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said Beijing had "official and normal state-to-state relations" with Pyongyang that "should not be linked to nuclear issues."

"We stand for resolving the issue through dialogue. We are not in favor of exerting pressure or imposing sanctions," Liu said.

The Washington Post reported last week that China had turned down a U.S. request to pressure North Korea to return to nuclear disarmament talks by cutting off oil supplies. Chinese officials said such a cutoff would damage the oil pipeline that links China's northeast with North Korea because of the high paraffin content in the oil, which can clog pipelines, the Post reported.

Pope pressing ahead with schedule

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI is pressing ahead with a busy schedule of ceremonies and travel, indicating that concern over his age and health isn't slowing him down.

The 78-year-old Benedict has set a grueling pace for himself, keeping up Pope John Paul II's twice-weekly appearances to the faithful and meeting with heads of state and visiting bishops. Last week, he traveled outside Rome for the first time as pope to formally take possession of the papal summer residence at Castel Gandolfo.

In the next few weeks, he has appointments in Rome and in the Adriatic port of Bari. And in August, he heads to Cologne, Germany, for World Youth Day.

The former Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger was the oldest man elected pope in 275 years when he was tapped by his fellow cardinals April 19 to become the 265th leader of the Roman Catholic Church.

The cardinal turned 78 two days before the conclave started, and was feted by cardinals during one of the secret pre-conclave meetings.

His health also has been a topic of discussion. He has acknowledged having suffered a hemorrhagic stroke in 1991 that temporarily affected his vision, as well as a fall that knocked him unconscious in 1992. He has said he recovered without permanent damage from each incident.

Benedict's brother, the Rev. Georg Ratzinger, has been quoted in several German media outlets about his younger brother's health, including an interview April 24 with the German television station TDF in which he said Benedict had suffered two strokes.

The Bild newspaper reported April 20 that the pope had "suffered several light strokes" in the past, although it gave no sourcing. Bild also quoted Georg Ratzinger as expressing concern about his brother, saying "And health-wise, he's no longer the most robust. His heart! Such a man should really not have such a burden put on him."

The Catholic News Service reported after the election that a few lower-ranking Vatican officials had written the pope's personal secretary, Monsignor Georg Ganswein, to suggest that Benedict slow down and consider using a chair to spare him from walking and standing.

Bush and Putin join to commemorate Nazi defeat

By Steve Gutterman
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Leaders of the victors and the vanquished united Monday to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the Allied victory over Nazi Germany, with Russian President Vladimir Putin hosting President Bush and dozens of others in a Red Square celebration replete with goose-stepping soldiers, a hammer-and-sickle flag and other symbols of the Soviet era.

At a lavish military parade, Putin evoked the alliance that brought victory but he also stressed the Soviets' huge sacrifice in defeating Adolf Hitler's Germany.

"I bow low before all veterans of the Great Patriotic War," he said, using Russia's name for World War II, which killed an estimated 27 million Soviets during nearly four years of bitter fighting after the Nazi invasion of 1941.

Amid strict security that closed the heart of Moscow to ordinary citizens, Putin watched the parade from a podium in front of Lenin's tomb flanked by Bush, French President Jacques Chirac and German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder. On the Kremlin wall, the word "victory" was emblazoned in several languages, including those of the war's losers.

Putin described May 9, 1945, commemorated in Russia as Victory Day, as "a day of victory of good over evil, freedom over tyranny."

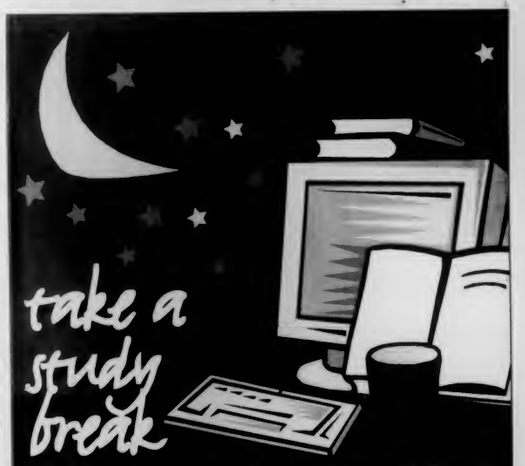
Beneath overcast skies, the parade began with four goose-stepping soldiers in ceremonial gold-embroidered uniforms carrying a replica of the red hammer-and-cycle banner unfurled atop the Reichstag in Berlin after the building was seized by Soviet troops a week before the Nazi surrender. Veterans adorned with gleaming medals rode by in green trucks.

Soldiers in modern and World War II-era uniforms _ infantrymen with red flags topped by Soviet insignia, tank troopers with black padded helmets _ marched in tight formation, the slap of their boots echoing across the cobblestones. Jets streamed smoke in the Russian flag's white, blue and red colors above the square after Putin's speech.

While Russians have often complained that the Soviets' wartime role is underrated in the West, Putin said that "we have never divided the victory between ours and theirs, and we will always remember the help of the Allies," listing the United States, Britain, France and those who fought fascism in Germany and Italy.

"Today we pay tribute to the courage of all Europeans who countered Nazism," Putin said.

However, he added, "the most cruel and decisive events unfolded on the territory of the Soviet Union." Listing battles such as Stalingrad, Kursk and the siege of Leningrad, where he was born in 1952, Putin said that "the Red Army put a victorious end to the war with the liberation of Europe and the battle for Berlin."



Attention Seniors!
ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Congratulations to the Class of 2005 from your Alumni Association!

Visit the Alumni Association Table at Cap and Gown May 2-20 in the Textbook Annex. Get your FREE Young Alumni Guide and enter to win $1,000!

Join the Alumni Association for only $20 -
Get two chances to win $1,000 and 1/2 off your Commencement Ball ticket!

UMassAlumni.com
You were. You are. UMASS.

Midnight Buffet
Monday, May 16, 2005
9pm–Midnight in All DCs

MENU FEATURING:
Fresh Fruit Salad
Chicken Fingers
Chicken Wings
Pizza
Spring Rolls
Lo Mein
Vegetable Fried Rice
Omelet Station
Texas French Toast
Bacon
Potato Puffs
Chocolate Chip Cookies
Starbucks Coffee
and much more!

Good Luck with Your Exams!

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Honesty in the media on the brink of dying

Journalistic integrity has once again been scrutinized with the recent alleged forgeries from a reporter at Wired News, an Internet news Web site. Sadly, these have become recent occurrences within the media world. Jayson Blair, the infamous former reporter for the New York Times that made up some of his stories, has set the scene for the prominence of journalistic skepticism today. Consequently, objective, un-biased reporting has become something that will be redefined for years to come.

The reporter, Michelle Delio, 37, of New York City, has blatantly denied all accusations against her and her reporting, according to an article written by the Associated Press. Reviewers have been hired to check all her sources and facts, including contacting each particular source cited her stories; stories which go back as far as years.

Whether Delio actually fabricated her stories is not the issue at hand. The issue is that she should have never even gotten herself into the situation to begin with. As a journalist, a qualified and experienced journalist, you should never present the reader with any doubt about your sources or facts. Along those lines, if a source comes across as ambiguous, it is the journalist's responsibility to find an accurate, more credible source; one that the reader will believe.

Back in 1998, Stephen Glass was accused of and proven to have forged many of his articles written for The New Republic. Upon revealing his forgeries, The New Republic promptly fired him. Even if a reporter is suspected of falsifying their stories, it is the responsibility of the heads of the publication to take action and make sure their readers are not continued to be led on by a potentially corrupt reporter.

The fact that a reporter should even be suspected of falsifying their articles is enough grounds for the heads of the publication to assess and correct the situation. A reporter should never find themselves in a place where the factual integrity of their work is questioned and they don't have the blatant evidence, ie, source contacts and proper reference materials, to promptly show their supervisors.

Some may attribute the recent tendency for media fabrications to the widespread use and reliance on the Internet. However, facts are easier to check than sources. The problem many fact checkers run into when verifying stories is when they only have the reporter's notes to rely on. While many things on the Internet are not legitimate sources when it comes to fact checking, it is a useful tool in that it will enable the fact checker to look for a certain fact in various valid locations quickly to either prove or disprove the fact. Sources and quotes used in stories are a lot harder to verify and consequently, are what wind up getting publications in trouble.

The reputations of, not only the reporters, but also the publications are at stake. If this trend continues, ethical journalism will turn into tabloid journalism and the already shaky trust people have in the media will be non-existent.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Conservatives are here to stay

Ben Duffy

In 1850, abolitionist William Seward took the floor of the Senate to debate the expansion of slavery into the Western territories. Seward understood that relevant law probably favored the pro-slavery delegates, but he really didn't care. He proclaimed that there was a "higher law" than the law of men. There was a moral law, handed down to us by the "Creator of the Universe." This law found slavery insufferable.

If William Seward were alive today, the Democrats would have him tarred and feathered. It seems that Christians are the new boogeymen that the Democrats use to scare their constituency groups into voting for them. A vote for the Democrats is a vote against the "theocrats," which is absolutely essential.

If the "theocrats" come to power, your daughter is going to come home pregnant because the "theocrats" won't allow condoms to be passed out to seventh graders. The Crusader-like tendencies of the "theocrats" guarantee wars in the Muslim world for years to come. In fact, they'll probably draft that same daughter of yours, when she turns 18 and we're fighting wars in Syria and Iran.

The hysteria over Christianity is greatly exaggerated. Sure, there are some religious fruit loops out there, but I don't trust the Democrats to identify them for me. To hear them tell it, anybody who sets foot in a church on a regular basis is a "Jesus freak."

There's always a conspiracy afoot among Christians to "hijack our democracy," or so we are told. We've heard such statements recently coming from Al Gore, Howard Dean and Colorado Senator Ken Salazar. When peace activists or environmentalists assemble and try to affect policy, it's called "democracy." When Christians do it, it's called "hijacking democracy." See how that works?

But I may be wrong about how Democrats would perceive Seward, if he were alive today. Maybe it's not Christians that they're against; maybe it's just Christians who disagree with them. Obviously, the Democratic Party no longer supports the institution of slavery, so Seward's "higher law" speech might be permissible.

Moral convictions become unacceptable in the political sphere only when they run contrary to policies that liberals know to be morally indefensible. When the Democrats support an institution that can never be defended on moral grounds, such as abortion, their only defense is that private morals should be kept to oneself.

When the Democrats support an institution that can never be defended on moral grounds, such as abortion, their only defense is that private morals should be kept to oneself.

Is that so? Well somebody ought to tell that to the National Council of Churches and its 50 million members. The NCC, despite its name, does not represent an ideologically broad coalition of churches. Its 36 member churches tend to be left leaning, Protestant/Orthodox denominations. The council itself is even further to the left than its member churches. If you've heard of "religious Right," the NCC is the "religious Left."

And you can bet that the NCC has an opinion on just about every political issue. They push their left-wing agenda under the cover of Christianity. They frequently justify their positions on political issues by using specific Bible verses. For example, their opposition to the Iraq War is justified using Matthew 5:9, "Blessed be the Peacemakers, for they will be called the children of God."

They support socialized medicine, legal abortions and a significant welfare state. They have condemned social security reform and the Republican effort to stop obstructionist filibusters in the Senate. They have dabbled in environmentalism, joining the anti-SUV "What would Jesus Drive?" campaign, a project of the Evangelical Environmental Network.

The NCC is a longtime supporter of communist states. In the 1950s and 1960s, they funneled money to the communist governments of Poland and Yugoslavia; in the 1970s and 1980s, the NCC cooperated with the World Council of Churches to aid Soviet-backed African Marxists in Zimbabwe, Namibia, Mozambique and Angola. According to a 1982 Reader's Digest article, almost half of the funds raised to "combat racism" somehow ended up in the hands of African Marxist guerillas. Blessed be the peacemakers indeed.

But you won't hear the liberals crying about "separation of church and state" in regards to the NCC. They've turned a blind eye to the religious Left. In fact, sometimes they seem to embrace it. When talking about conservative Christian leaders, they describe them as fringe right-wing theocrats, intent on pushing their agenda. When talking about liberal Christian leaders, they describe them as courageous individuals of faith, capable of principled social criticism.

I just want to see the same rules applied across the board. I have read the First Amendment many times, and I firmly believed that the American Left has mangled it for its own political purposes. But if we're going to require that religious people keep their faith and their politics separate, then we need to apply that standard to everyone. It's called consistency.

If religious people have no business protesting outside abortion clinics, then they have no business protesting outside military bases either. If teaching abstinence in schools qualifies as an "establishment of religion," then I guess teaching anti-racism does too. If Republicans appearing in churches is forbidden, then somebody needs stop the liberal Democrats who have benefited from the pulpits and collection plates of black churches for years.

I beg the Left to do one thing for me. They must either muzzle their religious wing, or learn to live in harmony with the religious Right. Conservative Christians are here to stay, and they have a right to their opinions, just like everyone else.

Ben Duffy is a Collegian columnist.

The American nuclear option

Andrew Freeman

Allow me, for a moment, to rewrite history. On Dec. 7, 1941, the Japanese attacked the U.S. fleet in Pearl Harbor, forcing our country to join the Second World War. Now, imagine if President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, in response to this dreadful attack, decided to expand the New Deal further, implement healthcare reform, lower taxes and invade Mexico. This did not happen, thankfully, because FDR realized the seriousness of the crisis that confronted him, and did not pursue such programs when war was underway.

Flash forward to the present. Our country has been attacked and how has our leadership responded? They have initiated a "War on Terror," but it is not a major priority, as visible from the policies that are being pursued. The past months have brought us Congressional hearings on steroids, attempts to save the life of a brain-dead woman and the "nuclear option."

After first glance, the nuclear option sounds like a throwback to the Cold War. Does it mean the U.S. would use nuclear weapons against North Korea or Iran if necessary? Does it herald a new commitment to fighting the War on Terror? No. This "nuclear option" is a proposal to change the rules of the Senate so that the president's judicial nominees can be approved.

I'll repeat this monumental hyperbole again. The "nuclear option" is a proposal to change the rules of the Senate so judicial nominees are approved. It's not Hiroshima and Nagasaki — it's Priscilla Owen and William Pryor, two judges criticized for their extreme views on abortion who Bush wants to force past filibusters by Democrats.

The filibuster, from a Dutch word meaning "pirate," is a parliamentary rule that allows a senator to delay the passage of a bill by prolonging debate. In the early years, a filibustering senator would have to stand and talk for as long as he could — an excellent portrayal of this in the movie "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington."

However, today's filibusters, unless a 60-senator majority votes to end debate over a bill, are allowed to stand and the Senate moves on to other business.

Both parties have used the filibuster when in the minority, and individual senators have also used it to stop bills they opposed. However, President Bush and his ally Senate Majority leader Bill Frist are seeking to end the filibuster for judicial nominations, so that Bush's appointments may be confirmed.

If atomic technology was sold to other countries, the possibility of a nuclear war would increase, since nations would see their neighbors go nuclear and decide they needed to as well.

In response, Democrats have threatened to retaliate by bringing the Senate to a standstill, filibustering many bills to force the Republicans to return the filibuster for judicial nominations.

While our leadership debates rule changes with atomic rhetoric, Kim Jong Il's North Korea is producing actual nuclear weapons. The International Atomic Energy Agency estimates that North Korea has around six nuclear weapons and the potential to produce many more. Combined with North Korea's ballistic missiles, the nation can already destroy many of the major East Asian cities, including Tokyo, Seoul, Shanghai and Beijing, and with further missile research it could threaten the continental U.S.

However, North Korea doesn't have to use its nuclear arsenal to benefit from them. Selling nuclear weapons or nuclear technology would provide the nation with much needed hard currency to sustain its faltering economy. If atomic technology was sold to other countries, the possibility of a nuclear war would increase, since nations would see their neighbors go nuclear and decide to they needed to as well. A greater danger in my mind is that North Korea would sell bombs to terrorists, who would use them against the United States or other countries.

What has been Bush's strategy for North Korea? Negotiate, walk out on negotiations, rejoin them and try to keep the media on other issues. It's worked so far, if the goal is to keep people from realizing that the annihilation of Washington, New York or any other city by nuclear suicide bombers is possible. If the goal is to disarm North Korea, it's been an abject failure.

War is a serious business, and the Bush administration has been anything but serious about it. They've lowered taxes, raised deficits and invaded a country, on fabricated evidence of nuclear weapons that had nothing to do with al-Qaeda. They've fouled up the democratization of said country, using insufficient numbers of insufficiently protected troops to provide security. Worst of all, they've done nothing while a hostile rogue nation built a nuclear arsenal.

Given this atrocious record, Bush is blessed that Americans are focused on culture wars, celebs and the latest Republican distractions. But the time may come when we look back at the "nuclear option," and realize just how horrifically misplaced our priorities were.

Andrew Freeman is a Collegian columnist.

War serves little purpose

Joseph St. John

It has been two years, one month and 21 days. Tomorrow it will be two years, one month and 23 days. This will mark one more day that our country began using violent force against a government of people that did not use, threaten to use, or have the means to use violent force against our own country. Numbers in newspapers cannot express the pain that war creates, and can be easy to ignore, but ignoring them is not a solution.

The war in Iraq has claimed at least 21,000 documented civilian deaths, over 1,600 U.S. deaths and countless life changing injuries. It has cost over $160 billion, $100 million of which was lost by incompetent or corrupt military leaders in the first few months of fighting in Baghdad.

I want these numbers to make you cry. I want them to make our leaders open up and sob rivers, like the mothers and daughters and sons and husbands are crying for their own losses. When they open up the full two page report in the New York Times showing a picture of each soldier dead from combat, faces of lost soldiers staring back with looks of hope, courage, strength and faith in the country whom they served, I want the people of America to beg for forgiveness and promise to cherish the life of every human being still on this planet.

If we have the brains to put people on the moon, predict the weather and shoot subatomic particles down miles of tubing to hit each other exactly, shouldn't we be able to think of ways to distribute resources in such a way to avoid killing each other like barbarians?

Every war that we fight is a message to future generations that violence is an acceptable way to cope with problems. Every subsequent war will now be able to justify itself on fear and loose information. This war stemmed from our fear that Iraq possessed weapons of mass destruction, yet it did not. We are teaching people that it is okay to make a mistake that cost tens of thousands of lives and not apologize, or acknowledge that a terrible mistake was made. Our society is responsible for teaching those who follow us what the world should be like, and making it as safe and free as possible for them.

If we have the brains to put people on the moon, predict the weather and shoot subatomic particles down miles of tubing to hit each other exactly, shouldn't we be able to think of ways to distribute resources in such a way to avoid killing each other like barbarians? Someday the world will be so good at communicating and loving one another that the fear of people will be minimal and the focus of every government will be on raising the standard of living for everyone. This may sound idealistic, but what guidelines do we live by except our ideals?

The six billion people on the planet right now have the power to control the world like no other population in human history. We have power over our climate, power over disease, power over our leaders and power of communication that no other group of people ever had before us. It is up to us to choose how we as a society want to use this power, and we must be aware of the impacts our actions have on those who look to our generation for guidance. They will have problems just like every other society has, but if we can give them a model for dealing with whatever problems they may be faced with, which doesn't involve violence, they will be much better off.

Einstein once said, "The youth that pioneer a warless world are those who refuse a military service." Yes, if the youth refused to fight, there could be no war, but the onus of a warless society does not rest solely on the youth. The pioneers also need to be those who teach the youth that a war is a hindrance to human growth. It takes every person to make a personal commitment to a non-violent world, and this can be done.

Many people disagree about the war in Iraq. Some believe that it is justified, and that good has come out of it, and others do not. There are things that everyone can agree upon however. No one can look at a picture of a bloodied child and say that this war has made his life better. No one can tell the lover of a fallen soldier that this war has made that person's life more complete. We can all agree on these simple facts. Everyone also agrees that absolute power, oppression and tyranny are bad, and lead to suffering. No one says otherwise. If we start somewhere, and put our most focused and dedicated minds to work, there is no problem that can't be solved nonviolently.

Joseph St. John is a Collegian columnist.

Future UMass improvements

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

The project of bettering our university continues as we bid it farewell for the summer months. Those returning in the fall will have our work cut out for us both in succeeding academically and improving the educational and social structures in which knowledge is produced. This year's setbacks have been well documented, but so has the student energy that was galvanized into action by administrative threats and by our own innovation.

Despite what Chancellor Lombardi and Vice Chancellor Gargano might tell Boston Globe reporters, they are responsible for student action and political gains only insofar as they have provided us cause by trying to suppress us. Uprisings have been against the perceived misdirection of UMass, and not a materialization of its productive qualities: it increasingly has none.

The university must be redressed in the image of the values of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. It is unacceptable to be contented by the lip service and deceptive rhetoric thrown at the problems by the administration, even as it pursues policies contrary to the student demands it futilely seeks to assuage. After all, the university is not just the classroom; it is where we define our encompassing structures and the content of our learning.

Among the issues most imperative to address in the coming months and in the fall are diversity, student autonomy and liberty, police abuse of power and misallocation of strained university resources. We have our work cut out for us but we will find solutions to our problems.

Diversity

Not only is UMass remarkably un-diverse – in fall 2004 less than five percent of students were black or Latino – but also the proposed direction of admissions is increasingly discriminatory toward minorities. The policy of placing increased importance upon SAT scores is an undisguised elitist move since those marks are proportional to wealth and statistically related to mastery of culturally white paradigms.

The suggestion that these new standards are good for everyone since they increase the prestige of the school is like the notion that slavery was good for everyone since it increased the wealth of the nation. It represents an exclusionary prestige that no one should be proud of and insults us all by reducing our qualifications as learners to an antiquated standardized test.

Instead, the school must understand its purpose as the flagship institution of public higher education in Massachusetts and fulfill its roll in the system of using public funds to promote upward mobility of the taxpayers that desire an education. We do not need "less GAP, more Abercrombie & Fitch," as Mike Gargano has suggested. We need more quality minds from a variety of backgrounds that transcend the narrow evaluation made by SATs.

Student Autonomy

Students must reclaim the autonomy that they have earned over the decades through protracted action and legal battles. Administrative control over the finances of RSOs, student businesses, ALANA and the SGA is deeply wrong under any circumstances, since these are purely student organizations and it is our right to guide them. It is especially wrong here, however, in light of the dangerous favoritism exhibited by the Lombardi administration.

The administration ought to try to mend the fences it has shattered with the student body by apologizing for its abuses. Specifically, Gargano must comply with state law and turn over to the public the solicited legal opinion from UMass counsel on the constitutionality of the ALANA caucus seats at the SGA.

The administration must also stop enacting policy in utter defiance of the SGA, and it must restore ALANA and Commuter Services to their previous capacities. It must stop manipulating the student senate by conspiring with allied representatives against other student body delegates. It must make a real commitment to working with the students and not just making disgracefully rare appearances that do not even establish the façade of a care.

Police Misconduct

There are over 55 police officers in the UMPD waiting to test out their latest toys on the animated targets that make up the student body. Their Web site is chock full of photographs of assault rifle training and other expressly violent images. Few other areas of the country are so strictly and shadily policed, particularly college campuses.

And yet the paradox is that they succeed only in creating pandemonium and arresting harmless alcohol offenders instead of preventing racist vandalism or sexual assault all over campus. The presence of such a surplus of officers naturally leads to their creation of crime to crack down upon, which leads to a pattern of abusive behavior and animosity from the students toward the police. This is a cycle that must be abolished.

University Resources

Large portions of the other problems listed here can be solved by proper allocation of the tight university budget. For example, the amount of discretionary funds given to Commonwealth College – an elitist and majority-white, centralized bureaucracy for honors – is tremendous considering that the money should rather be given to individual departments to grant honors. Departments are better suited to granting their students honors anyway, and they could involve much more relevant and ethnically diverse discussions.

Instead of paying over 55 police officers and buying them new TASERs and pepper ball guns to terrorize us with, the number of tenure-track faculty is on the steady decline, which causes a more gradual decline in the quality of education here as professors are more underpaid and more disgruntled with their positions.

The unnecessary money allocated to law enforcement should instead go to suffering outreach programs like ALANA Support Services and Every Woman's Center and/or under funded academic departments and RSOs. This would cut down on the feeling of a police state on campus and improve the educational and support side of the university that provides the reason for its existence in the first place.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

Creationism vs. evolution

Jamison Shipley

According to a Dec. 2004 Gallup poll, "only slightly more than one third of Americans believe Charles Darwin's theory of evolution is supported by fact." We are seeing a great debate in the Kansas State Board of Education over which theory should be taught.

Most of us have been taught the theory of evolution in our schools, but it isn't so often we hear a legitimate criticism of its validity. I would like to present two concerns I have with the theory – one scientific, the other philosophical.

Let me begin by drawing a distinction between micro and macroevolution. Microevolution is the idea that a species can adapt to its environment to survive. Macroevolutionary theory says all organisms that exist today come from one primeval cell. That cell turned into a worm. The worm became a fish, then up to an amphibian, reptile, bird, mammal and, finally, a human. I have no problem with microevolution. Rather, I am concerned with macroevolution, the idea that living matter originated from nonliving matter, and that living matter has the ability to mutate from one species to another.

Today, 145 years and millions of experiments and discoveries after Charles Darwin published his evolutionary theory, scientists have been unable to prove macroevolution. While it can and has been demonstrated that a species can change over time, there has been no evidence in the fossil record or in laboratory experiments that a species can develop from something other than itself. Scientists have uncovered millions of fossils, but none show conclusive evidence for the transition from one species to another. Fossils show nothing more than the abrupt occurrence and extinction of organisms.

So you may be asking, "Why are we taught macroevolution?" I think the fact that I need to make a distinction between macro and micro tells you something, but scientists need to explain how, by natural means, the origin of life and the origin of human beings came about. Unfortunately, the undeniable evidence for microevolution is applied to the theory as a whole.

The textbooks used to inform students on the subject lack alternative explanations.

Although I support the science for microevolution, I think many people falsely overreach these scientific conclusions to think they support macroevolution.

As important as the scientific problem is, I think the theory of evolution has a much greater problem for any person who wants to live a life that is intellectually consistent. This brings me to my next point, the philosophical one.

If we are chemicals randomly thrown together and if life is guided by the physical laws of nature and survival of the fittest, then it seems that is contrary to living a moral life.

According to evolutionary theory, through time and chance, nonliving matter was created from nothing. Through time and chance, living matter resulted in the mutation and natural selection, which resulted in human beings.

If we are chemicals randomly thrown together and if life is guided by the physical laws of nature and survival of the fittest, then it seems that is contrary to living a moral life.

Not only is it yet to be shown how a system of morals evolved, but morals seems contradictory to the theory of evolution. There are some things that seem obviously wrong; racism, rape, extermination of certain people. Yet, if evolution is true and we are trying to ensure that our genes survive, then those very things, racism, rape and extermination or murder, should be encouraged, not discouraged.

If we hold that there is a Creator, there is a moral standard by which we can live. If we deny a Creator and believe in evolution, we can either live a life of intellectual inconsistency or despair or both. Under evolution, morality as we understand it is just an illusion and we can really act however we want.

The scientific and philosophical concerns I have presented to you are just some of many problems with Darwin's theory of evolution. Scientifically, there is a lack of evidence for macroevolution. Unfortunately, the undeniable evidence for microevolution is applied to the theory as a whole. Philosophically, we must ponder the moral implications of accepting evolutionary theory as truth.

Scientists are divided over evolution. The Kansas Board needs to hear all sides. Pastor Adrian Rogers quoted Dr. George Wald, Professor Emeritus of Biology at Harvard University, winner of the 1991 Nobel Prize in Biology. He said in the Scientific American, "There are only two possibilities as to how life arose. One is spontaneous generation arising to evolution. The other is a supernatural creative God. There is no third possibility. Louis Pasteur and others scientifically disproved spontaneous generation, that life arose from nonliving matter, 120 years ago. That leaves us with only one possible conclusion: that life arose as a supernatural, creative act of God. I will not accept that philosophically because I do not believe in God. Therefore, I choose to believe in what I know is scientifically impossible."

Jamison Shipley is a UMass student.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

ELITISM LEADS TO INEVITABILITY OF HISTORIC FAILURE

I am responding the opinion piece by Michael Marceline entitled "Historical Inevitability" printed on Monday, May 9. Marceline offhandedly claims, "New England is the older, wiser region in this nation." He references John Edwards, but has clearly failed to realize the lesion inherent in the John-duo's failure to win the presidency. Marceline advances the idea that somehow the people of the United States are akin to foolish children who need to be shepherded around by an elite liberal clique. He breaks the United States into regions of enlightened New Englanders and (apparently) stupid Southerners and poor farmers in the Mid-West.

With such brazen elitism coming from the so-called populists, it's no wonder that the liberal party in the United States, the one that dominates New England politics, is on the decline. As it is, no party or ideologue thus far has been perfect, so it is foolish to claim that a small group of the nation is simply "wiser" than another.

Furthermore, the idea that regional wisdom is conferred on by the age of the society is utter garbage reasoning. Several thousand years of unbroken civilization in China produced the "wisdom" of Mao. It's unknown precisely how many people Mao killed, but by most estimates, he has the record for the bloodiest dictator of all time. If several thousand years of civilization is insufficient to give a culture enough wisdom to avoid such massive death and starvation, then, by Marceline's logic, it's a wonder anyone in the United States can so much as tie their shoes, much less debate policy.

Consider Marceline's argument from a different perspective. Let's phrase it as: "People from a certain area (Europe, perhaps) are simply wiser, on the whole, than people from other regions (Africa, perhaps)." Marceline's argument smacks of racism in the claim that people from "over there" just don't know what's best for them.

The fact is that liberals can no longer act like they hold the only keys to wisdom and sensible action anymore. Decades of such elitism have resulted in the notable decline of the liberal political policy, including gay-rights, which is currently (unfortunately) in retreat on an incredible scale. Such "Daddy knows best" politics are counter-productive in the extreme.

Bret Devereaux
UMass student

A TESTIMONY TO POLICE MISCONDUCT

In response to his editorial "Police misconduct the norm?" I would like to thank Aaron Wodin-Schwartz for raising awareness about the ongoing police misconduct that plagues this campus and the surrounding area. In fact, only two weekends ago, I witnessed first-hand this disturbing secret of the Pioneer Valley.

A friend and I were walking down Southeast Street in Amherst with two empty party cups in hand when we saw police lights and immediately threw our cups. As I had heard the command to stop from their footsteps, I turned around to see my friend abducted and literally slammed against the hood of their cruiser. Upon witnessing this shocking sight, I spoke up.

"Excuse me! Is this necessary?" They arrested my friend and not me (for reasons why I am still unsure), threw him in the back of the car and told me if I had a problem I should come to the police station. Trembling from anger and confusion, I walked to the police headquarters on Main Street.

Once there, I posted bail and requested a pen and paper so I could document the experience, still vivid in my memory, as accurately as possible. The officer behind the counter refused to lend me a pen and a piece of paper. Meanwhile, another officer mumbled my friend's Miranda rights to him and afterwards asked, "Do you understand?" He responded that he did not understand because the officer had mumbled. The officer then pointed to a sign and told my friend he could read them himself.

After about three hours they finally released my friend and I went back into the police station to request further documentation, which I had planned to show a lawyer. The officer behind the counter again refused to supply me with adequate information as to why he would not provide any documents. I informed him that under the Freedom of Information Act, the police department, as a tax-funded institution, would eventually be required to supply us with their documentation regarding the incident.

His response was, "If you stand there for a couple more seconds, I'll come out there and give you a freedom of information." Internally questioning my faith in the human race, I left and walked home with my friend.

The police report later made its way to my friend's court-hearing and cited me as "verbally combative" and interfering with the business of the police. Their obvious use of excessive force is deemed illegal across the United States, and yet, due to insufficient funds for the necessary lawyer, my friend instead will take alcohol education classes because of an empty party cup the Amherst Police Department deemed as evidence.

While my experiences with the UMass Police Department have generally been respectful occurrences, I ask that the town of Amherst review those employed by their police department. Until then, they should worry about their police performing these actions on the wrong student with the right connections. In an area where people are attempting to educate ethical and concerned individuals, these actions are completely unseemly.

John Bonanni
UMass Student

ADMISSION STANDARDS DON'T NEED RAISING

The question of raising admission standards at UMass has become a center stage issue now that it has been recognized by the Boston Globe. This type of privatization trend is not new to UMass Amherst, nor is it going to go away any time soon. The reasoning for higher admission standards at UMass seems clear; most people would love for their degree to mean more to a future employer. However, to increase the competitiveness of admissions also compromises the very foundations of public higher education in the state of Massachusetts.

Accompanying higher admission standards is a push for better SAT scores from incoming freshman. Studies have shown that minority and lower income students score worse on SATs, which certainly has more to do with income than it does intelligence. Many higher income students can take the SAT prep courses, which can run into the hundreds of dollars. Each time you take the SATs, it also requires a fee, which suggests that higher income students have more economic opportunity to take them more than once or twice.

Besides the issue of SATs, higher admission standards mean higher income students from out of state. Their enrollment at UMass compromises the opportunity of Massachusetts residents, many of whom live in inner city communities and whose education is grossly under funded and lack valuable resources such as teachers and books. Although you can say this is an issue for the local community, it is a deeper institutional problem that has plagued our country throughout its history.

In conclusion, by raising admission standards at this public university, you are choking out the futures of thousands of talented and bright young people who merely haven't had the resources to excel. Community colleges are a good thing, but they continue to suffer from a lack of funding by the state, and have become less focused on liberal arts. There are private colleges for those who feel their education at UMass Amherst is not reputable enough. The right future for UMass is one that strives for diversity and opportunity for all economic classes and racial backgrounds.

Ross Hogan
UMass student

Construction poses as burden

Alissa Thuotte

Discreet construction has recently yielded a new parking lot between the Thompson and South College buildings and a new road for traffic around the Student Union. The former, out of the way and small enough (i.e., blink-and-you'll-miss-it), is not the problem; rather, the latter is causing safety hazards and inconvenience for students walking in that area during the week.

When considering where to apply for college, I immediately ruled out "city schools" — I wanted a true-blue campus life, with grassy quads, flowering trees and the quiet of being secluded from main streets and police sirens. UMass may not have as much lush and verdant landscaping as that tiny college down the street, but I'm satisfied. I even enjoy walking to my classes when the only traffic I encounter is that generated by pedestrians, and the warm weather has even kept me from getting frustrated at being caught in the 2:15 post-class mob.

Don't get me wrong, I appreciate the smooth concrete under my feet as an alternative to trekking though the trees (the old detour) to get to my class, but this road wasn't repaved for you or me.

However, in the past two weeks I've noticed an ugly change. The road running from between Thompson and South College to behind the Student Union now has a painted yellow line down the middle — clearly, pedestrian students can no longer claim this as our territory. Don't get me wrong, I appreciate the smooth concrete under my feet as an alternative to trekking through the trees (the old detour) to get to my class, but this road wasn't repaved for you or me.

Apparently, my fellow students, construction trumps safety here at UMass. The other day, as I walked from the Campus Center to the Dickinson ROTC building for class, I had to step off the road to make way for a coal-stuffed dump truck; my reward was a blast of foul air in the face. Talking to a friend outside Machmer, we had to pause our conversation while a large tractor rumbled by, for hearing each other was certainly out of the question. I even saw a truck driver honk at one student on a cell phone crossing his path.

I wouldn't mind the intrusion so much if the invaders were more respectful of the fact that they are operating sizeable machinery on a college campus, an environment naturally populated by, in this case, thousands of students. Trucks and bulldozers thunder past the lone Stop sign (while going around a curve); such careless driving could easily result in student harm. (Imagine the public relations crisis for UMass when Suzy Student calls Mom from Cooley-Dickinson to say she was hit by a dump truck while standing outside her class building.)

Our campus has sometimes been referred to as resembling a city, but I would like to think that appellation comes from its sheer size. I know the countdown to the end of the semester is getting shorter and shorter, but I'd like to enjoy the flower-scented air and relative quiet on my walks to class during this last week. How about stopping construction until the bulk of us leave for the summer? Is that too much to ask?

Alissa Thuotte is a UMass student.

SUBMIT A LETTER OR OPINION

editorial@dailycollegian.com

413-545-3699

Letters to the Editor
113 Campus Center
Amherst, MA 01003

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Return of 'Family Guy' welcomed with open arms

By Nick Rudman
Daily Bruin

LOS ANGELES — "Family Guy" made television history on Sunday by being the first show to be cancelled and picked up years later by the same network (in this case, Fox). To say this was unexpected would be somewhat of an understatement.

"I was told that there was no way in hell the show would be back," said Seth MacFarlane, creator of "Family Guy" and supplier of numerous character voices for the show. "It had never happened before."

Yet, much to the delight of fans of the Griffins, "Family Guy" has returned.

As a result of unprecedented DVD sales, with 3.5 million units moved — it ranks behind only "Friends," "Sex and the City," and "The Simpsons" in TV shows — and high viewership for the show's reruns on Cartoon Network, where it is currently number one in the late-night Adult Swim block, watched by more young males than David Letterman and Jay Leno, one of the top two dysfunctional families in animation history is back on network television.

Credit this reversal of fate in large part to dedicated "Family Guy" fans — you know, the people who are as excited as Peter was to have "Gumbel to Gumbel" back on the air. And if you understand that reference, you are one of these people.

"If not for the fans, we wouldn't be back," said Mila Kunis, who voices Meg, the perpetually insecure Griffin daughter. "It's the truth."

Especially college-age fans. "Family Guy" undoubtedly has a huge, profound presence at UCLA. To hear the amount of "Family Guy" quotes brought into conversation regularly at UCLA, one would be hard-pressed to say that the show ever even went off the air. In fact, some fans here first encountered the show after it was cancelled.

"I had actually never really heard of ("Family Guy") until I saw the episodes (at UCLA)," said third-year electrical engineering student Richard King.

King started watching the show during his first year and has since purchased all of its seasons on DVD. He even went to an appearance MacFarlane made at Maloney's in the fall 2003 to promote the DVDs.

Devoted fans of college age like King had the greatest influence on "Family Guy"'s return, according to MacFarlane. He called them "hugely supportive" and "very important" in getting the show back to TV.

"These are the people who have bought the DVDs, which is why we're back. These are the people who watch the reruns on Cartoon Network. That's the reason we're back on the air," he said.

Playing to such a devoted audience means higher pressure to produce a funnier product, MacFarlane added.

"There's a lot of pressure to do shows that top the ones we've done before," he said. "The fans brought this thing back. There's a need to go seasons one to three, and hopefully we've done that."

And of course, not everyone at UCLA lives and dies for "Family Guy." For second-year physiological science student Sasha Petcavich, it is simply a matter of taste.

"I could see where people find humor in (the show)," she remarked, but added that she does not "find it too funny."

Petcavich, though not a fan, has still observed the phenomenal popularity "Family Guy" enjoys on campus.

"(The fans) own all the DVDs," she said. "They watch it in all their spare time."

And now, after years of waiting, they have fresh "Family Guy" humor to enjoy. MacFarlane said that 35 new episodes have been completed, with such story lines as Stewie falling in love with his baby sitter and Peter and Lois having what MacFarlane calls "a Hitchcockian second honeymoon adventure."

MacFarlane confessed to being a bit tired out by the draining seven-day weeks he has had to put in for the last year to produce the new shows.

"I'll be happiest when everything has died down and the show lives or dies based on how good it is and nothing else," he said.

With fans like King, though, the outcome may already be decided.

"It's exciting," he said. "I had never watched it while it was on the air, so it's nice to have something new every week to watch and look forward to. I don't really watch TV, but this is one show I'll watch."

Simply enough, "Family Guy" needs college students as much as college students need "Family Guy." It's a symbiotic relationship that is likely to continue, no matter how long the show stays on the network this time around.

"It's great to have college kids behind you, because they're supportive," Kunis said. "And they stick with you."

COURTESY FOX (2)

Failure's 'Golden' compiles many of the band's rarities

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

For every insanely popular and massively influential band there are quite a few artists that never really achieve commercial success but still have a huge impact on the future of music. This could be called the Velvet Underground symptom. There is a fairly popular saying that explains Lou Reed's band's impact: the Velvet Underground never sold a lot of records, but everyone that bought one started a band. For example, there are the Pixies; while they never headlined arenas or got a lot of MTV and radio play, they inspired everyone that listened (Nirvana would famously lead this pack,) and now they have reunited are selling out stadiums around the world.

If the Pixies were the Velvet Underground of the late 80s/early 90s, then Failure is very possibly the band that picked up after them. While not sonically similar, and perhaps not as far-reaching, the footprint left by the post-grunge, self-described "space rock" band is no less important. Failure is a primary influence for countless bands as disparate as Thursday and A Perfect Circle (who covered Failure's "The Nurse Who Loved Me" on their "Thirteenth Step" album.)

Failure
'Golden'
Self Released

Lead by singer/guitarist/bassist Ken Andrews and bassist/guitarist Greg Edwards, Failure released 3 albums over the course of the 90s, including their unparalleled final album, 1996's "Fantastic Planet". After breaking up due to personal issues, most notably drug problems that haunt the band's legacy, "Fantastic Planet" is considered by practically everyone that's ever heard it as one of the greatest albums of the past decade. Failure is widely regarded as pioneers, innovators and geniuses.

Since the band's split, Andrews has fronted two projects: his electronically-tinged solo outfit, On, and the Failure-esque Year Of The Rabbit, in addition to his production and mixing work with acts like Jimmy Eat World and Tenacious D. Edwards has just released his first LP with his new band, Autolux, who are easily the best band on earth that no one's heard. A few months ago, Andrews and Edwards finally decided to properly close the book on Failure, rather than letting their legacy fade away as a footnote to the bands that follow. Failure has taken to the internet to release "Golden," a CD/DVD package that chronicles their career and gives fans a full album's worth of unreleased songs, available on www.cdbaby.com.

In an interview with the Daily Collegian, Andrews explained that the idea to do a documentary came to him when he was working with his new band.

"Year Of The Rabbit had to do an [Electronic Press Kit] for Elektra but we were already on tour so it was really hard to do. So I just ended up doing it myself on my laptop and I learned Final

See FAILURE on page 9

COURTESY ARTISTDIRECT.COM

Failure was an influential band in the 1990s that never fully received the notoriety that they deserved.

'Enterprise' demise could mean end of long-running saga

By Charlie McCollum
Knight Ridder

This week, "Star Trek" will boldly go where it hasn't gone in 36 years: cancellation.

The original series, with William Shatner as Capt. James T. Kirk and Leonard Nimoy as Mr. Spock, was axed by NBC in 1969 after three seasons. But, a cult favorite, "Star Trek" was revived as a film in 1979 with the original cast, and a new television series — "Star Trek: The Next Generation" — made its debut in the fall of 1987.

Since then, 18 years in all, there has been a "Star Trek" series — and sometimes two — on television every season. With nine more theatrical films, numerous novels and comic books, and a vast merchandizing empire, "Star Trek" has permeated American popular culture to the point where it stands with "Star Wars."

That all comes to an end, at least temporarily, on Friday when UPN airs the last two episodes of the fifth "Star Trek" series, "Enterprise" (8 p.m. EDT), ending a four-season run that saw viewership drop from 12.6 million to 2.5 million. At the same time, the film division of the "Star Trek" empire also has gone into stasis after 2002's "Nemesis" pulled in a lowly $40 million at the box office. (The top "Star Trek" movie, 1986's "The Voyage Home," did $184.7 million.)

"There was some degree of fatigue," says "Enterprise" executive producer Rick Berman, who has run the franchise since the death of creator Gene Roddenberry in 1991. "After 18 years and 624 hours of 'Star Trek,' the audience began to sense a little bit of overkill."

In a way, the very success of "Star Trek" worked against "Enterprise." Repeats of the show's predecessors — the original, "Next Generation," "Deep Space Nine" and "Voyager" — turn up almost 24/7 in syndication and on cable channels such Sci Fi and Spike TV. So do the films.

"We found ourselves in competition with ourselves. 'Enterprise' was running against the franchise," says Berman.

Nor did it help that UPN, home of the franchise since "Voyager" started its mission in 1995, had gone from being a testosterone-driven network to one that emphasizes shows appealing to women. "It needs to be said that UPN has changed a great deal over the last few years," says Berman. "It's been skewed in a totally different direction than 'Star Trek.' That's caused as much of a problem with our viewership erosion as anything else."

But the fundamental issue has been the failure of "Enterprise" to connect with not just a broad audience but also with fans of "Star Trek."

Set in the earliest days of warp-drive space travel, "Enterprise" was a retro take on the "Star Trek" world with technology that was shaky at best and a crew that wanted nothing to do with such things as a nascent transporter system. If you pop in the DVD set of the first season, the first episodes look like a fresh and witty reinvention of the "Star Trek" mythology and canon.

Certainly, "Trek" fans initially were attracted. (The audience of 12.6 million was and still is huge by UPN standards.) But the appeal didn't last long.

"Enterprise" soon was being slammed for pedestrian storytelling and, as a commander, Capt. Jeffrey Archer (Scott Bakula) seemed to lack the gravitas of Kirk, Jean-Luc Picard (Patrick Stewart) of "Next Generation" or even Kathryn Janeway (Kate Mulgrew) of "Voyager." There was no breakout character along the lines of Spock; Data (Brent Spiner), the android from "Next Generation;" Quark (Armin Shimerman) of "Deep Space Nine"; or Seven of Nine (Jeri Ryan), the bodacious Borg on "Voyager."

And the Trekkers — the deeply obsessed fans of the series — slammed "Enterprise" on the Internet for playing fast and loose with "Star Trek" continuity, such as exactly when humans first met the Klingons.

"A lot of fans have discussed the fact that we have ignored the continuity of 'Star Trek' and ignored the canon," says Berman. "That could not be farther from the truth. We live and breathe this continuity."

But, adds "Enterprise" executive producer Brannon Braga, "the success of a television show doesn't hinge on a tiny bit of continuity" such as when the Klingons first turned up. "It seems to me there are much larger issues."

Given the show's somewhat contentious history, it perhaps was inevitable that even the final episode has been cloaked in controversy.

Using as its basis a memorable episode titled "The Pegasus" from the final season of "Next Generation," the "Enterprise" finale puts as much emphasis on guest appearances by two "Next Gen" characters — Cmdr. Will Riker (Jonathan Frakes) and Counselor Deanna Troi (Marina Sirtis) — as it does on the "Enterprise" crew.

That miffed the current cast, with the sharpest criticism coming from Jolene Blalock, who has played the Vulcan T'Pol and carries particular weight with fans because she was a devoted follower of "Star Trek" before being cast. In an interview with TV Guide, she called the finale "appalling" and "a reminder of why we're being canceled."

Braga essentially dismisses those complaints, saying, "There were a couple of people who were slightly uncomfortable with the fact that we have 'Next Generation' characters in the show and that it is a different kind of episode. But none of the actors have seen the episode, so they can't be dissatisfied with how it turned out."

Besides, says Berman, "we were aware that this 18-year run was coming to an end, and we wanted to create something that encompassed a little bit more than just 'Enterprise.'"

(The episode "These Are the Voyages ..." does have a sense of history to it, and Frakes, looking less like the Pillsbury Doughboy than he has in recent films, gives a witty performance as Riker.)

Neither Berman nor Braga believes the "Star Trek" franchise will really end with "These Are the Voyages." They point out that science fiction has never been more popular on TV, with the success of shows such as Sci Fi's "Battlestar Galactica" and USA's "The 4400," and the major networks have a number of sci-fi/fantasy series in the pipeline for next season.

Braga also notes that there was a concerted effort by some devoted fans to save "Enterprise," which "sends a signal that there are people out there who still want Star Trek."

"The fact that we're going to go two, or three, or four years without a television series — and the fact that the specifics of the next movie are not locked down — in no way means that 'Star Trek' as a franchise is over," maintains Berman.

"You can go anywhere in the world and people know what 'Beam me up, Scotty' means or what a Klingon is. They're not going to go away."

The final episode of 'Star Trek: Enterprise' may foreshadow the death of the entire franchise.

Failure's swan song

FAILURE from page 8

Cut [a video editing program]. So I was just thinking of Failure and thinking [about] how much material there is that I didn't know about that was in storage and that maybe there was an interesting documentary in there." This coincided with Andrews becoming friends again with Edwards. While Andrews himself struggled with drugs, it was Edwards' debilitating heroin addiction that drove Andrews to break the band up.

"Basically after [Greg] cleaned up completely, two or three years ago, he kinda reached out to me and we went out for dinner a couple times and hung out and then basically since then whenever we both had some free time we tried to go out or something or hang out together ... he finally got his shit together, he got clean."

And while Andrews was thinking about the documentary, Edwards found something of a buried treasure.

"I presented [the idea of a documentary] to him and he was like, 'yeah, that's kinda a cool idea' And then by coincidence he called me 3 days later and said, 'you're not gonna believe this but my mom was cleaning out the garage [where Edwards had stored a lot of his things] and she ended up finding this box, this big box, that just said 'Failure' on it'. It ended up having probably 70% of what ended up on the DVD in there. Video tapes, audio tapes, 4 tracks, DATs ... I didn't think that stuff existed or it was lost."

The assembled project is a gold mine for Failure fans. The documentary, which runs for about 40 minutes, follows the band from one of their first shows up until their final tour, Lollapalooza '97, and spares no details. While the majority of it is lighthearted, following the band into a residential studio with Steve Albini to record their first album, "Comfort" and going on their first international tour, it is brutally honest. The unnarrated documentary is more of a compilation of video clips from every stage of the band's career and so when the drugs enter the picture, "Golden" becomes a story as dark as many of Failure's songs (the band notoriously dealt with their drug problems in their lyrics.)

Watching the slideshow of pictures of the band, especially Edwards, sliding into heavy heroin use is one of the most powerful, unintentional scared-straight programs there is.

However the documentary is improved infinitely by the audio commentaries provided, separately, by Andrews and Edwards. Much like the video itself, the commentaries take no expense in being heavily informative and refusing to hold back. Andrews and Edwards are often funny and self-deprecating while they discuss the best moments of being in the band and the worst. From their dissatisfaction with "Comfort", to the process of recording and promoting their second album, "Magnified", to the creative leaps and bounds that were made during the "Fantastic Planet" sessions, and of course to their harrowing struggles with heroin that not only ended the band but almost killed them, Andrews says that he and Edwards decided that coming clean was the only way to really tell the Failure story.

While the DVD is no doubt an interesting look at the inner workings of the band, the CD is the real jewel of the collection. "Golden," the CD, is more akin to "Magnified" in that it is not a cohesive piece like "Fantastic Planet," however the songs can easily stand alongside the band's best tracks.

The opener, "Shrine," is a noisy, "Comfort"-era track. "Golden" is a menacing, bass-heavy affair, and "Gone" is just, well, out there. However the real standouts are tracks like "Perfect Prisons," "Mange," and "Wake Up," which sounds like the type of epic hit single that can define an era. In fact, "Wake Up" points to the greatest mystery of Failure's career. They were certainly not the most accessible band, but they were not too bizarre. They filled songs with soaring choruses and memorable hooks while still creating the brilliant subtleties and textures that they are best known for. Taken as a whole, "Golden" emphasizes that Failure was not blatantly out-of-place next to mainstream rock bands of the mid '90s, but they were just a bit too smart and certainly ahead of their time.

While "Golden" is an obvious gift to fans, and a nice tribute to a band that is still unlike anyone else, it serves a personal purpose to Andrews. As he has become friends with Edwards again and moved on to other bands, he is finally able to really look back at Failure with the pride that is deserved.

"It puts a nice closure on it for me. It was kinda fed up how it broke up and how it ended but we had kinda a cool run and made some good music. Personally it's given me a really nice final way of looking at my time with the band."

While "Golden" might not be the recommended starter-pack for those interested in Failure (that would be "Fantastic Planet,") it is a fitting, honest and loving retrospective for a band that directly changed the lives of a lucky handful and has indirectly changed the lives of thousands of people who may never know it.

Arts
The Daily Collegian

Shear Bliss
Holistic Full Service Salon
Metro Men's Special Package
Body Sugaring (Waxing)
$10 off
also upscale cuts, colors, men's pedis, manis, & massages
offer expires June 12th
460 West St., So. Amherst
shearbliss@yahoo.net
253-2322

ZANNA
SPRING SIDEWALK SALE
20%-80% savings
Thursday, May 12-Sunday, May 15
It's all top shelf Zanna goods, with many hidden gems. It's not just shopping, it's a rite of Spring 4 days left!
Women's clothing, shoes and Accessories
Zanna spring sidewalk sale at our Amherst store

Choose your classroom...
Take summer online courses taught by the faculty of the Isenberg School of Management and have the flexibility of choosing when and where your class meets. Have a look at the abundant offerings for this summer!
Summer Session I: June 6 - July 14
Summer Session II: July 18 - August 24
Build your business skills by taking any of the many online business courses offered this summer.
SUMMER 2005 COURSE OFFERINGS
Accounting 221, Accounting 222, Accounting 371
Fin & Op Mgmt 250, Fin & Op Mgmt 301, Fin & Op Mgmt 347, Fin & Op Mgmt 359, Fin & Op Mgmt 370
Management 260, Management 301, Management 314, Management 330, Management 365
Marketing 301, Marketing 412, Marketing 437
Sch-Mgmt 197I, Sch-Mgmt 210, Sch-Mgmt 310, Sch-Mgmt 391A, Sch-Mgmt 497A
To find out more information, contact UMass Continuing Education at 545-3430.
Register for courses by visiting umassulearn.net or call 545-3653 or 1-800-922-8211.

On the road at the New England Metal Festival: part 1

This story is part one of a two part series. Collegian writers Dave Fonseca and Patrick Rennick completed a three-day road trip touring several hardcore metal rock shows. The following is a diary of their trip.

New England Metal and Hardcore Festival concluded little over a week ago, and as I write this I'm stuck by conflicting senses of relief and withdrawal. On the one hand, three consecutive trips to Worcester and prolonged exposure to sadistically loud music, violent audiences, outrageous vendor prices, and insufficient nourishment without any substantial physical, financial, or vehicular damage is truly a miracle. However, I'm sure I speak for my companions when I say we'd risk it all again for a shot at another amazing weekend like this past one.

I flew solo on Friday with mixed expectations. Scheduling plays a critical role at such a massive concert as Metal Fest. When you're staring down the barrel ten straight hours of metal and hardcore, it's not just who plays but when they play. The scheduling gods did not smile on me Friday, as my two primary reasons for attendance (Ion Dissonance and Obituary) would be playing nearly five hours apart. Hence, getting the most out of Friday would require both precise time management and an open mind.

I arrived as Connecticut metalcore wunderkinds, Innovation of Nebek, were finishing off their set. As the final notes of "The Decay" rang out, every atom in my being started to stir as Canada's undisputed masters of calculated metalcore mounted the stage. The intimacy and sparse stage accommodations of the Palladium's upstairs did little to subtract from the menacing aura that surrounds this band. Their ability to incite a ferocious crowd response, while maintaining an exacting degree of surgical precision was near frightening. I wiped the sweat from my brow as the set finished, almost fearing that with only 25 minutes down and nearly 32 hours to go, Metal Fest had already reached its peak.

I offered my hand in congratulations to the members of Ion (one of the perks of the cozy upstairs stage) and made my way to the merchandise table. Free Stuff! As far as my eyes could see, stuff I didn't even want! But it was free, and I indulged in every last bit of it. After shooting the breeze with the fellows from Lost Disciples Records about the glory of Stockholm Death Metal, I decided to lighten my load in my car and grab a delicious veggie sub at the nearby Subway. The streets of Worcester were lined with a diverse stock of metal and hardcore fans. Terror and Emperor shirts as far as my eyes could see. Some came for the chugging breakdowns and massive pits. Some came for soaring guitar histrionics and razor sharp riffs. Others just came to feel like they belonged to something. Either way, as I ate my sub, I was pretty damn happy to be in Worcester.

I returned to the Palladium as Massachusetts' own, All that Remains, took the stage. Solid as ever, the band cranked out 25 minutes of their please-aller brand of Scandanavian tinged metal-core. Front man Phil Labonte looked especially dapper in his Armani shirt, as he pranced about the stage delivering ironic hardcore screams. Somebody has to give that guy a lesson in metal hygiene. As I Lay Dying followed with similar results. Formulaic but forceful, these guys make up for lack of innovation with crisp, emotive melodies and fluid song structures that translate perfectly at a venue like the Palladium.

Then it was time for Obituary. It's truly a vindicating experience when you get to see a band like this live. Having fallen in love with albums like "Slowly We Rot" and "Cause of Death" years after the band's split, I had never expected to a chance to hear some of my favorite songs live. I looked around the crowd and saw a lot of young faces; this would be the first Obituary concert for many in the crowd. We erupted in unison as the Tardy boys and company took the stage. Lacking the energy but none of the enthusiasm of the most of the younger openers, they ripped through crowd favorites "Threatening Skies" and "Chopped and Half" without missing a beat. Amidst all the dark grandeur, I could see the smiles on the faces of all five of the band members. After years apart, they were just happy to be playing together again. The set concluded with the Obies unveiling a new song for the grateful crowd. The audience was soaring.

I found my way to the upstairs bar after Obituary and relaxed for a bit. Noticing a fellow with a thick accent wearing a Sonata Arctica sweatshirt having a brief altercation with the barmaid, I quickly realized I was in the presence of Jani Liimatainen, I engaged in some awkward small talk with the Finnish guitar prodigy and made a few requests for the upcoming set on Saturday. I then made my way downstairs for co-headliners, Unearth. The band's incessant touring has certainly paid off, as they commanded the stage with the presence of true professionals. Despite the Palladium's consistently shoddy sound, crowd favorites "The Charm", "Zombie Autopilot", and "My Heart Bleeds No Longer" were all delivered at near studio quality. I was impressed.

Hatebreed closed the show in typical Hatebreed fashion. Encouraging fans to engage in some violent-friendly fun, they ensured that nobody in the crowd left the Palladium with an ounce of energy to spare.

I drove home with my neck and back in shambles. I was dead, and it was only Friday. Still, as tired as I was, I couldn't wait to go through it all again two more times.

It's Saturday and the weather has taken a turn for the worst. Cold icy rain saturates the campus, dispelling all hopes for the desired sunny spring weather. Welcome to New England. Yet, in the wake of this gloomy atmosphere, I have much to look forward to. As I leave my window to partake in the usual morning traditions, my thoughts wander to the New England Metal and Hardcore Festival that I will be journeying to this very day.

On urgent orders from my stomach, I run down to the lovely Franklin Dining Commons for a quick meal of soggy eggs and OJ. The hill back up to the dormitories helps me lose a few calories and the added stairs have me hungry all over again. My buddy, Adam answers his door with a half-mumbled greeting. We make our way back to Franklin to meet up with our metal brother Dave and get going to the show. After circling the dining commons several times, we find Dave at his car with Phi.

At last, we arrive in Worcester.

COURTESY AARON PEIRETS

Devin Townsend of Strapping Young Lad was once Steve Vai's backing guitarist of choice.

The Palladium, our destination, greets us with expensive parking and the friendly community of Massachusetts drivers. Luckily for us, Dave has a few tricks up his sleeve. A couple blocks later, we take advantage of free weekend parking on a backstreet. I am hardly aware of the rain shower, which has become a downpour as we hurriedly backtrack to the venue. I check one more time to see if I have the tickets and we are there.

The entrance has become a scene of disorder. People are leaving, entering, screaming, and trying to take cover from the rain. Phi runs over to the box office to grab some tickets for the day. An angry Palladium worker begins to bellow commands to the crowd that has clustered into the safety of the awning overhead. Several minutes pass and Phi returns. We all turn to enter when he makes a startling announcement. Our collective grins all turn to looks of dismay as Phi informs us that the event has sold out. After some deep thought on how to address the situation, Phi decides that he will walk the streets in search of another way in.

After receiving our re-entry wristbands, we make our way to the main stage area of the building. The Palladium's interior is quite majestic. Surrounded by intricate architectural flourishes and several balconies, the main stage looks as if it is reserved for plays and operas, certainly not for the extreme music that has beckoned the masses of metal-heads.

We make our way down to see what band is playing and we catch a good portion of Massachusetts' own, The Red Chord. It is still fairly early in the afternoon but the crowds are already tearing up the place. I now ask myself why in the hell I didn't bring some earplugs. However, after several riffs, I'm head banging so much that it doesn't really matter. I start talking to Dave and Adam after the set about metal in general. We are anticipating a performance from Finland's Sonata Arctica.

A couple of sets later the lights go dim and Tony Kakko, vocalist for Sonata Arctica, takes the stage. I stare for a moment, not knowing what to expect from the band, when I am blown back by the distinctive "flower metal" sound. The crowd around me seems to instantly explode. I witness two larger women battle each other ferociously for a closer position to Tony. Another fan in the front holds up a homemade flag bearing the band's insignia. I turn around for a moment to get a scope of things and I see a wall of hardcore fans in the back, bearing deep frowns, arms folded, and shaking their heads. Henrik proceeds to throw back a bottle of alcohol, while he flies into a speedy keyboard solo and I find myself pumping my fist in unison with the front row crowd.

Strapping Young Lad is another band I have been awaiting eagerly to hear, ever since hearing about the festival. The group is the creation of former Steve Vai protege, Devin Townsend. I have heard the band's recordings, but nothing can prepare me for the absolute wall of sound that laces into me when they assail the stage. Playing with a robotic precision and amplifiers that seem to rival an earthquake off the top of the Richter scale "Hevy Devy" Townsend greets his audience with a grating, "Worcester you suck!"

Student Activities Center
UMassAmherst
UP TO THE MINUTE

Wednesday, May 11
The Big Chill
Free food, incredible rides, great giveaways & amazing music!
Library Lawn, 2pm – 6pm FREE
Rain date: May 12

Thursday, May 12
Tension Breakers
Save the drama for yo' mama and let us relieve your stress.
Goodies. massage, aromatherapy!
Campus Center Concourse, 10am-2pm FREE!

Mix It Up Dance Series: Country
Come hear country music and learn the texas two step. Free giveaways for all.
Student Union Ballroom, 8pm-10pm FREE!

Friday, May 13
The Ultimate Chill Disc Tournament
All skill levels welcome. Prizes for winning teams and sport bags for everyone who participates
Pond Lawn, 12 noon FREE!

August 28 - September 1
UMassAmherst Leadership 2005
Annual Student Leadership Conference
Ropes course, group community project, tools for leadership: assertiveness, delegation, effective listening, making meetings fun, motivation, and time management.
Free to all UMass Amherst Undergraduates.
Lodging and meals provided.
Register at www.umass.edu/campact/leadership.htm

Brought to you by Student Affairs and Campus Life
UMass Amherst Calendar of Events:
www.umass.edu/umhome/events

www.dailycollegian.com
SUMMER JOBS
for the
ENVIRONMENT
$3000-$5000/Summer
* Stop Global Warming!
* Work with Great People!
* Make a Difference!
Career Opportunities and Benefits Available
Amherst, MA
Call Chris at 413-256-6434

Calling the Graduating Class of 2006!!

Now is the time to start thinking about making reservations at the Campus Center Hotel at UMASS Amherst for COMMENCEMENT WEEKEND 2006 (Fri. May 26th Sat. May 27th)

Calling Day for reservations Starts May 25th, 2005 @ 10am. Limited rooms available. First come first serve.

2 night minimum stay for $300/room ($150/night)

Stay either Thursday or Sunday for just $75/room/night
To make reservations, call: 413-549-6000

Orange are coming

MEN'S LACROSSE from page 14

all that other stuff, it doesn't matter. What matters is what you do between the lines between 1 p.m. and 3 p.m. on Sunday."

One of the major concerns for the Minutemen is the status of their starting goalie, Bill Schell. Schell broke his hand last week and missed UMass' game against Rutgers on Saturday.

Backup keeper Efosa Guobodia received the start against the Scarlet Knights and had a stellar outing, recording 14 saves while notching the win.

"We have confidence in both of those guys. Obviously it's a matter of Billy getting back into it after a week off and having his hand in a cast. We'll have to see how he feels," Cannella said.

Before the April 30 showdown, the Maroon and White had done more than enough inadvertent scouting of the Orange, as the two had played five of the same teams. Cannella mentioned that UMass would make some alterations, but would not stray far from its initial game plan.

One slight alteration will be adjusting to Syracuse's speed after playing Rutgers last weekend. The Scarlet Knights played a slow down possession offense, which cut down on the Minutemen's offensive possessions.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Sean Morris celebrates after scoring a goal against Syracuse on April 30. The Minutemen beat the Orange 14-13 in overtime.

Cannella is certain that the Orange, who play an extremely up tempo offense, will present a much different challenge.

"It's difficult to play anyone that comes right at you. Once your in the NCAA tournament that's the kind of team you're going to face," Cannella said. "You're not going to face a team that's going to slow it down because they can't compete with you at that time." In Division I lacrosse, only the first round games are played at home sites. With this, for the Minutemen seniors, Sunday's game will be their last chance to play on historic Garber Field.

Cannella is hoping that, with two of the preeminent lacrosse teams in the nation playing each other, there will be a significant draw to Garber.

"We hope so, we hope its a great crowd and a great lacrosse event. You have two great teams, so there's going to be a good product out there for anyone that's interested in lacrosse. It's great for our seniors to play one last game at Garber Field."

UMass prepares for playoffs

By Eric Athas
Collegian Staff

In early February, nine Atlantic 10 teams took the field for the first time and began the 2005 softball season. Although it was a long way off, May 12 was the date that was circled in the calendar of the Massachusetts softball team (34-14-1 13-3 A-10), for this day was the start of the A-10 championships.

The Maroon and White will travel to the Bronx, N.Y. tomorrow, to face Saint Joseph's in the first round. With one day remaining in the preparation for the championships, UMass coach Elaine Sortino feels that her group is ready to take on the Hawks.

"They're as ready as they're going to be and I do feel like we're prepared," Sortino said. "We are physically and mentally prepared for this championship. Everyone's in relatively good shape, so that's about all you can ask for as a coach."

Although the confidence level is at its peak, the Minutewomen go into tomorrow's contest with a disastrous 2004 outing in the back of their minds. As the No. 1 seed in last year's championship, UMass edged Fordham in the first round, but then fell to Saint Joseph's and Temple, ousting them from the tournament.

As the No. 2 seed this championship — with Fordham at No. 1 — Sortino is a lot more certain with her squad this season.

"There are no similarities at all," Sortino said. "I think the level, the composure and the mentality, and the physical skills of this team are far superior to last years team."

"Every case that we came up with a loss, in all of those case, those five games have brought the team and individual performance to a greater place because we found some things in those setbacks that we could really touch."

Falters and adversity began for UMass when it was swept in a doubleheader at A-10 foe Fordham on Apr. 4. Playing host in another A-10 contest against Temple on Apr. 17, the Minutewomen snapped an 82 regular season home game winning streak, falling to the Owls 11-3.

The final losses of the regular season came on Apr. 24 at the UMass Softball Complex, exactly one week later. The Maroon and White could not stay with North Carolina State, losing 6-4 and 6-0.

Since that day, however, the Minutewomen have not surrendered a single loss, and are currently riding a 10-game winning streak. Throughout those 10 contests, the Maroon and White have recorded four shutouts, three no-hitters and outscored the opponents 76-11.

"I think it's nice to be in a good place mentally," Sortino said. "I think it helps the team feel good mentally, but what I look at as a coach is what are we doing. We've put setbacks behind and we've put great performances behind. You have to stay in the present."

The Minutewomen are made up of an array of contributors that broke numerous records this season. Guiding UMass at the plate is home run queen junior KJ Kelley. The catcher leads the regulars in slugging percentage (.793), RBIs (38) and home runs (12).

Behind Kelley in most of those categories is the 2004 A-10 Player of the Year, senior Hilary Puglia. Her 10 homers and 36 RBIs are good for second on the team, while her 13 doubles are second in the A-10.

The pitching duo of senior Barb LaFogg and junior Jenna Busa, both of whom make up the entire starting pitching staff for the Minutewomen. LaFogg leads the A-10 in strikeouts with 207 over a span of 165.1 innings and is third in individual pitching, with a season ERA mark of 1.99.

Busa is not far behind the senior, throwing 122 strikeouts in 122 innings and holding a season ERA of 2.11. The Lexington native has found her way into the starting lineup as well, registering three home runs and seven RBIs during 16 at-bats this season.

Sortino has been pleased with the all-around performance of her team, with players such as senior Denise Denis, freshmen Lauren Proctor and Sarah Hurd, senior Pam Sulick and sophomores Amanda Morin and Candice Molinari all contributing to her game plan. Since coming up big for UMass, Freshman Stacy Cullington was recently named the A-10 Rookie of the Week.

"That's what makes this team so great, I think this team is very very capable, very very deep, a solid pitching staff on Busa and LaFogg, and solid performers at the plate [batting order] one through nine," Sortino said. "The team's talented, he team's athletic and the team's very well mentally composed. I can't say that we're going to have anything less than an incredible effort."

Garrity's father knows best

GARRITY from page 14

rently pitching for the Greensboro Grasshoppers, the Marlins single-A affiliate.

"My sophomore, junior and senior year, I caught Jeff Alison, who was the number one prospect in the senior class that year," Garrity said. "He was topping out at 98 mph and was striking 18 or 19 kids a game. Then, he just got into the wrong things like drugs, but now he's back there and hopefully it will work out."

The tradition of hard throwing pitchers has continued with UMass ace Matt Torra. The six-foot-three, 225-pound junior starter can reach the mid 90s and has attracted a lot of attention from scouts like Garrity's former high school teammates.

Torra likes his new catcher especially after he filled some big shoes. Last season, catcher Frank Curreri lead the team in batting average (.380), home runs (seven), hits (60), slugging percentage (.614) and RBIs (54). Garrity had difficult task replacing a leader like Curreri, who was drafted by Arizona Diamondbacks in 41st round, but his ace on the mound feels has done more than an efficient job.

"I compare him to a Jason Varitek," Torra said. "Varitek really knows how to handle every pitcher. He knows what he needs to do. Garrity is coming that way. He really knows how to handle pitchers and the more experience he gains, it's going to become more natural. He's going to be a solid leader for the next four years."

In fact, if you ask the young catcher, Garrity will tell you he loves the challenge of the hard throwing lire ballers.

"I rather catch someone throwing hard, because it makes you as a catcher better, more solid defensively and quicker," Garrity said. "You have to be on top of your A game and keep you focused more."

Torra is will be drafted in the early rounds in this spring's MLB draft, but will see definitely see plenty of Garrity this summer after the freshman catcher had nowhere to go.

Garrity's mother, Linda, worked persistently this past fall to find her son a team within a summer league. She started sending out emails to every coach in the league with stats and background information on her son. A family friend who was a scout with the Red Sox landed him with a team in a Hawaii summer league. But the phone rang with a last second opportunity that he could not pass up.

Along with Torra, the UMass battery will be playing on the Berkshire Dukes in Torra's hometown of Pittsfield. The Dukes are part of the New England Collegiate Baseball League. This wooden bat league is the second largest summer league next to the Cape Cod League.

To make sure he was on top of his game after high school, Garrity wanted a coach who had experience as a catcher. Before head coach Mike Stone started his coaching career in 1983, he spent three years in the St. Louis Cardinals system and two more years in the Los Angeles Dodgers minor league system in 1970s.

"By having a coach that played in the minor leagues as a catcher was one of the reasons I came here," Garrity said. "I wanted my head coach to also be the catchers coach and he told me great amount about catching. [He showed me] how to set up batters, how to receive the ball and how to make a clean throw to second or third. I'm a lot smoother now since high school and thank him for that. He's just helped me defensively on things that I was shaky on."

Another reason Garrity choose to come to UMass was the pride he showed for playing college baseball in his own state.

As you listen to him talk about how proud he is to be a Minuteman, the maturity, dedication and love of the game shine through bright and clear.

"It's very enjoyable playing for my home state," Garrity said. "I'm not wearing a UConn shirt or a West Virginia shirt, I'm wearing a Massachusetts shirt. I feel like wearing that I represent the team, my family, the school, my friends and everyone in the state. I feel like I'm playing for more than myself."

Through the early part of the season, Garrity struggled to find success at the plate. By April, he started to find his swing and achieved an eight-game hitting streak from Mar. 27 to April 16.

Garrity ranks among the leaders in several categories since breaking out of his early slump. His .275 batting is third best on UMass, as he is also second in hits with 35 and tied for second in doubles with four.

"He hasn't played like a freshman," Stone said. "He really has played how I thought he would play. I really wanted him as a recruit. He's been solid behind the plate, a leader, improving with the bat and very heads up. He plays the game as a mature freshman at a very high level. That's what has impressed me the most."

His skills on the field have impressed everyone from his coach to his teammates, but his teammates are more impressed by his intangibles.

As a freshman on a new Division I baseball team these types of players tend to be quiet and reserved. It's a big time to most incoming freshmen and they just want to take in whatever they can absorb. But not Garrity, he's not the shy type.

The freshman catcher came in right away and showed the maturity, as well as knowledge, be a good starting catcher. His teammates, however, feel has done a lot more than throw on the gear and crouch behind the plate.

"Right now, he is our leader," senior outfielder Jason Twomley said. "Every baseball would say the quarterback is the catcher. Coming in as a freshman, he knew his role he had to take. He's been able to leader for everyone."

It has been a hard season for Garrity and the Minutemen. They have lost all, but one one-run this season. The painful process of rebuilding a team can wear on you, but Garrity knows he's on a talented team.

He can also rely on a couple familiar faces to things in perspective after a bad loss or a tough day on the diamond. After every game, Garrity leaves the dugout and goes straight to his parents.

"I talk to my father after every game," said Garrity of the man who got him on the success track. "I'll break down every at-bat with my father after the game." He's just someone who I have looked up to and someone who has always been there. He always given me the truthful outlook on everything and never pushed me. That's why we such a great friendship. He's probably one of my best friends."

When it comes to saying father always know best. Bryan Garrity will never argue that.

No Calories No Carbs
Last Call
carb, hangover & nutritional drink
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0150
Please Drink Responsibly

Hit the books, then hit the beach!

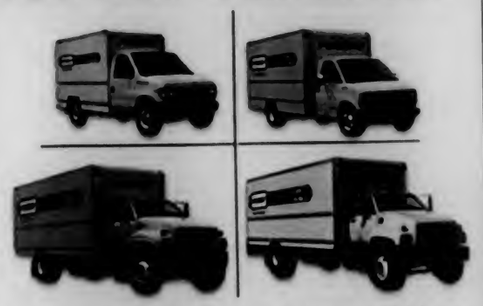
- Day and evening classes start May 31st & July 5th
- Affordable resident cost is $136 per credit
- 5- or 10-week courses
- A great way to earn college credits quickly
- Credits are transferable to your school! (When you are a university or college student, or incoming college freshman)
- Wellesley, Framingham, and Ashland

Call MassBay today at 781-239-2703 or go to www.massbay.edu

Looking to get ahead in your course work? Short on credits and need to catch up? Or just looking for something satisfying to do this Summer? A MassBay Summer Session course is the way to go!

Don't sweat it.
Check out MassBay's Summer Session Courses in:



Business
EMT
English
Health
History
Lab Sciences (such as Anatomy & Physiology, Biology, Microbiology)
Math
Social Sciences
and other transferable courses!

Classes meet Monday-Thursday so there's plenty of time left for other Summer activities.

To register or obtain additional information, call 781-239-2703.

MASSBAY COMMUNITY COLLEGE
Start here. Go anywhere.

Heading Home for the Summer?

Local ~ One Way ~ Do-It-Yourself Moves

We'll Take You Where You Want To Go
PENSKE Truck Leasing

* Low Rates
* Full Line of Moving Accessories
* Free Unlimited Mileage on One-Way Truck Rentals
* Full Range of Clean, Fuel-Efficient Trucks
* 24-hour Emergency Road Service
* Automatic Transmission and Air Conditioning Available

10% student discount with coupon below.

Receive a 10% discount WITH THIS COUPON on your next Local or One-Way truck Rental
Call (413) 549-1644
10% Discount PENSKE Truck Leasing 10% Discount
Affordable, new, clean trucks at convenient rental locations
This coupon is not valid with any other offer. One per truck rental and subject to availability. A "One-Way rental" means your Penske truck is rented in one city and returned to another

For Reservations Call 549-1644

Continuing tradition

GARBER from page 14

always knew what it was all about, just because of my grandfather and my father," Brett said. "I came on my first official visit here and just loved it. I loved the team, the players, the coaches, and I ended up canceling all of my other visits just because it was awesome. I didn't want to go anywhere else."

There were actually so many schools interested in Brett that Cannella didn't think he would land the third-generation Garber as a recruit. It wasn't until Ted called him on the phone and told him that UMass was the only school Brett wanted to play for.

Though Brett doesn't have a ton of memories of his grandfather — Richard Garber passed away on Dec. 6, 1994, at the age of 66 — he does remember sitting on the sidelines with him, while the two watched Ted coach the Minutemen.

"I know what he did, and it's special," Brett said. "The memories, I wish I had more, but what I have is awesome. It makes it even better to see his statue everyday."

The statue he talks about is the memorial that sits on the right corner of the lacrosse field, which was named after Richard Garber on April 11, 1992. The statue is a profile of Richard Garber, showcasing his accomplishments as a coach and a human being.

Like most athletes, Brett has a routine before every game. His is unique, though there is a reason for that. Not many people get to play on the field that was created by their grandfather. After leaving the locker room, he walks by the statue, and he flashes it a little wink.

Brett doesn't take any of this for granted. He knows what he has, and he knows how lucky he is with the opportunity he has been given.

"Before every game, I get nervous, but before every home game, I always find myself in the corner in the locker room," Brett recalled. "And I just think about where I am, and it hits me.

"It pumps me up because I know I only have a certain amount of time here, and the feeling just rushes through my body. It's such a scary but awesome feeling because I get another chance to play on Garber Field, and I get another chance to wear this jersey. It's just so special."

It would be for someone who grew up around lacrosse greats such as Mark Millon, Chris Nentwich and Mike Valente. In fact, Millon, who graduated from UMass in 1993 and is currently a member of the Boston Cannons of Major League Lacrosse, was Brett's favorite player as a kid.

A few years ago, for Brett's birthday, he mentioned to his father that all he wanted was for Millon to show up to his party. Ted tried arranging for his former player to make the trip to Connecticut, but things didn't work out.

"He just wanted Mark to come to his birthday party," Ted said. "Mark unfortunately couldn't make it because of his job at the time, but he sent him his uniform from the World Games [in 1998] that he was MVP in with his autograph on it."

"Mark was one of my big idols growing up, and my dad tried surprising me," Brett said. "I saw [the jersey], and it was so awesome. I have it back in my room just hanging up over my bed, so it's over me when I sleep. I love it."

Brett still keeps in contact with Millon through e-mail on a somewhat regular basis.

"It was nice of Mark to do that for him," Ted said. "I know Mark is a big fan of his and encourages him to keep working hard and do the best he can everyday, and he's trying to do that."

•••••

There were high expectations for Brett coming into UMass as a freshman last year. He was a two-year team captain, an All-American and he was asked to try out for the U.S. Under-19 Team. He scored 100 goals and tallied 77 assists during his four-year high school career for 177 points.

MATTHEW BRIEVELDAN

UMass sophomore Brett Garber stands next to the statue that honors his grandfather, Richard F. Garber, who was the coach of the Minutemen from 1955-1990. The field was named after him on April 11, 1992.

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Brett Garber is tied for fourth on the team with 14 goals and seven assists and is fifth-best with 21 total points this season. He scored five goals and tallied three assists for eight points last year.

Brett wasn't exactly a statistical juggernaut last year, as he only recorded five goals and three assists. His best game came against UMass' long time rival, though, in the team's trip to the Carrier Dome in Syracuse.

Brett scored three times and added an assist in the Maroon and White's 17-10 loss to the Orange, and he earned ECAC Rookie of the Week honors after his breakout performance.

This season, he has really come to life and showcased some flashes of brilliance. He is tied for fourth on the team with 14 goals and seven assists, and he is fifth on the Minutemen with 21 total points. His best statistical game came against Brown, when he scored twice and contributed an assist. He showed up for Syracuse again, too, as he found the back of the net twice in the team's 14-13 overtime win on April 30.

Even when things aren't going well, though, when he needs advice in life or for his game, he just looks to his old high school coach.

"My dad is who I always call when I'm in tough positions," Brett said. "He means so much to me. He guides me a lot through experience. He's always there for me."

His father doesn't hesitate to get on him about his game, either. In UMass' 6-5 loss at Loyola on March 26, Brett's first two shots were high, right where Greyhound goalie Michael Fretwell's stick was waiting.

"I usually give him a jab a little bit if I think his shooting isn't in the right location," Ted said. "That's what I stressed here and stress with everybody."

There are other expectations for Brett, though. Bigger ones.

And they have everything to do with his name. They are the same demons that Ted faced as a coach, and Brett is well aware of them now as a player.

"There are expectations from people," Ted said. "Even when I played in college, and my dad was coaching in college, and I didn't play well, they'd be like, 'Well, you're Coach Garber's son, shouldn't you play better?' And that sort of followed me around a little bit.

"I didn't want Brett to have to go through that. When I was interviewing [for head coach] at UMass, they asked me, 'How could you take the place of your dad? He's the all-time winningest coach and is in all these Halls of Fame.' And I said, 'It's easy, I gave him all his plays.' They sort of looked at me, but I was joking. What am I supposed to tell them?"

That was what Ted did so well, according to Cannella. He was witty and could brush things off with a joke if he wanted.

Brett is more reserved in comparison to his father, and Cannella said that Brett's personality is more similar to that of his grandfather's.

But while Ted may have handled those things differently than Brett does, it doesn't mean the younger Garber has any problems with living up to these meteoric pressures.

"I think [his teammates] respect the hell out of it," Cannella said. "There is a lot of pressure. I don't think Brett feels the pressure. I know if it was me, playing on my grandfather's field, I'd feel pressure, but he seems to revel in it."

These four — Richard, Ted, Brett and Cannella — have all been tied together through one another. Richard built the program from the ground up, Ted continued the winning tradition while Cannella and Brett have kept it moving in the same direction.

And they have all done it their way.

When Cannella reads that piece of paper in his office, which he transcribed immediately after his conversation with the Hall-of-Fame coach, he remembers why he took the coaching job and what it means, not just to him, but to five decades of UMass lacrosse tradition.

Looking down, these roles may be reversed, and Richard F. Garber would certainly admire that.

DIVISION OF CONTINUING EDUCATION
Conservation Law Enforcement Officer TRAINING PROGRAM

This program qualifies graduates for seasonal law enforcement positions in environmental agencies, such as national, state, and local parks.

The program includes over 334 hours of instruction in (among other topics):

- Law Enforcement Techniques
- Firearms Training
- Detention and Arrest
- Defensive Tactics
- Crime Scene Management
- Search and Seizure
- Accident Investigation
- Federal Law and the U.S. Code
- Patrol Procedures
- Defensive Driving

Up to six undergraduate credits available during Spring 2006 semester.

2005-2006 INFORMATION:

SCHEDULE:
Saturdays and Sundays:
September 10-11, 24-25; October 8-9, 22-23; November 5-6, 19-20; December 3-4, 17-18, 2005. February 4-5, 18-19; March 4-5, plus Monday-Saturday: January 2-21 and March 13-18, 2006.
All sessions meet 8:00 a.m.-5:00 p.m.
Registration deadline/confirmation: September 2, 2005, or until class fills.

Registration materials and more information are available from:
Program Coordinators
Division of Continuing Education
University of Massachusetts
100 Venture Way, Suite 201
Hadley, MA 01035-9430
(413) 545-2484
progcoord@contined.umass.edu

UMass offense explodes again to rally team past Black Bears

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

An outburst of 15 runs helped lift the Massachusetts baseball team (12-30 5-13 A-10) over the Maine Black Bears (27-14) in Gorham, Maine yesterday afternoon.

The 15-8 win marks the fourth in six outings for the Minutemen.

They were also able to defeat the Black Bears for the first time in seven years.

"We put the pressure on Maine all day," UMass coach Mike Stone said after the game.

The Minutemen jumped on top early as Ryan Franczek got the scoring started when he hit a lead off home run.

The solo shot was the freshman third baseman's first career home run as a member of the Minutemen.

In the bottom of the first, Maine was able to tie the score at one, but it wouldn't last for very long.

UMass regained its lead in the top of the second they same way as in the first — with a home run.

This time it was sophomore Michael Weiner's second shot of the year that put the Minutemen on top again 2-1.

The scoring didn't stop there.

Maine bounced back in the bottom of the second inning to tie the game and eventually take the lead 3-2.

The Black Bears' Ross Cantara and Ray Vallee each reached base with singles.

They were then driven in by Aaron Izaryk's second double of the contest.

Neither side was able to continue the back-and-forth scoring until the fifth inning.

It was in the top of the fifth that UMass had one of its biggest offensive outbursts of the season.

They hung seven runs in the fifth inning alone to regain the lead at 9-3 and they never looked back.

Freshman Andy Tuetken drove in Weiner, who doubled to left field, to start the explosion for UMass.

He was then able to advance all the way to third on an error by Maine.

Tuetken then scored the fourth UMass run when he was driven in by sophomore Adam Munsey's single to left.

Later in the inning, senior slugger Jason Twomley was intentionally walked to load the bases for fellow upperclassman Curt Szado.

He took full advantage of the situation as he hit a two-run single to right field.

Twomley was then able to score on a double steal and, in his second plate appearance of the inning, Weiner drove in two with a single.

"We had good hitting finally," Stone remarked. "And good clutch hitting today."

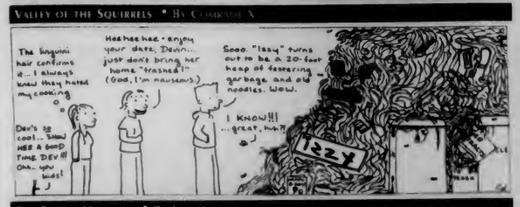
FRUSTRATED?
PUZZLED?
DO YOU HAVE:
- a grade dispute?
- teacher, roomate or job concerns?
- billing problems?
- harassment?
- ...or any other University related problem?

THE OMBUDS OFFICE CAN HELP
(confidentially, of course!)

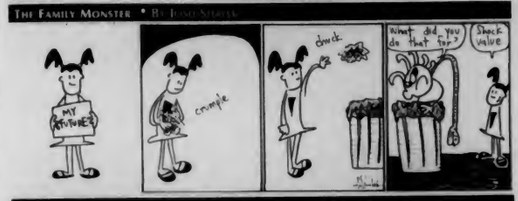
students, faculty, and staff are all welcome

523 Campus Center
Office hours: 8:00 a.m. - 5:00 p.m.
telephone: 413-545-0847
fax: 413-545-9720
e-mail: ombuds@ombuds.umass.edu

Write for Sports Next Year!



GET FUZZY • By Darby Conley



GET FUZZY • By Darby Conley

VALLEY OF THE SQUIRRELS • By Comrade X

THE FAMILY MONSTER • By Jesse Shafer

THE FAMILY MONSTER • By Jesse Shafer

Quote of the Day

"The whole problem with the world is that fools and fanatics are always so certain of themselves, but wiser people so full of doubts."

—Bertrand Russell

ACROSS
1 Hand part
5 Actress Olin
9 Scrawny one
14 Piece of Puccini
15 Small particle
16 Simple musical refrain
17 Call up
18 Unadorned
19 Allude (to)
20 Inuit
22 Long-tongued predator
24 Movies
25 Bobby of the NHL
27 Thailand, once
28 Soft drinks
30 Indications of elation
34 Does business
38 Sleep soundly?
39 Aura
40 Abbey Theatre founder
42 Relaxation
43 Knight's suit
45 World leaders
47 Sampler
49 Reduces speed
50 Sacred Nile bird
52 Vane dir.
53 Peter
56 Calls incorrectly
60 List of corrections
62 Lace cap
63 Shuttle org.
65 On the crest of 66 Untethered
67 Large swallow
68 Fine after four
69 Hank of hair
70 Latin being
71 Lower digits

DOWN
1 Reeled
2 Get up
3 PGA's mileu
4 Biblical sayers
5 September holiday
6 Greek letter
7 Wolfe/director Ephron
8 Player enders
9 Binnacles
10 Pearly quality
11 Actor George
12 Away from the wind
13 Actress Tori
21 Lea knits
23 "__ the season"
26 Track events
28 Haughty condition
29 Sports pages figs.
31 Gardener's soil
32 Scottish Gaelic
33 Witnessed
34 The one singled out
35 Uncommon
36 Beggar's request
37 Passe
41 "The Flintstones" epoch
44 Dealers offerings
46 Bed-stand pitcher
48 Outer edge
51 Perceive
53 Inner court
54 Make amends
55 Scruffs
58 Beer ingredient
57 Composer Stravinsky
58 Blackthorn
59 Time-worn adages
61 Harangue
64 Family nickname

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

THE HARP
NEW!! Wireless Internet
OCMP & All Credit Cards accepted
Irish Pub
May Special!
$1.50 PBR Bottles; Honey Brown, Molson
$2.00 A pint / $6.50 a pitcher
Outdoor Deck Open
WED. ·Breakaway soL
THU. ·Apollo Sunshine
FRI. ·Irish Seisiun
Sat: ·Savoy Shuffle
No Cover!
"Come Party Like You're Irish!"
413-548-6900 www.theharp.net
163 Sunderland Rd. · N. Amherst
Just north of the apartments

650-3384 ROADHOUSE 63 Rt. 63 North Millers Falls
Only 15 minutes from campus
Wednesday
Thursday
Promo Night
Friday
Saturday
UPTOWN ROCKERS
Sunday
Monday
Tuesday
Texas Hold-em Night
$5.00 pitchers of Bud and Bud light always www.rt63roadhouse.com

HOROSCOPES

aquarius • Jan. 20-Feb. 18
Oh no! You've damaged the scanner irrevocably.

pisces • Feb. 19-Mar. 20
What would you do if you lost your hat? The world would come to an end.

aries • Mar. 21-Apr. 19
Take the time to really listen to what your friends are saying today.

taurus • Apr. 20-May 20
Remember, Tuesdays and Thursdays are bad days. So today should be good.

gemini • May 21-Jun. 21
Today you are going to forget something that is essential to your existence.

cancer • Jun. 22-Jul. 22
Somehow, you've got to find a way to read that entire book tonight.

leo • Jul. 23-Aug. 22
Flip-flops are by far the most slippery piece of footwear.

virgo • Aug. 23-Sept. 22
You should really take some time to relax in between classes today.

libra • Sept. 23-Oct. 22
Today your friends are going to make you feel really good about something.

scorpio • Oct. 23-Nov. 21
Make sure you don't step on any ducklings on the way to the library.

sagittarius • Nov. 22-Dec. 21
You are an amazing friend. Your efforts proved this yesterday.

capricorn • Dec. 22-Jan. 19
It's not time to cash in yet. Keep working until you're done.

Only one paper left. Enjoy it while it lasts! And while you're at it, submit your comic ideas for next year.

collegiancomics@yahoo.com

Massachusetts Daily Collegian Marketplace

Announcements

Meeting Notice Top of the Campus, Incorporated (TOC, Inc.) will hold its Annual Meeting in Campus Center 903, Wednesday, May 25, 2005 at 11:00 a.m.

Apartment for Rent

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing, 1&2 bedroom apts. Leases begin Jun, July, Aug or Sep. First come, first-serve. Get them while they last. www.brandywine-apts.com stop by or call 549-3600

3 Bedroom Putton Apt Starting June 1st $1285 Heat and Water included Contact Lindsay 781-789-4898

Putton 3 bedroom. Great location, large front yard, walking distance to laundry facilities, on bus route. Take over lease for June 1st. CHEAP furniture available as well! Call Nicole at 978-866-3449

2 bedroom $1050 4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-7377 MillValleyEstates@comcast.com Now open Saturdays 10-1

3 Bedroom Apt on Bus Rt. 7 miles from UMass. Large yard $1100 per month Call Aggie 413-530-6996

Spacious 2 bedroom apt Heat/Hwtr, Basic and extended Cable, High-speed internet included. Wesbrook river available. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move-in costs. 665-3856. Move in today, receive Free Entertainment system

Auto for Sale

1991 BMW 325I grey 90000 miles $3400 423-441-7839

99 Audi A4/S4, Mint, Silver, CD/DVD, sound system, moon roof, fmt. $10,995 Contact John 413-262-3350

Employment

[Lifeguard] Brandywine Apts. Needs a certified lifeguard. full time. Must work some weekends. $9.00/hr. Call 549-0600. Or stop by office.

Lifeguard part-time, Hampshire Fitness $9/hr + membership. Current certifications required. Deb 256-6446

Looking for a rewarding sales career? Want to be in charge of how much money you earn? Our client is looking for highly motivated individuals who thrive on working in a fast paced sales environment. Any hard working individual with great communication skills that has a "no fear" attitude can be successful in this role. If you love to sell, send your resume to Michelle at momccarty@staffingnetwork.net or call at 413-529-7100

Painters Helpers Call 413-253-9457

Camp Counselors - Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pinebrookcamp.com

Make $75 taking online surveys www.monkeypaintbrush.com

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $8 - $12/hr (888)277-9787. www.collegepro.com

Responsible college students wanted for Franchisee in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Hourly plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown. (888)427-7672 Ext. 445

Summer/Beyond- Local franchise Major healthy home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay. 587-9500

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives
CampusFundraiser is hiring outgoing students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience help, but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraiser.com/cr.asp to apply.

Summer Job- Environment

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps. The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE). Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related course work in elementary education or highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one on one with special needs populations preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.45 per hour. 35-40 hours per week, June 22 - August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

Moving. Local moving company looking for self-motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Counter help. Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Cafe' 60 Masons St. Northampton

MARKETING&SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full time www.GreatestTanning.com Call Dan 413-665-0222

Administrative Assistant for Teen-Bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time mid-Late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call: 800-343-6132 Student Hosting Program, Conway, MA

"Bartending" $300/day potential. No experience necessary. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x162

For Sale

Used dorm furniture. Dirt cheap! Everything must go. Call Corey for prices. 413-687-9297.

Kenmore For Sale. All connections and 2 CO2 tanks. Full Fridge $1,549. 978-821-4497

Full Size bed for sale. 4 1/2 years old. Excellent condition. $200 & Twin mist pick up. (443) 304-6644

House for Rent

Expect to have few rentals coming up. Call during summer Skibski Realty 413-586-1827 Northampton

House Hadley. Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms. Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879

Lost and Found

Minolta Digital Camera Found outside Library, 5/9/05 413-210-8919

Miscellaneous

www.butchhats.com

Just Look Stupid

Roommate Wanted

Leverett 5 miles to UMass Large Bedroom in home Shared w/male rentals $500 inclusive 665-2723

Services

PREGNANCY TESTING. HIV TESTING. Birth control, and Emergency Contraception. STI Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9892

Preg nant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906

Sublet

Room Available June 10th Aug 31st in Amherst Center. Call Noah 413-687-2365

Room in Northampton Close to Downtown Rent $600 Negot. 413-230-1066

Putton Village 2 bedrooms, Rent 1207/month. Call Morgen 978-500-9161, with full option

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS WEDNESDAY

WEDNESDAY, MAY 11, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

A UMass lacrosse tradition

Garber carries on family name

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

"Just do it the way you think it should be done but always remember why you do it."
—Richard F. Garber, Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach from 1955-1980

It's a quote that hangs on the wall of UMass coach Greg Cannella's office, directly to the left of his desk.

It was some advice Garber had given Cannella, a point in the right direction. It was a direction that Garber started over 50 years ago, and the program hasn't steered off course yet.

When Cannella took over the reigns prior to the 1995 season, he met with Richard Garber, his former coach and mentor, just to talk.

They had talked often. Sometimes about life, sometimes about lacrosse.

When Cannella decided to transfer from Nassau Community College in New York to don the maroon and white, he met with Garber and his wife for dinner.

Garber was the reason Cannella chose UMass. He was a "throwback," a word Cannella used to describe the man whose name sits high upon the lacrosse field in the middle of campus.

He compared Garber to another legendary college coach, in a completely different sport.

Cannella says that Garber was a teacher, much like the way former UCLA men's basketball coach John Wooden. It wasn't so much because the two coaching greats were winners or because they stayed at one school for such a long period of time, however.

"They were guys that believed in treating people the right way, treating people fairly, guys that are respectful to everybody on campus," Cannella said. "They're well respected within the community. You don't really see that now in coaching. You don't see that type of person that's able to be successful and do it his way, but really do it the right way, have the student-athletes' best interest rather than worrying about winning and losing."

It's hard for Cannella to talk about his old coach without getting choked up. Whether he was staring off into empty space in his office or just boasting an ear-to-ear smile, it was easy to tell what kind of an effect Garber had on his former players, just by the reaction they give off when his name is mentioned.

It's apparent how much respect Cannella has for his mentor, as he still refers to him as "Coach Garber" without even missing a beat.

MATTHEW THAU/COLLEGIAN

UMass sophomore Brett Garber stands in front of the sign that was put there to honor his grandfather, Richard F. Garber. Brett is the third Garber to involve himself in the program, as his father Ted coached after Richard.

"He has an effect on me everyday," Cannella said, at this moment smiling. "Every time I walk into the office, he has an effect on me. Every time I go out onto the field, he has an effect on me. It's sort of hard to explain."

It is the same kind of respect that Cannella demands from his players now. Though it isn't so much that he needs to demand this respect, as he has done a great job over the last 11 years earning it.

The Minutemen have won 96 games since 2001, the most even missing a beat.

"He has an effect on me everyday," Cannella said, at this moment smiling. "Every time I walk into the office, he has an effect on me. Every time I go out onto the field, he has an effect on me. It's sort of hard to explain."

It is the same kind of respect that Cannella demands from his players now. Though it isn't so much that he needs to demand this respect, as he has done a great job over the last 11 years earning it.

The Minutemen have won 96 games since 2001, the best five-year stretch in the program's history. This isn't much of a small task, as Garber retired as the all-time winningest coach in lacrosse history. He was the first man to win 300 games, and only Jack Emmer of Army was able to surpass that, which he accomplished two seasons ago.

It's that respect, though, that Garber has helped him achieve. Cannella gives out a sheet of paper with a pyramid on it to each of his players before the start of every season. It is the identical sheet that Garber passed on to him two decades ago. It was similar to the pyramid that John Wooden devised for his players just a couple decades prior to that.

Some of it had to do with life, some was about lacrosse. It was the epitome of what UMass lacrosse has stood for since Garber took over.

*****

Two years ago, Garber's grandson, Brett Garber, needed to make the same decision all high school seniors make. Not that the decision was ever all that hard, but Brett needed to choose a college.

He was a great high school talent. He played for his father, Ted Garber, at Avon Old Farms High School in Connecticut.

Before that, however, Ted, was the second Garber to be involved with the UMass lacrosse family. He had the daunting task of replacing a legend, his father.

He took over at the helm in 1991 and coached the Maroon and White for four years, comprising a 37-17 record and reaching two NCAA tournaments. In 1993, he hired Cannella to serve as an assistant coach.

The bond is thick between the Garber family and Cannella. That is why it was no surprise that Brett chose to play for the man who coached under his father and played for his grandfather, even though virtually every top program in Division I wanted Brett for themselves.

"UMass always had a special feeling inside of me. I

See GARBER on page 12

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

In a photo taken years back, Richard Garber has a conversation with his son, Ted, who is carrying his son, Brett. Brett is now a sophomore for the Minutemen. Richard coached for 36 years and Ted coached for four.

A Minuteman says goodbye

Bob McGovern

"You'd better take one last good look...."
- NOFX -

As I sit here in the top row of McGuirk Alumni Stadium, I have a perfect view of the best university in America.

It's 10:14 on an unusually brisk May evening, and I'm writing this via the light of my cell phone, which turns off every five seconds, leaving me in a moment of complete darkness.

To my left are the twinkling lights of Southwest and the pulsating energy of my alma mater, to the right is the road leading away from campus ... the road leading home.

Aside from the cars pulling in and out of Yellow Lot, I am the only semblance of life here. Yet, as the sounds of engines and far off music reverberate off the walls of this U-shaped stadium, it's increasingly imminent that I am far from alone.

I have thought about this column since I was a sophomore and always wondered how I would write it. Yet, four years after packing my things, leaving Florida and heading north, it appears that it has already been written for me.

There are no cheers or youthful banter as I exit the north entrance of my football stadium. I leave with only the sound of my footsteps, grinding through the loose pebbles underneath me.

Just another Minuteman saying goodbye.

I made it through the parking lots that separate McGuirk from Southwest, yet with each step I wanted to stop and write. I knew I couldn't though; writing everything that came to mind about this school would fill a novel that only a select few would want to read.

Now I'm sitting on the big pyramid in Southwest staring blankly at Washington Tower, my home for my first two years. Memories are shooting through my head so fast that I stop and try to grab one, but it's gone before my pen can touch the paper.

Here are these giant stacks of lives, running parallel, shoulder-to-shoulder. Once in a while they collide with each other for an instant, and if they are compatible, they stick, if not, they simply continue on their respective journeys.

This is where I learned as a freshman and taught as a sophomore. It's where I met my first roommate, Chris Pullafico, who introduced me to my best friend and roommate for the next three years, Mr. Jordan Quitko.

I am sure those names are foreign to most of you, but so many have a similar story. Everyone came here running alone in some respect and met people who, for one reason or another, stuck more than others. In the end, these clusters are what we remember and what some of us are afraid to leave behind.

A wet paper towel almost hits me as I walk past Kennedy Tower. Two kids are sitting in their window laughing as I dodge its path. I simply smirk, shake my head and warn the kid behind me, who is barely phased by the air-borne prank. Now I'm sitting here in the tunnel that separates Southwest from campus, the division between blissful immaturity and educational reality.

In the distance I can hear the yells and laughter of those who are enjoying the waning days of this semester. Just the lingering calls of animals, not yet ready to leave the Zoo.

Standing at the gates of Garber Field, right next to the Curry Hicks Cage, I can feel a sense of this university's tradition. As steam bellows from underneath UMass' surface, it masks Garber's entrance in a line gray hue.

It's hard to believe I watched UMass beat Syracuse here only days ago. Those boys are coming back again on Sunday, this time I won't be sitting in the press box.

Before I pass Curry Hicks, I make sure I go around "the Circle of Bad Grades." I made the mistake of walking right through the middle my sophomore year ... never again.

I'm sitting in front of Bartlett Hall now, the house of the fine Journalism major. I can't help but think of all I've learned here, the true educating outside the social education. Nick McBride, Norm Sims, Bill Israel and Jim Hicks; thank you for showing me that the only thing objective about life is that nothing is ever truly objective.

From the 24th floor of the library I can see all of my campus. I am sitting at a desk near a window in the far corner, facing the practice fields. Engraved in the middle of the desk is "GO Minutemen!"

I couldn't have said it better myself.

As I look out I can see the faded facade of the Mullins Center, cracking through the darkness. Four years of concerts and athletics encapsulated as memories under one green roof.

I was here through the good and the bad. I saw coaching changes and athletic directors come and go. Through it all, it was well worth it as the two of us danced on December 9th 2004, a glimmering light in my college career.

Right behind the Mullins Center is my rugby pitch, where I learned how to be a man while never letting go of the child that plays within all of us.

Too many memories on this chilly May evening, I've tried to capture them, but I failed, just as I knew I would.

I guess my search has left me here for a reason, as I stare at my reflection in my library's window. Maybe it's too much and perhaps that's why saying goodbye is so hard.

So with this I leave you with my final column for this incredible newspaper at this stellar establishment. My only hope is that through my writing over the past few years I was able to give you a piece of myself as I ventured to the heart of UMass athletics.

I never thought I'd be writing this, but then again it wasn't really me. It was you, this school, and everything I've learned and experienced along the way.

And for that, UMass, I thank you.

Bob McGovern was a Collegian columnist.

Garrity living a dream

By Tobi Foster
Collegian Staff

For most kids growing up, your father is your idol. When he tells you something, you listen and try to emulate what he told you to do. Good thing freshman Bryan Garrity listened to his father, because it led to a full-athletic scholarship and a possible future in professional baseball.

His father, Dennis, was a high school catcher and had always told his son that a good catcher was something rare and coaches were always looking for a quality backstop.

When his son was six years old, Garrity threw on the gear for the first time during his tee ball days and was simply a natural with a catcher's mitt. Bryan caught his first pop up by the backstop and that was it. He wanted to be a ball player.

"I did fall in love with baseball right away," Bryan Garrity said. "As a young kid, your aspirations are you always want to be a major league baseball player. My father loves baseball. When I was younger, I tried to mold myself after him and he introduced me to the game. He never forced me into it, but I'm happy I stuck with it."

The young catcher enjoyed life behind the mask and stayed with the position. He continued to work hard on his technique to improve himself before he started playing for the Peabody High School varsity baseball team.

Garrity became a four-year starter behind the plate and was named Male Athlete of the Year at Peabody, where he was also the starting two-year quarterback and a senior captain. In his senior year on the diamond, he was named captain and posted a batting average of .302 with 12 runs batted in and 10 stolen bases, leading the team to an Eastern Mass Sectional championship game.

The state championship game in his senior year pitted Peabody against their rival, then nationally-ranked St. John's Prep in Danvers. The crowd was filled with fans, somewhere between 5,000 to 6,000 people in attendance, according to Garrity.

"It was just an unbelievable game to play in and experience," Garrity said. "I had a hit in the game, stole a base and there were a ton of scouts there. Playing in such a large crowd really got my adrenaline going."

Over his four years at Peabody High, he caught two big time pitchers in left Allison and Ryan Moorer.

Moorer was drafted in the 13th round of the Major League Baseball draft by the Chicago Cub's and is currently a freshman at University of Maryland. The six-foot-two right hander is a powerful pitcher, who throws in the high 80s to low 90s.

Though the best pitcher that Garrity caught for in high school was a local legend named Jeff Allison. The six-foot-two pitcher with a rocket for an arm was drafted the sixteenth pick overall by the Florida Marlins, who signed him to $1.85 million dollar contract. The newly drafted hurler, who was named Baseball America's 2003 High School Player of the Year, developed an addiction to OxyContin and almost lost his chance at the big time. Though, Allison is battling back and is cur-

COURTESY UMASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Bryan Garrity has batted .273 with 14 RBIs and 14 runs scored in his freshman season. He has 35 hits and four doubles.

See GARRITY on page 11

UM waits for Syracuse, again

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After winning its third ECAC title with a 13-7 victory over Rutgers on Saturday, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (12-2) had to wait until Sunday night to figure out who it would face in the NCAA tournament.

That night, as the team sat in Boyden Gym, its name was called only to find out its opponent was defending National Champion Syracuse.

From then on, the Minutemen knew they would have to make history.

The Maroon and White will face the Orange of Syracuse (7-5) on Sunday at 1 p.m. for the teams' second meeting this season. UMass won the first game 14-13 in overtime on April 30, in one of the most exciting lacrosse games in the nation this year.

This time is a bit different for the Minutemen. This game is won and done and if they are able to beat the Orange, it will be the first time Syracuse has not made the semifinals in 22 years.

UMass coach Greg Cannella is not intimidated by this daunting statistic and is hoping that no one on his team cares either.

"If you go into the game feeling that way or thinking that way, you might as well not show up," Cannella said.

Since the tournament selections on Sunday, there has been ongoing banter between UMass fans who feel the No. 8 seed that the Minutemen drew was unwarranted since Georgetown, who came in third in the ECAC and lost to both Penn State and the Minutemen, received a No. 6 seed.

Cannella is looking past all the hype and is simply exited for the chance to get back in the NCAA tournament after a year's hiatus.

"You don't change your preparation, don't change your focus on what's important and that's playing the game between the lines," Cannella said. "All this other stuff people are talking about this week, brackets and

See MEN'S LACROSSE on page 11

New England's Largest College Daily • Est. 1890

The Daily Collegian

Thursday, May 12, 2005 www.dailycollegian.com Volume CXV Issue 137

GEO and UMass announce latest contract agreement

Negotiators reached a tentative contract agreement yesterday between the Graduate Employee Organization and the University of Massachusetts Amherst. The deal was reached in time to stop a picket of tonight's inauguration of UMass President Jack Wilson, which will feature U.S. Sen. Ted Kennedy as the guest of honor.

The contract agreement is expected to be announced today by GEO and the University in a joint statement. Although details of the agreement are not clear, the two sides had been at odds for more than a year in a dispute over graduate student pay, health benefits, childcare and workload.

The timing of the agreement avoids a potential embarrassment for President Wilson, whose inauguration is set for 7 p.m. tonight at a "UMass Night at the Pops," which will feature the Boston Pops Orchestra at Symphony Hall, Boston.

The agreement follows a March 21 advisory from Wilson's assistant Robert Goodhue to University officials urging them to save this evening for the event, "celebrating the inauguration of President Wilson and honoring Senator Edward M. Kennedy as the 2005 President's Medal recipient."

GEO officials on April 22 co-sponsored a shut-down of UMass Amherst campus classes, and threatened to picket Wilson's inauguration, apparently anticipating that Kennedy would not cross a union picket line.

Officials at Kennedy's office confirmed that if the picket were to occur, the senior U.S. Senator from Massachusetts would not cross the picket line.

"We don't expect him to cross the picket line," said a Kennedy spokesperson.

GEO, which is affiliated with the United Auto Workers, has reportedly canceled its picket for Wilson's event this evening. However, the student activist group Take Back UMass still plans to picket concerning diversity issues on campus. Because Take Back UMass is not affiliated with the union, Kennedy seems likely to attend the event, as planned.

A UMass Amherst negotiator did not return calls for comment for this story, and GEO's president refused to discuss the matter until GEO and the university issue their statement. But word of the agreement has been posted on the GEO Web site http://people.umass.edu/geo/.

—Jamie Mason

Marching Band to perform with Pops

By Jennifer Warner
Collegian Correspondent

UMass President Jack Wilson is to be inaugurated at Symphony Hall in Boston tonight at 7 p.m.

The University of Massachusetts Minuteman Marching Band has been invited to perform alongside the Boston Pops tonight when Jack M. Wilson is inaugurated as the 25th president of the University of Massachusetts.

Wilson, a physicist, engineer and entrepreneur, decided to forego a traditional inauguration ceremony and start his own tradition with an event to celebrate the UMass community called "UMass Honors."

"There is no group that better represents the energy, enthusiasm and dedication of UMass students, nor is there a group that has brought greater honor to our university than the Minuteman Marching Band," Executive Director of Alumni Affairs Bob Goodhue said.

Wilson was elected as president of the five-campus UMass system on March 24, 2004, after previously serving as interim President. During the first part of his presidency, Wilson has highlighted the 58,000-student UMass system's importance as a research and economic-development engine for the state.

"UMass Honors" will take place at Boston's Symphony Hall, where Wilson will be inaugurated at 7 p.m. According to Band Personnel Manager Michael Smuda, the band will showcase music from the past season prior to the ceremony.

Following the ceremony, The Boston Pops will perform at 8 p.m. The 300 member Minuteman Marching Band, under the direction of George N. Parks, will join conductor Keith Lockhart and the Boston Pops in the finale performance. Band members will enter into the hall, filling the balcony and lining the walls, as the Pops begin to play Stars and Stripes.

"When our work is recognized enough to be invited to the inauguration celebration of the university's president, it is an incredible accomplishment," senior flute player Leanna Toy said.

Members of the band were surprised when their director first notified them of the performance.

"This opportunity doesn't happen all too often," Smuda said. "Not only are we playing with the Pops, but we'll be doing so in front of many top notch respected people such as Wilson who will be attending the event."

U.S. Sen. Edward M. Kennedy will also be honored at the ceremony as the 2005 recipient of the President's Medal, UMass' highest award.

Kennedy has been a strong advocate for public higher education, advancing the cause across the nation while working with particular emphasis on behalf of the public institutions in Massachusetts, according to Goodhue.

In honor of the special event, all proceeds will support student scholarships throughout the five UMass campuses, according to the Office of the President.

Wilson also notably served as vice president for academic affairs and founding chief executive officer of UMassOnline, the University's nationally acclaimed distance-learning division.

SGA talks about books and budgets

By Elizabeth Vargas
Collegian Correspondent

Yesterday's Student Government Association session began with announcements.

ALANA Caucus External Chair Qingjian Shi announced the need to level fund ALANA Registered Student Organizations. It was then brought to the attention of the Senate that they could not talk about the budget appeals concerning the budget set out by the Ways and Means Committee for the fiscal year 2005/2006 because of a technicality. This would have entailed a breakdown of the budget and likely an order to level fund Registered Student Organizations.

Senator Higgins went on to mention that the Finance Committee had passed allocations for the Student Nursing Association. The Baseball Club was also allocated $1543 to go to the College World Series in Florida.

Announcements continued as a Graduate Employment Organization representative announced that a tentative contractual agreement had been met and that GEO would vote on it during SGA session.

Next President Pavel Payano made several announcements. The pilot program of the textbook rental system for next year needs eight more faculty to support the cause, currently three faculty members have given their support.

He went on to announce that all the by-law changes made in the last two SGA sessions were passed by Vice Chancellor Michael Gargano, except one that concerned student support services creating a Customer Service branch.

Payano also appointed four seats to the Student Legal Services Board. Speaker of the Senate Sean Bliss, former SGA President Eduardo Bustamante were two of the appointees. Payano, along with Senator Holmes sponsored Chair Ayotunde Onikoro for Attorney General, whose appointment passed unanimously.

Then Speaker Sean Bliss nominated Senators Mike Marturana and Tameron Josbeck to Coordinating Council, they were later appointed by the Senate. Speaker

Bliss went on to discuss Senate productivity, citing his desire to appoint committees immediately after elections so the committees have more time to dedicate to their duties.

Senator Colin Delargy, Chair for the Ways and Means

See SGA on page 3

Memorial benefit to honor Hayes

By Kristin Sauve
Collegian Correspondent

Five months after the tragic car accident that took the life of University of Massachusetts graduate student and employee, The Crescent Dancers, a Middle Eastern dance troupe is sponsoring a memorial benefit to honor the memory of 25-year-old Jessica Hayes. All of the proceeds from this benefit will be given to help fund the scholarship that was created in Hayes' name.

Hayes died after being struck by a car in a pedestrian crosswalk on Route 116 in Sunderland near her home on December 21, 2004.

In honor of Hayes, Lila Gierasch, the head of the Biochemistry and Molecular Biology department, suggested to Hayes' mother Maureen Zak and stepfather Joseph Zak that they create a scholarship in her memory "I think we all felt this was something concrete we could do, at a time that was so difficult to fathom and to move onward from," said Gierasch.

Thus far, the scholarship fund has received over $10,000 of gifts, and according to Gierasch the gifts are still coming in.

Hayes received her undergraduate degree with honors from the Isenburg School of Management in 2001 with a minor in Economics. At the time of her death, she had been working for seven months as an undergraduate program assistant in Biochemistry and Molecular Biology while getting her graduate degree.

Hayes decided on studying biochemistry because as her stepfather said, "She believed that biology was a field that was going to save the world."

Hayes had always had a great love of learning. When picking classes she would always enroll in honors courses with the strictest criteria because "she always wanted to learn the most that she could," says Joseph Zak.

Hayes attended UMass as an undergraduate on a four-year scholarship she received from former UMass President William Bulger. Zak laughed as he remembered his daughter being the only recipient to give Bulger a hug when receiving the scholarship. Because of the impression Hayes made on Bulger, after the ceremony the three spent over an hour talking together.

"That was the effect that she had on people," Zak said.

The Zaks remember their daughter, Jessica, as "always having a smile on her face." She was described as very caring person who loved doing things for other people without expecting anything in return.

When Hayes' mother suffered from a large brain tumor that almost took her life, Joe Zak said, "Jess never looked back. She always went out of her way to help out her mother."

This was the type of attitude that was typical of Hayes, and from the 1500 people who attended her funeral it was clear how many people's lives she had touched during her lifetime.

Zak remembers being approached by a grocery store worker shortly after his daughter's death that recognized him as Hayes' father. Zak said, "She told me how Jessica used to talk to her and sit with her on the bus when nobody else would. That's how Jess was, a very caring person."

The Zaks and Gierasch are still working on the criteria for the recipient of the Jessica Hayes Scholarship Fund, but the scholarship will be awarded to a female biochemistry major. According to Gierasch, "[We] want someone who embodies the traits we all loved in Jessica. Someone who has the academic record... but also cares about helping people." They are also looking for someone who has many different interests and talents just as Hayes did. The scholarship will be given for the first time sometime within the next year.

One of the special traits that Hayes possessed, according to her father was that, "she kept a calmness about her even when chaotic things were happening. she could handle many things at once." She was also able to keep people amused in some way even in the most chaotic of times with her "cleverness and dry wit."

COURTESY OF KEITH ZAK

Jessica Hayes, 25, was hit by a car and killed December 21, 2004.

See HAYES on page 6

COURTESY UMASS BASEBALL CLUB

We won!!
The UMass Men's Baseball Club recently defeated the Penn State Nittany Lions 10-7 to secure their first NEA Regional Chapionship and landing them in a spot in the national Club Baseball Association.

Paris Program suffering cutbacks

By Christina Baron
Collegian Correspondent

Hit by shrinking faculty and budget restraints, the University of Massachusetts Paris Program has avoided demise by partnering with an international study abroad program.

The change means higher costs for students wishing to study abroad in Paris. It also means students abroad will be working with a resident director supplied by Academic Programs International instead of a UMass professor.

The Paris Program found itself looking for aid when early retirements and tight budgets left the French department with no one to spare for the one-year Paris assignment, according to the program's assistant director Neil Hartlen.

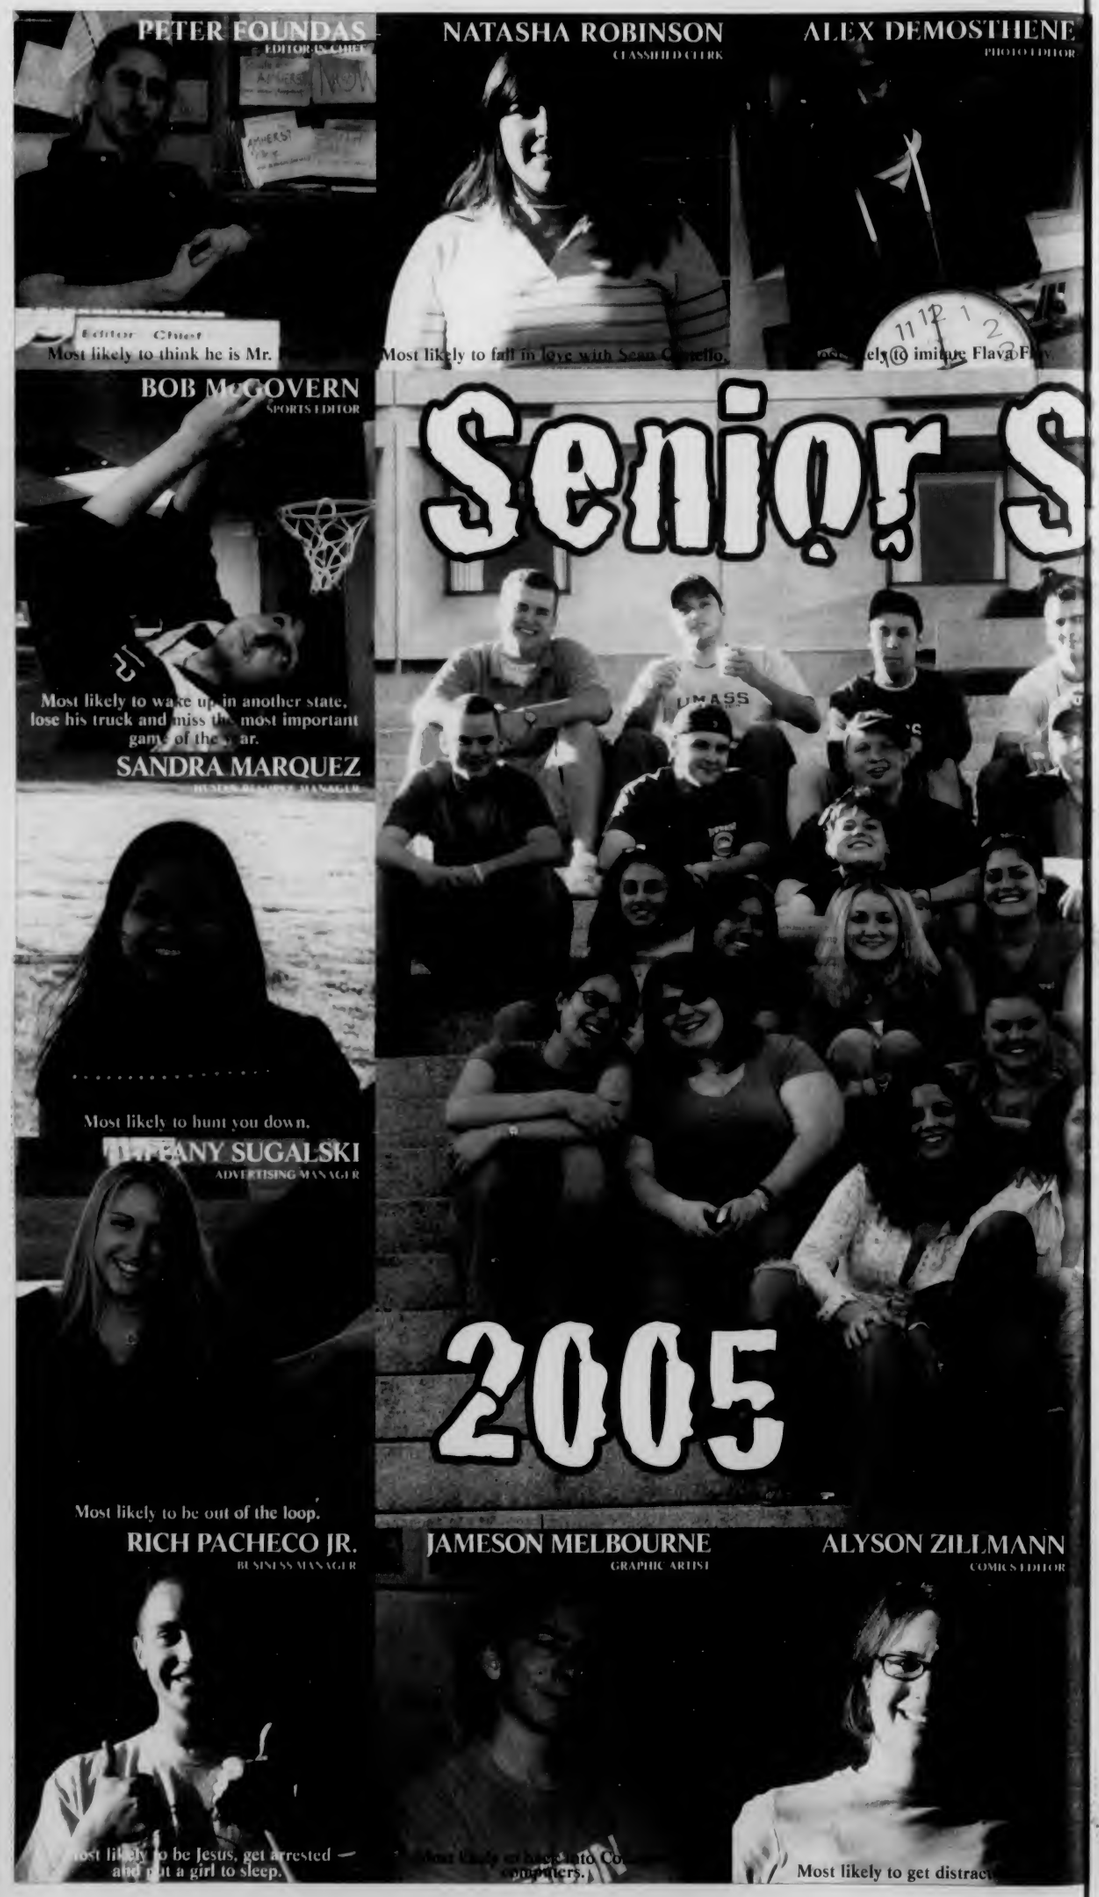
The partnership will allow students to still have the benefit of a fulltime advisor, however, costs are expected to rise another $2,000 for the semester and $5,000 for the year. Overall the cost of the program will be $15,600 for a semester and $24,870 for the year without personal expenses.

The Paris Program began as a two-campus program between UMass Amherst and UMass Boston in the mid 1990s. In the past, students planning on studying in Paris had the support of a full-time UMass faculty member living in Paris. The faculty advisor acted as a full time emergency contact and offered a course on French Civilization in the fall and Theater in the spring.

The UMass Paris Program had been a successful study abroad program for students looking to improve their language fluency and experience the French culture first hand, according to its Web site. Students found comfort in low cost, $12,000 per semester, and the fact that there would be a UMass faculty member in Paris for the entire year. Each year about 30 students studied in Paris through the UMass program.

Currently, UMass Boston has only one and a half full time faculty members and UMass

See PARIS on page 6



ARTS & LIVING
KASABIAN
The 'next big thing' has its 'next big show' in Boston.
PAGE 9

EDITORIAL/OPINION
SENIORS' LAST WORDS
Collegian seniors write their final thoughts about college experiences.
PAGE 7

WEATHER
TODAY Partly Cloudy, H63°
TONIGHT Partly Cloudy, L31°
TOMORROW Sunny, H66°, L41°

SPORTS
MISTY-EYED MEMORIES
The 2005 Collegian Sports Staff gives you the year in review, they way they saw it.
PAGE 16

Campus Perspectives

By Megan Brinster

What are your plans for the summer?

"Graduating and going to work at Breakers in Palm Beach."

Tamir Dvorin

senior

Hospitality and Tourism Mgmt

"Going home to Bellingham to work for the state at a home for the mentally handicapped."

Joshua Baker

junior

Communication

"Going back home to Puerto Rico."

Lizaira Hernandez

junior

Continuing Education

"Internship for Pratt and Whitney aircraft engines in Hartford, Conn."

Rob Graff

junior

Indust. Engine and Op Research

"Spending time on the beack back home in Puerto Rico."

Noelia Bauza

sophomore

Undeclared

"Working to the point of exhaustion."

Bryan Martins

freshman

Pre-medical studies

SGA discusses textbook rental system, appoints new members

SGA from page 1

Committee spoke next. He brought forth a motion to allocate $400 to the Student Resource Center for a new printer and to $1500 WMUA for a new Apple Mac computer.

The motion passed unanimously. Chair Brown then spoke about S129 a motion that stated that while the On Improving Campus Diversity Second Draft Action Plan[illegible] took away the SGA's right to manage RSOs and other various student activities on campus the University was doing this in good faith.

However, Chair Brown stressed that the SGA can and will create new agencies if they feel the University is not doing as promised. Chair Brown later withdrew his motion after debate.

Motion S136 was then proposed. This motion would basically enable the Student Legal Services Office to represent students in criminal cases, an ability previously revoked by the University. After debate the senators passed the motion.

Before some motions could be voted on however, quorum was called. Too many Senators had left the session to vote under the SGA by-laws. The Speaker then adjourned the meeting and Ayotunde Onikoro was sworn in as Attorney General.

SGA Speaker Sean Bliss addresses the Senate on Wednesday.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Campus Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Literature & Magazine Kristen Weiss
Copy Editor Marty Pappas
Production Manager Josh Kiggins
Finance Manager Hetak Shah
Associate Editor Virginie Frecaut
Design Director Sandra Marquez
Advertising Manager Mark Spinosa
Assistant Advertising Linda Wallack
Associate Editor Josh Greenberg
Associate Editor Nathan Chomsky
Assistant Photo Thomas Hecht
Assistant Production Rachael Bruno
Senior Associate Charlie Higgins
Associate Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Associate Arts & Living Chris Graziara
Associate News Julie O'Donnell
Associate News Dan O'Brien
Associate Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the academic year by the students of the University of Massachusetts. The Collegian is a member of the Associated Press. Operating on a budget of approximately $1,000,000, the Daily Collegian is entirely self-supported by revenue from its advertising and circulation. Founded in 1890, the Daily Collegian is the oldest college daily in Massachusetts. In 1907, the Weekly Collegian was added, and in 1968, the Collegian published daily for the first time. The Collegian is printed on recycled paper. For advertising information, call 545-3500.

Production Crew

On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Healy

PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brinster

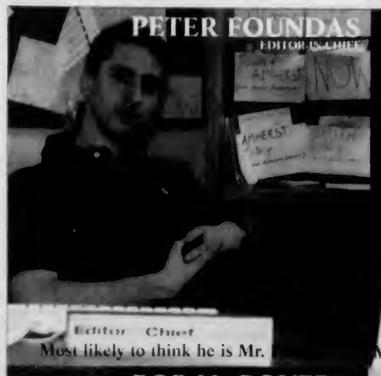
COPY EDITOR
Michael Busack

PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleston

PRODUCTION STAFF
Meloch-Natal, Lauren Egawan, Ellica Cheng

To the World's Best Customers:

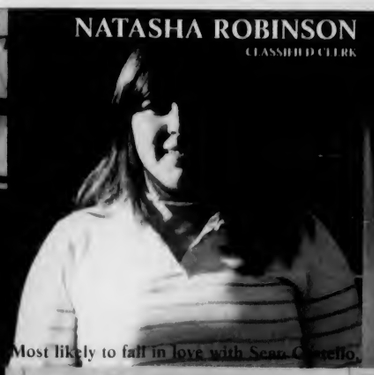
It has been a pleasure to serve you.
Good luck on your exams!



To the Seniors, we wish you well in your future endeavors.
To everyone else, we look forward to serving you again.

www.umass.edu/diningservices

DINING SERVICES
UMass

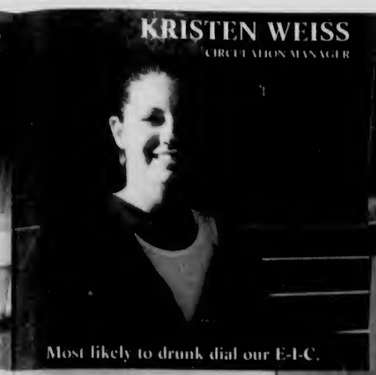


Senior Send-off

2005

PETER FOUNDAS
EDITOR-IS-CHIEF

Most likely to think he is Mr.



NATASHA ROBINSON
CLASSIFIED CLERK

Most likely to fall in love with Sean Costello.

ALEX DEMOSTHENE
PHOTO EDITOR

[illegible]ely to imitate Flava Flav.

KRISTEN WEISS
CIRCULATION MANAGER

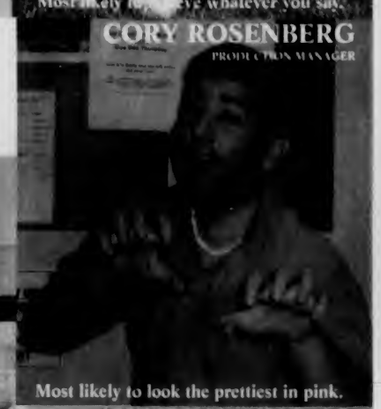
Most likely to drunk dial our E-I-C.

MEGAN BRINSTER
ASSISTANT PHOTO EDITOR

Most likely to be found in TJ Maxx.

RACHAEL BRUNO
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION MANAGER

Most likely to [illegible]ye whatever you say.



BOB McGOVERN
SPORTS EDITOR

Most likely to wake up in another state, lose his truck and miss the most important game of the year.

SANDRA MARQUEZ
HUMAN RESOURCE MANAGER

CORY ROSENBERG
PRODUCTION MANAGER

Most likely to look the prettiest in pink.

ANDY TAMULYNAS
PHOTO TECH

Most likely to hunt you down.

TIFFANY SUGALSKI
ADVERTISING MANAGER

Most likely to take a "cute" photo.

JULIE O'DONNELL
ASSISTANT NEWS EDITOR

Most likely to be out of the loop.

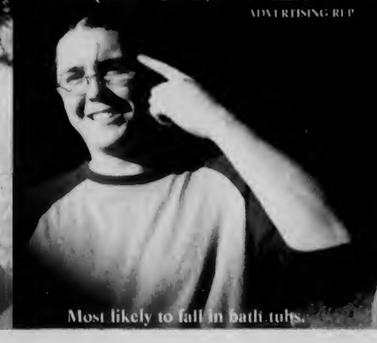
RICH PACHECO JR.
BUSINESS MANAGER

Most likely to be Jesus, get arrested — and put a girl to sleep.

JAMESON MELBOURNE
GRAPHIC ARTIST

[illegible] likely to have a lot[illegible] computers.

ALYSON ZILLMANN
COMICS EDITOR

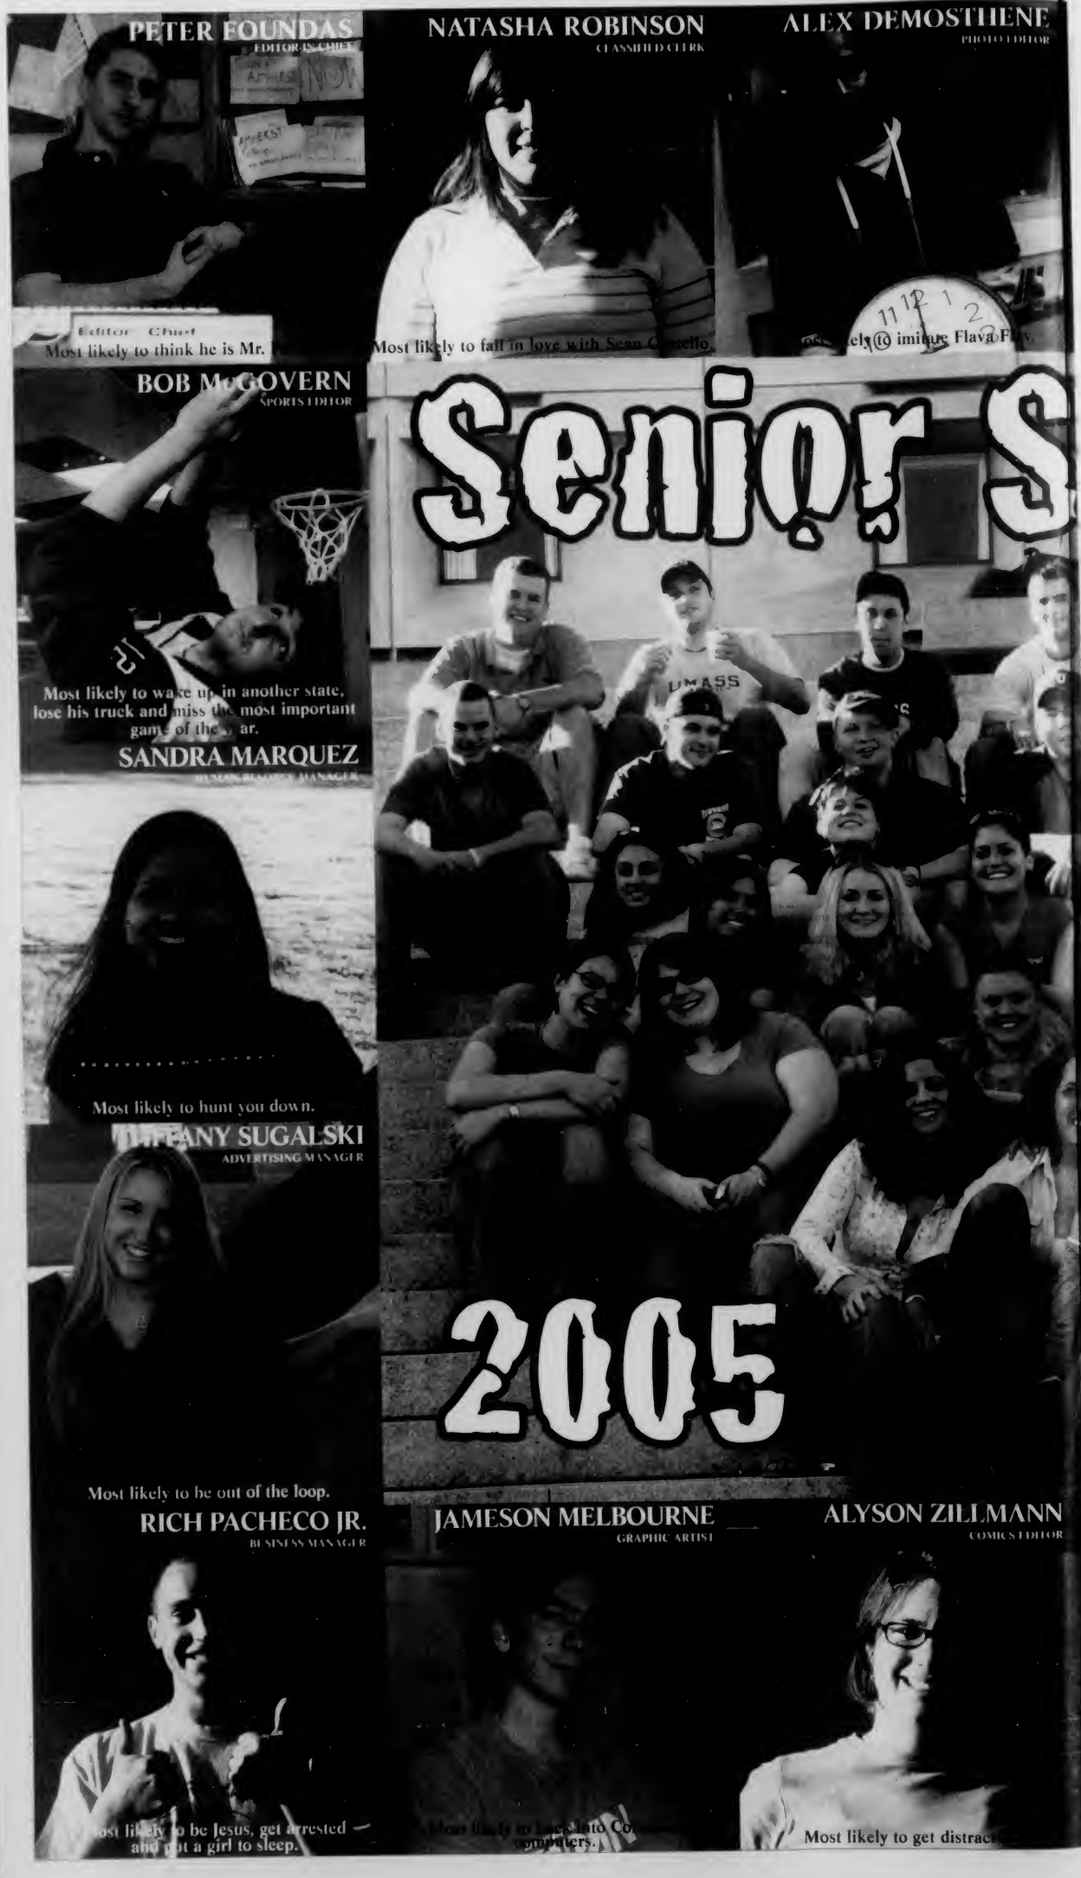


Most likely to get distract[illegible]

MEGHAN HEALY
NIGHT COPY SUPERVISOR

Most likely to marry Stephen Kellogg.

MIKE (KANSAS) McMEEKEN
ADVERTISING REP



Most likely to fall in bath tubs.

SARAH NASSER
ADVERTISING REP.

Most likely to have the entire office hear her phone conversation.

INTENTIONAL DUPE

Campus Perspectives

By Megan Brinster

What are your plans for the summer?

"Graduating and going to work at Breakers in Palm Beach."

Tamir Dvorin
senior
Hospitality and Tourism Mgmt

"Going home to Bellingham to work for the state at a home for the mentally handicapped."

Joshua Baker
junior
Communication

"Going back home to Puerto Rico."

Lizaira Hernandez
junior
Continuing Education

"Internship for Pratt and Whitney aircraft engines in Hartford, Conn."

Rob Graff
junior
Indust. Engine and Op Research

"Spending time on the beack back home in Puerto Rico."

Noelia Bauza
sophomore
Undeclared

"Working to the point of exhaustion."

Bryan Martins
Pre-medical studies

SGA discusses textbook rental system, appoints new members

SGA from page 1

Committee spoke next. He brought forth a motion of allocating $400 to the Student Resource Center for a new printer and an $1300 WMUA for a new Apple iMac computer.

The councils passed unanimously. Chair Brown then spoke about S129, a motion that stated that while the "On Improving Campus Diversity Second Draft Action Plan" [illegible] took away the SGA's right to manage RSOs and other various student activities on campus the University was doing this in good faith.

However, Chair Brown stressed that the SGA can and will create new agencies if they feel the University is not doing as promised. Chair Brown later withdrew his motion after debate.

Motion S136 was then proposed. This motion would basically enable the Student Legal Services Office to represent students in criminal cases an ability previously revoked by the University. After debate the senators passed the motion.

Before some motions could be voted on however quorum was called. Too many Senators had left the session to vote under the SGA by-laws. The Speaker then adjourned the meeting and Asoiundo Onikoro was sworn in as Attorney General.

SGA Speaker Sean Bliss addresses the Senate on Wednesday.

To the World's Best Customers:

It has been a pleasure to serve you.
Good luck on your exams!

To the Seniors, we wish you well in your future endeavors.
To everyone else, we look forward to serving you again.

www.umass.edu/diningservices

DINING SERVICES
UMass

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian
113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

Editor in Chief Peter Foundas
Managing Editor Mike Martelli
Business Manager Rich Pacheco
Production Manager Cory Rosenberg
News Supervisor Meghan Healy
Advertising Manager Tiffany Sugalski
Editorial Production Samantha M. Nielsen
Arts & Living Editor Michael Busack
Comics Editor Alyson Zillmann
Editorial Editor Allison Edles
News Editor Erika Lovley
Photo Editor Alex Demosthene
Sports Editor Bob McGovern
Circulation Manager Kristen Weiss
Classified Supervisor Marty Pappas
Distribution Manager Josh Kuggans
Finance Manager Hetak Shah
Advertising Assistant Virginie Frecaut
Human Resources Sandra Marquez
Production Manager Mark Spinosa
Accounting Supervisor Linda Wallack
Advertising Supervisor Josh Greenberg
Advertising Designer Nathan Chomsky
Advertising Finance Thomas Hecht
Advertising Production Rachael Bruno
Business Assistant Charlie Huggins
Arts, Arts & Living Matthew O'Rourke
Arts, Arts & Living Chris Gazzara
Assistant News Julie O'Donnell
Assistant News Dan O'Brien
Assistant Photo Megan Brinster
Assistant Sports Jeff Howe
Assistant Sports Eric Athas

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts academic year. The Collegian is entirely student-operated and independent of the University administration. Founded in 1890, the paper became a daily in 1971. It became the Collegian in 1914 and the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1936. Published continuously since 1890, The Collegian has been printed since 1994 by Journal Register Publishing Co. in Springfield. For advertising information, call 545-3500.

Production Crew
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Meghan Healy
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Megan Brinster
COPY EDITOR
Michael Busack
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Molly Eggleston
PRODUCTION STAFF
Melech Natal, Lauren Egavian, Elliot Chang

National News

Calif. sherriff believes D.A. investigator murdered family

By Ben Fox
Associated Press

GARNER VALLEY, Calif. — The sheriff confirmed Wednesday that the deaths of six family members in a remote ranch home were a murder-suicide carried out by a district attorney's investigator, who killed his mother, wife, three children and himself with his service weapon.

Sheriff Bob Doyle said David McGowan, 44, left a trail of bloody sockprints and song lyrics behind as he went on his killing spree in the middle of the night Tuesday, shooting each victim in the head as they slept.

The victims included his three children — his 14-year-old son Chase, and daughters Paige, 10, and Rayne, 8. Also killed were his wife Karen, 42, and his mother, Angelia McGowan, 75. The McGowans have an older son stationed in Iraq, Doyle said.

Investigators are still looking for a motive, the sheriff said, because McGowan seemed happy at work and at home.

"Although we did not find a suicide note, there was a piece of paper next to the computer with song lyrics from the Los Lonely Boys which read 'Woe is me. I'm looking forward to seeing you in the next life,'" he said.

"This investigation is not complete," Doyle said. "What was troubling this young man that he would do such a tragic thing?"

McGowan used his duty weapon, a 9-mm Smith and Wesson semiautomatic handgun, to kill his family, Doyle said.

Deputies were sent to the home at 4:33 a.m. Tuesday because of McGowan's last call — to 911.

The tape of that call was played by Doyle on Wednesday: a gunshot and several thumps can be heard, apparently McGowan and the telephone falling to the ground. His body, a gun and the phone were found close to the entrance of the home.

No one spoke on the very brief call, but the dispatcher immediately sent two patrol cars to the home.

Friends and neighbors said McGowan, who helped prosecutors in Riverside County prepare cases for trial, did not give any clues that something was so wrong.

Judge rejects defense attempts to block Abu Ghraib photos

By T.A. Bader
Associated Press

FORT HOOD, Texas — A military judge Wednesday rejected defense attempts to keep some of the notorious Abu Ghraib prisoner abuse photos from a jury in the scandal's second trial.

Col. James Pohl, in a pretrial hearing for Spc. Sabrina Harman, gave prosecutors the go-ahead to show jurors 29 of the photos that prompted condemnation around the globe of U.S military treatment of detainees at the prison in Iraq.

He also denied a defense request that detainees not be referred to as "victims" because it might prejudice the jury against Harman, and denied a defense request to present a statement allegedly made by an Iraqi detainee pictured in one of the photos because he could not be located and cross-examined about it.

Harman, a onetime pizza shop manager from Lorton, Va., is the second service member to go on trial on charges that she took part in mistreating detainees.

The trial was scheduled to begin Thursday with jury selection and opening statements. Charles Graner Jr., the alleged ringleader in the scandal and the only service member to be convicted at trial, was expected to be a witness.

Harman could face up to 6 1/2 years if convicted of conspiracy to maltreat detainees, five counts of maltreating detainees and dereliction of duty.

The 27-year-old reservist is accused of writing "rapeist" on the leg of one prisoner and forcing another to stand on a box with wires in his hands and telling him he would be electrocuted if he fell. In the photo, seen worldwide after the scandal broke, the hooded detainee is shown perched on a small box, with his hands outstretched.

In another photo, Harman gives a thumbs-up while posing with the corpse of an Iraqi detainee allegedly beaten by Navy SEALs at Abu Ghraib who later died while being interrogated by CIA agents.

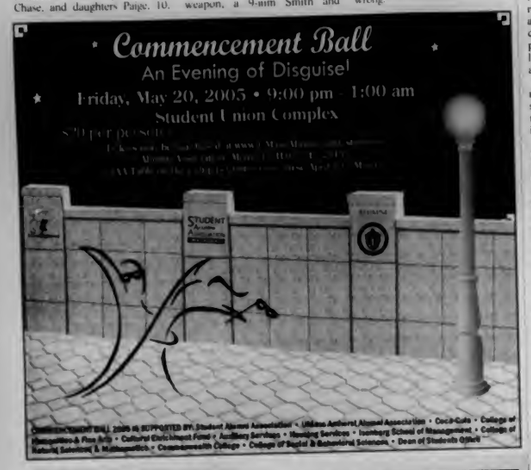
CPL. TED MEWSON, U.S.A.

This photo of a U.S. soldier taunting a Abu Ghraib prisoner is one that will remain admitted into trial, a military judge ruled yesterday.

Pohl refused to allow the defense to present a statement to investigators from the prisoner shown standing on the box. The prisoner, known as "Gilligan," said in the statement that other soldiers forced him to stand on the box.

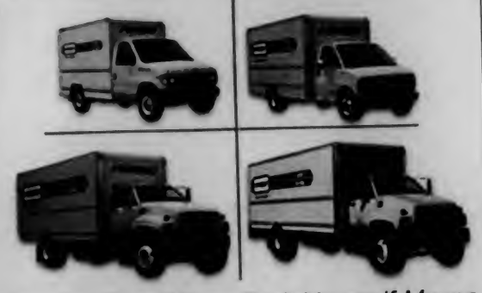
Pohl said the statement was not permissible because of questions about its trustworthiness and the fact that Gilligan could not located to be a sworn witness subject to cross-examination.

Capt. Cullen Sheppard, a prosecution spokesman, said the government tried without success to locate Gilligan after his release from U.S. custody.



Defense lawyer Frank Spinner said Gilligan's statement was not critical, but that "I'm still astonished that the government objects to introducing a statement of the alleged victim."

Earlier this year, Harman's legal team tried to get the photograph-related counts dismissed altogether, arguing that the taking of the photos did not itself cause prisoners any harm. But Pohl ruled in March that a jury should decide whether taking the photos constituted a crime.



Pohl did drop a charge of engaging in indecent acts, which carried a maximum five-year penalty. On that charge, Harman had been accused of being among a group of guards who watched naked detainees masturbate.

Harman's legal team tried to get the photograph-related counts dismissed outright earlier this year, arguing that the taking of the photos did not itself cause prisoners any harm. Pohl ruled that it would be up to a jury to decide whether taking the photos was a crime.

Four other Abu Ghraib guards have accepted plea agreements. Their sentences ranged from no time to serve to 8 1/2 years. Pfc. Lynndie England, the most recognizable Abu Ghraib defendant, also made a deal with prosecutors, but Pohl threw it out last week when sentencing testimony by Graner conflicted with England's guilty plea on the conspiracy charge.

Heading Home for the Summer?

Local ~ One Way ~ Do-It-Yourself Moves

We'll Take You Where You Want To Go

PENSKE Truck Leasing

* Low Rates
* Full Line of Moving Accessories
* Free Unlimited Mileage on One-Way Truck Rentals
* Full Range of Clean, Fuel-Efficient Trucks
* 24-hour Emergency Road Service
* Automatic Transmission and Air Conditioning Available

10% student discount with coupon below.

Receive a 10% discount WITH THIS COUPON on your next Local or One-Way truck Rental

Call (413) 549-1644

10% Discount PENSKE Truck Leasing 10% Discount

Affordable, new, clean trucks at convenient rental locations

This coupon is not valid with any other offer. One per truck rental and subject to availability. A "One Way rental" means your Penske truck is rented in one city and returned to another.

For Reservations Call 549-1644

Bring these back and get pennies on the dollar.

Bring these back and get $250 in discounts on travel, DVD movies, software, and more!

Here's all you need to do:

> Return your Comcast cable box, remote, and/or Comcast-provided modem to your local Comcast Payment Center (visit www.comcast.com to find the Payment Center near you).

> Go to www.comcast-ne.com/students and register for your $250 rewards card.

> When you receive your rewards card via mail, you'll have exclusive access to a website marketplace with tons of deals, including travel, DVD movies, magazines, software, and more! It's that simple!

Comcast.

International News

Inactive grenade found near President Bush in Georgia

By Mara D. Bellaby
Associated Press

TBILISI, Georgia — Georgia's security chief said Wednesday that an inactive grenade was found near the site where President Bush made a speech in Tbilisi.

Gela Bezhuashvili, secretary of the National Security Council, said the Soviet-era grenade was found 100 feet from the tribune where Bush spoke on Tuesday.

U.S. Secret Service spokesman Jonathan Cherry said Tuesday that his agency had been informed that a device, possibly a hand grenade, had been thrown near the stage during Bush's speech, hit someone in the crowd and fallen to the ground.

Bezhuashvili said, however, that it was not thrown but "found."

"The goal is clear — to frighten or to scare people and to attract the attention of the mass media," he said. "The goal has been reached and that is why I'm talking to you now."

"In any case there was no danger whatsoever for the presidents," he said, referring to Bush and Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili.

Bezhuashvili said the grenade was found in "inactive mode." He described it as an "engineering grenade" — one that is used for demolition or to simulate the effect of an artillery shell. Such grenades' blast-effect can be fatal at close range, but unlike offensive grenades, they are not designed to spread shrapnel.

"I am not an expert, but it was not possible to detonate it there," Bezhuashvili said.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. Embassy, Khatiya Dzhindzhikhadze, said "this question will be resolved jointly by American and Georgian specialists."

Security was very tight at Freedom Square, where Bush and Saakashvili gave speeches. Georgian police were deployed, and U.S. snipers were visible on the rooftops, scanning the crowd with binoculars.

Afghanis upset over alleged desecration of Quran in Cuba

By Stephen Graham
Associated Press

KABUL, Afghanistan — Shouting "Death to America," demonstrators angry over the alleged desecration of the Quran at Guantanamo Bay smashed car and shop windows and stoned a passing convoy of U.S. soldiers Wednesday in eastern Afghanistan. Police opened fire on the protesters, killing four and injuring at least 71.

The U.S. troops fired into the air before quickly leaving the area in Jalalabad, near the Pakistan border, provincial intelligence chief Sardar Shah told The Associated Press. It was the biggest outpouring of anti-American sentiment since the fall of the Taliban in 2001.

Mobs also attacked the Pakistani consulate along with the offices of two U.N. agencies and a Swedish relief organization. No foreigners were reported hurt and witnesses said police and government troops had restored order by early afternoon.

"There is a lot of damage to the city. they have burned a lot of things," Shah said. "These are the enemies of peace and stability in Afghanistan who don't want people to be able to get on with their lives in peace."

U.S. spokeswoman 1t. Cindy Moore said American forces in the area were ordered back to their camps, but she had no information on whether any of them were caught up in the unrest.

Four people were killed and 71 injured, including seven police officers, according to the Interior Ministry. It didn't give more details.

An Associated Press Television News cameraman said the crowds grew larger and wilder after the firing and the streets were deserted of traffic. Mobs pelted a government office and the local television station with rocks and tore down posters of President Hamid Karzai.

North Koreans prepare to hold more weapons-grade plutonium

By Burt Herman
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — North Korea said Wednesday it has completed removing spent fuel rods from an atomic reactor, enabling it to harvest more weapons-grade plutonium. It was the communist state's latest provocation amid deadlocked talks over Pyongyang's nuclear program.

A North Korean Foreign Ministry spokesman said the country had "successfully finished" removing 8,000 fuel rods from the reactor at its Yongbyon complex, which was shut down last month, so it can "bolster its nuclear arsenal."

North Korea kicked out international nuclear inspectors in late 2002, making it impossible to verify the claim.

While experts have previously said the 8,000 rods could yield enough plutonium for five to eight bombs, South Korean media said the current batch would likely yield material for a couple bombs because of the shorter time it was inside the reactor. To get the plutonium, the rods would need to cool and then be reprocessed, which takes months.

The announcement came a day after China rejected using sanctions to prod Pyongyang to return to six-nation talks on its nuclear ambitions, with a spokesman saying Beijing's political and trade relations with its neighbor should be kept separate.

"We stand for resolving the issue through dialogue. We are not in favor of exerting pressure or imposing sanctions," China Foreign ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao said at a regular briefing. "We believe that such measures are not necessarily effective."

A Bush administration official said the United States has asked China to redouble its efforts to lure North Korea back to negotiations.

The U.S. appeal, disclosed by a State Department official Tuesday on condition of anonymity, reflects a growing frustration over North Korea's refusal to reopen six-nation talks for nearly a year and rhetoric from Pyongyang that U.S. officials consider alarming.

String of bombings shake Iraq, killing at least 60

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — A string of bombings, including one by a man with explosives strapped to his body, struck several Iraqi cities Wednesday, killing more than 60 people and wounding more than 100.

A U.S. offensive in the lawless region near the Syrian frontier aimed at followers of Iraq's most-wanted terrorist entered its fourth day, the military said, adding that evidence obtained from captured insurgents confirmed the presence of foreign fighters in the area.

In Hawija, 150 miles north of Baghdad, a man with hidden explosives slipped past security guards protecting a police and army recruitment center on Wednesday and blew himself up just outside the building where some 150 applicants were lined up. At least 50 people were killed and 55 injured, police said.

"I was standing near the center and all of a sudden it turned into a scene of dead bodies and pools of blood," police Sgt. Khalaf Abbas said by cell phone from the chaotic scene. "Windows were blown out in nearby houses, leaving the street covered with glass."

In Saddam Hussein's hometown of Tikrit, 80 miles north of Baghdad, a suicide car bomb exploded in a small market near a police station, killing at least 27 people and wounding 75, police and hospital officials said. The attacker swerved into a crowd after heavy security prevented him from reaching the police station, police said.

The Ansar al-Sunnah Army said on its Web site Wednesday that it was behind the blast. But it denied the attack was carried out by a suicide bomber and that it targeted a local market, saying instead it was aimed at Iraqis who work in the U.S. base in Tikrit. The statement, which could not be authenticated, claimed its fighters left a booby-trapped car at a "site where dozens of renegades who work in an American base pass."

This vehicle was bombed in Baghdad yesterday. The region saw a particularly violent day, with more than 60 dead.

Four more car bombs exploded in Baghdad, three of them in suicide attacks, the U.S. military said. One caused an unspecified number of casualties in a U.S. patrol, it said.

Iraqi police confirmed three attacks targeting a police station and patrols in Baghdad. Four Iraqis were killed and 14 wounded, including at least three policeman, they said.

Another bomb exploded at Iraq's largest fertilizer plant in the southern city of Basra, setting fire to a gas pipeline and destroying about 60 percent of the plant. One person was killed and 23 wounded in the blast, police and employees said.

In Brazil, Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, on his first foreign trip since being elected to head the interim government, appealed to South American nations to support his country's efforts to defeat its insurgency.

"Terrorism is not limited to Iraq. It is a global curse," Talabani said, addressing heads of state and ministers gathered for the first summit of South American and Arab countries.

Rent One of Ours

No additional fee for 21-25 year old drivers

POTTERS Auto & Truck Rentals

• Cars
• Passenger Vans
• Trucks

• Direct Billing to Insurance Companies
• Free Local Pick Up
• Locally Owned and Operated

549-RENT (7368)

at North Amherst Motors
Collision Repair Center

On Bus Route • One Mile North of UMass

Midnight Buffet

Monday, May 16, 2005
9pm–Midnight in All DCs

MENU FEATURING:
Fresh Fruit Salad
Chicken Fingers
Chicken Wings
Pizza
Spring Rolls
Lo Mein
Vegetable Fried Rice
Omelet Station
Texas French Toast
Bacon
Potato Puffs
Chocolate Chip Cookies
Starbucks Coffee
and much more!

Good Luck with Your Exams!

DINING SERVICES UMassAmherst

Dad admits murdering two girls, police say

By Nicole Ziegler Dizon
Associated Press

WAUKEGAN, Ill. — The father of an 8-year-old girl who was slain along with her best friend admitted to authorities that he was the killer, saying he was angry at the girl for breaking curfew, authorities said Wednesday.

A judge denied bond Wednesday for Jerry Hobbs after prosecutors described a videotaped interview in court in which he allegedly told investigators he stabbed the girls to death.

Hobbs' 8-year-old daughter, Laura Hobbs, and her friend Krystal Tobias, 9, were found dead Monday in a park in Zion, the day after they vanished.

The father, who had been released from a Texas prison last month, told investigators he was angry at Laura when he tracked her and Krystal in the wooded park, punched her and then killed both girls, prosecutors said.

Courtesy photo

Jerry Hobbs is being charged in the murder of two young girls.

Hobbs, shackled and in a dark blue jail uniform, stared at the floor as Assistant Lake County State's Attorney Jeff Pavletic described the case against him.

Hobbs led police to their bodies Monday morning, claiming then that he found them while searching for his missing daughter. In videotaped interviews, however, prosecutors say Hobbs told them he killed the girls, stabbing his daughter repeatedly in the neck and eyes, after Laura refused to leave the park when he ordered her to go home.

State's attorney Michael Waller told NBC's "Today" earlier Wednesday that the father had showed a lack of emotion and that "things didn't add up" in his interviews with police.

The prosecutor said Hobbs went looking for his daughter and that Krystal "just happened to be there," before the father killed both girls.

Hobbs has an extensive criminal history dating to 1990 in Texas, including arrests for assault and resisting arrest, according to Texas Department of Public Safety records.

Just last month, he was released from a Texas prison after serving time for an assault in 2001. He had argued with Laura's mother, Sheila Hollabaugh, then grabbed a chain saw and chased neighbors until someone hit him in the back with a shovel, according to Rick Mahler, assistant district attorney for Wichita County, Texas. No one was injured.

Hobbs was sentenced to 10 years probation but failed to appear for required meetings, so his probation was revoked in 2003.

Arthur Hollabaugh said Hobbs had been living with the Hollabaughs after his release.

Memorial fund set up for Hayes

HAYES from page 1

The Zak's remember the last words spoken by their beloved daughter when she left for campus hours before her tragic death. Those last words to her parents were, "love ya," something both of them will always remember.

The Belly Dance, Drum Jam and Dance Benefit, sponsored by The Crescent Dancers, will be held May 19 at 6:30 p.m. at Greenfield Community College dance studio. Faith Kaufmann, a member of the group who was fond of Hayes, said, "It is our way of supporting our friend and fellow dancer Maureen." Maureen Zak was an active former member of the dance group and will also be at the benefit.

The Crescent Dancers ask that any musicians who want to play Middle Eastern rhythms or dancers who would like to dance for a good cause to participate. The suggested donation for the event is $5 to $100.

Those who cannot attend the benefit but wish to donate to the Jessica Hayes Scholarship Fund may contact the University of Massachusetts Amherst Department of Biochemistry and Molecular Biology, located at 913 Lederle Graduate Research Center, Amherst, MA 01003.

Paris Program suffers cutbacks; professors remain optimistic

PARIS from page 1

Amherst has five. However enrollment in the French program at both schools has not declined, said Hartlen. The two universities used to alternate sending a professor abroad each year, but the burden is now too heavy for either department to sacrifice faculty, said Hartlen.

At first the French Department began to look for other programs to recommend to students who had been planning to study in Paris, said Hartlen. When the department contacted Academic Programs International, an independent study abroad program that was looking to establish their own program in Paris, they began discussing a partnership.

Hartlen said that the Paris Program coordinators are "still juggling" with the details, but it appears that the UMass Paris Program is going to survive as a partnership with Academic Programs International.

Academic Programs International is an independent study abroad program which provides living, travel, education, and cultural opportunities for students in France, Hungary, Ireland, Italy, Mexico, Poland, Spain, and the United Kingdom, according to their Web site.

The new partnership with Academic Program International will allow the UMass program to still benefit from the support of a full time advisor. The advisor will have his or her own office and students will be able to contact him or her by cell phone 24-hours a day. Aside from advising and support, the Paris coordinator will also organize orientation in the fall and excursions throughout the year.

The difference between this advisor and those from the past is that he or she will be provided for by API and will most likely not be a UMass professor.

Coree Macomber, a junior political science major who plans to study in Paris next spring, said she was a little worried when she first heard that the program was undergoing changes, but is now more optimistic.

"Now it seems like everything is going to workout," she said.

Students will have the option of studying at one of three Parisian universities depending on their major and knowledge of the French language. The most advanced students will study at the Paris VII or Dauphine, a French business school, where all of their classes will be taught in French. Students who are in the beginner levels have the option of studying at the Sorbonne University. In all, the program has 15 openings for students each semester, half the amount before.

The Partnership with API has been finalized, however the past uncertainty has led to many questions from prospective students that cannot be answered.

"It has been challenging from a recruiter's standpoint," Hartlen said. But he said he remains optimistic that the program will be just as good or better than in the past. "It is not just a matter of getting everything together, crossing the t's and dotting the i's," he said.

UMass junior served in Iraq, commutes from Boston often

By Brian Duffey
Collegian Staff

Jessica Gilman is the embodiment of a non-traditional student. This 27-year-old junior is a married 'Operation Iraqi Freedom' veteran, who commutes to Western Massachusetts four days a week from Somerville.

Gilman grew up in a bi-racial military family in Hawaii. She left the Aloha State after high school to begin her college career at Northeastern University in Boston. Gilman signed an eight-year contract with the Army Reserve in her sophomore year at Northeastern, for what she said were a series of, "complex reasons." She eventually left Northeastern primarily for financial issues.

As a member of the Army Reserve, Gilman is required to report to Attleboro for one weekend a month to honor a two-week yearly training regiment she obliged to serve as part of her enlistment. The purpose of the reserves, Gilman explained, is to supplement for active duty members of the military. She is an E-5, or a Sergeant and trained as an engineer. Her unit has been active in community service projects throughout the South Shore of Massachusetts.

In 2003, Gilman received notification that her company was being sent to a Processing/Assembly Area in Kuwait. She says was not told exactly how long she would be serving there.

Gilman said that this was one of the toughest parts of her time overseas, not knowing when she would return. She spent the bulk of her time working on construction projects.

"It was a lot of concrete work," Gilman said, adding that temperatures were as high as 116 degrees farenheit. "It was like sticking your face in an oven."

As an E5, she had four men under her command. Gilman, the only female in her platoon and the only Asian American in her company, was explicitly told by these four men that they didn't like taking orders from a woman. She says that she told the men that they would have to get used to it.

"I shut off my brain," she said.

An avid reader and English major, Gilman read only two books over the course of the year she spent in Kuwait. She explained that there was some "anti-American, anti-occupation sentiment" towards the American troops and was reluctant to get into specifics about her time in Kuwait.

She did say that each soldier shared one common experience, they had to be there, and describes her time in Kuwait as neither good nor bad, but says that it is an experience that shapes who she is.

Gilman has had a hard time readjusting since she returned to the states in April of 2004. She described feeling disconnected from everyone, including her husband, after returning from Kuwait.

"You don't feel like you fit in," she said.

She added that many things that people complain about and consider important, she finds to be meaningless. She found comfort in drinking with other members of her battalion, claiming she felt as if they were the only people she could relate to.

Gilman spent a lot of time alone after coming home. After spending 12 months constantly surrounded by other people, this was hard for Gilman to handle. She struggled with leaving the house alone. The amount of free time she had after returning home was also difficult.

"I'm much more serious now about doing well," Gilman said. This is Gilman's second semester at the University.

Division of Continuing Education
Conservation Law Enforcement Officer Training Program

This program qualifies graduates for seasonal law enforcement positions in environmental agencies, such as national, state, and local parks.

The program includes over 334 hours of instruction in (among other topics):

- Law Enforcement Techniques
- Firearms Training
- Detention and Arrest
- Defensive Tactics
- Crime Scene Management
- Search and Seizure
- Accident Investigation
- Federal Law and the U.S. Code
- Patrol Procedures
- Defensive Driving

Up to six undergraduate credits available during Spring 2006 semester.

2005-2006 INFORMATION:

SCHEDULE:
Saturdays and Sundays:
September 10-11, 24-25; October 8-9, 22-23; November 5-6, 19-20; December 3-4, 17-18, 2005. February 4-5, 18-19; March 4-5, plus Monday-Saturday: January 2-21 and March 13-18, 2006.
All sessions meet 8:00 a.m.-5:00 p.m.
Registration deadline/confirmation: September 2, 2005, or until class fills.

Registration materials and more information are available from:
Program Coordinators
Division of Continuing Education
University of Massachusetts
100 Venture Way, Suite 201
Hadley, MA 01035-9430
(413) 545-2484
progcoord@contined.umass.edu

UMassAmherst
You'll find smaller classes
the same great teachers, credits that can add to your GPA, with flexible class options so that you can take care of the rest of your life, too.
Your Summer Your Way
UMassULearn.net
413-545-2414
Summer

ALL FIRED UP! creative food & beverage
FEATURING MONGOLIAN BARBEQUE ALL YOU CAN EAT BUFFETS

STUDENT SPECIAL
ALL YOU CAN EAT SUNDAY BRUNCH
$9.95
(Regularly $13.95)

48 Russell Street, Route 9, Hadley
413-584-5155
www.allfireduphadley.com

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SeniorMemories

Thursday, May 12, 2005 Editorial@dailycollegian.com

College was a party

Ben Feder

I once owned this campus; in a figurative sense anyway. Like all of us graduating seniors, I couldn't walk from the Campus Center to Herter without running into 30 friends and waving to 20 others. As the years waned on though, the number of people we ran into decreased and everyone around us started looking younger and younger. That is the way college goes.

Preparing for graduation and life beyond is a lot like my first "time." I was young and eager and there was a lot of preparation and planning put into the event. When the moment finally came to "do the deed," my parents walked in and for the next two weeks I found myself mowing the lawn and avoiding eye contact at the dinner table. It's not to say that it's embarrassing or anything, but it's a very anxious time. We can't plan for everything because in reality, we are planning for the unpredictable.

Everyone knows the end is coming. I realized my time was almost up last fall when I was awakened by this weird scraping sound outside my window. When I looked out I saw this red solo cup rolling a long the sidewalk.

Immediately the symbolism struck me. College is like a big party. Some people are just showing up, the night is young, and they're waiting to purchase a cup. Others have been inside for a while and are enjoying keg beer and drunken antics. For others, it's time to find a ride home and a place to rest you and your drunken friends' heads. Then there are those who have been gone for a while and it's the next morning. All that remains of them are their cups idly blowing in the wind.

So I'm ready to leave my cup behind and look forward. There's a giant question mark looming over my head. Has that ever stopped me before? Not really, and it shouldn't stop you either.

With that being said, I will say my goodbye and give my last words of advice. The bathroom in the basement of the campus center is the best on campus. Junior year you will see your orientation counselor again when you both are drunk somewhere uptown. Tuesday 10-cent wing nights at Charlie's constitute a day's worth of meals. John Adams is the best high-rise, followed by I.Q.A. All other high rises are of equal merit. You can be friends with cops. Veer away from starting any relationship via the Facebook. After getting his/her number, call back the next day at 5 p.m. to schedule a date for that night or the following evening, no later.

There, that's all I have left to say. To my friends, it's been a blast and we've had far too much fun. To the ladies I never called back or angered with my youthful naiveté, my apologies. For the rest of you, try the "throw it in her" at Charlie's. I hear the guy who invented it was pretty awesome.

Ben Feder is a Collegian columnist.

The world only spins forward

Thomas Naughton

I remember thinking "How blue..." when looking up at the sky while walking hand in hand with my friend, Lisa, away from our acting class after the planes struck the World Trade Towers. We were barely adults who only a week before had said goodbye to our parents and our old small-town world to start our "new lives" in college. Suddenly, frighteningly, and sadly, the world we were entering had fallen apart, or more appropriately put, had exploded, crumbled, fallen, and had been crushed.

Lisa and I watched the towers fall on the big screen television that used to be in the Blue Wall Café. We watched people jump out the window on television while people next to us cried and hugged one another. That television is gone, and I haven't seen or spoke to Lisa in two years; its funny how the world takes things out of your life.

Outside the Campus Center, on the green quad, in the shadow of the tallest library in the world, I stood and watched young people crying on cell phones walking and running to their rooms or to their friends or to anything that could hold them down on a day where the gravity tether of emotions seemed to have been unfortunately cut.

The bells in the Chapel tolled and kept ringing while evangelical Christian protestors showed up on campus to tell us that their predictions concerning God's vengeance and the end of the world were coming true.

They were right; the world had ended, lives were ending, lives were changing, and the sky was blankly blue that day to make room for what was being ushered in. When the dust settled in New York, the bells had stopped here in Amherst, and a volatile conversation began. No one had the answers.

I realized when looking at the faces of New Yorkers and my own reflection that I wasn't different from them even though I wasn't a block away from the site of terror when it occurred four years ago, even though I was far away and safe at a university.

No one has the answers even today.

As a member of the Class of Sept. 11, the class of college students whom were youngest dealing with the tragedy, I did not want to face the reality of that day.

It was easier to think of Lisa and me in the Blue Wall, watching from far away an event that is so close to the entire nation.

This year, I found myself in New York City for the first time since that day. I didn't go to the site of the attacks. I didn't need to. Just walking around Manhattan with the same people who ran from the falling towers was close enough.

I realized when looking at the faces of New Yorkers and my own reflection that I wasn't different from them even though I wasn't a block away from the site of terror when it occurred four years ago, even though I was far away and safe at a university.

We all carry that day with us to some extent; it's a reminder that the world can be so unstable, that we have to keep living, that someday we'll look around at where we are and it will all look so inescapably different. XOX

Thomas Naughton is a Collegian columnist.

Finally at ease

Peter Foundas

"C's and D's get Degrees." – A man who lives in a hovel.

"You have never edited anything before in your life. How is an accounting major supposed to run a newspaper? Have you even taken a journalism class at UMass?" These were the words of encouragement I received from my family and friends as I left for school last August to take the helm of New England's Largest College Daily.

As I made my way down the Mass Pike, I began to remember how I got my start at The Collegian. I was sitting in the Campus Center Café on a cold November with a copy of The Collegian, as was my usual routine. I was a sophomore, ready for more responsibility, and looking to get involved with something on campus. Just then an advertisement caught my eye, "Assistant Business Manager Needed," it read.

Nine months, two magazines and 137 issues later my collegiate career comes to an end, as does my role as Editor-in-Chief. What I most appreciate about my time at The Collegian is that this paper helped me fill that void.

I jumped up, ran down to the Campus Center basement and a year and a half later was elected Editor-in-Chief.

Getting off Exit 8 and taking the scenic route back to campus, I became extremely anxious. This would be my last return to UMass from a summer break. This would be my last year as a college kid. I began thinking, "I haven't gotten everything I wanted out of college. I am missing something." It seemed to me that there was this hole I needed to fill, to graduate satisfied. I couldn't quite tell what I was longing for. I had been to enough college parties, enough athletic events, enough classes, done enough group projects, ordered enough late night food, spent enough time playing wiffle ball and had enough of those wicked cold winds that blow through campus during the winter months.

As I pulled onto Rt. 9, I remembered coming to visit my older sister up here when UMass was in its heyday. Marcus Camby was the big man on campus, Billy Bulger was raising record amounts of money from alumni, coach Cal led us to the Final Four, the party scene here was at its peak and the name "Zoomass" was more befitting.

As I unloaded my car to move into my new place on Main Street that hot August afternoon, I started making a mental list of everything I wanted to do prior to graduation day, to see if I could figure out what was giving me this feeling of incompleteness: go to a toga party, do something other than study in the library, don't get arrested, finish a Fatso Burger and graduate on time.

After moving in, I headed straight down to 113 Campus Center, to ready the paper for another year. I was faced with the daunting task of running a professional daily newspaper, managing a staff of skeptical journalists, ambitious ad reps and sleep deprived graphic artists. Nine months, two magazines and 137 issues later my collegiate career comes to an end, as does my role as Editor-in-Chief. What I most appreciate about my time at The Collegian is that this paper helped me fill that void.

Before I begin my final words, I have to mention my roommates. I could not have remained sane this year if it wasn't for you, Nick Dust, Pat and yes even you Pico. You guys gave me another world to come home to so I could forget about all the nagging problems at this paper.

In my opinion, the purpose of college is to get an education; It would have been unfulfilling to me unless I had something tangible to show for it. With this paper, I had something everyday to show for my hard work. I had the chance to see ideas of mine come to life, to help the ideas of others materialize and to build on the foundations that have been laid for me, while setting new groundwork for those yet to come.

I could not have done it without the help of some amazing people, so to all of The Collegian staff this year, I thank you for dedicating yourselves as much as I have. You were the ones that kept me motivated to see this paper improve in every aspect. Thank you for trusting an SOM kid to run the paper. I did my best to not let you down.

Thank you UMass for giving me The Collegian.

Peter Foundas is the outgoing Editor-in-Chief of The Collegian.

Our Collegian seniors...

...always kept it serious

It ain't a party until my crew runs through

Tiffany Sugalski

These past four years have been the most insane and memorable times of my life. I want to thank my amazing friends for this unforgettable experience. I never thought in a million years that I would meet and grow so close to so many inspirational people. Every one of you has put a new meaning into my life and I hope I have done the same for all of you too.

To all my DZ ladies:

No one can ever shut us down, keep going strong. To my pledge class, we will always be one. We have done some crazy shit, and I could never remember half of it in the morning. I know after a night with you ladies, my head is always in the toilet the next day. We are still the best pledge class ever.

To the great eight:

We have torn this small town up, and everywhere else we have gone these last four years. We are truly a scene and "those girls" wherever we go. It was never a party until the crew ran through. Wendy, we started and finished together. I am glad you weren't gothic, but I still hate the color yellow. Sorry for all those nights I kept you up. Heidi-Heidi-Hoe, you have the softest hands. Boston couldn't get enough of our lesbian strut down Main Street. Remember Hobart – "Pillow Fight" or that's what I was trying to start. Steph, you crazy animal, I wonder where your leash is sometimes. Anytime you feel we should make a little extra cash, just let me know. We know how to put on a good show, but I think we can charge more next time we are in NYC.

Sarah, all I got to say is what happens in Cancun stays in Cancun. I think there is a drought of beads in Cancun after us. Kristen aka Kinky Kiki. California did you right. To the girl who talks the most, eats the most and has the most perfect bed. Korinee, my Crew, you are my favorite dancing partner. As those boys keep flocking you keep on blocking. Oh Ricky. Ahhhh!!!!

Jenny B., my partner in crime. The parties will never end for us, well maybe at four in the morning after we are done being American Idols. You are the Champ. FAB 4, it has been quite the year, you're awesome. RPJ (Ralph), you always make me smile and I will always have a special place in my heart for you. Don't forget to work on your 3 B's. I know your going to miss me like crazy and all, but "me too." "Tempted to Touch."

And finally to the Collegian staff

You have made my college experience worth more than I ever thought it could be. I have learned so much from all of you. I will never forget all of our experiences we had in Seattle and New Orleans. Remember, what happened in CNBAM stays in CNBAM. Peetah, you were the best lunch date ever, and will always be my Big Papa.

I'm going to miss those late nights at Barbie's dream house, late night karaoke, bungin' on the bongos, setting off fire extinguishers, looking for our knobs, falling off rolley chairs, stealing Cassidy and always having new boy stories. Thank you all so much for creating these memories with me.

Keep partying hard. I will miss all of you. And to those who I didn't mention I will miss you too, thank you for the fun time. And remember this ... "You are all pretty when I'm drunk, and I was always pretty fen drunk." Thanks UMass. Love ya.

Tiffany Sugalski is the outgoing Advertising Manager.

See you soon

Chris Eckel

So this is it. The last column I may ever write for this fine newspaper. And in 500 words or less, I need to sum up my college experience and what I'll miss come June. Doesn't seem like nearly enough words to convey such complex experiences and emotions. I feel like I'm writing an Emmy acceptance speech. That, or a personal ad. So for what, exactly, am I leaving the good life of a college student behind?

Nothing good. The real world is starting to set in, and like any transition, parts of it are a bit scary. Like the idea that we seniors will have to make certain lifestyle changes as we "mature." Food is one of those things. We're supposed to eat and drink more mature things as we grow up. When we leave pre-school, it's time to bid farewell to Fluffernutters and Teeni drinks for lunch. When we leave college, we're supposed to quit drinking beer for breakfast. Of course, I was still eating peanut butter and fluff throughout high school, so that puts me on track to quit my breakfast beers around age 35.

So if I could stay forever, what would I stay for? Well that's the tricky part about this word limit. There are far too many people to list, far too many memories that I want to keep in the present tense, not the past tense. So a lot would get left out, and besides, everyone hates lists. So I'm going to stay away from lists, and instead, try and offer a little advice.

Any humble man knows he owes thanks for his success and happiness. So thank you to people like Chris Blood and Lilly Dignan, who have loved me and who have my loyalty and my admiration in return.

Hang on to those near and dear, and let them know how you feel, for it's the people around you that define your happiness.

And more importantly, thanks to my family: Matt, Carolyn, Mom and Dad, for always being there and always supporting me. I love you all more than I'll ever be able to show you. It's important for you all to remember that such relationships won't be cut off like I will be at Charlie's the night before graduation, unless you let them wither away. So don't. Hang on to those near and dear, and let them know how you feel, for it's the people around you that define your happiness.

My word limit is fast drying up, so, in the best tradition of our graduation speakers, I'll close out with one killer piece of advice about living in the real world. "Be who you are and say what you feel, because those who mind don't matter and those who matter don't mind." So you're probably wondering about the name of my spiritual guru? It's Theodore Geisel. Also known as Doctor Seuss. It just goes to show you ... if you fail in the real world, just award yourself a fake doctorate and write children's books and that'll get you rich quick. Goodbye for now, UMass.

Chris Eckel is a Collegian columnist.

Not knowing what the future holds

Stacy Kasdin

I can't believe it's been four years. I can't believe I'm 21. I can't believe that in more days I'm going to be an unemployed, uninsured college graduate. Lately I've been complaining about how I've had enough of college life, but the thing is, you don't appreciate something until it's gone, and now that everything is about to change, I'm realizing I'm going to miss UMass more than I could have imagined.

As annoying as living in the dorms can be, it's nice to be able to come home at any time of the day or night and have someone be awake. As much as my neighbor's loud music pisses me off when I'm trying to do work, sometimes I can't fall asleep without it. By mid-sophomore year I thought I'd had enough DC food to last me a lifetime, but I fear the day I will have to go into a deli and purchase a sandwich with actual money rather than just swipe and be on my way. More so, I fear death by starvation due to having to cook, and more importantly, afford all my own meals.

The thing I'll miss most about UMass is the people I've met here, the people who have forever changed who I was and shaped who I have become. Matt, Justin, Brian, Nate and Brett, you have been my world for the past four years. You have taught me what true friendship is and allowed me to come out of my shell in a way I was never able to before. I am and will always be grateful for all your love and support. Thanks for the good times, the hugs and the memories. I'm sure there will be plenty more where those came from.

Another huge part of my life at UMass was Shaha. If there was one thing I could encourage all underclassmen to get involved in on campus it would be clubs. Shaha was an incredible outlet to discuss my frustrations with the world and an amazing way to grow, learn and have fun all at once. "Shahaians," thank you for everything, and I'll see you on Broadway.

Thank you Mom, for encouraging me to apply to UMass just before the deadline, the last of the 11 schools I sent applications to. Thank you to all those I couldn't fit into this 500 word column, who have made the past four years an unforgettable experience for me.

So now I'm moving on, and rather than say good-bye I'd like to end with these words from SNL great, Gilda Radner, "I wanted a perfect ending. Now I've learned, the hard way, that some poems don't rhyme, and some stories don't have a clear beginning, middle, and end.

Life is about not knowing, having to change, taking the moment and making the best of it, without knowing what's going to happen next. Delicious ambiguity." Here's to whatever lies ahead and may it be every bit as wonderful as we've dreamed.

Stacy Kasdin is a Collegian columnist.

Leaving UMass without regrets

Meghan Healy

About a week ago, I took a walk through campus. I was alone, which I rarely am anymore — I don't have time to sleep, let alone take a few hours for solitude and reflection. As I walked around, I remembered my first sight of UMass. I was driving down Rt. 116 and suddenly out of nowhere the towers appeared.

"What the hell is that?" I asked in horror.

"I don't know, maybe it's an industrial park?" my mom cautiously wondered aloud.

We made our way to the Student Union for an accepted student reception, where I learned that industrial park was actually the place I would call home for three long ... very long ... years until I finally escaped to the sanctuary of off-campus housing.

It's funny, but as much as I talk shit about Southwest, the Collegian and the University of Massachusetts as a whole, these have been some of the best years of my life.

If you had asked me even a year ago what I would have said about my time here at UMass when it was all over, the last thing I would have said is "these were the best years of my life."

To be perfectly honest, these have probably been some of the worst.

Leaving my home, a town with a population just a bit smaller than that of Southwest, opened me up to an assortment of life experiences, most of which I could have done without.

There has been the typical "growing up is hard to do" type of drama, the kind that everyone our age goes through. And then there are the other things, the things I don't talk about much: the suicide of a close friend in February, most of junior year (let's leave it at that) and the passing of my mother freshman year.

Since most of these things happened here at UMass, I have blamed UMass for them. Logically, these things would have happened regardless of where I was, but in a time where we are all on the path to becoming the normal, healthy, adjusted adults we will be for the rest of our lives, these "bumps in the road" were not appreciated.

Leaving my home, a town with a population just a bit smaller than that of Southwest, opened me up to an assortment of life experiences, most of which I could have done without.

I constantly found who I was and who I wanted to be never really measured up. All my expectations for Meghan at ages 18 and 19 were missed. Meghan, age 20 fell painfully short. Meghan, age 21 is already way behind.

But the other day, as I revisited all my UMass ghosts, walking through campus, I realized that maybe those expectations don't matter. I have overcome more than some people my age have even considered thinking about. And beyond that, I have made and kept amazing friends, I have been an active member of the UMass community and I have given a lot of myself to the Collegian.

It's a strange thing we do down here. We spend hours on end in the bowels of the Campus Center to create a product that half the student body seems to hate and the other half doesn't even read, and yet I am walking away from this experience proud to be a part of this paper. It's strange for me to say this, but being a part of the Collegian has in fact become a huge part of who I am. At a time when I wasn't even sure that I wanted to be at UMass anymore, this paper gave me a way to make UMass mine.

For those of you who will continue on here in the fall and beyond, I hope that you find your own way to make UMass yours. Join something besides a club on Facebook, be passionate about some cause beyond how you are going to get wasted this weekend (this is UMass, there is always a way).

For those of you that are taking your final walk away from the Zoo in just 10 days, I hope you found something similar while you were here. No matter how awful or wonderful your time was here, I hope you don't regret a moment of it.

I know I don't.

Meghan Healy is the outgoing Collegian Night/Copy Supervisor and a rock goddess.

Goal is to get in and get out

Alex Demosthene

"Yes, pay full attention. This is for gangstas, this is for gentlemen There's two kind of people out there. I happen to be the boss type. I'm a product of my environment. Blame the streets, I am what they made me." - Excerpt from A Gangster and A Gentleman by Styles P.

Even though I should be studying for an exam right now, I think it's definitely worth taking a break to look back and reflect on the past few years that I spent here at UMass.

I guess it's true what they say, "Most people are here on the five-year plan." I came in 2000 and it's taken me five years to get out. My reason for being here this long (not to make excuses) is more acceptable than others. I was doing a double-degree, which necessitates an additional 30, totaling to 150 for those of you who don't know.

Oddly enough though, a lot of my people that I came in with lingered too, anxiously to be part of the class of 2005. Only the extremely focused ones made it out in four years. It's not impossible but it takes sacrificing that first year of just "fking around" and adjusting to the zoo.

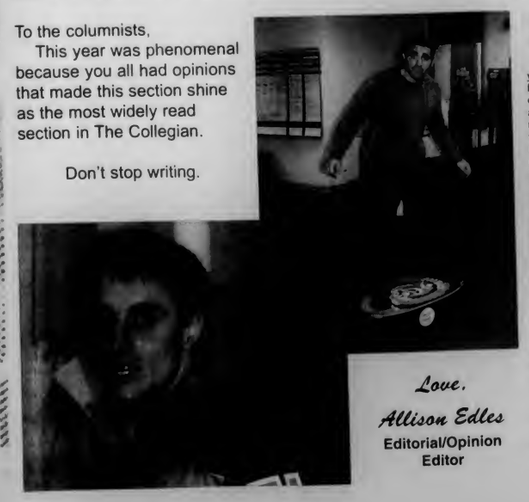
The other thing too is even though we hate being here sometimes, where else would we rather be? Not home, not working, not on the block, but right here in the dorms killing our brain cells with ethanol and cannabis. Oh yeah, getting an education too.

Most of what I learned here didn't come from books. It came from keen observation.

You can learn a great deal just by watching people and studying your environment. Different circles and people from different backgrounds each take their own distinct approach to reach what is ultimately the same goal, getting by and getting out.

The other thing too is even though we hate being here sometimes, where else would we rather be? Not home, not working, not on the block, but right here in the dorms killing our brain cells with ethanol and cannabis. Oh yeah, getting an education too.

Another important skill that I picked up at UMass has to be the art of negotiation. Well, I've had to use the skill before in order to get out of high school, but here on the university level, I had to take it up another notch. I'm sure all my buddies know what I'm talking about.



How many times have you had to email your professor with a B.S. excuse? I'm sure the answer is plenty. The rate of success of these excuses depends solely on one's ability to sound "down to earth" and also come up with a suggestion or remedy to your issue. For example, "I really can't make it tonight because I'm sick. And since I've missed so many other classes, I would like to complete a make-up assignment just to be sure that my grade won't be affected." Nine times out of 10, it works. Underclassmen take note.

There's so much more I'd like to share but my word limit is minimal. On that note, I just want to thank a few staff and faculty members who made the ride a little easier: Nick McBride, Jill McCorkel, Sid, Doris, Barbara McGlynn, Delsey Thomas, Dean Wikander, Millicent, Terry, Sandy and many others who know they have a place in my heart.

Lastly, I want to shout-out my menz and 'em: Rene, Jimmy, DL, P-Tek, Max, Frank-nitty, O, Dobber, and Rackizo.

I'd shout out the shorties but y'all are just too many. So yeah, this is my first and last submission to the Collegian. I was the photo editor all year and I loved working with each and everyone. McGovern stand up. People, the goal here is to get in and get out.

Alex Demosthene is the outgoing Collegian Photo Editor.

To the columnists,

This year was phenomenal because you all had opinions that made this section shine as the most widely read section in The Collegian.

Don't stop writing.

Love,

Allison Edles

Editorial/Opinion Editor

Hi, I'm Sandra Maria Marquez

Sandra Marquez

As we approach the imminent end of our many years of hard work (or lack thereof) I am reminded of famous quotes, most of which have graced the pages of my daily self-help bulletin (also known as, AIM away messages). I am reminded of the wise man who once said, "Adversity teaches you who your real friends are," whatever the hell that means. But I am also reminded of an even wiser man, who said, "H to the izz-O, V to the izz-A, fo shizzle my nizzle used to dribble down in VA." And that just about sums up our collective experiences as college students, does it not?

We put on a fake intellectual academic façade during the day, and at night, we bump the G-Unit tracks and freestyle. Rinse and repeat. Now here we are, left with this, a column, in which I can no longer distinguish between academic lexicon and friendly banter... fo shizzle. So friends, acquaintances, pimps, ho's and everything in between, bear with me as I try to say goodbye ... holla.

To my girls, y'all know that I'll miss ya. I am actually surprised not a single one of us got pregnant in all these years of college. Between Lauren forgettin' to take her birth control pills and Chris hiding mine, one would think it would have happened by now. Ah well, there's always next year. Sheila, you're Asian, and now I know that you're a particular nationality of Asian, I still don't know which one, but at the least, now I know all Asians ain't the same. Jamie, I haven't become talented enough as a writer to describe you, but all I can say is this, you make me want to become a lesbian.

To my boys, well, as all boys eventually do, it is time to re-enter the world a man. And by "man" I mean, "an overgrown boy who finally lost his virginity, he thinks." No for real though, it's been fun being your guys' mother (Colly). Thanks to James, I now know how to crack into the Pentagon and download musik from the servers at the White House. Thanks to Dan, I know how to spell Phish. Still ain't high enough to enjoy it, but I'm getting there. There is, of course, my man, the sexiest Korean man alive (he wrote this part himself) who is an animal in bed ... meow. Dear God, anyway, lets wrap this up.

To my boys, well, as all boys eventually do, it is time to re-enter the world a man. And by "man" I mean "an overgrown boy who finally lost his virginity, he thinks."

It's hard to believe, this all started with a makeshift dorm room in the first floor of Knowlton, a weird Korean kid with his even weirder friends in Cashin and a "Hi, I'm Sandra Maria Marquez," but in the end, everything seemed to work out just right, and there isn't a single day I regret. Now let's get outta here.

Sandra Marquez is the outgoing Human Resource Manager.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

Thursday, May 12, 2005 arts@dailycollegian.com

Kasabian Comes to Boston

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

As classes end and finals week begins, students generally do two things: get stressed out and start moving stuff home. A lot of people are going to be heading home this weekend and might be looking for a way to avoid studying for finals. Luckily, WFNX has a plan by bringing British dance-rock sensations, and one of the only ones from the current crop of "next big things" to live up to their expectations, Kasabian to the Paradise in Boston for free. There is a catch of course, the show is 21+ and the only way to enter is with an FNX card. Fortunately, FNX cards are free and signup is at wfnx.com.

Kasabian have become somewhat of a 21st Century Oasis. Mixing the electronics of Primal Scream, the dance beats of The Stone Roses and the drunken, sweaty rock-club swagger of, well, Oasis, Kasabian has concocted a surprisingly unique formula that took them to the top of the charts in Britain and they have begun to rise to the top of the alt-rock clutter in America.

Kasabian's bassist, Chris Edwards, told the Massachusetts Daily Collegian that the States have been treating the band well, coming off a tour supporting another British dance-rock act, The Music.

"[It's been] outstanding," Edwards enthuses, "we're getting amazing responses from the crowds...it's our first time out here and we're getting a lot of people coming to see us, even when the album's not out." Since then, the hype has only gotten bigger. Their first US single "Club Foot" has been enjoying a lot of play on radio stations and on MTV2, leading to much hyped performances like the upcoming on at the Paradise.

Where their tournmates The Music give a stunning live performance but can never quite translate the energy on record, Kasabian's self-titled debut is a straight-through adrenaline

See KASABIAN on page 10

Courtesy Jill Furmanovsky

'Kingdom of Heaven' lacking

By Jake Monte
Collegian Writer

'Kingdom of Heaven'
Directed by Ridley Scott
Starring Orlando Bloom, Eva Green
Studio name
Rated R
194 mins.
Grade B+

The difference between Ridley Scott and some other directors is that Scott truly loves everything the camera is capable of doing and expressing. His films are loaded with tilted camera angles, slow and fast motion effects, MTV style cut sequences, and brilliant cinematography. Some directors like to film their movies like plays, simple one-shot scenes, and let the actors do the work of entertaining. Kingdom of Heaven, Ridley Scott's newest film, employs all the same camera possibilities that got him his best director nomination for Gladiator.

The film stars Orlando Bloom, as Balian, a blacksmith in France, who meets up with his long lost father Godfrey, Liam Neesan, shortly after Balian's mother commits suicide. Balian rejects his father, but when he kills a man who speaks negatively about his mother, he is forced into exile and follows his father toward Jerusalem, where he takes up his father's life after he's killed and is thrust into a battle between Christians and Muslims for control of Jerusalem. There is a love story between him and Eva Green who takes to him extremely quickly – after all, he's Orlando Bloom.

Watching Orlando Bloom in this film, I kept waiting for his countenance to turn to stone for lack of moving his facial muscles. The script is equally lifeless. When he finds his father on his way to Jerusalem, he says, "I've done murder," and just stares in his detached emotionless way. This is how Bloom delivers most of his lines — dry, flat, totally uninteresting statements, made by someone who is so one-dimensional that he resembles a comic book character. Watching Orlando Bloom try to be a tough guy is laughable. If there were interesting actors in this film, who we were intrigued to watch, the film might not be such a dry, uneventful, shallow, bore.

Kingdom of Heaven is two hours and twenty minutes of your life you'll never get back. The experience feels more like five hours. There are some redeemable elements. The battle scenes are impressive, but nothing we haven't already seen in Troy or Lord of The Rings. The best part about the film is its message, which takes a stand against religious based conflict. Balian is not a particularly strong advocate for conventional religious ideas.

At one point he says, "Your brothers Kingdom is here and here," pointing to mind and heart, "that Kingdom can never be surrendered." He also says, "At first I thought we were fighting for God, then I realized we were fighting for wealth and land."

These ideas are like gems in the middle of a pit of tar. Kingdom of Heaven feels like an imitation of all the interesting period films. It's passionless and uninspired. It just sits on the screen without enough energy to create even the most meager emotional impact. Scott's direction is in fine form as usual but it's not enough to save the film from the soulless screenplay and actors who play it as safe and under par as possible. Some people really like films like these, period pieces that don't really have any ups and downs, yet portray a time period in a realistic way. For me, it was as tedious as can be, and I was glad when it was over.

Courtesy Paramount Pictures

Orlando Bloom has struck out again in a new crusader-esque film, "Kingdom of Heaven." This movie, unlike the wildly popular "Lord of the Rings" trilogy, may be found less than thrilling.

Trip to the the New England Metal Festival: part 2

This is part two of a [illegible] Collegian writers Three Fonseca and Patrick [illegible] completed a three-day [illegible] seeing several hard-[illegible] shows. The following is the second half of a [illegible] journey.

[illegible]:15 on Saturday night [illegible] are residents away from the [illegible] commotion from the techni-[illegible]-death metal masters-[illegible]. I am struck with [illegible] shock and awe as I watch [illegible] than the original [illegible] Lord Worm stroll [illegible] stage with the rest of [illegible] clad in his leather [illegible]. As if this isn't [illegible] he immediately [illegible] "Crown of Horns" [illegible] never disbelief as they [illegible] play "None So Vile" [illegible] an album regard[illegible] as the metal commu-[illegible] one of the finest and [illegible] works ever pro-[illegible]. The crowd goes ballistic [illegible] and witness a sea [illegible] crushing. To my right [illegible] he yells wildly, eyes [illegible] with excitement. This [illegible] times. To top it all [illegible] Lord Worm stays true to his [illegible] by brandishing a goblet of [illegible] and devouring

[illegible] are merely [illegible] for the headliner of [illegible] for me. We get comfort-[illegible] some ancient seats on [illegible] and kick back for [illegible] through's set. Adam [illegible] to take a nap. This [illegible] Country, CA metalcore [illegible] blends some crushing [illegible] hardcore elements exploded yet.

Lord Worm pleases his fans at the New England Metal Festival by living up to his name and eating an entire goblet of earth-crawlers. Each band that played the venue did a good job of keeping fans interested at the show.

The duo proceeds to launch into Misfits songs as if it were 1977 at the CBGB's Audition Showcase. I myself am not familiar with a lot of Misfits tunes. Adam however, looks like he should be right up their with Danzig and Doyle basking in glory. After belting out classic numbers such as "Die Die Die My Darling" and "Skulls" Danzig bids us all farewell, wrapping up a performance that will most likely mark the closest thing to a Misfits reunion that fans will ever get to see.

After a long day filled with friends, mosh pits, head banging, and metal, the Saturday leg of the 7th annual New England Metal and Hardcore Festival is finally drawing to a close. As we make our way out of the tired mass of metal heads, I notice a familiar shade of red hair. I can't believe it, somehow Phi did manage to get in for the event. We call him over and head back to Dave's car where we spend the ride home exhausted yet satisfied.

We approached Sunday with renewed vigor. Saturday had presented its share of highlights, namely Cryptopsy's full rendition of None So Vile, but the proceedings left us feeling more drained than anything else. However, with Sunday's high metal to hardcore ratio, we were more than willing to slug it out for one more day. The crew arrived just in time to catch the beginning of Behemoth's set. Their brand of subtly technical and acerbic death metal translates perfectly live. While the intricacies were somewhat muddied by the Palladium's sound system, any Behemoth fan worth their salt had no difficulty keeping pace. Playing a reasonable mix of their last three albums, the set culminated in Demigod's "Conquer All," a song that's rightly become a live staple.

To our pleasant surprise, Canada's Three Inches of Blood followed. The band was running behind due to a 30-hour trek to Worcester and had swapped sets with Behemoth. Undeterred by the fatigue of being held up in a van for two days straight, the band unleashed a hearty battle cry upon all in attendance. With tongues firmly planted in cheek and broadsword in hand, the band cranked out songs about pirates, "Fear on the Bridge", settling scores, "Revenge is a Vulture" and obliterating posers, "Deadly Sinners." These guys purvey a style of nostalgic metallic truth, which while unabashedly hokey is simply fun. In a live setting such as this, there was very little to hate about 3IB.

North Carolina's Between the Buried and Me followed. Eschewing their more tender moments for a set of unrelenting brutality, their jazz tinged death-core was a highlight of metal fest. While it would have been nice to hear fan favorites such as, "Mordecai" and "Aspirations", the tight riffing and potent grooves of "Shevanel Cut a Flip" and

See METAL on page 11

Eve says Goodbye

A TRIBUTE TO THE MOTHER

I use to always feel a slight stitch of resentment the moment anyone would say I am an exact replica of my mother. Is it because I fear that one day I might turn out just like her? It isn't her fault I never knew my father, never had siblings, and never had a place I could call my home.

Her top-of-the-line occupation as a designer required that we live and travel through Europe, the Middle East, and America. My occupation was to accept the instability if I wanted to be fed, and be thankful for these experiences that not many children get to have.

When I was old enough to understand these privileges, my mother sent me off to a Swiss boarding school in Geneva. I spent three disciplined years developing the skills I needed as an independent woman by the age of 12.

However, my mother's gift of early freedom caused a deeply seeded bitterness that took much of my adolescence to resolve. She gave me independence, choices and trust. She was certain I had a good head on my shoulders, but I wanted to be mothered, limited and regulated by her authority. I wanted to be innocent and naive, but I had already seen too much.

I compared my relationship with my mother to others and couldn't accept the differences. I couldn't understand why we weren't like everyone else. Why don't I have a father? Why is my mother always working? Where is our picket fence and golden retriever? She loved me as an equal companion, relied on me as a best friend. She confided in me, asking for advice and pleading for emotional support. I loved our connection, but in the back of my mind I was frightened. I didn't want to make her mistakes, to end up old and alone, dependent on one child to pick up the pieces.

I spent seven years in serious relationships, trying desperately to find a man that could save me from my mother's fate. I convinced myself that I wanted an enormous family, in the suburbs, with a Volvo and a dog. I searched to find a life that defied everything my mother had become.

However as of today, I feel quite the opposite. I only hope to become as strong, as successful, and as worthy as my mother. She has suffered tremendous amounts of difficulties within her lifetime, and has overcome each obstacle with elegance and vitality. She has been my guide, my teacher, my strength. With graduation just around the corner, I can't help but realize that I wouldn't have been here without her. I owe every piece of accomplishment to my mother, my one and true best friend. I would be honored if I became even half of who she is in the future, because in reality, I am my mother's daughter.

EVE'S GOODBYE

Eve sinned against God's command. She didn't listen. She ate that apple because she wanted to. That was the Original Sin, and I understand her completely.

Before I conclude, I would like to share a few words of wisdom that I picked up during my years at the University of Massachusetts.

To the soon-to be-men on this campus: pull up your pants, take a shower, treat women with respect and try to have an intelligent conversation once in a while. You'll be surprised by how many more women will be attracted to you.

To the already-men on this campus: don't be too naive, too nice, too gentle. Women will walk all over you, even though they may appreciate you after they graduate.

To all the ladies: you are beautiful, thin and unique. Respect yourselves and you will find a

See EVE on page 11

Kasabian jams out and says no to the hype

KASABIAN from page 9

rush. From the opening of "Club Foot", which rings like an oncoming train, through other stand outs like the "Reason is Treason" and "Cutt Off" Kasabian seem to know what they are doing much more then most new artists. On stage, however, Kasabian are somehow able to up the energy a thousand times. While the comparison may be wearing thin, Kasabian comes across as a young Oasis. They know what they want and they know how to get it. The band shows no fear and refuses to restrain their live show seems to have a seething undercurrent of an oncoming riot.

In fact, Kasabian seem to be insistent on a riot. From their album cover, that suggests a Che Guevara-type figure, to their website, which refers to their fanbase as a "movement," Kasabian is intent on starting a musical revolution: putting the passion back in music.

"I think a lot of the record companies are to blame and these pop moguls who do these things like pop stars and stuff like that, it gives people stuff to dream about but it just take all the passion out of getting together with your mates and starting a band ... All the pop stuff has taken a little bit of the balls out of music, taking a little bit of life out of it."

For a band that has received its fair share of hype and positive press, Edwards has no problem denouncing the 'next big thing' machine.

"It's more to do with the business side of it now, you get a lot of good press, you sell a lot of records, even if your songs are crap. But it should be all about the music, it doesn't matter if you've been on the front of 15 magazines in the last week. If you put your CD on and it's crap it doesn't mean shit." It's very likely that Kasabian's focus on music, not hype, is what will hopefully lend to their longevity.

Edwards also sees that Kasabian's specific brand of music putting an important mark on modern music.

"We're trying to put some kind of bassline and drum beats down," Edwards explains, "If you get to watch someone live you need to throw a bit of groove...just to make it move. It's just good to mix in some funky basslines, all the different genres that will get people moving and love going to gigs again, cause I think it's died over the past few years."

Kasabian now have a chance to prove to Boston what the press has been saying for the past few months. This Saturday at the Paradise they will be telling anyone who will listen about their musical revolution.

"I think sometimes you need a revolution to keep things on their feet. Otherwise it'll just get stale...That's all we're talking about when we talk about revolution it's just bringing back, not necessarily the old music...but bringing back the old heart and the passion and the desire to be in a great band and tour the world."

CINEMARK
The Best Seat In Town
CINEMARK AT HAMPSHIRE MALL 6
367 Russell St. 413-587-4233
Schedule for 5/13/05 - 5/18/05
DIGITAL SURROUND SOUND IN ALL AUDITORIUMS
Purchase Tickets Online @ cinemark.com
Thurs Previews Star Wars: Episode 3: Revenge of the Sith 5/12 Midnight
• NO PASSES-NO SUPERSAVERS
Tickets & showtimes available @ cinemark.com

No Cals Last Call No Carbs
No Hangover
All-Natural Anti-Hangover & Nutritional Drink
Last Call is available now at:
Liquors 44, Four Season's Liquors, Stoney's Pub, Holyoke Liquor Mart, Pop's Liquors, R&P Liquors and Niedbala's.
Ask for it at your favorite bar and restaurant
Campus Rep Opportunities Available, Call for more information
Distributed By Baystate Beverage Distributors, Westfield, MA 413-642-0190
Please Drink Responsibly

Shear Bliss
Holistic Full Service Salon
$10 off Special Occasion Package
• Updo
• Mini-facial
• Makeup
460 West St.

WE SUGGEST 18-HOUR MASCARA
Caffeine Ginseng and Guarana
BEER REMIXED
comedy CONNECTION HUKELAU
PRESENTS
Pablo Francisco
Saturday, May 14th
at The Comedy Connection Hukelau in Chicopee
One show only at 7PM
Pablo has appeared on
• "Comedy Central Presents...Pablo Francisco"
• FOX-TV's "The Family Guy"
• NBC's "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno"
For tickets call (413) 593-5222
or order on-line at www.hukelau.com

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST
HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students
Student & Worker Rights: Family & Criminal Law, Landlord-Tenant & Consumer Disputes
CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

Rockin' hard in New England

METAL from page 10

"Lost Perfection" proved that a band can indeed incite massive pit action without having to lower themselves to mindless chugging and drum syncopation.

Utilizing a cutting-edge strategy of running in front of everyone waiting in line for the Palladium's smaller second stage, we broke through to the soon-to be killing ground for Denver's Cephalic Carnage. Despite the best efforts of Palladium security, fans rushed into the area, severely overcrowding the floor space. What ensued can only be described as pure and unbridled mayhem. As the band launched into their schizophrenic brand of technical death-grind, the floor responded with a mosh pit that resembled Wall Street after a market crash. Cephalic Carnage decided to end the set with the classic, "Kill for Weed" a brutal call for legalization.

Hypocrisy led metal-heads on a sonic journey into the realm of alien abductions and astrology. Peter Tägtgren, the band's front man recently lent his vocal talents to the Swedish death super-group Bloodbath. Tägtgren's performance on this album was nothing short of breathtaking. This was reflected in Sunday's set as Hypocrisy belted out a brutal dose of melodic death metal. Showcasing some of his best death growls to date, Tägtgren and company ended their set with fan-favorite, "Eraser."

The one-two punch of Gothenburg's "elite" acts, Soilwork and Dark Tranquillity followed. Despite being the under card in the pair's current U.S tour, it was clear that DT were the superior band tonight. While Soilwork, an admitted guilty pleasure of Dave's, tried to pawn off new material and barely touched on their superior back catalog, Dark Tranquillity played a set that any die hard fan would be pleased with. Songs like "The Wonders at Your Feet," "Monochromatic Stains," "Punish My Heaven," and the more recent, "The New Build," all translated brilliantly despite the ridiculous amount of duel guitar play and keyboard noodling.

Oh, and then it was time for Nile. You know those middle-aged dudes from Greenville, South Carolina who are utterly obsessed with ancient Egyptian culture? Yeah, those guys. Dave wasn't expecting much, death metal rarely translates well at the Palladium, never-mind the breed of hyperblasting, low end death that these guys deliver. However, Sunday seemed dead set on being damn near perfect, and yes, even the stubborn Dave Fonseca thought that Nile sounded good. As hordes of prepubescent youth in Cannibal Corpse tee shirts made requests in faux-guttural belches the band dished out a satisfying mix of old and new. Showing off the impressive, "Lashed to the Slave Stick," from the upcoming "Annihilation of the Wicked" and closing out with the title track of "Black Seeds of Vengeance". As we stood there enjoying a live Nile, Dave conveyed feelings of being transported to a parallel dimension where everything was being specifically altered to his exact specifications. On that note, we all wished there were more females around.

Nothing spells "culmination" like an appearance from the Finnish master of falsetto, King Diamond. Breaking into the scene with the legendary metal outfit Mercyful Fate, King Diamond decided to pursue a solo career after the band split in 1985. Known for his distinctive falsetto vocal style, King has released a slew of classical conceptual metal albums. King Diamond shocked and pleased fans by opening his set with a start to finish performance of his classic album, "Abigail" complete with stage props ranging from the demonic child to an actor playing the role of Miriam. King continued his set with a diverse selection of tracks from his later works including, "Welcome Home" from, "Them," and "So Sad" from his latest album, "The Puppet Master." King even returned for an encore to perform the opening track to Mercyful Fate's "Melissa," "Evil."

Of all three days Sunday had managed to bludgeon Friday and Saturday with a spiked club. Our undying thirst for metallic goodness had finally been quenched completely. As we stood in line at a McDonald's off the highway after the show, clad in metal t-shirts and receiving hateful glares from the elderly, we looked back with fond memories of a truly incredible show.

Behemoth, a classic-style metal group, known for their distinct style of camp that makes them a fan favorite, rocked out with other groups at the New England Metal Festival.

Eve gives final send-off to fans man that respects you. Don't expect to find a husband in college because they aren't ready yet.

EVE from page 10

To the singles: this is the best time to be single, and it is nothing to be ashamed about. Enjoy it before you're locked down.

To the committers: you will fight, be jealous, and hate each other. It's part of the relationship, but at least you know you'll be having consistency in bed.

To those of you that despise my column but read it still every week: it feels good to know you have emotions.

To my few fans: look for me in bookstores.

To my guys at Alpine: stop getting arrested.

To my guys at the bars: stop drinking so much.

To my girls that I love so dearly: thank you for putting up with me.

To my Trinidadian lover: polyps are the hottest thing this spring.

And to all you UMass Minutemen: you know who you are. And it's too late. Better luck next time.

Eve has left the Garden.

Eve is a Collegian Columnist.

SUMMER JOBS
for the
ENVIRONMENT
$3000-$5000/Summer
* Stop Global Warming!
* Work with Great People!
* Make a Difference!
Career Opportunities and Benefits Available
Amherst, MA
Call Chris at 413-256-6434

FRUGAL FRIDAY
JOIN US FOR OUR SPECIAL SALES EVENT
FRIDAY, MAY 13TH
ONE DAY ONLY
BUY 1 CLOTHING OR GIFT ITEM and get an item of equal or lesser value
50% OFF!*
UMASS AMHERST University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE
Campus Center • Phone: (413) 545-2619
www.umass.bkstr.com
*Does not apply to sale items, regular priced merchandise only. Not valid with any other offer.

MISTY (cont.) from page 13 and pasted those chumps. Thank you, Stacy Tutt, for that ridiculous halftime Hail Mary. Thank you to the men in the Boston College press box, who loved talking to our fans all before/during/after the game. I guess that's what happens when real, professional journalists show up to the Heights. UNH just two weeks later. My first trip back to the school that brushed me aside as if I were a rat and asking Salma Hayek for her seven digits. Crazy weekend; no print needed. Lest I forget, URI. Actually, it isn't so much of the game I remember, it's the two kids calling it on the radio for WRIC, possibly the equivalent to the radio show I hosted with my Home Alone TalkBoy when I was 10. First of all, players should be called by their names, not their numbers. If I went on, I would lose it.

Fun football season. From 2-5 to 6-5, building momentum for next fall. Good luck to Jason Peebler in National Football League.

Then came hockey. Traveling to each Hockey East arena was definitely an experience, especially when I got to see the Yale Doug Hattie ball at Conte Forum. Oh, I opened that bag up again.

Definitely the craziest trip of the year was the weekend of November 19. I left Thursday for Orono, Maine and didn't return back until Sunday night. Oh, and I drove 930 miles and 11 hours all by myself. It was mostly it. My cousin's 21st birthday weekend three hours into the heart of the woods and lakes of Maine — some stories most of which will never be told.

I can't forget the night of December 9, as I'm sure many with UMass connections will. It was the night of Marc Boal '06.com, a historic two hours of UMass basketball. Campus was on fire. Except for one thing. I was at UNH watching UMass lose 4-0 to the Wildcats. I watched the end of the basketball game, while typing a story at my buddy's apartment. It's one of the greatest gut-wrenching displays I've ever seen. During the first game between Jimmy Chitwood Black Bears and Cory Schneider's Eagles — which ridiculous, except the game took near four hours to play. I can't forget to mention that former UNH, Harvard and Bemidji State provided the best backer the Mullins Center had seen all year in the Northeast Regional of the NCAA Tournament. And I got to cover the national champion Denver Pioneers.

I didn't think I would enjoy covering a team so much until lacrosse kicked off. Road tripping to Hofstra, Hobart, Harvard and Rutgers saw some of the craziest trips I had been apart this year. Hopefully, Baltimore and Philadelphia are on the horizon. Especially heading north to Geneva, N.Y., baby. I hadn't ever heard of the place before I checked out the schedule, but, wow, is Hobart College a beautiful place. People are nice and everything. Someone needs to discover Hobart because that place is a gold mine waiting to happen. Another thing to do before you die, walk to the top of Harvard's football stadium when no one is inside. How 'bout those Georgetown and Syracuse games? Bob especially loved UMass's stave off the Hoyas. Didn't you, Bob?

Then came June. It was the second biggest thing to happen to UMass all year. Overtime, Zywicki, deja vu, rain, front flip, somersault, call it what you want, peace Mike Powell, crazy fans, national champs. Leaving the press box, watching an ending no one could even dream of seeing on the sideline, jumping three feet in the air. It really happened that fast. Victory drinks at Chucks, crazy afternoon, wild night, Green Day, video camera, spiking the beer, the homeless can collector.

Then there was Rutgers. I had always called New Jersey "The Armpit of America", but I guess that may have been unfair of me, only because I hadn't yet seen it. Now, however, I KNOW that New Jersey is the Armpit of America, and it hasn't been washed with a good bar of soap in months.

I'm still ripped about the selection committee jobbing the Minutemen. If something isn't done by the higher-ups in lacrosse, this sport — which has been dubbed for years as the fastest growing sport in America — will continue on the path towards professional boxing before it reaches the popularity of football. Sketchy things were done 80 years ago in baseball and 30 years ago in college basketball, though, and that all got straightened out. Lacrosse could hit that point some day, but some serious grunt work by some people who have some actual guts needs to get done.

I can't leave out Mill Valley, the Crack Shack, 171, Charlie's, McMurph's, Rafters, the Hanger, the terrible service at Applebee's, DS, Danny at BK, the sorostitutes on Nutting, Lowell (obviously) and everywhere else I found myself around this crazy, crazy area. Nothing more to add, except this: Patriots, Red Sox, UNC, Celtics (division champs, baby!).

And now, it's what you've all been waiting for. Let's have a sports meeting.

McGovern — Your presence around the sports section will be missed more than anything, and that isn't just because you're the only person leaving. I'm pumped we covered lacrosse together before you bounced out of this fine establishment. We dominated that beat, much more so than those bandwagoning writers. I'm really glad we'll be in the same place as that high-profile dirtbag radio announcer from 'Cuse again this weekend. Maybe, one of us can get his autograph. The times at the Shack were crazy, there's no other way to put it. I think that's all I can write about that because words can never do the Shack justice. Nope. I haven't met many more people over the last 22 years who will have a lasting impression on me the way you will. I know you'll have an unreal time driving across the country this summer, and I hope you get your big break doing something you love. You deserve it. Someone out there needs a Bob, preferably a Bob McGovern, a wise man once said.

After putting in the grunt work over the last four years, it's about time you got to cover a team like the lacrosse team this semester, while you were the Sports Editor, no less. They sent you out with a bang, but more importantly, you sent them out with a bang. You have a very unique writing style. You know that, and have a very unique writing style. You know that, and have a very unique writing style. You know that, and everyone else knows that. You've modeled it after a legend, someone who passed on this semester. It's not like you and he ever met, but he left the world just a few months before you were about to enter it. I think there is something significant in that.

We walked into this semester with as much adversity in our faces than anyone has seen in a long time, if ever, at this paper. Whether it was the old guys who didn't take either of us seriously, the young guys who weren't sold that we knew what we were doing, the disappearing acts by some people, plus Hall and Foster, bringing in rookies and training the new guy. We didn't have much going for us in January and February, but we got through it. We may never get any praise or pats on the back — not that we really were looking for it in the first place — but when we look back at the spring semester of 2005, it will be something we really can pride ourselves on. Each of us knows that the goal of every sports editor is to leave the section in better shape than he left it, and no one can dispute that you made sure that happened.

There are a lot of people I meet and will immediately brush aside once they leave my life, but you aren't to be one of them. I think we became good friends this semester, and I hope this isn't the last time we get to work together.

Marzelli — Before I say anything, will you just please try a sausage, egg and cheese sandwich on a cinnamon raisen bagel? Come on.

I thought it was pretty funny last semester when we would start arguing, whether it was serious or not, and everyone else in the room would have a look of fear on their face. In terms of journalism, no one has ever taught me as much as you have, and I don't believe anyone else will be able to top that, either. I came into UMass thinking I was a hot shot writer coming from a solid community college newspaper. The paper was solid, but I learned fast that I wasn't everything I thought I was. I didn't have a clue how to cover a team the right way, especially one with the magnitude of football. Although I'd be lying if I said the fear of Don Brown didn't motivate me to give it everything I had. Good for you if you get the radio job next year, but if I have to spend my Saturdays making fun of Randy Lively with Athas, it's definitely not going to be the same. I will say that watching the team lose won't be as difficult, though.

I'm definitely lucky you didn't let up on me in the fall, as there were definitely times when I could have started to drift a little too much. I expect the same next year, even though I'm gonna be your boss.

Here's to Game 7, football road trips, your poor showing at UNH, your unbridled love for UMass athletics, your greeting to Travis Ford, my formal introduction to Fear and Loathing, Antoine Walker, Opening Day, the three weeks when you lost 10 pounds, you driving, Lowell, Don Brown's MedRel photo, Buckley, my bathroom floor, everything I forgot and everything that will happen across from Charlie's next year.

Athas — First and foremost, I'm going to once again take credit for hiring you. Now that that's out of the way, you did a damn good job this semester.

You took a whole lot of weight off the shoulders of Bob and myself when you took over. Considering it took me at least a month to learn how to work on my own, we pretty much chalked this semester up as a training period for you. Then, we realized that I take longer to do everything, no matter what it is. Right, anyway. You completely dedicated yourself to learning how to do everything it takes to put the sports section out on a nightly basis. You still have some stuff to learn, like making sure your night editor doesn't allow "Committe" into a headline, but I'm not too worried.

I said when we hired you that I saw all the potential in the world in you, and that one day you would run this newspaper. I didn't see anything that made me believe I was wrong. You're on the right track, and there are great things ahead of you.

Next, don't ever let Todd Foster talk down to you. In the first place, he's too short to do that. You're gonna need to pick up the slack next year in terms of tooling on the staff because we're losing Bob, and Marzelli may never step in the newsroom again.

We're going to dominate this section next year, and Duggan will be a great help. I know when I leave this paper, providing I graduate in the Spring, this section will be in good hands. I've gotta say it. You better make it to Lowell this summer.

Duggan — I'm excited that we hired you, and I really believe that you will make the absolute most of this opportunity. I have no doubt that you will put everything you have into this section, but remember that there is a long line of people — who were here long before we both stumbled down here at the same time — who check up on the Collegian on a regular basis. You'll hear it from those old guys if you miss a beat, but I'm confident you won't. Take this and run with it.

I still don't know that much about you, but at least there is someone else who talks like me on this staff next year. We need to hang out this summer, so I can figure out who you are outside of the newsroom.

Merritt — Is Sean Regan playing in net for UNH tonight? Ever? Didn't he at least once last season? No? Dammit.

How 'bout the whole NU2 crowd singing the national anthem when the barn lost its ability to play any music. Or the three-hour trip to BC in the snow. I think we still made it there before the SuperFans.

I don't really have much for you right now cuz it's been awhile, but I'm sure of one thing. I can guarantee that your CD collection still sucks.

Jon — Not that I'm one to talk because I haven't been around for that long, but I haven't seen anyone take care of tennis the way you did. You have a ton of dedication to this paper, an asset that is always as valuable as anything. You have good things ahead of you here if you keep up what you've done this semester.

We can see the passion you have for this stuff, something that isn't always present with everyone who walks through these dungeon doors. Keep it goin.

Re-Todd — In all honesty, I don't know how you got baseball. And you don't have a staff or minions or any power around here whatsoever.

Beyond that, yeah, you're about as insane as anyone I've ever met. The rumors about you are true, which I guess wouldn't really make them rumors. No matter what happens with you next year, I expect big things from you. I will not let up on you all year because I'm not going to let you waste any of your potential. "Waste" wasn't the right word there, but I know you know what I mean. The Industrial Revolution line will work some day. If it doesn't, I'll crack out things about Paul Tsongas, Jack Kerouac, the mill girls, the Spinners and Lockmonsters.

Have a solid summer.

Rob — You could have gone one of two ways this semester, and you chose the right direction. You improved in every single way since we talked to you a month back. When you first showed up in the newsroom, we had our doubts. I didn't know if you were in this for the right reasons, or even if you know why you were here. I firmly believe that I no longer have to worry about that anymore. You are finally starting to "get it". And once that happens, everything else will begin to fall into place for you. It's a good thing Dan Shaughnessy wanted me to call you.

Ian — I really don't know a damn thing about you except for the fact that you like basketball. Good luck trying out for the team, but I'm a little worried. If Coach Ford got Delt to lose 30 pounds in the first four weeks, what the hell is going to happen to the rest of you? I know you wanted to live it up your freshman year and you weren't sure exactly what you wanted to do with your life. I completely understand that. Three years and two colleges ago, I was a freshman business major at UNH, and I couldn't have fathomed this is where I would be at this point in my life. You have another three years to figure out what you're all about. That's what college is for. Just make sure you do what makes you happy. That is the advice I got from my friend a few years back, and I've followed it ever since. If for some reason, you never return to this newsroom or we never cross paths again, I hope I could have left you with at least that advice.

Hall — It's not that I don't care about you or anything, but that's just the last for a reason. There isn't a real, solid reason, but you're last and that's that. This isn't going to be that long because you know exactly how you stand with me. Just chill out, take a deep breath and get your head clear this summer. You owe it to yourself. Stop trying so hard. Let things come to you. I know that if there is any more advice I can give you. After all the meetings and everything else this semester, the rest is up to you. You need to figure everything else out on your own.

To everyone else at the Collegian — Rich, this kid hates you, me and everyone else at the Collegian. Let's fight him. Josh, I don't know if you remember this, but we were in Charlie's right before Easter or something like that, and you told me your last name. I responded with, "I guess you're not going home this weekend." Good for Charlie's, that's what I say now. Meghan, thanks for all the Blue Wall swipes. Cory, I don't know where to begin. It was definitely an experience working with you. Pete, have you kissed your managing editor lately? Megan. I don't remember it happening, but I guess I saved your life in Antonio's. Everyone else, good luck if you're graduating, and if you're back with me next year, let's do it even better.

This sports meeting is officially adjourned, so I've got that goin' for me, which is nice.

ERIC ATHAS, ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR, WOMEN'S TRACK, SWIMMING, SOFTBALL
HENRY ROWENGARTNER, "ROOKIE OF THE YEAR"

It was Sept. 5th, then I blinked, and now it's May. As cliché as it sounds, that's how I feel right now. There was a point in June 2004 when I had trouble deciding which school to attend. Something drew me to UMass, but I'm not sure what it was. All in all, I wanted to be sitting in my dorm on the final week of school and be satisfied that I made the right choice. As I ponder about the past, I learned to always trust your instinct, no matter what. Looking back, I never would have imagined how much I accomplished this year at UMass, and namely, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

Of course, I am still the Rookie, there is no changing that. And while I am still learning the inside jokes, I have built a decent amount of memories in my vault, which will continue to grow.

Jeff, I'm excited for next year, it's going to be different, but I think for the better. In a way, you're sort of like my mentor in the sense that you have been instrumental in teaching me the ropes. I have learned so much in the past two months, just from watching you do what you do, and I could not have asked for anyone better to teach me. Your dedication is exceptional. Someday I may understand the fascination with the Industrial Revolution, but for now, lets just say it's an interesting subject and leave it at that.

Bob- The newsroom will be a lot different without you. I cannot count the number of times that I had been left hysterically laughing after you pulled one of your antics. I've only known you for less than a year, but if there is one thing that I've learned about you is that you do your own things in everything that you do, and I respect that. Good luck next year as you take on life after the Zoo.

Marzelli- When I first came to the Collegian I was sure you were a senior, I never really questioned it. When I found out you're only a junior I was shocked because of your ability to handle any situation that came your way. Since we both got the assistant job as freshmen, I can only hope I get as far as you have. Good luck at your internship this summer.

OUR APPOLOGIES:

Due to the fact that Bob, Mike and Jeff wrote a combined 10,000 or so words, not everyone could get their memos in this week. They will, however, be on www.dailycollegian.com in their complete form.

Log on and read the misty-eyed memories from Dan Duggan (Danny O'Grady — Travis Ford — "The Sixth Man"), Todd Foster (Coach Jimmy Dugan, "A League of Their Own"), Jon Pelland (Peter Colt, "Wimbledon"), Brendan Hall (Al Bundy — "Al Bad"), Rob Greenfield (Phil Brickma, pitching coach, "Rookie of the Year") and Ian Kilpatrick (Jimmy Chitwood, "Hoosiers")

KISS A SENIOR
Goodbye
Send your favorite Seniors a
UMass Amherst Champagne Glass
full of Hershey Kisses to celebrate graduation!
Only $6.00 per glass
Available online until May 6, 2005 at www.UMassAlumni.com/students
or at the
Student Alumni Association Table on the Campus Center
Concourse Tuesday, April 19 - Wednesday, May 11

MISTY from page 16

I reached the baseline, flipped the Camel Hassen couch and went ballistic on the Mullins Center court in a way I never knew I could act. From there I returned to press row, hair disheveled, shirt untucked and sweating profusely. It was there that Bob and I forgot all notions of objectivity and hugged the hell out of each other, because we deserved it and it was our moment. Massachusetts 61 Connecticut 59

—Hoops – MOOOOOOOOOVE!! like anything I've ever covered before…tins of apple for pregame, halftime and postgame, in the cold, the rain and the snow, before wins losses and ugly losses and before triple overtime thrillers on the radio…Gibbs Mart before every trip for empty water bottles, sports blankets and hookers wearing makeup they put on 30 years ago…Ghetto Boys, Pearl Jam, Bob Seger, Nofx, Dire Straits, Tom Jones and The Edge ripping guitar riffs in Stand By Me…Red Bull and Beef Sticks…No Doubt!…Uhhhh, we just need to, uhhhhh, keep our, uhh, exposure and uhhh, just battle diversity (slides microphone into eye socket)… sitting in the Crack Shack before Concordia saying "ok they should just go blow this team out," mmmmmm…no…Barea from the edge of the mascot…X…Miami on no sleep, riding the crest of a glorious night…two unnecessary hours on a bus…Coral Gables sports talk…soaps, imitation Coral Gables sports talk from sailors in Key West…$5 media food…huge margaritas at Friday's…Halo 2…catching poisonous fish while little kids are pissing everywhere…bars with huge fish tanks…red bull and vodka…South Beach… crazy ass chicks with huge, obtrusive tattoos…Shaq drops 40…finding the right way home…All saves the BU game…another disappointing Commonwealth Classic…Sean Marshall still sucks…blowing huge leads to Temple…Chaney: "we need to get some of these big guys some little dogs, little chihuahuas so when we go play Duke, they be like 'damn, look at they dogs!'"…on the radio with Bobby, in a blizzard, for three overtimes with Bobby…Deli drops 20…Strates gets me and Marc lost in Philly and makes us late (not really, but what sports season would be complete without that?)…Pat Carroll learned a lot from you this year, but I think that in the end, if I had to choose the best lesson I've learned from you, it's to do everything balls out, to the fullest and leave nothing on the table, but in the end be content with yourself, what you've done, what you're about to do and be able to look back and say "hell yea, that was some shit right there."

You know you've become one of my closest friends this year, and you also know that I wouldn't trade all the incredibleness we've been through this year for anything. Together, we looked journalism right in the face and drove straight down it's throat, with no regard for anything other than taking care of business. This has been one of the most fulfilling and amazing campaigns I can remember, and I will take a lot of what life's thrown at the two of us this year and remember it for the rest of my life. I can't help but feeling like we both grew up quite a bit this year after all that we've been through, and I know that I now feel ready to be a pro after learning to persevere with you. I wish you the best of luck with anything you choose to do, and that if you ever need me for anything to call without hesitation. Not that I worry, though, you'll be back for hoops and sports next year, no doubt!

Jeff – "My stomach was killing me, so I try eating these buffalo wings…" This is arguably the first time all year I'm going to address something to you without mentioning any of your negative qualities, including your metrosexuality. I'm but seriously, I think you realize that every time I've criticized you, made fun of you, disagreed with you or just ripped you apart all year, it's been because I know that you have all the ability and potential in the world, and I just want to do anything I can to help you mold that into something that's going to take you somewhere in this business. You are as witty and creative a writer as I've met in my time at the Collegian, and someone who loves sports enough to get things done in this business. I'm very proud of you for how you've turned yourself around and really worked to make something of yourself here at UMass and at the Collegian, and it's been a distinct pleasure of mine to have worked alongside you as you've done it. I know you're ready to take the reigns of the department now, and I'm confident that you'll do nothing less than uphold the strong tradition of excellence Bob and I carried before you, and raise the bar for those who will come after you.

More importantly than that however, you've become one of my best friends on campus and someone who makes me love living at UMass as much as I do. We've had some crazy fun this year, a lot of which I don't have time to – or can't – mention in the paper, but you know of what I speak. Next year on North Pleasant street is gonna be pissa tand walking distance from Charlie's) and I know you'll be ready to pick up the slack missing when Bob takes off. Keep up the good work and remember, you'll always be a bitch.

cruising through ohio…we want real Dayton…"But she's all I ever want. she's the kind I like to flaunt and take to diiinner" but Bob's really looking for the university…crazy wind outta nowhere…13,000 screaming fans…Lappas and the Minutemen get SCREWED like no other, and Lappas is not pleased to see us Bobby…exhausted, filing our stories from press row…and apparently not sending them to Jeff…cruising away from Dayton…cruising back to Dayton…me getting pissed…stories are sent, blankets are bought and we're out…Bobby takes over, but only figuratively; we almost go careening off the off ramp…safely back to Amherst and reality, having survived all that is Dayton…beating Duquesne for one last game in the Mullins Center this season, and one last apple out by the service entrance…I don't even wanna talk about Cincinnati, so I'm done…Best of Luck Travis Ford, I'm rootin' for ya…

—Montreal for my 21st Birthday – oh ya, this gets it's own record…Jeff payin for Casino de Montreal to stay in business…Robbie offers a quarter to lay down on stage…Bry offers a Dunkins gift certificate…shots all around…buyin nothing at Super Seve…getting the boot for free…the infamous French fries and gravy…Mariano Rivera electrocuted this whole family!…no jokin bout those dogs…

—I went to Games Five (with Derek! & Seven (with Jeff Howe and Derek and Kevin) of the 2004 American League Championship Series, and the Sox won the World Series…'nuff said.

Bobby – This is the end of the line, man, you're swan song and farewell tour…I can't begin to tell you what a pleasure it's been to work with and share the section with you over the course of the last year. I can't help but think we've learned so much more than we were supposed to, and I know I owe a lot of that to you. You've become an infinitely better writer, reporter and editor over the course of the year, and that's all attributed to your own hard work and dedication. I know that you are going to find some job, somewhere that is going to not only showcase the tremendous skills and mind that you have, but also make you very, very happy. I've learned a lot from you this year, but I think that in the end, if I had to choose the best lesson I've learned from you, it's to do everything balls out, to the fullest and leave nothing on the table, but in the end be content with yourself, what you've done, what you're about to do and be able to look back and say "hell yea, that was some shit right there."

You know you've become one of my closest friends this year, and you also know that I wouldn't trade all the incredibleness we've been through this year for anything. Together, we looked journalism right in the face and drove straight down it's throat, with no regard for anything other than taking care of business. This has been one of the most fulfilling and amazing campaigns I can remember, and I will take a lot of what life's thrown at the two of us this year and remember it for the rest of my life. I can't help but feeling like we both grew up quite a bit this year after all that we've been through, and I know that I now feel ready to be a pro after learning to persevere with you. I wish you the best of luck with anything you choose to do, and that if you ever need me for anything to call without hesitation. Not that I worry, though, you'll be back for hoops and sports next year, no doubt!

Jeff – "My stomach was killing me, so I try eating these buffalo wings…" This is arguably the first time all year I'm going to address something to you without mentioning any of your negative qualities, including your metrosexuality. I'm but seriously, I think you realize that every time I've criticized you, made fun of you, disagreed with you or just ripped you apart all year, it's been because I know that you have all the ability and potential in the world, and I just want to do anything I can to help you mold that into something that's going to take you somewhere in this business. You are as witty and creative a writer as I've met in my time at the Collegian, and someone who loves sports enough to get things done in this business. I'm very proud of you for how you've turned yourself around and really worked to make something of yourself here at UMass and at the Collegian, and it's been a distinct pleasure of mine to have worked alongside you as you've done it. I know you're ready to take the reigns of the department now, and I'm confident that you'll do nothing less than uphold the strong tradition of excellence Bob and I carried before you, and raise the bar for those who will come after you.

More importantly than that however, you've become one of my best friends on campus and someone who makes me love living at UMass as much as I do. We've had some crazy fun this year, a lot of which I don't have time to – or can't – mention in the paper, but you know of what I speak. Next year on North Pleasant street is gonna be pissa tand walking distance from Charlie's) and I know you'll be ready to pick up the slack missing when Bob takes off. Keep up the good work and remember, you'll always be a bitch.

Athas – Well freshman, you made it. It takes a special breed to become an editor as a rookie, if I do say so myself, but all kidding aside you impressed the hell out of me this year…You took shitty beats and made the most of them, while learning how to become an effective writer in the process. You have the right head for this job and an even better outlook on your future, and that will carry you to success down here without question.

Foster – Hahahaha you have a staff! Little Foster minions, all holding tape recorders in Stoney's face – beautiful…I'm glad you're back Todd, contrary to popular belief, we missed you when you weren't here…I hope you stick with this through next year, because I think you have what it takes in you somewhere, it's just a question of your dumb ass finding it. Nice job stepping up with baseball, and you know we'll be hanging out come fall.

Duggan – I think you're going to be better at this job than even you realize, if you truly want it. Jeff needs you and the Collegian needs you next year, and I think you're going to start realizing that you need the Collegian too. One of these days, Bob, Jeff and I will shut up and you'll really done, but until then just keep doin what you do and you'll be alright, Yankees Suck.

Hall – Just pull your head out of your ass and concentrate on doing what you know how to do: write. You are your own worst enemy, and when you figure that out, then you'll succeed like I know you can.

The rest of you dipshits – Take it easy on Jeff next year, he's a very fragile person with very expensive and delicate clothes. But in all seriousness, you guys stepped it up big time to help lill out the sports section. You know who you are: Ian, Ian and Rob…keep at it and make us all proud of the Collegian when we leave.

So that's it. The year is done, the sports are over and summer is on the horizon. It's been an incredibly run this year, the likes of which I'll never forget. So until next year keep the sports talk rollin', gas in the tank, a battery in the laptop, pens behind the ear and a keen sense for everything maroon and white.

Because Damn! It feels good to be a gangsta…

JEFF HOWE, ASSISTANT SPORTS EDITOR, FOOTBALL, HOCKEY, MEN'S LACROSSE
CARL SPACKLER, "CADDYSHACK"

Once again, another year down, another year to go, and this really is supposed to be the last go-around. I feel like I've heard this before.

Oh, that's right. Roger Clemens said it.

It's almost like the years pass, and the jokes don't change.

Just don't tell that to Peyton Manning.

Okay, I need some new material.

So, Jeff Van Gundy got a real phone call from a real official who made a real true statement about NBA referees looking to ruin Yao Ming's playoff performance by calling cheap fouls?

Does that even need a punch line?

I'm sorry — not too sorry — but if Yao was the key to the Rockets winning the championship this year, you might as well hire Isiah Thomas to play point guard for you.

You know what, just give him the keys to the organization, too.

So I was taking steroids the other day, and…hold a second.

Well, that was Congress. They just summoned the entire Massachusetts Daily Collegian staff to a hearing next Friday. Suddenly, I've forgotten how to speak English.

How 'bout them Yankees, everybody?

First, they're the greatest team ever because they bought Randy Johnson's throwback jerseys, then they're doomed because they lost a few games in April. It turned out okay, though, because Steinbrenner called them out in the papers, and they lit up Rob Bell and the Tampa Bay pitching staff.

Solid effort that night, too. In all honesty, though, I think UMass' wiffle ball team could knock Rob Bell and the Devil Rays around.

Hey, at least Alex Rodriguez became a true Yankee in the process. He hits three home runs and drives in 10, and his pinstripes are now official

One question, though.

What did that make him last year, an overpaid, whining, slap-happy, error prone, letter-toting, everyday Yankee punk?

He's a hero now, though. Anyone remember when he was in Boston last month and saved the little boy from crossing Newbury Street?

He said that truck was going to hit him while traveling at a speed upwards of 50 miles per hour. Wow, that poor kid.

One more question.

How in the world could a truck be driving that fast on a street chockfull of red lights and traffic jams, especially at 3:30 on a Tuesday afternoon when everyone was getting out of work?

I hope I was able to make you laugh. After all, I did steal half my act from NH funny man Freddie Mitchell...

This year started with a bang for me, coming straight from Hilton Head Island, where I bartended the annual Celebrity Golf Tournament down there and immediately thrusted myself back to Amherst, not even 24 hours after getting off the plane at Logan.

I learned a lot, a whole lot. Now, whether you're ready or not, come along and ride on my fantastic voyage.

First, this is the end of an era. It was the era of the sports meeting, an era that involved three editors who may have had the closest bond the Collegian sports department had ever seen. As I stay on board and Mike and Bob go off to do different things, I just wanted to take an inch of space to remember this trio. It won't ever get better than it was this last year. Let's take the sports world by storm, boys.

My first UMass, oops, where's the AP style? My first Massachusetts football team experience was easily the most exciting, Bringing in Colgate, who knocked off the Maroon and White in a ridiculously fair snow game last year in the first round of the playoffs, Marzelli shouts his mouth off and calls a win. Well, he was right. UMass cracked out the toothbrushes

See MISTY (cont.) on page 12

Where are YOU living next semester?
CHECK OUT
PUFFTON VILLAGE!
Excellent location...1/2 mile from UMass
Spacious Apartments--1,2 and 3 Bedroom Townhouses
All rents include heat, hot water and cooking gas
On site laundry, off street parking.
Basketball and Tennis courts.
No last month's deposit required!
PUFFTON VILLAGE
1040 N. Pleasant St. #410
Amherst, MA 01002
413-549-0145
www.pufftonvillage.com

AMAX STORAGE
EASY ACCESS OFF RT 91 IN HATFIELD
•OPEN 7 DAYS 7AM TO 7PM •SECURE
•CLIMATECONTROLLED •KEYLESS GATE
•MOVING SUPPLIES •SURVEILLANCE CAMERAS
CALL ABOUT OUR PORTABLE SELF STORAGE "SCOUTS"
WE'LL DROP IT OFF, YOU FILL IT, WE PICK IT UP AND SECURE IT.
RENT WITH A FRIEND AND SAVE $$
413-247-3030
164 West Street • West Hatfield
www.amaxstorage.com

Choose your classroom...
Take summer online courses taught by the faculty of the Isenberg School of Management and have the flexibility of choosing when and where your class meets. Have a look at the abundant offerings for this summer!
Summer Session I: June 6 - July 14
Summer Session II: July 18 - August 24

Build your business skills by taking any of the many online business courses offered this summer.
SUMMER 2005 COURSE OFFERINGS
Accounting 221, Accounting 222, Accounting 371
Fin & Op Mgmt 250, Fin & Op Mgmt 301, Fin & Op Mgmt 347, Fin & Op Mgmt 359, Fin & Op Mgmt 370
Management 260, Management 301, Management 314, Management 330, Management 365
Marketing 301, Marketing 412, Marketing 437
Sch-Mgmt 197I, Sch-Mgmt 210, Sch-Mgmt 310, Sch-Mgmt 391A, Sch-Mgmt 497A
To find out more information, contact UMass Continuing Education at 545-3430
Register for courses by visiting umassulearn.net or call 545-3653 or 1-800-922-8211

Hit the books, then hit the beach!

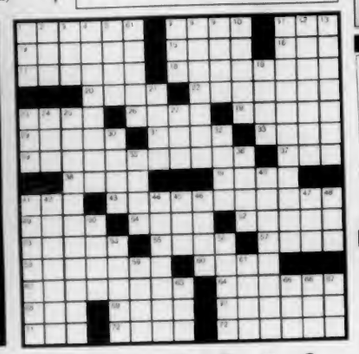
Looking to get ahead in your course work? Short on credits and need to catch up? Or just looking for something satisfying to do this Summer? A MassBay Summer Session course is the way to go!
• Day and evening classes start May 31st & July 5th
• Affordable resident cost is $136 per credit
• 5- or 10-week courses
• A great way to earn college credits quickly
• Credits are transferable to your school! (Whether you are a university or college student, or becoming college freshman!
• Wellesley, Framingham, and Ashland
Call MassBay today at 781 239 2703 or go to www.massbay.edu
Don't sweat it.
Check out MassBay's Summer Session courses in:
Business
EMT
English
Health
History
Lab Sciences (such as Anatomy & Physiology, Biology, Microbiology)
Math
Social Sciences
and other transferable courses!
Classes meet Monday-Thursday so there's plenty of time left for other Summer activities.
To register or obtain additional information, call 781 239 2703.
MASSBAY COMMUNITY COLLEGE
Start here. Go anywhere.

the Moan and Dove

this is the last ad.



themoananddove.com
460 West St. • Rte 116
Amherst, MA • 256-1710
3pm 'til 1am every day

ACROSS
1 Chandelier pendants
7 Lower California
11 Actress Ryan
14 Ripped into
15 By mouth
16 Back in time
17 Turkey's capital
18 Brave-lining material
20 Fax button
22 Shepherd's shield-toter
23 Piano-playing
26 Actress Tate
29 Isolated
31 Monumental
33 Do not include
34 Gulf War operation
37 Make a choice
38 Singer Adams
39 Long period
41 Captive GI
43 Flightless Australian birds
48 Keep in check
51 Police cover
52 Small closet
53 Best and O'Brien
56 Agenda entry
57 Spirited vigor
58 Walter of "Mrs. Miniver"
60 Muddy
62 Twelve disciples
64 Fishers from restraint
68 Uncooked
69 Backs of tone
70 Audio system
71 Chicago tramp
72 Shuttle org.
73 Fluctuating weighing

DOWN
1 Sch. grp.
2 Silver or Ely
3 Irritate
4 Spiced
5 Foal's mom
6 Laurel and Marla
7 Fluffy scarf
8 Host Hall
9 Pulling blows
10 Baldwin and Guinness
11 Of marriage
12 Self-indulgent spree
13 An Officer and a Gentleman co-star
19 London district
21 Sandra and Ruby
23 Small amount
24 Taproom order
25 Stained glass decorations
27 Exactly suitable
30 Actor Stuart
32 Coop of a bird
35 Brewed drinks
36 Lion's fare
40 Positioned properly
41 Get ready
42 Of a parent-child Freudian relationship
44 Black eyes
45 Make a deal
46 Foreboding sign
47 Historic period
48 Japanese horseradish
50 Worn out horses
54 ___ Hall University
56 Timid
59 Russian saint
61 Not taken in by
63 Red or Yellow
65 Chisel
66 Slippery fish
67 Call for help

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

GOOD LUCK TO THE CLASS OF 2005!

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • JAN. 20-FEB. 18
Make sure you don't drown in your margherita this weekend.

pisces • FEB. 19-MAR. 20
You might as well enjoy as much free food as you can.

aries • MAR. 21-APR. 19
Don't hold any resentment towards your colleagues.

taurus • APR. 20-MAY 20
Every once in a while it's good to let loose of some of your aggression.

gemini • MAY 21-JUN. 21
You are going to need some shades where you are going.

cancer • JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Jogging without your walkman isn't as much fun. You need your tunes.

leo • JUL. 23-AUG. 22
This morning you have to get up when your alarm goes off.

virgo • AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Way to put your foot in your mouth big time yesterday.

libra • SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
You better keep your profanity in check today.

scorpio • OCT. 23-NOV. 21
This weekend you should definitely have a cookout. Make sure there's a fire.

sagittarius • NOV. 22-DEC. 21
This weekend will be the grand finale of the year.

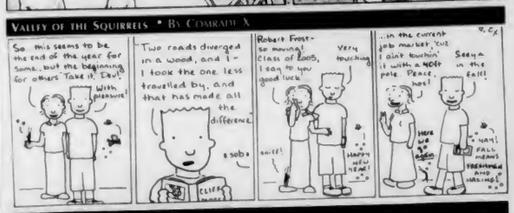
capricorn • DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Don't do anything foolish tonight while you're celebrating.

Commencement Videos
DVD $25 $20
Before June 1
After June 1 $30 $25
umass.edu/uvctv19 for more info

UVC TV

UVC-TV 19
Umass' only Student Run TV station

Southwest Concert
GOLDFINGER
BOTTOM LINE
Thursday 5/12 and Sunday 5/15 @ 10pm



GET FUZZY • BY DARBY CONLEY

GET FUZZY • BY DARBY CONLEY

VALLEY OF THE SQUIRRELS • BY COMRADE X

THE FAMILY MONSTER • BY JESSE STRAUS

THE FAMILY MONSTER • BY JESSE STRAUS

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"There is at the back of every artist's mind something like a pattern or a type of architecture. It is a thing like the landscape of his dreams; the sort of world he would wish to make or in which he would wish to wander; the strange flora and fauna of his own secret planet."

—G.K. Chesterton

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS

Meeting Notice Dept. of the campus, Incorporated (DOC Inc.) will hold its Annual Meeting in Campus Center 903, Wednesday, May 25, 2005, at 11:00 a.m.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Brandywine Apts. Now Leasing for 2005-06! 1-bdrm apts. Large floorplans, Laundry on site, Pool, Tennis. Move-in Oct. 1st or sooner if you like. Call 549-4600 or email brandywine@meadowwalk.com

1 Bedroom Cottage Apt. Starting Feb. 1st. $615/mo. Heat and hot water included. Contact Yvonne (203) 254-4505

Furnished 1 bedroom. Great location, steps from yard, walking distance to Amherst College. Heat included. Available June 1st. Call Nicole at 978-846-1442

2 bedroom $1,053.4 bedroom $2100 Now Accepting Applications 253-1371 MillValleyEstates@comcast.com Now open Saturdays 1-3

APARTMENT FOR RENT

Spacious 2 bedroom apt. Many updates. Some Fireplaces, Entertainment access, Hot Water, Trash and extended cable. Hot spot internet included. Water/sewer avail. Great location on Bus Route. Minimal move in costs. 665-3856

AUTO FOR SALE

'99 Audi A4 1.8T, Mint, 55,000 miles, CD/MD, sound system, moon roof, tint. $16,995. Contact John at 413-262-3436

COMPUTERS

Free Computer Recycling. Call 413-584-8557

EMPLOYMENT

Thompson & Brandywine Apts. Needs a certified lifeguard. Full time. Must work some weekends. $9.00/hr. Call 549-4600 x3 or stop by office.

Lifeguard part time, Hampshire Fitness. $9.00/hr + membership. Current certification is required. Call 256-6446

"Parttime" $4,000's potential. No experience necessary. Training provided. 1-800-965-6520 x160

EMPLOYMENT

Camp Counselors - Gain valuable experience while having the summer of a lifetime. Counselors needed for Outdoor Adventure, Arts, Aquatics, and more in the Pocono Mountains of Pennsylvania. Apply on-line at www.pinebrookcamp.com

SUMMER IN MAINE Male and females. Meet new friends! Travel! Teach your favorite activity. Tennis, Swim, Theatre Tech, Canoe, Water ski, Kayak, Gymnastics, Sports, Lacrosse, Archery, Theatre Costumer, Copper Enameling, English Riding, and more. TRIPP LAKE CAMP 1-800-997-4347 www.tripplakecamp.com

Students and others wanted for summer painting positions. Work with friends. Work outside in and around hometown. Earn $5-$12/hr. (508)1277-9767 www.allpropro.com

Responsible college students wanted for franchise in Training Program. Get paid to learn how to run a business. Health plus bonus incentives. Work with friends. Work in hometown. (508)347-7672 Ext. 445

EMPLOYMENT

Summer/Beyond- Local franchise Major healthy home company. Seeking motivated people. Sales, customer service, telemarketing. Lucrative pay. 587-9500

Camp Counselors and special needs camp counselors for town of Amherst day camps The town of Amherst seeks camp counselors for its day camps operated by the Leisure Services and Supplemental Education Department (LSSE). Past camp counseling experience, other experiences working with school-aged children and/or related coursework in elementary education highly desirable. Also seeks camp counselors to work one-on-one with special needs population preferred. Must be 18 years old. Money ranges for both positions $8.19 per hour to $9.48 per hour; 35-40 hours per week, June 22 – August 12. Applications available from The Bangs Center and Town Hall Human Resource Department, 4 Boltwood Walk, Amherst 413-256-4065. Equal Employment Opportunity / Affirmative Action Employer.

Painters Helpers Call 413-253-9457

EMPLOYMENT

Now Hiring On-Campus Representatives CampusFundraiser is hiring outgoing students for on-campus spokesperson positions. $15 to $25 per hour plus bonuses. Modeling, acting or customer service experience helpful but not required. Visit http://www.campusfundraisers.com/stag to apply.

Summer Jobs For The Environment
*$275 - $475 / Week
*Stop Global Warming
*Protect the Environment
Make a difference. Work with MASSPIRG on a campaign to stop global warming. Career opportunities and benefits. Call Chris 413-256-6434

Moving. Local moving company looking for self motivated individuals, part time positions available immediately. Raises commensurate with performance. Potential for tips. Good attitudes are a must. Call (413) 584-4746

Counter help- Part-time year round positions. Fast paced, detail oriented environment. Apply in person at the Woodstar Café. 60 Masonic St. Northampton

EMPLOYMENT

Make $75 taking online surveys www.makeyouthecom

MARKETING/SALES

Local Company owned by UMass Grads. Use your marketing knowledge to sell our Best-Priced-Products! Easy sales in Amherst, Northampton and throughout western Mass. Part-time, Full-time www.GetSetPrinting.com - Call Dan 413-682-0220

Administrative Assistant for Teen-bicycle Touring Program. Part-Time until Late Spring. Then Full-Time thru late August. Call: 800-341-6132 Student Hosteling Program, Conway, MA

FOR SALE

Used dorm furniture. Dirt cheap! Everything must go. Call Cory for prices. 413-687-9297

Kegerator For Sale. All connections and 2 G.3/2 tanks Full Fridge $125 978-501-4397

Full Size bed for sale. 1 1/2 years old Excellent condition. $200 & buyer must pick up. (443) 904-6844

HOUSE FOR RENT

Expect to have few rentals coming up. Call during summer. Skibski Realtors (413) 586-1827. Northampton.

House Hadley. Large 4 Bedroom, 2 Bathrooms, Living Room, Kitchen and 2 Car Garage. 1 3/4 miles to UMass. $2750 plus utilities. Lincoln Real Estate 253-7879.

LOST AND FOUND

Minolta Digital Camera. Found outside Library, 5/8/05. 413-210-9419

MISCELLANEOUS

www.hutchhats.com

Just Look Stupid

ROOMMATE WANTED

Leverett 8 miles to UMass. Large Bedroom in home. Shared w/undergrads $500 inclusive 665-2723

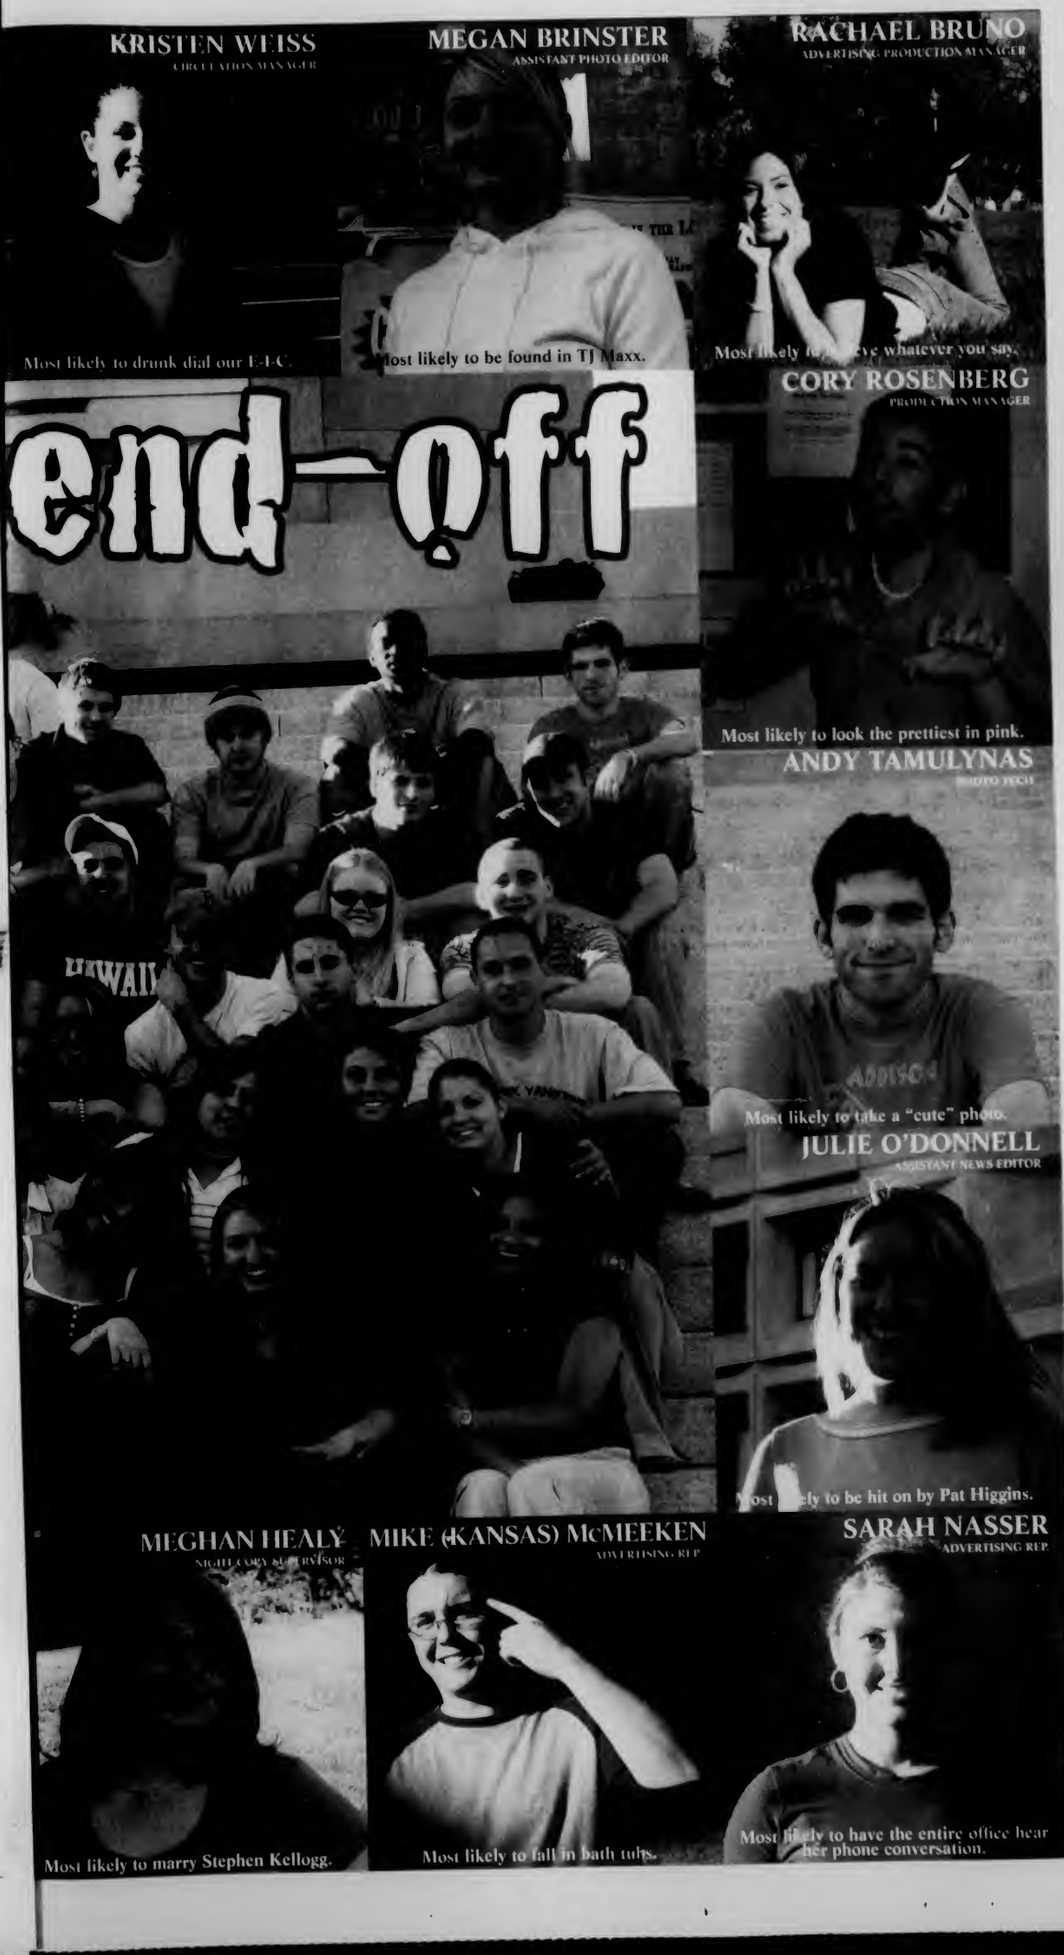
SERVICES

Have you been ripped off by a retailer? Contact the Student Legal Services Office. Regarding your rights as a consumer. 922 Campus Center, 545-1995.

SERVICES

PREGNANCY TESTING, HIV TESTING, Birth-control, and Emergency Contraception. STD Screening and Treatment. Affordable and confidential. Tapestry Health, 27 Pray Street, Amherst. 548-9992

Pregnant? Need help? Call Birthright of Amherst area for free testing and assistance 549-1906



SUBLET

Room Available June 10th. Aug 31st in Amherst Center. Call Noah 413-687-2365

Room in Northampton Close to Downtown Rent $600 Negot. 413-230-1068

Puffton Village 2 bedrooms, Rent 120 / month. Call Morgen 978-500-3961, with full option.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian would like to congratulate the graduating class of 2005 as well as its very own seniors. You will all be sorely missed! Best of Luck!!

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS THURSDAY

THURSDAY, MAY 12, 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Misty-eyed memories from the 2005 sports crew

"Experience is not what happens to a man; it is what a man does with what happens to him"
—Aldous Huxley

Every year I learn something new, some facet of life that up until that moment, I never knew existed. This year was more of the same for me as I embarked on my last year at this fine university. As I learned, so did my staff of sometimes diligent writers, who are all pressing the same dreaded, to be writers, more precisely, sports writers.

We have had our ups and downs, but with the help of my assistant and the work of my staff, everything came together in the end. I guess that's one of the learning experiences of college: working with others through adversity, all aiming at a common goal.

So without further adieu, here is the 2005 edition of sports section's Misty Eyes. Each writer has been dubbed with a name from a sports movie that suits them, in one way or another. Most of them don't know who we've chosen, but then again, that makes it that much more fun for us sarcastic editors as we snicker to ourselves one last time in the Campus Center basement.

—Bob McGovern, Sports Editor

BOB MCGOVERN, SPORTS EDITOR, MEN'S SOCCER, MEN'S BASKETBALL, MEN'S LACROSSE
BILLY HOYLE, "WHITE MEN CAN'T JUMP"

Four years ago I was driving with my parents up Rt. 9, with a rental car full of my odds and ends. All around I saw, well, nothing ... and to be honest I was scared out of my mind.

I thought to myself, "Oh McGovern, what did you get yourself into now?" as we drove past bison farms and that sign has the guy made out of vegetables painted on it. I figured I would transfer right away, there was no possible way I could stay up in this liberal, boonie town for four years and enjoy any minute of it.

Boy was I wrong.

As I mentioned in my column yesterday, I love this school and the people who have made it worth the ride. Through it all, I figured out bits and pieces of myself, learned that I have a passion and discovered just how enjoyable it is to be a little bit different than anyone else.

While traveling on this crazy road known as UMass, I discovered that I want to be a journalist and that I actually enjoy the art of journalism. I never could have gotten to this point had I never came down to the Collegian when I was a sophomore, not that I ever showed up that year. Gotta love e-mail.

Three years later I somehow became the sports editor and not only did I show up, but I lived down here. I sat in my little corner, surrounded by papers and wrote, edited, and learned far more than I did in any blistering hot classroom in Bartlett about sportswriting.

I could go on forever about what I feel about this place, but this is neither the time nor the place. If you really want to know, just ask me. Believe me, I have plenty of stories.

So without further adieu, here is the big friggin' list of people I want to say goodbye to. If you don't make the list, talk to me. Believe me, I have plenty of excuses.

First off, the Collegian:

Mike Marzelli - I have no idea where to start with this one man, too many memories, too many miles. You are one of the only people I know that shares a passion for athletics that mirrors my own, the only difference is, you know waaaay too much man. I knew going into this that you were going to be my chaser for the Collegian when things got too crazy and that if I ever had a question, or needed to work on an idea you would be simply a sports meeting away.

This basketball season could take up the entire section by itself man, I couldn't have asked for a better partner UCONN!?!?! then scrambling to your house before going to Miami, figuring out every bus route in Miami-Dade County, watching UMass get destroyed, "get on the bus Anthony!" sitting in front of the Convention Center and throwing rocks, meeting that crazy assed girl who was friends with Josh, staying extra long just for the sake of being there, and turning in the story a bit too late... sorry Jeff. Driving to New York to watch UMass play some school, the Fordham library, Philadelphia (Chickies and Pete's), taking Alamar and Michelle as our photographers, wins, losses, Lappas talks, Olean 12oi damnit), and of course Fear and Loathing in Dayton and the exit I fell asleep on, literally.

It's been real man, real fun. Outside the Collegian you have been a good friend and always a great conversation. There will always be a shadow in the corner of the Crack Shack, that spot where you and Jeff camped out at every party. Good luck with everything. I WILL see you in Cali this summer. You are a rare talent, make sure you use it well ... NO DOUBT!

Jeff Howe - Lowell sucks, I have nothing else to say to you. No, but in all seriousness, I am extremely happy I am giving this section to you, after working with you this semester I know you are more than prepared. No matter what people think or say, you were the unsung hero of the Collegian this year as you helped keep together a section that was going through crazy transition. Every writer we have is lucky to have you as the skipper next year.

Lacrosse was unreal: Hobart (the most beautiful school in the world) Harvard, Cannella interviews (have to prepare the same way every day), and dominating this beat. We were the only RI that's coverage of this team and for that we deserved this season, even if we don't get seats in the press box. Oh, yea, and I almost forgot... SYRACUSE!!! Unreal man, unreal. I can't wait until Sunday when I come back to Garber as a fan. It's about damn time. We killed this beat man, no two ways about it and because of that I will never forget this season.

You have stepped it up big time man, big time. I know you will succeed, because you have that personality and vintage Massachusetts annoyingness that will open doors for you. One more thing though, sign off of facebook dude, I hear Posada wants to be your buddy. Take care of this baby man, it's going to be one helluva ride.

Todd - There are few people on this campus that laugh like you do, I can hear that thing from a mile away. Yet, in some weird way, I think I'm going to miss it next year. The trip to Fordham, starting at the same time and talking about life. You are a true journalist my man, that's why I gave you a second chance ... that and I wanted to see you deal with Stonicy. You impress me because I see a different side of you than most, because you have given me the privilege of seeing it. I very writer goes through ups and downs, yet you laugh through it all and for that I will always respect you. Thanks for being a good friend these past few years and being the one of the few frat kids on this campus that I can actually deal with. Take care my man and never, ever give up on this. You know you're better than that.

Eric Athas - I expect you to have this paper by be ball- when you are a senior. You are a true talent, just don't let flattery get to your head. Your steady demeanor and strong will is going to carry you far man just don't listen to ONE thing Jeff says ... kidding. You bring an interesting sense of humor to the Collegian, yet I have never seen you at the Crack Shack, ass. This is going to be a long journey man, but you obviously have what it takes, now go out there and make Jeff and I look smart for hiring you.

Dan Duggan - You really turned it around man and in some weird way you remind me of myself. You have one more year down here, one more year to prove yourself before you go out into the real world. It goes really fast man, believe me. You are levelheaded and know more people on this campus than anyone I've ever met in my life .good luck with everything, I still look forward to having you over for a beer, or two, or... well you get the idea.

Hall - The biggest pain in my ass this year. I can't believe you made me yell, I never yell, so in some way consider yourself special. You have so much talent, yet I'm not sure if you know how to use it yet. In all seriousness I gave you another chance because of your undying passion for this and passion is something I can never cast aside. I will miss you because you are a quandary and I'm waiting for the day when you figure yourself out and turn into the spectacular reporter that is waiting to come out. One more strike man, I advise you to take a step back this summer and figure out what Brendan is coming back next year. Take care and good luck.

Rob G. - I see only good things coming from you over the next few years. Your turn around is one of the most drastic, I've seen down here since, well, me I guess. It appears you have made your decision to be a journalist and to be honest we are damn glad to have you. It's going to be a fun year for you, go out, make a name for yourself, and set yourself up for the next one.

Ian - If you make the basketball team I will buy season tickets and ride my pet elephant to every game. I'm only kidding, but if you think you have a shot go for it. I look forward to seeing your mug on the UMass Athletics site. You have potential man, you just have to decide where you want to put it. Thanks for the drunk dial by the way, I'm glad your lowly editor from the Collegian was on your mind while you were wallowing in drunken darkness.

Jon - The fan favorite. I see big things from you down here, you just need to get those damn bleach stains out of your blue shirt (separate the whites and colors man). It all seriousness you have been a breath of fresh air since you came here and I'm sure the women's tennis team loved having you. Keep working hard and things will work out for you, just don't get in fights with your friends in front of my house anymore.

Merritt - We left on pretty interesting terms Mr. Merritt, but that does not change the fact that I respect the hell out of you. You were a driving force behind this paper and the reason I am sitting here as editor of this section today. Although our mentalities differ in the ways of journalism, you are truly a good person and I will not forget the influence you have had on me and this section as a whole. A pain in my ass till the very end man, I said it in the first Misty Eyes section I wrote for and I'll say it again. Good luck with everything and leave those girls at McMurphy's alone will ya.

Alex (the weakass photo editor): I will beat your ass in jousting. I was tired last time. We need to chill before you take off and, well you know what we have to do. Be good to the ladies and stop trying to get me to "Holla!" I'm an Irish kid from Florida... I don't need to, they come to me.

Oh honestly, I have a limited word count so I can't say goodbye to everyone individually. But to the rest of you that have dwelled in the basement of the Campus Center with me the last few years, that you for everything. So many times people forget that we are a student-run paper and come down on us for the decisions we make. To those people I say thank you. Every time you bitch or complain, we learn something, something like sarcasm. Yea, I definitely got that down.

To my friends from above ground:

Jordan (Geico, Sweet 1, etc.) - I can't think of a good way to say goodbye to my best friend so I'll just try and list a few things that come to mind: the Sylvan parking lot, "Puli I need your garbage can," the SoCo night, Babs' Goat, 1011, 314, 1039 (Crack Shack), Tiffany, late night McGuirk walk, the matchbook, Merissa and her SoCo, "I think all the geese went home," Steve Gill, Midnight Madness, frats (almost joining Sammy), Homer frat, hating frats, rugby parties in our back yard, Orbiting Riley, "those Collegian kids think I'm actually gonna go down there?" C.O. Astro, football games freshman year, Steve Slapass, spring concerts, Sex Bomb, Bobalicious, drawing on Ray's door, cake on the RAs door, the broken sink, fireworks, calling the good doctor, Thondup, getting all of our writeups erased because we can't bullshit, Playstation and all the seasons we never finished, wasting away in different ways and I am happy I had the chance to meet you. Don't yell at me that I put you in the same list, I really just love you all the same.

To my rugby team - We are the boys of UMass...

Paige, Crazy Chris, Jaclyn, Romance, Alie, B, Johnny, Rach, Spills, Terri, Ken, Kenny, Allizar, Kirsten, Marjorie C., O'Malley and O'Malley, Peredhia, Hershey, Soji, Larkin, Barish, Lappas, Allison, Meyers, South African, Girls at 69, all my other rugby friends, Asian Brian, Alex Bianco, Shumway-girls, all my other Puffton friends, and every one else that I forgot to mention at 9:30 on a random May evening - You were my college experience and I hope I was a positive part of yours. Thanks again, this has truly been the time of my life.

MIKE MARZELLI, MANAGING EDITOR, SPORTS EDITOR FALL SEMESTER, FOOTBALL, BASKETBALL
#00 WILLIE "PLAYS LIKE MAYS, RUNS LIKE..." HAYES, "MAJOR LEAGUE"

"Those who make beasts of themselves, get rid of the pain of being an editor." – Dr. Johnson

We were somewhere around Kellogg Avenue, on the edge of uptown, when sports began to take hold...

Not just any ol' sports, mind you, but sports second to none in the Pioneer Valley - the type of sports that isn't found in Northampton or Springfield, but rather emanates from the basement of the UMass Campus Center at all hours of the night. Sports not for the faint of heart, the short of breath or those who get sleepy at the wheel, but for the few seasoned, veteran souls who thrive on playing for quarters, games, seasons eventually careers without ever feeling inclined to expire.

It was about a year ago at this time, on a May evening eerily similar to last night, that sports stormed to forefront of my college life, cracked me in the jaw and reminded me that if I indeed wanted to make something of this next year, I would have to breathe sports in every day the sun rose, and never exhale.

Bob and I were just beginning to become friends and Jeff was the new kid on the block who dressed real pretty, but we weren't quite sure about. He didn't really know us, we didn't really know him and there was some apprehension on my part about just how well he could handle sports the way Bob and I had planned on handling it for the upcoming year. We had nothing to gauge Jeff's sports prowess on other than what we'd assumed after observing him work; we knew he had potential, but the pooka necklace threw everything off. As the three of us sauntered lazily through the but cave that May night, Jeff turned to Bob and I and single-handedly altered the course of the next calendar year in each of our three unique, twisted and ultimately parallel lives.

"Do you guys want to swing by my apartment and just talk some sports for awhile or something?" he asked, taking a shot in the dark that maybe it was as good an opportunity as any for the three of us to begin to come together as one, and to find a common ground where each of our unique and twisted sports could harmoniously intertwine. Never were the three of us strangers again.

It was Jeff, Bob, scarface, the loveable old James and me. Wait, old James wasn't there. I don't even know nobody named old James. Anyways, there we were in Jeff's apartment, the future of sports still just a twinkle in our eyes. There were no worries to be passed around that night, just sports talk.

We bantered for an hour or so and quickly realized that we were no longer strangers. A bitter Knicks junkie, a fake North Carolina supporter and the world's biggest Red Sox rooter brought together through sports, realizing that we were all fully equipped to take on sports for a year where it would be all our own, serving as the collective fuel for three aspiring journalists who, together, needed nothing more than guidance through the depths and perils of journalism.

Sports – Collegian Sports – has never truly been the same since, and for that I am grateful. Jeff Howe, Bobby and I have never looked back from that night, and I doubt we ever will. We've dedicated ourselves to sports night in and night out, day-by-day, through places near and far and without fail in a tireless fashion to do for sports what it has done for us, and that is keep us rolling.

As Bobby now moves on and I drift away, sports will continue to burn strong as a legacy we are proud to have started and left behind, but sports will never burn as bright as it did in 2004-05. The three of us will relish this past year and the profound impact it had on us for years to come. Sports has made us smarter, stronger, slicker and more dedicated than we ever thought possible, and in return we have given every ounce of all we have. We will all resurface in other endeavors, but we will always take sports with us, knowing now what it means to all that we do.

Never will we forget where we first were learned sports in its purest, truest and most brutal form; sports that only those journalists with true grit can love and comprehend. And never will we forget whom we learned from and shared such sports with: the only two poor, misguided souls who would ever, in the end, understand what the hell is going on.

—Football – So it's like 105 degrees out, and we're in Dover, Delaware for UMass and Delaware State. Derek's walking back from the car with huge armfuls of radio equipment, sweating bullets and just extremely uncomfortable overall. So he catches his shoe on the edge of the track, goes flailing ass over teakettle and the shit goes everywhere as the only kid around, a local punk, can't stop laughing at him. I wasn't actually there to witness this; I didn't see a single bit of it to be exact, but I feel qualified to tell it a story now. Atta boy DY…so I wrote for the Boston Herald, cool…Colgate, a guaranteed win and an unbelievable night of revenge…Richmond in the rain, boy did that suck… Fightin' Blue Hens suck, wait till next year…HUNG OVER driving to BC w/dv and howe…can I please have an egg and cheese on a cinnamon raisin bagel?…the Weakly Heights has expanded to twice a week now…but those yellow tshirts are so COOL and STRAIGHT! …"coach Brown, I know this is the dumbest question I'll probably ever ask in my entire career, but can you compare Peterson to Doug Flutie?"…and Jeff, can you please rip ass for the complete and entire drive back to Amherst? Thanks… Harrisonburg/Charlottesville…big screen at Damon's…Big Papi's blast in the hotel room…I have an idea, lets run the option!…kickin UNH's ass…my first time on WRNX…sports talk in Durham with Jeff's boys…losing 19-8 to the Yankees last night and having it not matter because THE RED SOX WON THE WORLD SERIES!…WRIU in the Meade Stadium press box on World Series Day…makin' it back to McGuirk in time for Maine on homecoming in the rain…nobody named Marcus Williams will ever beat UMass…BLOCKED!…and Derek missed it…Brown Bowl I at Northeastern…meeting Steve Buckley – "and the Herald readers have been better off ever since!"…closing out a 500 season at home…RJ for Punter and Minutemen for 05 NCAA Division I-AA National GodDamn Champions…hellyeah —December 9, 2004 William D. Mullins Center, Amherst, Massachusetts sometime after 11:00 p.m. – I didn't eat any popcorn or drink anything, I didn't even leave my seat at halftime.I watched intently, not speaking with Bobby for the duration of the second half, I clutched the table at tense moments, pounded my fists in jubilation and had a harder time breathing than the old guy next to me with the oxygen tank. As the game wound down and things were looking up, Bobby and I nodded at each other in complete agreement – we had discussed this before. When I heard Jack O' Neil bellow "JEFF VIGGIANOOOOO FORRRR THREE-EE!!" I knew that it was on… With under a minute to go I gave my laptop to my father in the stands and put my valuables in my pockets. I ignored a text message from Boothy asking me if I was "going over the table" and sat there intently as I felt it all slipping away. Then it went Maxwell to Bowers. Bowers to Vigg. Vigg to Freeman for two, and I was on my feet, moving towards the baseline. Ray went dashing off the court and I didn't even notice. I watched the action fly down the other end of the court, first a pump fake than a three and it was…NO GOOD and all hell broke loose.

See MISTY on page 13

NEW ENGLAND'S LARGEST COLLEGE DAILY • EST. 1890

The Daily Collegian

ORIENTATION ISSUE 2005 WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM VOLUME CXVI ISSUE 1

Students speak out against RIAA

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

April 21, 2005

Students across the University of Massachusetts reacted to the lawsuits that the Recording Industry Association of America and the Motion Picture Association of America are filing against university students.

UMass Legal Services says that some of the students have already sought advice.

"The recording industry is very meticulous at what they do," said Steve Mammarella, a Legal Assistant at Legal Services.

In April both the RIAA and the MPAA filed lawsuits against college students who illegally download music and movies on the "Internet 2 hub" (i2hub) network. The RIAA disclosed that UMass had 25 students who were being sued, while the MPAA would not release that information.

Even though college students were the targets of this round of lawsuits, RIAA CEO Cary Sherman said in an online chat that his company is not specifically after students.

"College students are not the primary target of the lawsuits brought to date. We've sued a relatively small percentage of students as compared to the general public," he said.

Sherman also said that his company sent out letters to 140 universities informing their presidents about the downloading problems on their campus.

See RIAA on page 6

Tasers spark heated UMass debate

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

March 21, 2005

The use of Taser weapons by police departments has sparked heated debate nationwide over whether the weapons are humane or even necessary.

Here at the University of Massachusetts, the police department announced in September 2004 that it is looking into purchasing the weapons, which have been deemed "non-lethal" by officials in the past.

UMass is currently awaiting a review from the Executive Office of Public Safety before purchasing the Tasers. The EOPS review may take a few months to complete.

"UMass is not currently purchasing Tasers," said UMass Chancellor John Lumbardi. "The state is evaluating the safety of the devices and we await further information before considering these devices."

The University may not currently have plans to purchase Tasers, but UMass Police are definitely considering the weapons as an option. Four officers are in the process of being trained as Taser instructors, including Det. Lt. Robert Thrasher.

"The Tasers give us a tool to add to [our arsenal] that's much more humane," Thrasher said. "It's a very humane tool."

Currently, the four UMPD officers must receive an additional four hours of training to be qualified as training instructors by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

In terms of a plan to implement the use of Tasers on campus, UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor explained, "We're not even there yet."

"We continue to do more research on [the Tasers]," she said.

Recently, members of the Student Government Association, most of whom have expressed strong disagreement with the Taser idea, spoke with O'Connor and other police officials on the Taser issue.

"We had a good exchange of ideas," O'Connor said. "I think the SGA is going to be working with police on this matter."

SGA President Eduardo Bustamante said he was pleased with the meeting.

"It's an example of the administration listening to students," Bustamante said.

Taser International, a manufacturer of the weapon, says Tasers can fire at a target between 16 and 21 feet away. The weapon fires two needles, which penetrate the skin and deliver an electric shock for about five seconds. The wires deliver a 50,000-volt charge at 1.36 joules of electricity. By comparison, a heart defibrillator has 300 joules.

Thrasher experienced the effects of the Taser firsthand while participating in Taser instructor training. He described the pain as being immediate, but intense.

See TASERS on page 6

GEO, UMass reach contract agreement

May 12, 2005

Negotiators reached a tentative contract agreement May 10 between the Graduate Employee Organization and the University of Massachusetts Amherst. The deal was reached in time to stop a picket of the inauguration of UMass President Jack Wilson, which featured U.S. Sen. Ted Kennedy as the guest of honor.

The contract agreement was announced May 11 in joint statement issued by both the GEO and the University. The two sides have been at odds for more than a year in dispute over graduate student pay, health benefits, childcare and workload.

The agreement follows a March 21 advisory from Wilson's assistant Robert Goodhue to University officials urging them to save the event to celebrate the inauguration of President Wilson and honoring Senator Edward M. Kennedy.

GEO officials on April 22 co-sponsored a shut-down of UMass campus classes, and threatened to picket Wilson's inauguration, apparently anticipating that Kennedy would not cross a union picket line.

Officials at Kennedy's office confirmed that if the picket were to occur, the senior U.S. Senator from Massachusetts would not cross the picket line.

Kennedy did attend the event.

GEO, which is affiliated with the United Auto Workers, canceled its picket for Wilson's event. However, the student activist group Take Back UMass still planned to picketed due to concerns regarding diversity issues on campus.

The tentative agreement includes stipend increases of two percent for each year of the agreement, plus a one percent pool of money each year to raise the lowest minimum stipends in the university's schools and colleges, said University spokesperson Ed Blaguszewski in a statement. An agreement was also reached on health fees, childcare fees, and same-sex domestic partner benefits, he said.

GEO's president refused to discuss the matter until GEO and the University issue their statement, However, the word of the agreement has been posted on the GEO Web site (http://people.umass.edu/geo/).

—Jamie Mason

Students celebrate Red Sox victory

By Erika Lovley
Collegian Staff

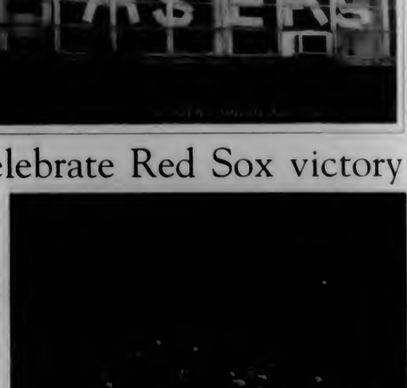
October 29, 2004

A deafening roar of cheers and a colorful display of fireworks marked the beginning of a largely peaceful celebration in Southwest Residential Area late at night on October 27, as approximately 3,000 students flocked from their dorms to celebrate the Boston Red Sox victory in the World Series.

"It's crazy, I can't believe the madness," said Derek Popek, a UMass student.

According to UMass officials, police arrested 22 people for charges of disorderly conduct and failure to disperse, and one person was put into protective custody. No injuries or significant property damage was reported.

Over 100 officers were on the scene, including UMass police, Massachusetts State Police, and Amherst police. A helicopter was used to monitor the crowd.



"I believe the word has gotten out that we are serious about maintaining order and arresting people when necessary," UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor said.

In John Quincy Adams Tower, students pressed against their windows, which were decorated with Red Sox symbols and signs, waving to the revelers below. The crowd threw toilet paper and shoes, waved Red Sox flags and crowd surfed. Several sets of fireworks were set off, and one man climbed a tree in the Southwest quad, impersonating a monkey.

"There's nothing like it. These are stories to pass on," said Jonathan Gravallese, a student.

The celebration was the first disturbance UMass experienced since the Red Sox entered the World Series last Saturday.

"It's amazing," said Kassia Mercier, who stood under Berkshire Dining Commons watching the celebration. Mercier said she was overjoyed to be at UMass for the historical night. "You get to experience everything ... it's great to be here."

Red Sox World Series' victory leads to rioting in Southwest that was later moved to the campus pond. 3,000 students left their dorms to celebrate the win.

UMass law school plan rejected

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

April 1, 2005

The University of Massachusetts lost its bid to for the state's first public laws school on March 31, after the Board of Higher Education voted against the proposal.

This was the University's second attempt at making a publicly funded law school in four years. The board's 8-3 vote was viewed as a huge defeat by University administrators, including UMass President Jack Wilson.

Wilson told the Associated Press he believed the board had strong support for the law school concept and hopes the plan could one day be resurrected.

"What I heard today was strong support for the concept," he said to the AP. "We have to come away, analyze this and decide where we go from here."

President of the Southern New England School of Law's Student Bar Association, Ryan Benharris, says he's extremely displeased with the board's decision.

"Chairman [Steven] Tocco should be ashamed of himself," he said.

See LAW SCHOOL on page 6

Relay raises $70K for cancer fund

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

April 19, 2005

After nine months of preparations, fund raising and recruiting, this spring's Relay for Life volunteers raked in nearly $70,000 for the American Cancer Society, nearly doubling last year's totals.

Students from the Five-College area volunteered their efforts, hard work and determination on the weekend of April 16 to raise money for cancer research, education, awareness and advocacy. Teams were then created and Friday night, students kicked off the third annual relay — walking around the track at Amherst College for 18 straight hours. The teams collabo-

See RELAY on page 5

A Male Alternative

Male birth control pill offers new options

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

February 10, 2005

"Don't worry, I'm on the pill."

One day, that could be a man speaking.

And with the new agreement between the Norwegian-based company Spermatech AS, and the University of Massachusetts Medical School, that day may come sooner than you think.

Spermatech researchers are in the planning stages of creating a drug that could possibly block sperm's ability to swim as well as its ability to fertilize an egg.

This would not be the first attempt in creating birth control for men, but it would be the first to avoid tinkering with male hormones.

Previously, researchers have found that it is extremely difficult to suppress sperm production while maintaining normal male hormone levels. A drop in a man's hormone levels would likely cause a lowered muscle mass, a loss of sexual drive, and other testosterone-related effects.

This new drug would instead affect a specific protein in the production of sperm that would inhibit their movement while forgoing the hormonal side effects that women currently experience in taking the pill.

MEGAN BRONSTEIN/COLLEGIAN

Arlene Avakian questions if men can be trusted to take a birth control pill.

Male students at UMass seemed to be split in their first reactions to the idea of a male birth control pill.

"I think it's great that we'll be given a chance to contribute in the act of birth control," said Dirk Barron, a junior at UMass. "A birth control pill could act as a back-up to condoms, which might break during sex."

However, Barron admitted he thinks the new pill might not be 100 percent safe.

"I love the idea of having another option, but I just have a hard time believing that there won't be any harmful side effects, physically as well as sexually," said Barron.

Today, American men are left with only two realistic methods of birth control: condoms and vasectomies. Both however, have drawbacks.

"For one thing, condoms aren't cheap, and a lot of guys dislike them because they decrease sensation and can spoil the mood," said Barron. "Vasectomies, on the other hand, would guarantee infertility, but I'm way to young for a vasectomy."

While the majority of the public may see this future development as a gift to American men, the creation of a male birth control pill may act as an even larger reward to women and the women's move-

See MALE CONTRACEPTION on page 3

Lombardi releases new Diversity Plan

May 3, 2005

University of Massachusetts Chancellor John V. Lombardi posted the final draft of his response to the Commission for Campus Diversity Friday.

In the plan, "On Improving Campus Diversity," he named Associate Chancellor Esther M. Terry to oversee diversity related issues on campus. Terry was a member of the original 23-person commission.

"The final draft is not substantially different from the second draft primarily because most of the major changes in response to comments appeared in the second draft," Lombardi said in an e-mail to The Daily Collegian.

Lombardi added that this plan is a little more clear than the old plan that came out on April 11.

"[The final draft] assigns responsibility for the continuing monitoring of the various activities described in the document to Associate Chancellor Esther Terry," Lombardi said.

Terry's main job will be to oversee the progress of diversity related issues on the campus. The first performance review by the commission, which is now chaired by Terry, will take place on July 1, 2006.

The performance will review all the work that the commission did in the fiscal year.

"Our goal here is student success," Lombardi said to the Springfield Republican during an interview. "This is a blueprint that we will then try to execute. Some of it will take time."

Lombardi expressed similar thoughts in his e-mail.

"The point of the exercise is to make progress and improve our effectiveness in building a diverse and inclusive campus. There is much to be done to achieve this goal, and the only want to get there is to start," he said.

The new plan, and all old drafts of the plan, can be found on the commission's Web site at umass.edu/campusdiversity/.

—Matt Elder

ARTS & LIVING
GREEN DAY ROCKED UMASS
As the highlight of a group of spectacular concerts to hit the UMass campus this Spring, Green Day rocked the Mullins.
PAGE 10

EDITORIAL/OPINION
COLLEGIAN PROVIDES OPPORTUNITY
The Daily Collegian has a wide readership and the skills learned there are invaluable. Come check us out.
PAGE 7

SPORTS
LOOK BACK AT UMASS SPORTS
From the defeat of UConn, to the Red Sox winning their first World Series in nearly 90 years, it was a historic sports year for UMass students.
PAGE 20

Campus Perspectives

By Megan Brinster

What are your plans for the summer?

"Graduating and going to work at Breakers in Palm Beach."

senior
Hospitality and Tourism Mgmt
Tamir Dvorin

"Going home to Bellingham to work for the state at a home for the mentally handicapped."

junior
Communication
Joshua Baker

"Going back home to Puerto Rico."

junior
Continuing Education
Lizaira Hernandez

"Internship for Pratt and Whitney aircraft engines in Hartford, Conn."

junior
Indust. Engine and Op Research
Rob Graff

"Spending time on the beack back home in Puerto Rico."

sophomore
Undeclared
Noelia Bauza

"Working to the point of exhaustion."

freshman
Pre-medical studies
Bryan Martins

New male birth control pill sparks student debate

MALE CONTRACEPTION from page 1

ment.

"The women's movement is all about the freedom to choose, and I see the male birth control pill as one more option for everyone," said Breitta Jones, a UMass student.

For nearly 40 years, women who wanted to take birth control have been forced to deal with the side effects that come with taking the pill.

"Many people, men specifically, do not realize the medical risks and side effects that may occur in taking birth control. They are low in occurrence, but it is still a drug, and as such should be treated with the same respect," said Jones. "Women who take it are not just taking reproductive responsibility, they are also taking on all the medical risks associated with the drug such as nausea, blood clots, and high blood pressure."

There is also some concern of how a male birth control pill would be received in today's political climate. As of today, the Federal Drug Association has legislation pending that would give pharmacists the ability to refuse filling a woman birth control prescriptions if it violates his or her moral standards.

Amanda Collings, Community Health and Patient Educator in University Health Services at UMass, feels that a form of male birth control is long overdue.

"We can put a man on the moon, and yet we have such a limited amount of options when it comes to controlling our fertility. It's amazing to me that we don't have better methods of contraception available when you consider how much money is poured into the pharmaceutical industry."

Arlene Avakian, director of the Women's Studies program at UMass, is uncertain just how much success a male birth control pill will have in the American public and whether or not men can be trusted to take the pill habitually.

"I think it's terrific, that men would have to take responsibility for birth control. And also, taking some burden of the risk, because all of this is risky," said Avakian. "But on the other hand, I wonder whether women can trust that men will really take the pill. Men aren't the ones who will become pregnant. They are not the ones, necessarily, who will have to suffer the consequences, or the joys of pregnancy."

"Until you have more of a egalitarian relationship between women and men structurally, that will always be the question," said Avakian. "But I think in a long term relationship, where there was a lot of trust and egalitarianism you could trust this, but if it were me, I'm not sure that I would trust it."

Alicia Desjardians, a UMass student, agrees that while some men may forget to take the pill, it isn't going to effect her opinion on male birth control.

"If the guy is really serious about the pill, then he should take the responsibility to remember to take it," said Desjardians. "Even girls forget once in a while, and it is expected that guys will too, but I still support this."

In between the entire debate, Breitta Jones is still able to give her ultimate summary of what she feels is the reward of this new development, the reward of another choice.

"Birth control is all about choice, and the more choices the better. With the addition of a male counterpart to female birth control there will be a level playing field, and whether men or their partners choose to take advantage of it, at least they will have the option."

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

113 Campus Center
University of Massachusetts
Amherst, MA 01003
• 413-545-3500 •
• Fax 413-545-3699 •
www.dailycollegian.com

EDITOR IN CHIEF Michael Busack
MANAGING EDITOR Cameron Woods
BUSINESS MANAGER Hetak Shah
PRODUCTION MANAGER Samantha M. Nielsen
ADVERTISING MANAGER Kerry O'Grady
EDITORIAL PRODUCTION Nicholas Belanger
ARTS & LIVING EDITOR Matthew O'Rourke
COPY EDITOR Amanda Allen
EDITORIAL EDITOR Allison Edles
NEWS EDITOR Dan O'Brien
PHOTO EDITOR Kate Sachsenmaier
SPORTS EDITOR Jeff Howe
DISTRIBUTION MANAGER Marty Pappas
CIRCULATION MANAGER Thomas Hecht
ADVISING CLERK Virginie Frecaut
PRODUCTION MANAGER Mark Spinosa
ASSISTANT OPINION Linda Wollack
ASSISTANT ADVERTISING Caren Tortorici
ASSISTANT BUSINESS Nathan Chomsky
ADVERTISING PRODUCTION Lauren Egavian
GRAPHIC ARTIST Charlie Higgins
ASST. ARTS & LIVING MacKenzie Issler
ASST. ARTS & LIVING Ian Jones
ASSISTANT NEWS Matt Belliveau
ASSISTANT NEWS Megan Daley
ASSISTANT PHOTO Elizabeth Carinci
ASSISTANT SPORTS Eric Athas
ASSISTANT SPORTS Dan Duggan

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN IS PUBLISHED MONDAY THROUGH FRIDAY DURING THE UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS ACADEMIC SEMESTER. THE COLLEGIAN IS OPERATED INDEPENDENTLY OF THE UNIVERSITY ADMINISTRATION. THE COLLEGIAN BECAME A DAILY PUBLICATION IN 1890. THE PAPER BECAME KNOWN AS THE COLLEGIAN IN 1908. THE COLLEGE SCIENTIFIC NEWS, THE MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN IN 1911, AND THE MASSACHUSETTS COLLEGIAN IN 1960. PUBLICATION WAS SUSPENDED DURING 1967. THE COLLEGIAN WAS REVIVED AS A WEEKLY NEWSPAPER IN 1968, BECAME TRI-WEEKLY IN 1971, AND RETURNED TO DAILY PUBLICATION IN 1984. OFFICES ARE LOCATED IN 113 CAMPUS CENTER. THE MAILING ADDRESS IS P.O. BOX 35910, AMHERST, MA 01035-5910. THE PHONE NUMBER FOR ADVERTISING IS 545-3500. THE FAX NUMBER IS 545-3699. SUBSCRIPTIONS ARE $150 PER YEAR AND MAY BE PURCHASED BY CONTACTING THE CIRCULATION MANAGER. POSTMASTER: SEND ADDRESS CHANGES TO THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN, P.O. BOX 35910, AMHERST, MA 01035-5910.

PRODUCTION CREW
On staff today

NIGHT EDITOR
Michael Busack
PHOTO TECHNICIAN
Alex Demosthenis
COPY EDITOR
Erika Lindey
PRODUCTION SUPERVISOR
Samantha M. Nielsen
PRODUCTION STAFF
Nick Belanger Lauren Egavian

Visit us on the web @ WWW.DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Welcome to Award Winning
UMass Dining Services. We are expecting you.

DINING COMMONS Worcester, Franklin, Hampshire, Hampden and Berkshire	CAMPUS CENTER STUDENT UNION COMPLEX & CONCESSIONS	CAFES AND CONVENIENCE STORES
Continuous dining from 7am to 10 pm*	Bluewall Eatery	Pita Pit at Worcester
Grab-n-Go and Breakfast-on-the-Run	Bluewall Café	Southwest Café
Create your own stir fry and noodle bowl stations	Marketplace Café	Whitmore Café
Many healthy options including vegetarian and vegan.	Starbuck's Cart	Physical Plant Café
Theme specials including Restaurant Night and Taste of UMass	Hatch Food Court	Worcester C-Store
Premium nights with Steak & Lobster	Outdoor Concessions	Franklin C-Store
All-you-care-to-eat Sushi and Dim Sum Brunch	Mullins Center Concessions	Hampden C-Store
Kosher Dining		Mini Store at the Student Union
Five College Meal Exchange Program		Herter Hall
Free nutritional consultation with our registered licensed dietitian		Library Coffee Kiosk – Procrastination Station

* Monday - Thursday at Worcester and Berkshire

www.umass.edu/diningservices

2005 Loyal E. Horton Awards
First Place - Menu Concept
Second Place - Theme Concept

RESIDENTIAL
THE BEST VALUE ON CAMPUS

GET IT DONE. INSTANTLY.

I265 I730 BlackBerry 7520™ I355 I860

ONLY NEXTEL HAS THE TOOLS YOU NEED TO GET MORE DONE.

Free Incoming Calling Plans
From anyone. From any network. At any time.

Coast-to-Coast Walkie-Talkie
Connect instantly.

GPS Solutions
Get directions.
Know where you're going.

Wireless Web Access
For info on the go.

* Ask about our Special Student Offers.

* FREE Travel Pack with new activation (car charger, ear piece and travel case)

For all your wireless needs, visit us at:

Endless Communications
The Hampshire Mall
(413) 584-0117
Located near the Food Court.

Endless Communications
The Eastfield Mall
(413) 543-1033
Located in the center of the mall.

Cyber Surf Shop
1512 Memorial Drive
Chicopee
(413) 552-0081

NEXTEL
AUTHORIZED REPRESENTATIVE

Free incoming applies to calls received in the U.S. Nextel's Nationwide Network serves 297 of the top 300 markets. ©2005 Nextel Communications, Inc. NEXTEL and the NEXTEL logo are service marks, trademarks and/or registered trademarks owned by Nextel Communications, Inc. MOTOROLA and the Stylized M Logo are registered in the U.S. Patent & Trademark Office. The BlackBerry and RIM families of related marks, images and symbols are the exclusive properties of and trademarks or registered trademarks of Research In Motion Limited - used by permission. All other product or service names are property of their respective owners. All rights reserved.

Rezoning eliminates land for fraternities

By DAN KOFFMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

May 9, 2005

At the Amherst Town Meeting on May 2, the east end of Olympia Drive was rezoned leaving the University of Massachusetts with no future further undeveloped fraternity land in the town.

The rezoning, made possible by Article 18 of the planning board, changes the land from being designated as fraternity residence land to neighborhood residence land.

Amherst used eminent domain to take the 27.59-acre property from a private trust in May of 1987. The town cited acquiring permanent conservation land and creating affordable housing as the primary reasons.

The University and town have tried numerous times since the town acquired the land to put a plan in place for affordable housing that would be tailored towards UMass students, such as housing for married students. Nothing concrete ever came out of these talks, and so the town decided to move ahead on its own.

The rezoning does not mean that affordable housing will be built on the land anytime soon. No timetable has been put in place for such an occurrence and no one shown great interest in developing the land.

"There's always been talk about doing something [on Olympia Drive]. The town meeting has always supported the idea," said Paul Bobrowski, Planning Board chair. "But the town can't afford to do it. We have to find a partner or developer to come in and do something. There's a lot of ways to do it."

Some within the community are worried about the possibility of affordable housing and fraternity housing eventually being alongside one another.

"I support completely the establishment of affordable housing in Amherst," said Morris Singer, a UMass student who also represents Precinct 4 of Amherst at Town Meetings, "but now there seems to be little or no consideration on behalf of the planning board on what the edge would look like between the University land and the affordable housing cluster."

"It's not just about fraternity housing and how the fraternity members would feel living next to affordable housing, it's also in consideration for the future occupants of the affordable housing cluster," said Singer, whose precinct includes all of the Southwest Residential Area of UMass.

The University has talked about building a fraternity and sorority park on Olympia Drive adjacent to the rezoned land, but not much has been heard of this plan recently. Michael Gargano, the Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life at UMass, has said in the past that the park would help to enliven the Greek presence across campus.

Fraternity housing can only be built on land already designated for fraternity use. Because of no undeveloped land being able to be used for fraternity housing and because a fraternity park is on the backburner for the foreseeable future, many fraternity members will be faced with having to live on campus.

On Wednesday, May 4, UMass trustees voted to pursue the purchase of five fraternity houses along North Pleasant Street. The five homes, which have been up for sale since January 2005, are spread over 1.82 acres and worth collectively $1.8 million, according to Amherst officials.

Alpha Tau Gamma owns the entire property on North Pleasant Street, but the fraternity moved to Sunset Avenue last year. Currently renting the houses are Alpha Epsilon Pi, Pi Delta Psi, Zeta Beta Tau, Lambda Phi Epsilon, and Sigma Psi Zeta, the lone sorority house of the group.

If UMass does buy the properties, which would presumably be turned into classrooms or offices, then these fraternities would be faced with having their members live on campus. Some fraternity functions would be able to still occur on campus, according to leading fraternity members, but parties would be impossible.

A public hearing was held on Article 18 on March 30. The standard public comment and discussion period followed and then the article was voted on by the Planning Board. The board voted unanimously to recommend that Town Meeting adopt Article 18.

Sig Ep fraternity is next to land that has recently been rezoned by Amherst Town Board for affordable housing.

Memorial benefit honors student

By KRISTIN SAUVE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

May 12, 2005

Five months after a tragic car accident that took the life of a University of Massachusetts graduate student and employee, The Crescent Dancers, a Middle Eastern dance troupe sponsored a memorial benefit to honor 25-year-old Jessica Hayes' memory this May. All of the proceeds from the benefit were given to help fund the scholarship that was created in Hayes' name.

Jessica Hayes died after being struck by a car in a pedestrian crosswalk on Route 116 in Sunderland near her home on December 21, 2004.

In honor of Hayes, Lila Gierasch, the head of the Biochemistry and Molecular Biology department, suggested to Hayes' mother Maureen Zak and stepfather Joseph Zak that they create a scholarship in her memory.

"I think we all felt this was something concrete we could do, at a time that was so difficult to fathom and to move onward from," said Gierasch.

Thus far, the scholarship fund has received over $10,000 of gifts, and according to Gierasch the gifts are still coming in.

Hayes received her undergraduate degree with honors from the Isenburg School of Management in 2001 with a minor in Economics. At the time of her death, she had been working for seven months as an undergraduate program assistant in Biochemistry and Molecular Biology while getting her graduate degree.

Hayes decided on studying biochemistry because as her stepfather said. "She believed that biology was a field that was going to save the world."

Hayes had always had a great love of learning. When picking classes she would always enroll in honors courses with the most strict criteria because "she always wanted to learn the most that she could," says Joseph Zak.

Hayes attended UMass as an undergraduate on a four-year scholarship she received from former UMass President William Bulger. Zak laughed as he remembered his daughter being the only recipient to give Bulger a hug when receiving the scholarship. Because of the impression Hayes made on Bulger, after the ceremony the three spent over an hour talking together. "That was the effect that she had on people," Zak said.

The Zaks remember their daughter, Jessica, as "always having a smile on her face." She was described as very caring person who loved doing things for other people without expecting anything in return.

When Hayes' mother suffered from a large brain tumor that almost took her life, Joe Zak said, "less never looked back. She always went out of her way to help out her mother."

This was the type of attitude that was typical of Hayes, and from the 1500 people who attended her funeral it was clear how many people's lives she had touched during her lifetime.

Zak remembers being approached by a grocery store worker shortly after his daughter's death that recognized him as Hayes' father. Zak said, "She told me how Jessica used to talk to her and sit with her on the bus when nobody else would. That's how Jess was, a very caring person."

The Zaks and Gierasch are still working on the criteria for the recipient of the Jessica Hayes Scholarship Fund, but the scholarship will be awarded to a female biochemistry major.

According to Gierasch, "[We] want someone who embodies the traits we all loved in Jessica. Someone who has the academic record... but also cares about helping people." They are also looking for someone who has many different interests and talents just as Hayes did. The scholarship will be given for the first time sometime within the next year.

One of the special traits that Hayes possessed, according to her father was that, "she kept a calmness about her even when chaotic things were happening, she could handle many things at once." She was also able to keep people amused in some way even in the most chaotic of times with her "cleverness and dry wit."

The Zak's remember the last words spoken by their beloved daughter when she left for campus hours before her tragic death. Those last words to her parents were, "love ya," something both of them will always remember.

UMass student Jessica Hayes was killed Dec. 21, 2004.

The Belly Dance, Drum Jam and Dance benefit, sponsored by The Crescent Dancers, was held May 19 at Greenfield Community College dance studio. Faith Kaufmann, a member of the group who was fond of Hayes, said, "It is our way of supporting our friend and fellow dancer Maureen." Maureen Zak was an active former member of the dance group and will also be at the benefit.

Those who wish to donate to the Jessica Hayes Scholarship Fund may contact the University of Massachusetts Amherst Department of Biochemistry and Molecular Biology, located at 913 Lederle Graduate Research Center, Amherst, MA 01003.

UMass students walk in Relay for Life rated and competed with one another to raise money from local area sponsors, family and friends.

RELAY from page 1

University of Massachusetts seniors and co-chairs of the event Melissa Ivanoski and Nicole Lohr were both anxious and excited to lead the event.

"It's a lot of hard work, but seeing results like these make is worth it," Lohr said.

Last year, the Relay raised $45,000, a goal that was well surpassed by students and sponsors. This year, both Lohr and Ivanoski set a lofty goal of raising $60,000.

Online Chair for the event, Dan Lee said that the majority of the fund raising came from online donations — a newer fund raising strategy that proved to be successful.

"We set up the Web site and we already raised $42,000, with more coming in," Lee said, "Last year we raised $15,000 online. It is the easiest way."

Dozens of teams participated in the Relay, all using different strategies to fund raise. Team "Drop it like a W" from UMass copied links from the Relay Web site into their instant messenger profiles.

Team Captain Christine Marchefer said that her team had also raised a large amount of money from family members and some of the team members, like senior Carolyn Markey of UMass got her inspiration from personal experience.

"I bought a purple scarf which is a Relay item and all the money goes to the American Cancer Society," Markey said, "we will be wearing it somehow on us all night."

UMass seniors Kelly Hess said that her reason for relaying is for the good cause of the event and it

See RELAY on page 6

Survivor's walk at the Relay for Life, which was attended by UMass students at Amherst College, April 18. $70k was raised through the event for cancer research.

Looking for a Job?

The Daily Collegian

is seeking energetic and creative individuals to fill fall 2005 advertising executive positions.

Sound like you? Contact Kerry O'Grady @ 545-3500 for more information

This year, get yourself a job where you meet great people and gain great experience!

Welcome to UMass Amherst!

Feeling lost?

Career Services can help give you direction!

Career Counseling...
Assessment...
Internship & Co-op Opportunities...

Find it all at

CareerServices

511 Goodell Building
413-545-2224
www.umass.edu/careers

Cancer survivors share experiences

RELAY from page 5

reminds her of her aunt who battled and beat breast cancer and for her grandmother — who lost her life to the disease just one year ago.

"It is hard, because anyone can become a victim of cancer," Markey said.

Before the event kicked off both Lohr and Ivanoski shared their personal reason for relaying that brought a notion severity and motivation to fight the disease. Ivanoski said that she relays for her mother Chrisitne Ivanoski who battled breast cancer and survived.

"[Her battle] was absolutely devastating, but that is why I am here today," Ivanoski said.

Lohr lost her father Thomas Lohr to cancer a few years ago and she emphasized the importance of the event, stating that it is the American Cancer Society's top fund raising event, last year alone raising over $200 million nationwide.

Perhaps the most inspirational part of the event was the lighting of the luminaria around the track. Hundreds of candle lit bags lined the track and bleachers either in honor of a cancer survivor or in memory of someone who lost his/her life to the disease. People had written personal stories and anecdotes on the bags that remained lit for the entire night. Additionally, bags were placed and lit on the bleachers spelling out "hope."

"Students especially really enjoyed that luminary lighting," Ivanoski said. "We had a table set up in the Campus Center and so many people wanted to help out."

After the personal introduction eager participants began the walk behind the UMass Honor Guard and cancer survivors, including Christing Ivanoski, a UMass professor and student.

Teams, however, did not have difficulty walking all night, as entertainment was provided throughout the night. Disc Jockeys from the UMass student radio station, WMUA-FM donated their equipment, providing upbeat music and Djing. Also, there was a comedian, gift certificate giveaways and local bands. Dozens of local area restaurants also donated food and beverage to the participants.

"It is such a great feeling knowing that the whole community gets involved," Lohr said, "and it is so awesome to know that everyone here is having such a great time."

Both Lohr and Ivanoski admitted that final totals would not be reached for a few weeks because more donations tend to trickle in after the event, however, they are both overwhelmed by the support of the community and five-college area.

"We are so proud of everyone who got involved," the co-chairs said. "People don't necessarily realize that cancer affects everyone at some level."

Zoomassbooks.com provides students alternative to textbook buy-backs

By Dan O'Brien and Kelly McGuire
Collegian Staff

May 6, 2005

When University of Massachusetts sophomore James Highsmith arrived on campus to begin his studies last year, he couldn't believe the price of textbooks.

"Textbooks are a huge expense," said Highsmith, a Cambridge resident who is now 21-years-old. After two semesters of "suffering" through what he claims are the high costs of textbooks, he came up with an idea.

Zoomassbooks.com was Highsmith's creation to combat the University's Textbook Annex's sales practices. He calls his Web site a "marketplace" where students can advertise used textbooks to be sold at prices that are much closer to the actual retail price of the book.

Currently, the Annex, as well as several other textbook retailers in Amherst, will buy back a student's used textbook at a price which is much less than what the student originally paid. One example of this occurred to a Daily Collegian staff writer, who originally purchased the textbook, "The Search for Life in the Universe," third edition by Donald Goldsmith and Tobias Owen. The book was originally purchased from Jeffrey Amherst Books at $54. The retailer offered to buy the book back for $7, despite the book's mint condition.

"It seems like there aren't any options," said Highsmith, referring to the textbook situation. "The school is not really watching out for its students, but is more concerned about its money."

He says his goal is simple.

"I just wanted a place to sell books at the price you bought them from," he said.

His idea has seemed to catch on. Zoomassbooks.com has a total 160,000 hits since November and currently has roughly 600 members reselling books.

University and Annex officials have yet to comment on the Web site, which was started six months ago.

The University currently has a "no competition" clause in the contract with the Annex. Highsmith, who resides in the Central Residential Area, says he has gotten around this clause by establishing an off-campus post office box as the main address of his establishment.

There is no cost to go onto the Web site and browse the textbooks online. If a student sells a book, the company charges a small percentage of the profit, done by credit card, in order to keep the site running.

"I'm not really doing it for profit in anyway," he said.

Highsmith claims he has invested $1,500 out-of-pocket towards the Web site in the past six months, and has spent over $2,000 towards the site this academic year. Most of this money was spent on printing costs, Internet server space, office supplies and encryption security for credit cards so users' identities cannot be stolen.

Campus Design and Copy, located in the UMass Student Union building, has provided Highsmith with cheap prices to produce some 5,000 fliers promoting his updated Web site that will be posted this weekend.

The flier reads, "Monopoly is fun to play, but enough is enough," referring to the virtual monopoly the Annex has over textbooks purchased on-campus.

With 1,000 books already sold through the Zoomassbooks.com, business is pretty good, he says. However, he hopes to get more people interested in reselling books through his site.

Highsmith says he is re-launching his Web site today to include no pop-up advertisements and more straightforward instructions. He also says the site will be easier to navigate.

When asked if he was afraid of getting sued by the University or the Annex for possibly violating the "no competition" clause of the Annex's contract, he responded, "I'm not scared of being sued."

"I'm willing to play their (the University's) game," he said. "I'm providing a marketplace so students can contact each other instead of using the Annex."

Thus far, neither the University nor the Annex have contacted Highsmith regarding his Web site.

MEGAN BRINSTER/COLLEGIAN

James Highsmith, founder of Zoomassbooks.com stands in front of Memorial Hall in May of 2005.

RIAA lawsuit upsets students

RIAA from page 1

Since the legal process started last week, Mammarella said that now is the time that students should take advantage of Legal Services.

Once the student has received the subpoena, they have a short period of time in which they can "quash" it, Mammarella said. Quashing a supine is when the student tries to say that the respective industry does not have grounds for their information- like what they have downloaded and their IP addresses.

According to Mammarella, Legal Services has talked to some students who have received letters from the RIAA and MPAA. He said that some of the lawsuits can demand up to $10,000 per song downloaded.

Sherman said in his Internet chat that the average user had 2,300 MP3 files and one user had 13,600 MP3's.

Many students at the university voiced their displeasure of the lawsuits as they wondered why the industries would go after college students, who usually do not have much money for a legal settlement.

"I think it's crazy," said Kyle Murphy, a senior civil engineering major. Murphy said that he didn't know that downloaded music was illegal, and that he hasn't seen any warnings in any of the programs, and that can be a cause of the problem.

"If you download Kazaa, there's no warning," he said.

Legal Services is located in 922 Campus Center. Lawyers operate on a sliding scale fee basis.

Law school proposal rejected

LAW SCHOOL from page 1

"It is the students who lose out here," UMass Dartmouth Chancellor Jean F. MacCormack, an architect of the proposal told the AP. She blamed "interference" by the private law schools.

"I have never seen this level of scrutiny," she said.

The board's concerns over how the new school would handle its finances was prime reason the law school was rejected, says board Chairman Steven Tocco. The board claims that UMass' plan to place revenue from the school into an on-campus fund, rather than into the state treasury, appeared to be illegal.

"The view of our legal officer is important," said Tocco.

Tocco called for the end of such trust funds, which are used elsewhere in the university system, citing lack of publi, disclosure.

Governor Mitt Romney, who has remained silent on the law school issue, said the board made "the responsible decision given the unanswered questions surrounding this proposal."

The proposed latest law school plan, before it was defeated, reduced in-state tuition from $19,000 to $16,000, and Wilson planned to launch a major fundraising campaign.

But Higher Education Chancellor Judith Gill, who oversaw the board's research into to proposal, said there still were concerns about a budget "so constrained and sensitive" that any miscue on enrollment projections would be costly.

Information from the Associated Press was used in this report.

Tasers spark student debate

TASERS from page 1

"Someone pulls the trigger and your body immediately tenses," he said. "You're in pain for about five seconds and it's over... That's all the time we need to put handcuffs on someone."

The issue of Tasers being used on the UMass campus has sparked discussion after it was first publicized in a January Boston Herald article. Many student leaders are against the idea. The SGA even went so far as to post giant letters that spell the words "NO TASERS" across their Student Union office windows.

Coincidentally, the human rights group Amnesty International released a report about Tasers around the same time UMass announced its plans to look into purchasing them. Amnesty International says Tasers can be linked to at least 80 deaths in the United States and Canada since 2000. Another study by the Southern Christian Leadership Conference released in February stated that 86 deaths in the United States could be linked to Tasers since 1999.

O'Connor says she thinks Tasers are a good option for officers who come into contact with dangerous situations.

O'Connor gave several examples of officers who have been assaulted in the past, including one incident of a male officer who was allegedly beaten by several individuals. One individual kicked him in the head and another stole his police radio in Southwest, she said.

"Just speaking for myself, I was assaulted three separate times on my first year on the job," she said.

Thrasher says although officer assaults aren't frequent on campus, they happen often enough to warrant additional precautions.

"With the number of violent altercations my officers deal with in a year, it's not uncommon to address seriously violent subjects," Thrasher said. "The other option is to seriously beat them with a baton."

O'Connor stressed that the use of Tasers would "not be a crowd control option."

Tasers are already the norm for police departments in other states, but its usage has not come without controversy.

A Jacksonville, Fla. TV station, WJXX-TV reported March 8 that a 13-year-old girl was tasered at least twice by officers trying to subdue her.

The incident was discussed at a community meeting in the city's Lincoln Villa section. Residents discussing the recent use of Tasers by police in that community's high school got a unanimous response by local parents.

Two highly publicized cases involving Tasers in Chicago happened the week of Feb. 10 when a 54-year-old man died and a 14-year-old boy was critically injured when police tasered them within four days of each other.

The 54-year-old, identified as Ronald Hasse of Cedar Lake, Ind., allegedly made statements to officers such as: "If you come near me, I'll give you HIV," and "I'm going to kill you with my blood."

Paramedics transported Hasse to the hospital where he died 90 minutes later. An autopsy to determine his cause of death was "inconclusive."

Hasse's death came four days after Chicago Police made headlines when officers used a Taser to subdue a 14-year-old boy. The boy, who weighed 220 pounds and was 6-feet 2-inches tall, allegedly injured three female workers at his group home and "advanced on the sergeant with his fist drawn," when police arrived, according to Chicago Police Superintendent Robert Cline.

The boy's legal guardian appointed to him by Cook County disputes Cline's claims saying, "it is definitely my understanding that he was just sitting on the couch when he was tasered."

O'Connor says UMass will be carefully studying the effects of the Tasers before implementing any policies regarding their use. Above all, she wants to maintain the best level of safety for her officers.

"I believe in giving my officers as many possible options," she said.

Looking For Something To Do?
Atkins Farms Has Something For Everyone!

A unique country market nestled in one of the oldest apple orchards in New England. Atkins is just a short drive south from UMass on Route 116. You'll enjoy a unique shopping experience where old time service is an everyday treat. Sample some of New England's favorite foods or pick up a country gift as a keepsake.

Farm Fresh Produce
Country Bakery
Deli & Lunches
Take-Out Food
Specialty Foods
Homemade Fudge

Fresh Meat & Seafood
Ice Cream Shop
Sushi Bar
Full Service Florist
Fruit & Gift Baskets
Gift Department

Attention Parents!! Ask about our Student Special Care Packages
A great idea for parents far away from their busy, hard working, and hungry college student.

Birthday Cakes
Flowers, Balloons
Snack Paks
Get Well Paks
Mix & Match Paks
& many more!

Call for our brochure
(413) 253-9528 or
1-800-594-9537
Local Deliveries
Monday-Saturday

ATKINS FARMS
Country Market
Corner of Route 116 & Bay Road
South Amherst, MA 01002
(413) 253-9528 * www.atkinsfarms.com

Amherst Computersmiths
Welcome new students!
Is your computer unhappy? Having trouble setting it up?
Call us – we'll fix it and take your worries away.
We come to you and specialize in quick turnaround.
We also offer free loaner computers and late night emergency service.
New student special:
The first hour of regular service is only $35!
(Special valid until Oct. 25, 2005 *Additional fee applies for late night service.)
Phone: (413) 687-1665
http://www.amherstcomputersmiths.com

Dance Stuff
Starting a dance class?
Go to Dance Stuff for all your dancing needs
220 W. Pleasant Street
253.5201

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

EDITORIAL OPINION

ORIENTATION ISSUE 2005

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Collegian provides news and opportunities

Being on a college campus, students have access to many resources provided, either directly or indirectly by the university. Living away from home for the first time, for many students, it is very important to remain in touch with what's going on, not only in the world, but on campus as well. The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is committed to keeping the campus, as well as the general readership of the Amherst area, informed of important issues that concern them.

In addition to The Daily Collegian, there are also free copies of The New York Times, The Boston Globe and USA Today available on campus at no cost to the student body. The university acknowledges the importance of reading the news and has, consequently, made these three publications available for free to students through the Student Government Association's Readership Program.

The Daily Collegian is a self-funded, student-run daily newspaper that is dedicated to reporting unbiased and objective stories to the UMass community and surrounding areas. In the past year, our publication has reported on controversial campus issues regarding the Student Government Association and the administration, the UMass Police Department acquiring TASERs and the extensive coverage of the riots following the Boston Red Sox winning the 2004 World Series.

With a readership of over 14,000 people, The Daily Collegian reaches a wide variety of readers, ranging from Amherst to Northampton, even to other countries via our Web site, which receives literally over a million of hits monthly. Reading The Collegian each day will help freshmen students get acclimated to the UMass, Amherst and will keep them informed of special events and issues that concern them.

In addition to reporting strict news, sports and entertainment stories, the paper also offers a very versatile editorial/opinion section with columns written by UMass students providing different voices from different backgrounds. Consequently, The Daily Collegian poses as a great forum for expressing student thought and opinion. Any UMass student is welcome to apply to become a Collegian columnist and doing so greatly increases their perspective of the campus community as a whole.

Staying involved with the campus is an important factor to maintaining a careful and much-needed balance of school time and outside time. One of the main ways students will be able to hear about popular organizations and keep up with the important aspects of the UMass community is by reading The Daily Collegian.

At the beginning of the fall semester, The Daily Collegian strongly encourages any and all students who many be interested in earning real newsroom experience at New England's Largest College Daily newspaper to come down to our office, room 113 in the Campus Center basement, and speak to the editors.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

A stalker's guide to thefacebook

Matt Brochu

Once upon a time, stalking people wasn't just an underrated art form; it was also a huge pain in the ass. Sit back and think about the countless hours you could have wasted: 1) Driving four to five car-lengths behind your stalkee at all times. 2) Dialing her phone number and breathing heavily like "Big Deli" after a round of wind sprints, then hanging up. 3) Taking black-and-white pictures and thumb-tacking them to your Shrine Wall, right next to the hair doll and that pencil she picked up for you in CompSci105. 4) Dealing with the bird that crapped on your head while sitting in the oak tree across the quad to take those pictures. 5) Cutting individual letters from magazines to paste together creepy makeshift love notes to tape to her dry-erase board, always signed, "Your Secret Admirer."

Fortunately for all of us, www.thefacebook.com has brought those days to an end. Of course, one would think that such an innovative solution to all of your stalking needs would be sold via an infomercial for three easy payments of $19.95 (and if you call now, they'll throw in a pair of binoculars absolutely free). But you'd be wrong. All you need is an Internet connection, an uploadable picture of "yourself," and the desire to poke random chicks (which isn't as cool as it sounds) to put hundreds of vulnerable, accessible college coeds at your fingertips within the click of a mouse. And if you haven't had the opportunity to re-enact the toilet scene from "One Hour Photo" yet, this may be your lucky day.

Well, as soon as I heard about this thing, I logged on and registered immediately (for research purposes only) to see what it was all about. This is what I found. For the seven of you who haven't heard about thefacebook (by now, it's a Web site thence the .com) that allows you to post much-too-personal information about yourself on the Internet for the entire world to see. In the end, thefacebook is just a cross between your high school yearbook, your AOL Instant Messenger profile, and that unsettling feeling you get when you read the personal ads in the Valley Advocate.

Basically, they assign you some web space for a personal profile, supply you with the categories, and expect you to supply them with the answers depending on how pathetic and attention-starved you are. You can then browse the profiles of fellow UMass students and add people to your group of friends, except unlike the girls who made lists of their friends at recess in 4th grade — you can't distinguish your best friend forever (BFF) from your best friend for life (BFFL) by dotting your I's with little hearts.

Of course, one would think that such an innovative solution to all of your stalking needs would be sold via an infomercial for three easy payments of $19.95 (and if you call now, they'll throw in a pair of binoculars absolutely free). But you'd be wrong.

Unfortunately, thefacebook's suggested way of making friends is creepier than the old dude with the beard, the "I'm panning for gold" hat, and the cane that hangs out in front of Antonio's every day. And if you disagree with me, I suggest you try this out in the real world (you know, that place where normal people have normal relationships and girls can go to bed without using the halo-ed angel smiley face). Here's thefacebook's method to becoming Mr. Popular, in step-by-step fashion. Insert Patrick Duffy or "Code-man" joke here:

Step 1: Approach a random person in the campus center. Step 2: Poke them with your finger (or with a pelvic thrust, it doesn't really specify how). Step 3: If they're OK with this — I mean, who wouldn't be - simply say, "I request to add you as my friend, but before I can do that, you must confirm that you are in fact friends with me." Sound weird to you? Sounds like a kick-in-the-balls and a restraining order to me.

But here's the deal. Allowing a friend to be on facebook is a lot like allowing a friend to have sex with a really shady guy. It's bound to happen every once in a while, so when they do it, just make sure they do it responsibly. Here are a few ground rules to start you off on the right foot.

RULE 1: When building your profile, keep your cell phone number to yourself. I don't know about you, but I'd rather not have random people calling me ever. Would you go out to dinner and a movie with the next telemarketer who calls to ask about your satisfaction with your newspaper subscription? I didn't think so.

RULE 2: Don't list your school address. If you're that comfortable telling strangers where you live, you might as well take it a step further and add a few new awkwardly personal categories, such as: "Words My ATM Pin Code Rhymes With When Spelt Out," "What I Told My Therapist Last Week" or "If You Were My Social Security Number, What Would You Be?"

RULE 3 (FOR GUYS ONLY): Keep your damn shirts on. You know who you are (and if you don't know, your last name might just be a well-known salsa brand). But seriously, if I wanted to check out some freshly waxed, oiled-up pecs, I'd go watch "Baywatch" reruns. Hopefully someone gives you the head's up when "Playgirl" shoots their next "Facebook Fantasies" DVD.

So use thefacebook wisely or don't use it all. Just realize that it exists for the same reason that Snood exists, to help your sorry ass procrastinate every night. And if it doesn't help you find love, when you might just have to resort to the old-fashioned way: get drunk and blatantly hit on people. Sure, it might get you slapped in the face, but at least you won't be the loser who pokes people on the Internet.

Matt Brochu is a UMass graduate student.

The Hookah revolution

Yousef Munayyer

You may have seen them on campus and you may even be smoking out of one right now. The hookah, also known as the argile, shisha, nargile, hubbly-bubbly and so on, has caught fire on this campus like a freshly lit coal.

Perhaps some of you have no idea what I'm talking about. The hookah is a water pipe used to smoke flavored tobacco (or other things, but what you do with your hookah is your business). Its origins are not quite clear. We can say with some degree of certainty that it originates somewhere between India and Iran, but exactly where is unsure. It is evident that the hookah met the western world through the Ottoman Empire, which ruled over much of the Arab lands in which the Hookah was popular.

In the 19th century, it became very much a symbol of the east. The pipe fascinated orientalists coming from the west, frequently documenting its presence in their travel logs. It became so fashionable at one point that pictures could not be taken unless the hookah was present. It was to be recorded as part of a culture, part of a people.

Today that fashion craze is back. It started up again within the last 10 years. I am not quite sure how it happened, but I watched it evolve. I remember a few years ago when friends of mine and I were spotted on campus with one; we were looked at as if we were walking around with the Holy Grail. People would frequently stop by and ask what it is and ask to smoke, once their skepticism were off.

Now this is no longer the case. In the few years I have been at this University, I have watched the boom happen right here in what is surely a microcosm of hookah culture worldwide. Surely this is tied to marijuana culture and its popularity on college campuses, but the hookah revolution has spread further then the grassy hippie-filled fields of universities.

In the few years I have been at this University I have watched the boom happen right here in what is surely a microcosm of hookah culture worldwide.

The hookah is now present in many Arab American households. It has become a way to symbolize the heritage. It has become a way to hang on to what you are so far away from. In fact, the hookah in the Arab household has also become a fashion statement. Much like "The Da Vinci Code" in the trendy-posing-as-educated white homes, if you cannot find a hookah in an Arab house, their authenticity as Arabs may be questioned.

It all hit me earlier this month on the first sunny day. Like animals that have grown tired of hibernation, everyone was outdoors in bathing suits and shorts, even though it was only 60 degrees. Yet there, spread out in between clumps of sunbathers, were several hookahs. The hookah revolution is here.

Unfortunately, it saddens me. It saddens me that the hookah has become the ambassador of Arab culture. It is not even originally Arab, though it is widely popular in the Arab world today. Hookahs, along with belly dancers, have become the symbols of Arab culture in America today. The civilization, which brought the world the Arabic numeral system and algebra; preserved Greek philosophy for centuries and developed chemistry and medicine while Europe was in the dark, is now represented here in the U.S., not by these accomplishments, but rather by scantily clad dancing women and smoking devices.

These accomplishments of ancient Arab civilization are centuries old, yet modern Arab civilization has a rich culture filled with literature, art and music, all which are drowned out by the hubbly-bubbly.

Part of the blame for this lies on Arab Americans who struggle to assimilate with American culture and are thrilled by the attention they get when some one is inquiring about their "bong" or about a woman that can shake. Arabs here in the United States have an obligation to be ambassadors of a proud culture and cannot allow the demands of a culture driven by consumerism and sexuality to affect the message they carry into the western world.

The hookah revolution is the resurrection of an unhealthy trend. Surely it offers a glimpse of the east, but only as well as a cigarette defines western culture to the rest of the world. On college campuses, there is a slightly higher understanding of Arabs then in the rest of the country. In many places around this country, Arabs are still seen as rag wearing terrorists, yet at universities, they are symbolized by hookahs and dancing women.

I am by no means asking anyone to give up his or her hookah. That would just be terrible. Yet, it is our duty, Arabs and Americans alike, as the future of educated America, to change the stereotypes about Arab culture and broaden the understanding of foreign lands here at home.

Yousef Munayyer is a Collegian columnist.

This space for sale

Allison Edles

There's nothing quite like buying into American propaganda. After all, why else would we feel the need to buy eight different bags of various shapes and sizes that all serve the same exact function if we didn't honestly believe in the bottom of our hearts, even just a little bit, that buying those eight bags would make us exactly like the people in the commercials and, therefore, better than those around us?

It's a fact well acknowledged that advertisers are way too good at what they do. And they know it. Who else can make us want to buy something that gives us nothing in return, like paying $4 for a cup of coffee that contains very little actual coffee? I mean really, you're paying more for the Sweet 'N Low than you are for the coffee. Regardless, just when we couldn't think advertisers could do their job any better, they one-up us once again.

It's a fact well acknowledged that advertisers are way too good at what they do. And they know it. Who else can make us want to buy something that gives us nothing in return, like paying $4.00 for a cup of coffee that contains very little actual coffee?

Rather than solely utilizing billboards, commercials and magazines, now those savvy slick-talkers have found a new outlet for their clients' messages: the human body. Thirty-one year-old Joe Tamargo, who runs a Web site called LivingAdSpace.com, is offering his body as available ad space. That's right; clients are now free to venture into previously unexplored territory by permanently tattooing their products and businesses on Tamargo's body.

Now, to the cynical reader, this may seem like nothing new. After all, how much of a difference is there from wearing a Tommy Hilfiger logo tattooed on your arm as opposed to wearing one of his T-shirts? Let's face it; you can't even buy a standard black T-shirt without having the designer's name stapled to it somewhere. Perhaps Tamargo is just giving in to the inevitable.

However, what I find eerily disturbing, more so than the obvious, is the fact that tattooing an ad on your arm pays less than if you were to advertise in a professional magazine or on a billboard. For having two ads tattooed on his right arm, Tamargo earned a little over $1,000. Leave it to advertisers to price out the worth of permanently disfiguring human flesh at around $500. And, sad to say, I have a sneaking suspicion that the unsuspecting Tamargo set the price a lot higher and was talked down by the piranhas of the ad world. Such is the way of things.

Having gotten past the initial shock of it all, we can now move on to the specific ads that have been permanently affixed on Tamargo's right arm. Now, taking into consideration the everlasting factor of these ads, it leaves one to question, what it is exactly that he is now an advertisement for. The answer: Web sites. Tamargo has two ads on his arm, one for a pharmaceutical company in California called pilldaddy.com and the other is SaveMartha.com, a site launched in lieu of Martha Stewart's imprisonment. So, in exchange for $1,000, Tamargo has become what we all hate. That's right, he's now a walking pop-up.

But where does it go from here? In a recent cnn.com article, the Madison Avenue advertising guru Jerry DellaFemina commented on Tamargo's situation, saying, "I don't even want to ask where he might want to place an ad for Viagra." While it's easy to jest at the situation, the underlying threat is much more serious. We have become a nation that relies and functions, not only on the products being advertised, but also on the ads themselves. Take, for example, the Super Bowl. While the actual game is very exciting (and because a good portion of those viewing don't watch football games otherwise), it is not solely the game that is the reason for its entertainment and appeal. Those who don't normally watch football watch the Super Bowl for two reasons. First, because it is just another reason to throw a party and second, the advertisements are impeccable.

Rarely is there another occasion where you can sit back with your bowl of chips and cold beer in hand and realize that the 30 seconds of commercial you're watching just cost that particular company $2 million. That's right, while both your brain and arteries are functioning at decreased levels, you can still count on that comfort of knowing that Budweiser will always be $2 million dollars poorer for making you laugh so hard you spill your beer.

I fear that what we have to look forward to are days when magazines will be filled with articles and not ads; days where the only things that constitute commercials are public services announcements and local broadcasting network tests. But, we can continue to rest easy knowing that in the future, there will be a group of people who will not be afraid to finally tattoo things on their bodies like "Eat at Hooters!" and "Atlantic City is your calling!"

Allison Edles is a Collegian editor.

In our own backyard

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz

I grew up in a small hill town called Heath, about 15 minutes north of Shelburne Falls on the border of Vermont. The northwestern towns of Franklin County are what we locals refer to as West County, and we garner the most intense love and pride for our home.

Just south of West County lies Greenfield. This was the big city for the majority of my childhood, and it had it all — a couple of big streets, two movie theatres, and lots of stores and restaurants. Later in life, Greenfield became my cozy home away from home, an extension of West County, as I worked and studied there for a couple of years.

Yet, I am saddened to say that in the past five years, Greenfield has taken a tragic turn for the worse.

Never a particularly large town, Greenfield's post-Cold War economic downturn has been exacerbated by recent influxes of poor and unemployed residents mainly from Holyoke and Chicopee seeking cheap government subsidized housing. As a result, drug-related crime has been on the rise across the demographic spectrum for the past decade, with arrests increasing an average of at least 300 per year in that time span.

But this is my home. These are sacred grounds and I cannot simply say that this is what happens when empires finally come crashing down and be done with it. I need to do something.

I cannot possibly articulate the pain that I have borne of late in reading of multiple armed bank and convenience store robberies and residential burglaries within weeks of each other in this humble municipality of 19,000. Most recently, I am appalled at the gory murder of 20-year-old Anthony Alves of neighboring Colrain, which occurred within two blocks of Main Street.

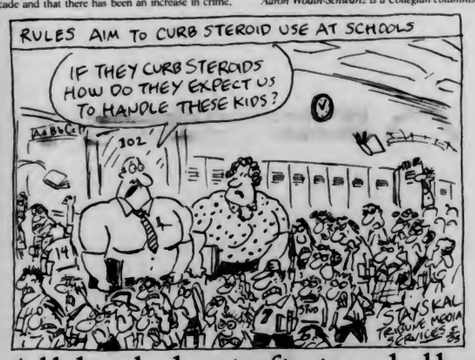
As described in a Boston Globe article aptly entitled "A Death Reflects a Town's Decline," Alves was brutally beaten to death by four unknown youths bearing steel pipes and a machete. As it turns out, the young men arrested for the killing were called in from Northampton to commit the murder and did not even know Alves personally.

Murders don't happen in Greenfield, especially not of the heinous variety, and especially not of people from West County. Understandably, this incident piled on top of all the other startling developments in Greenfield has brought up some serious issues for me.

My first instinct was to feel anger with Alves' murderers and all the other criminals plaguing Greenfield in such a way that would have warranted revenge. I must admit that I even had an initial xenophobic reaction and thought some pretty scary and racist thoughts. Once I got over my initial emotion, however, I got to reckoning and then to wondering just how such structural collapse could occur seemingly overnight.

It's true that there's been a drastic change in the demographic composition of the town in the past decade and that there has been an increase in crime, vagrancy, and unemployment since then, and particularly in violent crime in the past five years, but most of this has been perpetrated by poor white people. The tragedy is not that we now have a more culturally diversified town, it's that the town is in a heap of irremediable trouble.

There is a daily queue outside the employment services and welfare offices. There was already a distinct lack of social programs two years ago before Romney began cutting them. The aisles of the Salvation Army are bare and so many residents now live on insufficient government subsidies that there is no hope of raising a large enough tax base for the town to be able to support its new and growing population.



I expressed these grievances to my mother and the only explanation she could give me was "this is what an empire in decline looks like." Of course she is right. Just 20 years ago, Greenfield was a thriving economic hub at the crossroads of Route 91 and the Mohawk Trail. Now most of all the industrial jobs have been shipped overseas or to southern states where labor unions are weaker. I remember at about the age of six, most of my friends' fathers were laid off as their employers downsized or skipped town. My own dad, a trained professional, also found himself out of work at the time.

But this is my home. These are sacred grounds and I cannot simply say that this is what happens when empires finally come crashing down and be done with it. I need to do something. I am confined, at the moment, to simply buying locally produced goods and asking state representatives to increase fiscal policy in Western Massachusetts to provide employment and stimulate the economy. The insertion of some much-needed social programs could be just the trick and could also directly combat the violent streak that is quickly becoming a recurrent theme in town.

While I call on my fellow UMassers to do the same, I also feel that this is not enough. We are a strong school of some 24,000 students right down the road from Greenfield and we are in a position to help. More of us should direct our academic attentions toward this area and realize that this is an untapped resource in almost any field of study: sociology, psychology, political science, medicine, film, human and resource management. You name it. Engage in civil society. Make industry contacts. Apply your knowledge and learn some real life lessons.

There are some tremendous opportunities for students to connect with existing programs or even create new ones. Take advantage of the chance to help your local district and increase your prestige at the same time. Please help our community in decline.

Aaron Wodin-Schwartz is a Collegian columnist.

All hail the infinite dollar

Elizabeth Carter

All hail the infinite dollar! Bow down before it, and lay waste to your decency, morality, ethics and soul. Sell yourself a cent at a time until you've got all the cents in the world and not a drop of sense left in your head. Take 'til you can take no more, and if taking means buying, then buy 'til you can buy no more; buy every lie they sell. Keep buying until you've bought into it all.

Incredible how a piece of paper could gain so much power over man, isn't it? But money isn't just any piece of paper, it's paper with value, paper with enough power to make a good man do bad things, and a bad man unleash hell on earth just to have it. It's incredible the sense and reason people will cast aside, incredible how responsibility toward one's fellow man is lost amidst the greedy green sight-stealing glow of the buck. Even more incredible is how much money this world has, and how little it is willing to use to help others. Yet mention the making of a bomb and they say, "A bomb for every man, woman, and child, a bomb to protect, a bomb to save, for in bombs we trust." Yet bombs enslave.

Money: it's a crime. Oh sweet money, oh sweet lies, sing me a song again, dance with me and spin me 'round until I'm spinning so quickly I can no longer see, until I'm completely spinning out of control, but don't you let me go. I want your control. I need it. Because I, me, the part of myself that I own, is out of control. Oh infinite emerald deceiver, take me and my awareness away, dull my mind until I'm blind, until your lies have become my only truth. All I want is the infinite, and you, though solid, are the closest thing to infinity I can grasp in my highly evolved monkey paws.

Money, money, take me higher; you're a number in solid form; numbers never end; maybe if I covet you enough I will reach higher! Maybe if I have all the money to buy up all the things in all the world I'll be infinite too, or maybe I'll never own anything at all, for even if I have all the money in all the world, I will still never have myself. I will never own and understand my own awareness. Did I give up? Yes, yes I did. I sat down, ripped my still-beating heart out, slammed it on the auction block, then sold it to the highest bidder for the cheapest price, for any price is cheap when you're selling your soul.

Maybe if I have all the money to buy up all the things in all the world I'll be infinite too, or maybe I'll never own anything at all, for even if I have all the money in all the world, I will still never have myself.

I live in a world of prices, numbers and bottom lines. That line is unforgiving; that line crosses off names and splices dollar signs in half, and that line is all I hold onto these days. I live in a world of empty shells walking around in their high class suits, dressing themselves up as if that will make them less animal when they destroy in the name of nothing; all of them spending money as if it will amount to something in the end. Survival was not enough for me, taking money for what it is-money as a means of getting by, not as an ideal and a desperately needed imitation infinity that simply was not enough.

For how is it that you purchase eternity?

And you may ask who I am. I am the businessman with no morals, slashing jobs needlessly, "Gotta increase those profits," they say. But what profit is self-profit when you already have more than you need, when your self-profit destroys the livelihood of another? That doesn't sound like profit to me at all. Then he closes his eyes, and washes his hands like Pilate, as if blindness to bad deeds means innocence. No, no my friends, those with self imposed blindness in the name of "I" aren't less guilty, but rather suffer from a lack of personal responsibility.

Who am I? I am the lying politician whose soul has been purchased and paid for by interest groups who care more about their own benefit than the fate of those they affect. I am the Nothing Man, the man who stands for nothing, lives for nothing and goes about his days in the name of nothing. For that's all money is: you can buy all you want, but if you're empty inside, you'll never own a thing. Money is my fickle and unforgiving God, to whom I pay worship by making others fall down on their knees.

I am the plunderer; I am the wretched; I am the beginning of the end. I am the man who forgot that we become the things we do; yet most unfortunately of all, I am.

Elizabeth Carter is a Collegian columnist.

Finding meaning in a bracelet

Meghan Healy

You probably have one. Your best friend, your TA and maybe even your grandmother — they probably have one, too. Like me, I am sure you all have noticed the proliferation of rubber bracelets that have taken the wrists of pretty much everyone in the United States hostage. The most notable, the yellow Live Strong bracelets, supporting those diagnosed with cancer, began popping up over the last year. As "yellow fever" rapidly spread, it was only a matter of time before AIDS, Democrats and even Red Sox Nation followed suit. And, though I resisted the rubber bracelet trend, for quite some time, even I have one now.

I managed to keep my wrist free for quite a while, but one day a few months back while making a donation to the Lupus Foundation of America, I found that they too had jumped on the bracelet bandwagon. I was surprised at first. Lupus is not a trendy disease. Most people have never even heard of it. To be honest, my own mother had it for as long as I can remember and until I was a junior in high school, I didn't really even understand what exactly it was.

Some weeks later, a note thanking me for my donation to LFA was accompanied by one of the organization's purple bracelets. I held it in my hand for a minute and then placed it in my jewelry box. I wasn't ready to wear it yet... I knew that wearing it would attract attention and inevitably lead to questions I was not prepared, at least not emotionally, to answer.

A few weeks later I took the bracelet out and slid it on my wrist. My first time wearing it out, my worst fear was realized. The cashier at the grocery store caught sight of a flash of purple as I went to pay. "That's a pretty color. What is it for?" I hesitated and then replied, "Lupus." She looked at me like I had said something unintelligible and questioned again, "what the heck is that?" I am not sure what she thought it was, but there was a certain change in her demeanor when I answered. "It's an auto-immune disease," I said. "It turns your own antibodies against themselves, often affecting major organs and sometimes causing death." She stared for a few seconds and when I did not offer anymore she smiled and handed me my receipt.

Although the interaction was awkward (to say the least) I walked out of the store feeling good. At least one more person knew what it was and maybe she would even take it upon herself to learn more.

Although the interaction was awkward (to say the least) i walked out of the store feeling good. At lest one more person knew what it was and maybe she would even take it upon herself to learn more.

The face of Lupus is an ever-changing one. Nearly 1.5 million Americans are said to suffer from some form of the disease, with an estimated 6,000 new diagnoses being added to that total each year. Although it is two to three times more common among African Americans, Hispanics, Asians and Native Americans, lupus is not designated to any race or ethnicity. Although typically onset is between the ages of 15 and 44, lupus can be diagnosed at any age. Both men and women are at risk, though adult women are nearly 15 times more likely than men to be diagnosed with lupus.

My mother happened to be one of those women.

When my mother was first diagnosed in 1989 with systematic lupus, the most severe and most prevalent form, very little was known about the disease. In fact, it took over two years of doctors' visits before anyone could really make sense of what was going on with her. In the 16 years that have passed, my family has watched as the field of medicine made great strides in the treatment of AIDS and cancer, but, comparatively, very little time or effort seemed to be devoted to lupus.

My mother went through a barrage of tests and operations, treatments and medications. She suffered two strokes, one leaving her paralyzed on her left side for nearly a year. She lost her vision for almost three. Since so little was known about lupus, her life was constantly in jeopardy. Around Christmas, when I was 11-years-old, the doctors told us that she wouldn't make it to Valentine's Day. Over the next eight years she was given similar death sentences from clueless doctors, yet, unfortunately, when she passed away in my freshman year of college no one saw it coming.

I am not sharing this story for sympathy or attention — in fact most people I have met since freshman year don't even know that my mother passed away ... at least they didn't really, until I started wearing this bracelet and opening up about it. Instead I am hoping to simply make some of you aware that lupus exists and is a reality, not only in our society, but statistically, right here in the University of Massachusetts community.

Lance Armstrong has raised millions and millions of dollars for cancer research and support with his yellow Live Strong bracelets, on top of raising awareness and garnering support for survivors and their loved ones. If a proliferation of purple bracelets is what it takes to raise public awareness about a disease that, if caught early enough, doesn't have to be as painful and life-threatening as my mother's was, then I am proud to wear it — and if you have any questions, just ask.

Information from lupus.org was used in this column.

Meghan Healy is a Collegian editor.

A person's right to smoke

Matthew Reid

Let me start off by saying how opposed I am to smoking. I hate the smell, I hate how the smell gets on your clothes, and I hate the whole concept of smoking in general. It's baffling to me how much money people will spend on cigarettes.

With that said, I think that people have every right to smoke in the privacy of their own homes.

Howard Weyers, President of Weyco Inc., feels differently. The medical-benefits administration company in Okemos, Mich. went smoke-free last month, requiring all employees to take Breathalyzer tests to ensure that they weren't lighting up. Four employees refused the test, and were promptly fired.

The company said that it has the best interest of the employees in mind. Forgive me, but I fail to see how firing someone is in his or her best interest.

The company also says that it is trying to lower health care costs by not employing smokers. Does this mean the company can fire people for having lousy diets? What about people who participate in extreme sports? Fatty foods and skydiving may not kill as many people as tobacco, but where do you draw the line, and who should be allowed to draw the line in the first place?

I don't like smoking any more than Mr. Weyers does, but it's not illegal and employers can't pretend as though it is.

I'm not arguing that smoking can lead to heart disease, emphysema, lung cancer and other health-related problems, but the fact that Weyco has singled out smokers doesn't make a whole lot of sense to me.

State Sen. Virg Bernero (D-Mich.) is working on a bill that would prevent Michigan employers from using anti-smoking policies to fire or fail to hire workers who smoke. Sen. Bernero is not an advocate of smoking, but is an advocate or a person's right to privacy. The term "equal opportunity employer" applies to gender, sexual orientation, race, age, religion, disability and nationality and "doing things in your own home that are your own business" should be on the list as well.

The exception would be if smoking deters from a person's ability to do their job. A few years ago a police officer in Fall River was fired when his boss learned he was a smoker (state law prohibits police officers from using tobacco products, whether they are on duty or not, due to the detrimental effects of smoking on physical ability). I agree with a law banning cops from smoking. However, as much as I may be opposed to the act itself, smoking is still legal, even for workers of a Michigan medical-benefits administration.

I am reminded of a conversation that repeatedly comes up between two people I work with back home. My hometown is currently in a debate over the smoking rights of individuals in certain "private establishments." These establishments are not business offices, but rather places where people go to socialize.

One of my coworkers, who happens to be a non-smoker, feels that smoking should be allowed, because the people who frequent the clubs pay membership dues and have a right to do what they want inside of the club's walls. A fellow co-worker disagrees, saying that smoking is harmful not only to the smoker, but also to the other people in the room as well (this person happens to be a smoker).

I realize that the situation doesn't exactly parallel the situation at Weyco, but it does bring up an interesting and important point — this is not about smoking. The fact that a smoker thinks smoking at the clubs should be banned, and a non-smoker feels smoking should be allowed, proves that this issue goes beyond how someone feels about smoking. The issue is one of privacy and discrimination. I'm not saying discrimination against smokers is anything like other more blatant types of discrimination, but it is discrimination nonetheless.

Weyers, in a column he wrote for USA Today defending his company's position, said that people against his policy are not "facing the dangerous realities of smoking." He goes on to say that his plan is "not about what people do at home ... it's about the acceptance of personal responsibility by people we choose to employ." It doesn't seem like a "personal" responsibility to me, if a boss is monitoring someone's every move and punishing people for not meeting their own expectations.

The headline of Weyers' USA Today column was, "Smoking is not a civil right." Excuse me, Mr. Weyers, but not smoking isn't exactly a person's civic responsibility, like you seem to think it is. The truth is, many smokers may very well "face the dangerous realities of smoking," as you put it, and still choose to smoke. It's their decision.

I don't like smoking any more than Mr. Weyers does, but it's not illegal and employers can't pretend as though it is. I would love to see the government prohibit smoking completely, but that's never going to happen, not as long as Big Tobacco keeps profiting from its global empire. Maybe some day the right system will be in place for smoking to stop completely, but that day is not now. Weyco Inc. would argue that they are doing their small part in the fight against smoking, and that's all well and good, but people, even smokers, have rights to privacy.

Matthew Reid is a Collegian columnist.

T AN OPINION
SS KNOW ABO
R ED/OP IN THE
TORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

HEALTH EDUCATION WANTS YOU!

GET INVOLVED! MAKE A DIFFERENCE!

CALL 577-5181 FOR MORE INFORMATION ON ANY OF THESE PROGRAMS.

SEEKING VOLUNTEERS:

1. FRESH & SOBER

Fresh & Sober is an anonymous recovery-based student support program for UMass students recovering or seeking recovery from alcohol and/or other drugs. This program can benefit any student who is questioning their alcohol and/or drug use who would like a non-judgmental person to talk with, any student who would like more information about recovery and Alcoholics Anonymous, and already in the fellowship of AA who would like to offer their experience, strength and hope to others. Call 577-5188. All calls, conversations and inquiries are confidential.

2. NOT READY FOR BEDTIME PLAYERS

The Not Ready for Bedtime Players is a student theater troupe that performs on campus on Wednesday evenings throughout the academic year with opportunities for special performances. Our lively and entertaining skits address sex, masturbation, coming out, relationship violence and much more. Check the UMass events calendar for our schedule. Call 577-5181 for more information.

3. ALANA HEALTH EDUCATION AND OUTREACH

The purpose of the ALANA Health Outreach and Education program is to support students of color to access health care at University Health Services, raise awareness about health issues and concerns that impact ALANA communities, promote healthy lifestyles, and provide advocacy, education and referral. This is done through customized workshops, educational forums, consultation and leadership development.

4. THE WOMEN'S HEALTH PROJECT

Come and be a part of a group that educates students at UMass and the surrounding communities on issues that affect women! The Women's Health Project conducts weekly workshops on contraception in the residence halls, sponsors the clothesline project, breast health workshops and UMass Orgasm Week, all while having a great time! Independent study credits available. Come to our meetings every Thursday at 7:00 p.m. in UHS Room 302.

5. HEALTH REACH INTERNATIONAL (HRI)

HRI helps international students, scholars and their families to stay healthy while facilitating easier access to the health services offered at UMass by providing information, organizing and presenting workshops on health related topics, and networking and collaborating with other organizations to address the concerns of international students. For more information, call 577-5181.

6. THE STUDENT HEALTH ADVISORY BOARD (SHAB)

SHAB is the officially recognized voice of the student body in matters pertaining to UHS, and participates in the planning, financing, implementation and evaluation of student health programs. SHAB provides input into the recruiting of health professionals, reviews and makes recommendations regarding the Student Health Trust Fund and the Supplemental Health Benefits Program, and serves as a liaison to other student organizations. Come to our first meeting of the fall semester, Tuesday, September 13 at 2:30. Call 577-5181 for details.

7. HEALTHY EATING/ HEALTHY BODIES

Nutritionists are seeking students interested in supporting others on ways to eat healthy while on campus and feel good about their bodies. Students majoring in Nutrition, Exercise Science and Public Health, or those with a strong interest in these fields are encouraged to call 577-5181 or 577-5314 for more information.

OTHER SERVICES:

Health Education will be happy to meet with individuals or groups to discuss any health related topic. Come to our offices on the 3rd floor of UHS to obtain information on contraception, safer sex, alcohol, drugs, stress or any health topic.

Call 577-5181 for more information about these topics or any of the services listed below.

NEW! THE CENTER FOR ALCOHOL AND OTHER DRUG PREVENTION

Housed in Health Education at UHS, this new service is for all members of the UMass community. Its mission is to create a campus environment that supports responsible decision-making about alcohol consumption and to decrease incidents of high risk drinking among UMass students. Services include training, education, individual assessment, support of alcohol-free activities, online education courses, and much more. Watch for more details coming soon.

AHEP (THE ATHLETIC HEALTH ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM)

Provides information and education to student athletes.

ANONYMOUS HIV ANTIBODY TESTING

Call 577-5126 to make an appointment for anonymous testing.

CONTRACEPTION EDUCATION

Classes are offered Wednesday evenings in room 302 of UHS and Monday evenings in the residence halls. Contact Health Ed for additional dates and times.

MEN'S HEALTH PROGRAMS

Workshops on topics such as Sexual Health, Body Image, Masculinity, and more. Call for more information about workshops and the formation of a new Men Against Violence RSO.

NUTRITION SERVICES

Nutritionists are on staff to meet with students individually to discuss concerns about eating, proper diet and weight loss. Please call 577-5314 to schedule an appointment at UHS.

PEER HEALTH EDUCATORS

Earn 6 credits while learning and educating others about alcohol, drugs and much more in this year-long course. Call 577-5181 for details.

TOBACCO TREATMENT SERVICES

Assistance to quit smoking, Individual and Group Sessions, Presentations. Please call 577-5181.

VOICES AGAINST VIOLENCE

Committed to working with the UMass community to address violence in all its forms, with a particular focus on men's violence against women. Voices Against Violence utilizes a bystander approach to violence prevention and regards student participants not as potential perpetrators or victims, but as empowered bystanders who can confront abusive/violent peers. Peer educators wanted. Academic credit available.

UMassAmherst

University Health Services • Health Education Division
150 Infirmary Way (third floor) • 577-5181 •
www.umass.edu/uhs

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

ARTS & LIVING

Orientation Issue 2005 ARTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The politics of punk

By Matt O'Rourke
Collegian Staff

May 2, 2005

Although the Ramones may not have intended for their punk rock standard "Blitzkrieg Bop" to be used politically, it has evolved into just that. punk's political anthem. From the Clash, to Rage Against the Machine, to Green Day's latest album, punk rock has been used to shape change either politically or socially across the world. More importantly, the music mattered.

Punk music is rooted in fighting the norm. Nearly 30 years ago, when punk-acts began to form, it was seen as a response to the current trend of disco and music sounding "too boring," as the Ramones put it.

For the Clash, it was a way to bring about social change for what they saw as inefficiency in their home country of England. Race was a favorite issue for the Clash in their early years, as their song "White Riot" chronicles the plight of blacks (albeit with a sarcastic tone). "Black people gotta lot a problems/But they don't mind throwing a brick/White people go to school/ Where they teach you how to be thick." Perhaps their most famous rendition of the song was performed in 1978 at the Rock Against Racism concert in Victoria Park in front of a crowd of nearly 80,000 people. In fact, it may have been this show that launched the Clash into being one of punk's forerunners for political music.

Confrontation. Anger. Rebellious. All of which have been used to describe Rage Against the Machine, perhaps the most political band of the 90s —covering issues as far

See PUNK on page 13

Concert for the ages

By Ian Jones and Michael Busack
Collegian Staff

May 2, 2005

It's rare to see a line of people stretched nearly all the way around the Mullins Center, but if you walked by on April 30, that's exactly what you saw. The giant crowd was there to see Grammy Award-winning punk rock legends Green Day, and they were rewarded with an amazing show.

Green Day
Mullins Center
Amherst
April 30

After My Chemical Romance's finished their opening set, Green Day's chosen messenger — a giant, pink bunny chugging a beer — took the stage and, in-between drinks, got the audience cheering for the band they were about to see.

Green Day came out, unsurprisingly to "American Idiot," and the crowd started singing along in approval. They followed that with "Jesus of Suburbia," which ended in the first of many jarring explosions. They were surprising even when you knew they were coming, and they added a lot of power to the end of several songs.

After a few more songs from "American Idiot," Tre Cool started a drumbeat familiar to any Green Day fan, and the band played their first single, "Longview," beginning a series of old hits. Towers of flame filled the stage after the band played "Hitchin' A Ride," and lead vocalist and guitarist Billie Joe Armstrong doused the audience with a squirt gun between "Brain Stew" and "Jaded."

The highlight of their set came during their cover of the Operation Ivy classic, "Knowledge." Billie Joe announced that he wanted to

See CONCERT on page 13

INTERESTED IN A CAREER IN JOURNALISM?

DO YOU ENJOY WRITING?

LOOKING FOR A PLACE TO PRACTICE YOUR BUSINESS SKILLS?

DO YOU HAVE A KNACK FOR ADVERTISING?

Collegian All-Staff Meeting
Tuesday, September 6
@ 2 PM

Both NEW and Returning members are welcome

*Mandatory for all returning staff

Pioneer Valley comic artist uses the web to reach readers

By MATT O'ROURKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

JANUARY 25, 2005

Forsaking the more traditional career paths to financial security, Ieph Jacques chose to enter the creative, albeit risky world of web comics. At the age of 24, Jacques emerges as one of the most reviewed and respected artists online, with his web comic "Questionable Content."

In a recent interview, Ieph Jacques commented on his chosen career and the success his inventive strip generates. A graduate of Hampshire College with a degree in music, Jacques expressed weariness about the direction in which his life proceeded.

"A band that I was in had just broken up, and I was sick and tired of having to rely on others to do something creative. Web comics are the next step in the evolution of humor and more serious, story based comic strips," Ieph began drawing every day. "I started thinking, I like reading web comics, and I've drawn stuff all my life, so why don't I just give it a shot?"

Ieph attributes the biggest influence for his creative inspiration to Bill Watterson's print comic, Calvin and Hobbes.

"Watterson was the perfect newspaper comic artist, who could draw like no one else who does syndicated strips. Second, he was a wonderful writer, making the reader identify with everyone in the strip, and that says a lot. Here I am a 15-year-old kid identifying with Calvin's parents, that's genius!"

Jacques also credits the web comic by the name of "Scary Go-Round" who he says influenced him "not so much in what I had done, but rather, what I could do. I could use the daily lives of people and make it silly, and amusing."

Jacques bought a domain name and designated it www.QuestionableContent.net. He said the title is a mere warning that the content of the strip will not always be what he referred to as "PG." Jacques quit his job at the Valley Advocate to become a full-time web comic.

Initially posting two strips a week, than after a month, three strips, Ieph now publishes up to five strips a week.

Questionable Content stars a 20-something male named Marten, and his four friends, Pintsize, Faye, Dora and Steve. Marten is a depressed sort of character, usually feeling sorry for him for some reason or another.

Nonetheless, his character has a good sense of humor. Faye is sassy and enjoys toying with Marten, keeping her feelings unclear to him. Dora runs a coffee shop, and generally considers Dora and Marten friends, but her romantic feelings are also enigmatic. Steve is Marten's confidante, and his advice usually helps Marten get out of the glum. Pintsize is an "Anthro PC," that is, a talking robot whose childish actions usually provide comic relief.

People find it easy to identify with the strip, Jacques says. "They pick a character they really like, and want to make sure that character is okay in the end. They send me angry emails if something happens they don't like."

Jacques admits to no offense by the emails. "It gives me a chance to giggle," he says, "but on the other hand it makes me think about how much they [the readers] care. I want them to know that I care just as much as they do to make it good!"

Much discussion amongst web comic artists, critics and readers, centers on the issue of whether the daily strip is a viable medium for web comics, or is it too restrictive a format.

At a recent round table sponsored by the Webcomics Examiner, titled "The Future of Webcomics," the moderator, Joe Zabel, posed these and other topics. William G. believes the daily format is imperative if a web comic wants to gain a large following. The downside of this, he warns, however, is he sees this approach as "the fastest route to producing some un-interesting comics."

Neal Von Flue, who recently originated a web comic daily strip to test its viability, says one of the drawbacks is material must be created at least a month ahead at a time. The reward is the instant feedback. Von Flue believes it a "fantastic tool for people who have something specific to say about the world."

Yet another member of this round table group, Alexander Danner, said, "I think there's a lot to be said for working within a restrictive format as a means of breaking new ground. If your goal is to innovate, than the tighter the restrictions you put on yourself, the more you're forced to think creatively about how you're going to make your work stand out."

Ieph Jacques assents as he says, "I benefit from the tight deadline. It helps your brain move up to the next level, and something better will come."

Web comics, according to an introduction by Joe Zabel in T. Campbell's "History of Webcomics," is not a new form of comic, but rather an electronic medium of print comics. However, that is not to say they are not revolutionary.

"They are a revolution in several important ways — they can be published much more cheaply than print comics; they can be distributed much more broadly than print; they can be published much more quickly, allowing artists to comment on news events that occurred only hours ago," he says.

"And as an electronic medium, they open the door to an exciting array of formal innovations — motion, sound, infinite canvases, and the flexibility of hyper linking."

Making web comics good is not easily accomplished, although according to some web comic critics, web comics have definitely improved since their onset, dating back to the early nineties. According to Shannon Garrity, a participant of the roundtable on The Future of Webcomics,

> "The first five years were marked by raw, crude cartooning, the establishment of successful formats and genres (so many newspaper-style strips, so many tech-support jokes), and working without an economic or social net. The second five years brought art that is more sophisticated and storytelling, the increased testing and breaking of creative boundaries (Diary strips! Infinite canvas! Flash! Comics that aren't about computer nerds!), and the establishment of organized collectives, aesthetic theories, and moneymaking schemes."

Asked how a web comic earns a living, Ieph Jacques, while declining to name a specific amount, states he earns money from Questionable Content exclusively from merchandising t-shirts, sweatshirts, etc.

Not only does Jacques' Questionable Content deliver humor, but also provides a place for people of a similar mindset to come together. Jacques provides a column to supplement each new comic, where he comments on something new he has come across for readers to check into, or to clarify something in the comic. He also provides a forum for feedback on the site, as well as a "Recommended Listening" section for music he has recently discovered.

"I always wanted the comic to be a vehicle to get the word out on bands that I like," he said. "I get a lot of e-mail thanking me about a band I've introduced them too."

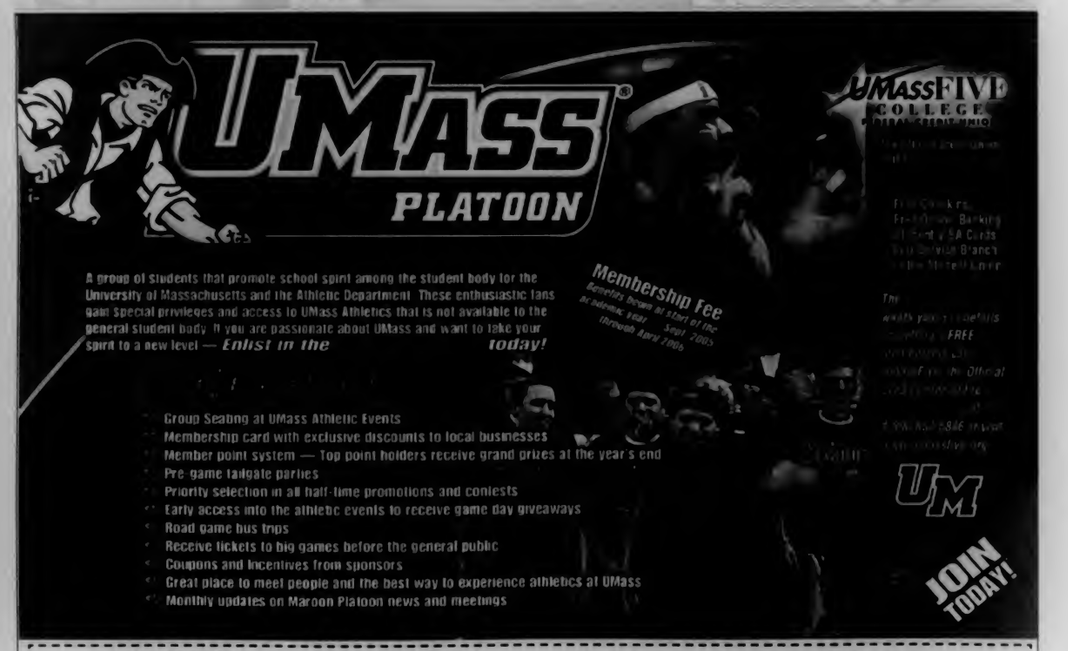
Asked why he believes his strip marshals such a following, Jaques comments "I don't really know, but I think I have found my niche with the indie-rock/hipster culture. I think it exudes this air of 'coolness' around the comic that some people find attractive."

Tim Edwards, a regular reader of the strip says this isn't all that it is interesting about the strip. "The art, for starters, is wonderful. I loved the style when I first saw it, and, also, I went through the archive and saw how the strip developed," Edwards said in an email interview. A native of Sydney, Australia, Edwards works for the Bureau of Meteorology and is currently residing at Davis Station, Antarctica. Edwards discovered Questionable Content one day while surfing the web.

"I don't really get print media here, so online anything is completely golden. Now I do not mean to say that QC single-handedly pulled me though an Antarctic winter, but to say that it did not play a roll would be a lie. It was a great way to wake up," Edwards said.

Jacques, like so many of his colleagues in web comics, repeatedly avows that creative control is the single biggest advantage to web comics. Web comics develop exclusively for websites. Web comic creators, like all artists, possess their own unique illusion, their own artistic goals and agendas for what they want to convey to their audience.

The introduction of the web assists web comics in a way no other medium does. Jacques acknowledges that not all web comics are good, in fact, the quality can still, unfortunately be inferior to its print counterparts. The advantage for these web comics is the lack of control or standards. For Jacques that is not the issue. His explanation, "I'm not interested in having influence on people as I am helping them find things they might not have heard about otherwise."



Ieph Jacques said that if asked to go to major syndication for distribution in newspapers, he would decline the offer.

"I don't feel too well answering to an editor or syndicate. I want to be in charge and you lose a measure of that if you go to a syndicate," he says.

Joe Zabel thinks the vital role of web comics is to be "missionaries for the comic art form." The nineties saw the rise of the comics shops only to than see them go bust. Fans despaired for the future of comics. Zabel attributes the comeback to the web.

"Comics are once again a vibrant part of our culture, no longer held captive by a handful of backward looking publishers," said Zabel. "Clearly that's what the future holds for web comics - to bring the art of comics to every corner of the Earth, and into every unenlightened eye."

Web comic creator Ieph Jacques is determined to make his imprint without the binds and restrictions placed upon print comic strip artists. Dedicated to their art both artists continually strive to make it better, to keep improving. Financial gain is of secondary importance, the reward is that they are pursuing their dream. For those who enjoy the web comic medium, an artist like Jacques is a source of enlightenment.

Join the Maroon Platoon Today!

NAME _____
LOCAL ADDRESS _____
_____
LOCAL PHONE _____
E-MAIL _____
CLASS ☐ Freshman ☐ Sophmore ☐ Junior ☐ Senior
T-SHIRT SIZE ☐ S ☐ M ☐ L ☐ XL ☐ XXL

Questions? Call 413-545-1401

MEMBERSHIP FEE: ☐ Free Membership (UMassFive)
Membership Fee of $20 payable by: ☐ Check
Credit Card ☐ Visa ☐ Mastercard ☐ Discover
Credit Card # _____ Exp. Date_____
Signature: _____
UCard (16 digit Run No.) _____

Please mail your form with payment to:
UMass Athletics--Maroon Platoon
248A Boyden Building • University of Massachusetts
131 Commonwealth Ave • Amherst, MA 01003

Concert at the Mullins

CONCERT from page 10

start a band on the stage, and selected three members of the audience to fill in on drums, bass and guitar. At the end of the song, he told his replacement that she could keep his guitar and explained that the new bassist was going to do a stage dive, and as he leaped from the stage they broke into another classic, "Basket Case."

Billie Joe disappeared for a minute, and came back on stage wearing a crown, a fitting hat for "King For a Day." In the middle of the song, the band burst into the Isley Brothers' "Shout," and fell to the stage during the quiet breakdown of the song, while Billie Joe put on a cape to match his crown for the end of the song.

They started the encore with "Maria," from their "International Superhits" album and from there went into "Boulevard of Broken Dreams." Their cover of Queen's "We Are the Champions" had the entire crowd singing, and they had the lyrics flashing on the screen behind them for anyone who didn't know them. Billie Joe started a "Yankees suck" chant, and confetti filled the air. After the song, Tre and Mike left the stage and a spotlight came down on Billie Joe, who ended their set with "Good Riddance (Time of Your Life.)"

All things considered, it was an amazing show. Both bands were tight and on top of their game, and the crowd's energy was high the whole time. Billie Joe said that of all the tours the band had been on, this was his favorite, and it's easy to see why.

My Chemical Romance gave a boost to the show in the opening spot. The band was just off the release of their sophomore record "Three Cheers for Sweet Revenge," and they recently enjoyed the pleasure of sharing their first major bill.

"We are playing to bigger crowds than we have ever seen before," said MCR's bassist Mikey Way in a phone interview with the Daily Collegian. Way and his brother Gerard (lead singer of MCR) formed MCR, with heavy influence from bands like Green day.

"Working with Green Day has been amazing," Way said. "Me and Gerard used to listen to them constantly when we were younger so it is just such a great experience to be playing shows with them."

My Chemical Romance is planning their first headlining tour this fall.

'SAU AUS USA'

Heimo Wallner
Hampden Gallery
Southwest

By MACKENZIE ISSLER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Austrian artist Heimo Wallner has catalyzed much dialogue amongst the University of Massachusetts community in regards to his provocative and shocking mural in the lobby of the Hampden Gallery located in Southwest.

The mural consists of figures that Wallner refers to as the "everyman." The figures do not have pupils, and are naked in order to represent the humanity as whole, rather than focusing on a particular individual or specific group.

The entire mural is drawn with one medium, a black magic marker. Each figure is a contour drawing, consisting simply of a series of lines. Through the numerous positions, actions and expressions of the figures, Heimo Wallner creates what he refers to as "a vocabulary of emotions."

The mural is done in a very linear fashion. According to a statement from the artist, he says, "the important aspect of my art is drawing imagery away, banning it into wallpaper."

"My work is better when I'm drawing faster than I can think," Wallner said, noting that the entire piece is improvised. He has been drawing in this manner for the last 15 years.

The composition of the mural is meant to reflect the artist's own internal feelings and processes, as well as to encompass some of the world's external circumstances. Wallner grew up influenced by American pop music and movies. However, he says there are still issues and cultural differences that the artist has problems coming to terms with. His art is a way he can express these internal and external conflicts.

Wallner was born in Salzburg, Austria in 1961. He attended the Vienna Academy of Art, where he studied sculpture. His work has been show in Mexico, Italy, Croatia, and throughout the United States. This is not Wallner's first experience in an academic setting either. He has also shown his work at Columbia University in New York City.

Wallner was brought to UMass by Line Brunise and Steve Buddington, two junior faculty members of the Art Department's Foundations program. Bruntse, a native of Denmark, has traveled around the world, participating in different art residencies. It was on one of her residences, that she met Heimo Wallner. Bruntse and Buddington later agreed that Wallner would be a great artist to expose to the UMass community.

Anne Laprade, the Hampden Gallery director, refers to the lobby where the art is displayed as the "incubator." She says the artwork that is housed in the lobby is there to break down the barrier between the formality of the gallery, and the informality of the lobby. The artwork creates dialogue and invites viewers to talk and interact with the art in front of them.

As many already know, this piece has caused some controversy due to its provocative manner. A complaint has been made, and representatives of the gallery have said they do not wish to offend anyone. Since then, a corridor has been installed, creating a hallway for students who want to get to the convenience store without fully viewing the mural.

Director Anne Laprade said that for students who plan on seeing Wallner's mural, and to those who are trying to avoid it, it is very important to know that Wallner "is not preaching, just presenting." The artist has backed up this statement by saying, "I don't consider myself a missionary."

Heimo Wallner emphasized if the viewer is "willing to go into a dialogue. It is always possible to explain to your point of departure." He understands the discussion will not necessarily end in agreement. Dialogue between the viewer and the artist will promote a more thorough understanding of the artist's inspirations and motives. Throughout the process of making the mural, Wallner carried on dialogue with passerbys who wanted to know more about it. Wallner said he willingly responded to the inquiries, as well as received input from the bystanders.

The figures depicted in the mural personify the sexuality and violence that the artist sees in this world. It is true that the images can be seen as disturbing, but no less disturbing than those seen on the daily news and the front pages of the newspaper.

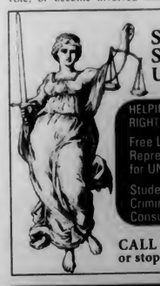
Art is about expression, as well as response. Heimo Wallner's mural has done just this. Through his use of just a black marker, the artist has transformed the empty walls of the lobby into a work of art.

The political side of punk

PUNK from page 10

and widespread as political prisoners, the evil of corporations, and of course, revolution. Combining hip-hop rhythm with the thrash of punk rock, lead singer Zach de la Rocha was able to grab the attention of two completely different crowds of listeners. Their albums were almost all best sellers on the Billboard charts. In fact, even after the band's breakup, their Web site has remained active — calling for the release of Mumia Abu-Jamal, a black man accused of murdering a police officer who was sentenced to be murdered. They also played a set outside of the Democratic National Convention in 2000, pushing for a political shift in ideals. The band placed great faith in its listeners to go forth and make change.

"One of the great things about young people is that they do question, that they do care deeply about justice, and that they have open minds," Rocha is quoted as saying on their Web site.



Green Day too have joined the political-punk movement bringing the ideas of the 70s movements to a younger generation of listeners. However, this didn't truly occur until their latest album, "American Idiot," considered to be the group's most political album yet. Lead singer Billie Joe Armstrong is quoted recently in Rolling Stone, "This song ("Holiday") is not anti-American, it's anti-war." In fact, the change in sound may be the reason why Green Day won the Grammy for Best Rock Album earlier this year.

The latest war in Iraq pushed the band, like so many others, to fight back and call out what they see as an unjust cause. Unlike so many of their past albums which featured ruminations of teenage life and angst, "American Idiot" is almost completely political.

"I'm not a part of some redneck agenda/Now everybody do the propaganda/And sing along to the age of paranoia," Armstrong sings while backed by heavy guitar and drums on their opening track.

Even their stage show features so many symbols similar to that of Che Guevara fits clenched and black figures against crimson curtains. While Green Day may not be as "hard" as Rage, they still promote political activism with tables set up for concertgoers to register to vote, or become involved with Amnesty International.

Punk rock has provided an outlet for those who otherwise might not care to become involved in shaping change, while banging heads, fist pumping, and generally having a good time. Punk has continued to reinvent itself over the years, and as long as there is someone there to dictate authority, punk rockers will be

STUDENT LEGAL SERVICES OFFICE UMASS, AMHERST

HELPING STUDENTS PROTECT THEIR RIGHTS FOR 30 YEARS

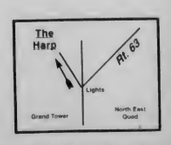
Free Legal Advice, Referrals, Representation and Counseling for UMASS Students

Student & Workers' Rights, Family & Criminal Law, Landlord/Tenant & Consumer Disputes

CALL 545-1995
or stop in at 922 Campus Center

TheMercantile
Mon-Fri 10-9 Sat 10-6 Sun 12-5
Northampton
Amherst

The Harp restaurant in North Amherst is a great place for families looking for delicious food in a casual friendly atmosphere. During the summer months enjoy dinner and drinks outdoors on the dining pavilion while the kids play in the play yard.



Dinner is available Tues-Sun 5-12 AM featuring...
- Fresh salads
- Sandwiches
- Burgers
- The freshest seafood available.

Lunch is available 7 days a week with a light menu on Monday night.

Try our Lobster dinner specials all summer long!

Includes:
- Lobster
- Steamed mussels
- Potato
- Coleslaw.

And while your here try our new pizza menu!

The Harp Sunderland Rd. & Cowls Rd. No. Amherst, MA 413.548.6900

Classic finishes and highlights of the year

SPORTS from page 15

come at a better time for the Minutewomen, as they are playing their best softball of the season. UMass has won 23 of its last 26 games, and is currently on a 10-game winning streak.

"The team is in a really good place right now," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "They get a little bit better everyday, and right around now you want to be playing well and we are. Championship week starts this week, so this is it."

Despite the cold and rainy weather, there was a good crowd gathered at the UMass Softball Complex to celebrate Senior Day yesterday, and LaFogg treated the fans to the first of two dazzling pitching performances.

"I went into today like this was basically my last game," LaFogg said. "I held nothing back, and I had nothing to lose. Those are the kind of days when I pitch my best."

"It's a storybook finish for her," Sortino said. "She's had so many near-misses, I was happy for her to get it."

LaFogg (20-9, 1.99 ERA) breezed through the overmatched Quinnipiac lineup, allowing only one base runner on an error in the fourth inning.

UMass scored single runs in the second and third innings, before blowing the game open with a six-run fourth inning.

The first run was scored by senior Denise Denis, who led off the second with a walk and came in to score on senior Pam Sulick's bloop single down the leftfield line.

Senior Hilary Puglia stroked a one-out double to the left-center gap in the third and scored on sophomore Amanda Morin's single up the middle.

UMass then sent 10 batters to the plate in the fourth, and was aided by wildness and shaky defense from Quinnipiac.

Freshman Lauren Proctor led off with a walk, one of four she collected on the day. Sulick then followed with a double to right-center. Proctor stopped at third, but was able to score when the cut-off throw got away from the second baseman.

Senior Jasmine Edwards then walked and sophomore Candice Molinari drove in a run with a single over the shortstop's head. A failed suicide squeeze attempt by senior Hilary Puglia resulted in the first out of the inning. With Puglia at first and Molinari at third, UMass pulled off the first of two successful double steals in the inning.

A groundout by Morin advanced Puglia to third and junior KJ Kelley followed with a walk. Denis drove in two runs with a double to left that was affected by the swirling winds. After freshman Stacy Cullington reached on an error, the final run of the inning was scored on the second double steal.

LaFogg then set the Bobcats down in order in the fifth to secure the mercy-rule win. LaFogg struck out seven on the day to bring her A-10 leading total to 207.

After the Senior Day ceremonies between the two games, Busa took the mound and picked up right where LaFogg left off. She allowed only three walks en route to recording her third career no-hitter.

UMass got on the board with a run in the first. Morin walked with one out and scored when Denis bunted and the throw by Quinnipiac's pitcher sailed over the first baseman's head and into right field. Denis was credited with a hit on the play, extending her hitting streak to 11 games.

In the second, UMass tacked on four more runs to take a 5-0 lead. Proctor led off with a walk, and junior Kristi Stefanoni was hit by pitch to put runners at first and second. Molinari then singled to right and Proctor scored from second. Stefanoni came around to score when the throw got past the catcher.

One batter later, Puglia drilled her 10th home run of the season over the wall in left-center.

UMass went scoreless for the next two innings before scoring three times in the fifth to lock up its second mercy-rule win of the day.

Proctor drew yet another walk with one out, and Busa followed with a single to center.

Sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman slams home the ball in UMass' 78-68 win over Florida State at the Mullins Center on Feb. 15.

COURTESY KAREN WINNER

UMass wide receiver Jason Peebler runs over a URI defender on Oct. 13 in Kingston, R.I. Peebler signed a National Football League contract with the Philadelphia Eagles on April 24, after the NFL Draft ended.

Stefanoni knocked in one run with a double down the leftfield line. Junior Amanda Acampora then came in to pinch-hit, and ended the game with a two-run double to right.

Busa (14-5, 2.11 ERA) finished the regular season at the top of her game, as she went 11-1 in her last 13 starts of the season.

"Jenna is really starting to feel what she needs to do out there," Sortino said. "There aren't too many things that are distracting her from what she needs to do. She's really matured a lot on the mound."

"I had the same feeling that I had on Friday, so that gave me a huge boost of confidence," Busa said. "I basically focused one pitch at a time and I wasn't focused on a no-hitter, so I think that was a key to the success."

On Friday, UMass beat up on URI, with Busa leading the way both at the plate and on the mound.

Busa, who has only been in the batting lineup for two weeks, went 3 for 3 with two home runs and six RBIs in UMass' 9-0 win in the second game. Busa also recorded her first no-hitter of the weekend, allowing five walks in the five inning game.

"When I was warming up I felt really good," Busa said. "Although I had five walks, it was a mixture of bad calls by the umpire and me getting a little frustrated. That didn't hold me back. The madder I got, the harder I was throwing."

In the first game of the day, LaFogg allowed two runs on four hits, while striking out 11.

The offense provided plenty of run support, led by the heart of the order. The 3-4-5 hitters (Kelley, Denis and Cullington) combined to go 9 for 12 with seven RBIs and five runs scored.

Kelley homered in each game, raising her team-leading total to 12, one shy of the single-season school record she set last year.

—Dan Duggan

UMass Softball Team Wins in a Number of Ways
May 5, 2005

Winning teams are built around an explosive offense. Or is it the defense that wins championships? Maybe it's a coaching genius that is essential to any program. In trying to slap a cliche onto the face of the Massachusetts softball team, I have come up with several solutions, but no clear-cut choice.

The Minutewomen beat Cal State Northridge 2-1, so that proves they are a defensive group. But then again they crushed La Salle 15-1, which shows that offense is apparent.

If there is one aspect of the game that is the most simple to measure, it is certainly defense. If a team has a talented pitching game, it will show during virtually every contest. The Maroon and White certainly display this theory to its fullest.

Although the team's hitting has struggled at moments throughout the season, and fielding errors have become a deterrent as of late, the UMass aces have remained consistent.

Senior Barb LaFogg and junior Jenna Busa (maybe she doesn't count, because she hit a homerun Tuesday, but for clarity's sake, lets only call her a pitcher) have accounted for the team's pitching staff in 2005, and the two are both putting up some striking (no pun intended) numbers.

I honestly wouldn't be surprised if most of LaFogg's opponents are all at home crying right now. In 28 appearances, she has struck out an A-10-high 189 batters and boasts a 2.04 ERA on the season. Not only has she struck out more batters in the A-10 than anyone else, but the four pitchers behind her on the list have pitched in significantly more innings than her.

LaFogg's numbers, matched with Busa's 112 strikeouts and 2.27 ERA, make for a good one-two punch, as Busa is averaging 4.3 allowed hits per game.

It would be easy to say that both the offense and the defense have equally earned UMass coach Elaine Sortino 30 wins this season, especially since the Minutewomen have outscored their last 17 opponents by a whopping 116-41 runs. But UMass' all-time winningest, Hall-of-Fame and legendary coach even understands that when it comes down to it, defense is what really matters.

"Hitting comes and goes," Sortino said. "But defense wins championships."

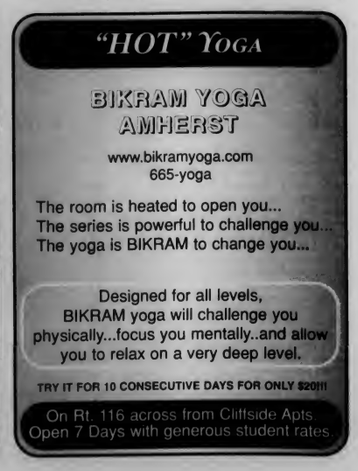
One example that solidifies this notion is a lopsided weekend that took place in April. The Minutewomen swept St. Bonaventure on Friday, April 22, winning Game 1 by a margin of 9-1 and then proceeded to win the second game 7-1.

After putting up 16 runs against the Bonnies, UMass managed only four runs two days later, in two home losses against North Carolina State. Hitting came, and then it went.

A second example of how the hitting game can be an enigma one day and palpable the next is UMass senior infielder/designated player Pam Sulick. Prior to Tuesday's comeback win against Boston College, Sulick registered 29 hits, one home run and 15 RBIs in 41 games.

After not playing for the majority of the contest, Sulick came off of the bench in the final inning and recorded the game winning RBI against the Terriers. It didn't end there, however, as Sulick cranked two homers and 4 RBIs in yesterday's 9-1 destruction of Boston College.

So there it is, I've made up my mind, it is actually defense that will be a softball team's best friend in the end. And it is defense that is the contributing factor for the Minutewomen. But there is no overlooking junior KJ Kelley's 10 homeruns and .396 batting average or senior Hilary Puglia's 34 RBI, or freshman Lauren Proctor's 43 hits.



Forget it. I give up.

—Eric Athas

Upsets and wild finishes of the past year

SPORTS from page 17

both without the services of their starting keepers. UMass keeper Bill Schell was out with an injured hand and was on the sidelines with a cast on his right hand. The Scarlet Knights had suspended their All-American goalie Greg Havalchak for violating a team rule.

The Minutemen started sophomore Efosa Guobodia while Rutgers had Lyle Farrar in the cage.

Both goalies stepped up to the occasion with Guobodia tallying 14 saves and the victory, while Farrar had 13, including several point blank shots from the UMass attack.

"He did a heck of a job and he's a great leader," Cannella said of Guobodia.

"I was a little bit nervous at first, but the first save wipes that out, you know? You get your first shot, your first save, then you can play," Guobodia said.

The Minutemen were in command for most of the game, but the slow down offense the Scarlet Knights played made each offensive possession particularly valuable for UMass. Rutgers only won one quarter when they shut out the Maroon and White 1-0 in the third frame.

UMass put up eight goals in the first half, while Rutgers put up four. The Minutemen would not get on the board again until Morris broke the ice with 11:13 left in the game to put the score at 9-6.

"They just played ball control," Morris said. "We were sitting there, me, Jeff (Zywicki) and Geno (Gene Tundo) and we're like 'are we ever going to get the ball?' It was so slow. Our defense played great, it was a testament to them, but at the same time, they were slow."

The Scarlet Knights had some extra incentive to be fired up as Saturday's game against the Minutemen was Senior Day at Rutgers. The Scarlet Knights have nine seniors.

Rutgers senior Robert Morris came out on fire and netted two goals in the first nine minutes of the game to give the Scarlet Knights a 2-0 lead. UMass went on to rattle off three consecutive goals, one from Morris and one from Zywicki.

"It was a hardcore game and Rutgers put up a good effort, we knew they were going to. It was senior day, it was their last game and they wanted to go out on a high note," Reid said. "Last year we came out on our senior day and went out on a high note against them when they were the ranked team."

Right after the game Cannella yelled at his team for arguing with the Rutgers sidelines. After he talked about being "first class" he congratulated his team on the victory.

"We lost our cool there for a second and he was getting fired up at us," Reid said. "He always finishes on a high note and he's really proud of what we've done this season."

—Bob McGovern

Rage In The Cage
UMass 52, Syracuse 51
December 4, 2004

Last Friday in practice, Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko was working with sophomore forward Tamara Tatham on the mental aspect of foul shooting.

"I was with her just talking about visualization, all that mind stuff, trying to get her to focus on the ball and seeing it go through the basket," Dacko said.

So it comes as no surprise that with 11.7 seconds left and a tie score in Saturday's "Rage in the Cage" contest with the Syracuse Orange (5-1), it was Tatham at the charity stripe, visualizing the two most important shots in her young career.

"I was just focusing, zoning everything out, visualizing making the basket," Tatham said.

And with the crowd of 1,402 on its feet and screaming in the historic Curry Hicks Cage, the 6-foot-1 native of Canada came, saw, and conquered, nailing both her free throws to give the Minutewomen (3-3) a 52-51 win over the Orange.

"It was an ugly game," Dacko said. "We're usually a rebounding team, and we got beat on the boards today. It was an ugly game, but we'll take the win."

But things would have certainly been much uglier for UMass had forward Chineze Nwagbo made both of her free throws with 0.4 seconds left to go, which would have forced an overtime.

Once again, luck went the way of Maroon and White as a perennial star player fell short when it came down to the wire. Nwagbo led all scorers on the afternoon with 19 points and added 14 rebounds to give her a double-double. And so while the 6-foot-1 senior continued to wreak havoc on the Minutewomen's inside game all day long, she was unable to make her last shot count.

"Overall, I was pretty pleased with the way we're trying to play, and it's just [a matter of] finishing," Syracuse coach Keith Cieplicki said. "I'll tell you, Chinny's never played better. She plays hard. She's so consistent. I mean, it's too bad she's got to miss that free throw because she carried us for 39 minutes and 59 seconds... I think everybody understands everybody else has to play better."

Senior guard Rochelle Coleman also scored in double figures for the Orange, throwing down 11 points despite a three-for-11 day on the floor. She also grabbed two boards and dished out three assists in 31 minutes of play.

The Campbell-Nwagbo match-up was an interesting showdown as the two continued to exchange baskets and boards down inside the key. When all was said and done, the two came away with double-doubles (Campbell scored a team-high 16 points and grabbing 10 boards).

UMass concluded its Big East tour for the 2004-05 season, finishing with a record of 2-1 against teams from that conference. The Maroon and White are also in the midst of their first two-game winning streak since November of 2003 when they pulled off three wins in a row against Brown, Vermont and Utah State, respectively.

The first half saw a neck-and-neck battle between the Minutewomen and Orange through the first 15 minutes. The excellent ball movement of UMass and the inside and outside shooting game of Syracuse continued to counteract one another until late in the first half. With 4:43 to go in the half and trailing 20-19, Edris Bailey tapped in a layup, sparking an 8-0 run to finish off the first half.

In what has almost become customary, the Maroon and White saw its seven-point halftime lead vanish, care of the hot outside hands of Coleman and Lauren Kohn. Every time the Minutewomen took back the lead, the Orange went deep from outside.

Trailing by three with under five minutes to go, Katie Nelson took a page from Kohn's book and nailed a deep trey to tie things up. Pam Rosanio then stole the ball on SU's next trip down, dished the ball off to Joyce Massey, who passed it right back to her for the go-ahead layup, and the Minutewomen would cease to relinquish their lead again.

Gulak grabbed the rebound off Nwagbo's errant second shot to prevent overtime, and the Minutewomen closed the door on a game that literally went down to the last stitch of allotted time.

If winning on a sloppy day is any indicator of the potential this team has, then there certainly has to be some momentum carrying into tonight, when they will play their last home game of the fall semester before embarking on a four-game road trip.

Tonight's game against the Toledo Rockets (1-4), scheduled for a 7:00 p.m. tipoff at the Mullins Center, ought to be an interesting one. Both the Rockets and the Minutewomen are shooting 38 percent from the field, 25 percent from beyond the arc and around 50 points per game (Toledo averages 49 while UMass averages 52).

Now here's where the paint comes into play. UMass has nearly a double-figure advantage in rebounds, as Toledo averages a mere 33 per game while the Minutewomen board

UMass attackmen Sean Morris (25) and Jeff Zywicki (9) celebrate after Zywicki scored the overtime goal to beat rival Syracuse 14-13 on April 30 at Garber Field. UMass ended SU's season 15 days later in the playoffs.

41.3. Syracuse has been the only team thus far in the young season to outplay the Maroon and White on the boards.

This will be the second of six straight road games the Rockets will play. Last Thursday, the Rockets traveled to Youngstown State, where the Penguins came away with a 53-42 win. It was the fourth straight loss for Toledo since taking down Cincinnati on opening night, Nov. 19. Since ousting the Bearcats 62-57, the Rockets have been outscored 253-187-including a season-low 28-point effort in a 39-point loss to Marquette.

The Minutewomen would love to embark on their first three-game winning streak since November of a year ago, putting them one game over .500, but it will not come easy. After Saturday's wild barnburner with the previously undefeated Orange, the Minutewomen - despite playing poorly - have found out that anything can happe.

UMass is 0-1 so far a 04-05 when playing in the Mullins Center.

—Brendan Hall

UMass Softball Tosses Three No-Hitters in Four Games
May 6-8

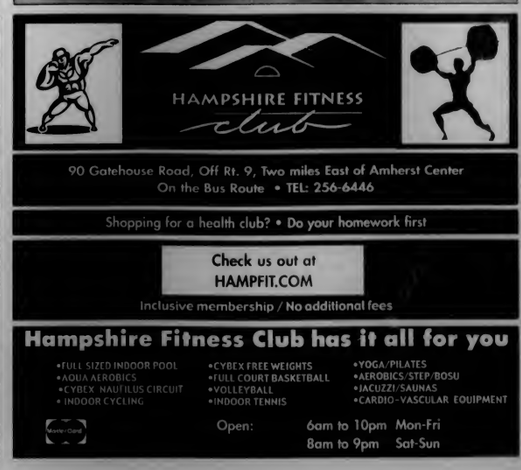
No-hitters are supposed to be rare occurrences in softball, as evidenced by the fact that the Massachusetts softball team hadn't recorded a single no-hitter in its first 45 games, despite having two dominant pitchers.

But in this weekend's four games the UMass pitchers incredibly threw three.

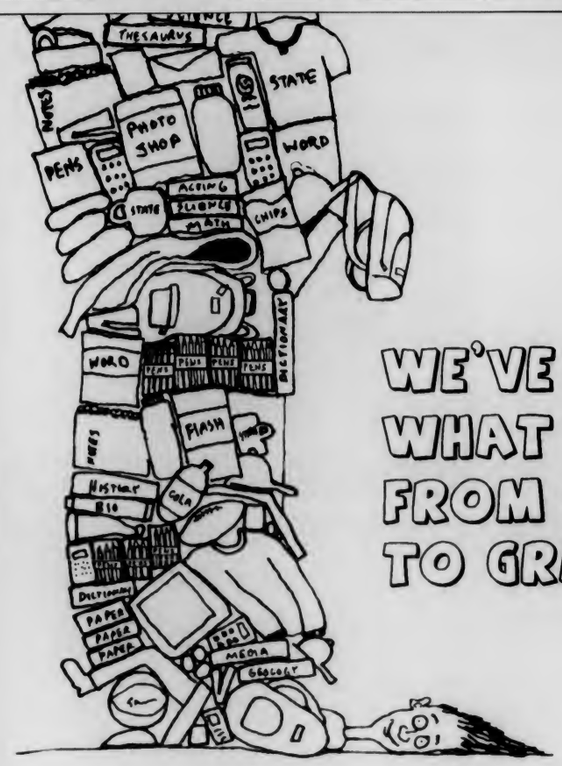
Senior Barb LaFogg, who came within one out of a perfect game earlier this year against Dartmouth, tossed a no-hitter yesterday against Quinnipiac in her final home start. Along with coming on Senior Day, the no-hitter also served as a nice birthday present for LaFogg, who turned 23 yesterday.

Not to be outdone, junio Jenna Busa, a, to follow a hit in either of her starts this week end, no-hitting Quinnipiac 11-0 27-11 in the second game yesterday, as well as Rhode Island (8-35, 3-11) on Friday. Busa helped her own cause against URI with two home runs and six RBI.

UMass (34-14-1, 13-3 Atlantic 10) coasted to four mercy-rule victories behind the strong pitching performance of her in its first 45 games, despite beating URI 12-1 and 9-0, and finishing the regular season with a pair of 8-0 wins against Quinnipiac.



With the regular season over, the Minutewomen now direct their focus to the A-10 tournament which begins on Thursday at Fordham. UMass is the No. 2 seed and will face Saint Joseph's (21-19, 8-6 A-10) in the first round on Thursday at 2 p.m.



The postseason couldn't

See SPORTS on page 14

WE'VE GOT WHAT YOU NEED! FROM ORIENTATION TO GRADUATION-

We're more than just textbooks.

- A Large Selection of Used Books that Save You up to 25%
- Pens, Pencils, & Highlighters
- Binders, Spiral Notebooks, Filler Paper, & Folders
- Diskettes & Mousepads
- Dictionaries & Writing Guides
- Study Guides
- Calculators & Batteries
- Course Related Supplies
- Backpacks
- Key Tags & Lanyards
- Imprinted T-shirts & Sweatshirts
- Caps & Shorts
- Mugs, Decals, & more!
- Desktop and laptop computers

UMass AMHERST University of Massachusetts UNIVERSITY STORE

Campus Center • Phone: (413) 545-2619

www.umass.bkstr.com

*over the cost of new.

efollett.com ONLINE. ON CAMPUS.

Looking back at the year of UMass sports winner Jamaal Branch for the second time in as many meetings.

SPORTS from page 19

After being held to just 59 yards in the previous meeting between the two teams, Branch again struggled against the Minutemen in picking up just 62 yards on 23 carries.

With their running game being rendered ineffective, the Raiders were thus forced to go to the air. Senior quarterback Chris Brown completed 27-of-48 passes for 272 yards and a touchdown, but was intercepted three times.

On the other side, UMass junior quarterback Tim Day was 13-of-22 for 258 yards and a pair of touchdowns, and was intercepted twice.

Leading 17-10 at the start of the second half, UMass took control of the game for good on its second possession when Day hit Peebler with a 50-yard touchdown pass that made the score 23-10 following a botched extra point.

The Red Raiders answered back with a field goal to cut the lead to 23-13 at the 2:20 mark of the third quarter, but Peebler added to the Minutemen's advantage when he took a third down screen pass from Day and scampered 58 yards for his second touchdown to push the advantage to 30-13 with 14:45 to play in the game.

Colgate then returned the favor, but became its own enemy in the process, using 8:30 to march 80 yards before Branch plunged in from a yard out to narrow the margin to 30-20 with 6:15 remaining.

The Maroon and White got out of the gates running in the first quarter. Baylark capped a seven-play, 57-yard drive when he found the end zone from 32 yards out to give UMass a 7-0 lead just over 11 minutes in.

The Apopka, Fla. native then followed that up with a 13-yard touchdown scamper just before the start of the second quarter to make the score 14-0.

The Raiders did not go away, however, as Dick Biddle's squad came up with 10 consecutive points to tighten things up. A Lane Schwarzburg 21-yard field goal with just over two minutes to play in the half made the score 14-3, and after UMass sophomore wide receiver Brandon London lost a fumble on the ensuing kickoff, the Raiders narrowed the gap even further.

Taking over at the Minutemen's 42-yard line, Brown needed only four plays to find senior wideout Luke Graham with a 31-yard touchdown pass.

—Mike Marzelli

COURTESY KAREN RINGER

UMass men's lacrosse senior captain Chris Doyle celebrates scoring a goal against Syracuse in the first round of the NCAA Tournament on May 15. UM won 16-15.

MINUTEMEN WIN ECAC CHAMPIONSHIP
UMASS 13, RUTGERS 7
MAY 7, 2005

PISCATAWAY, N.J. - Since March 26th, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team has done everything right.

After losing to Loyola 6-5 on that Saturday afternoon, the Minutemen (12-2 5-1 ECAC) went undefeated in the ECAC, won their 20th New England Championship, and then defeated long time rival Syracuse 14-13 in overtime on April 30.

Then, on Saturday, everything came together one more time as UMass won its third ECAC championship with a 13-7 victory over Rutgers (14-9 1-5 ECAC).

With the victory, the Maroon and White have set itself up for a NCAA playoff game against Syracuse at Garber Field on Sunday.

"There's a lot that went into this. We're not done by any means, but this is a big part of our season," UMass attackman Sean Morris said. "We're happy we got this, we're definitely happy. The season is over, now it's the postseason and its do or die."

UMass men's basketball coach Travis Ford throws out the first pitch at Fenway Park on May 9 before the Boston Red Sox played host to the Oakland Athletics.

Morris had five goals on the game, including two in the fourth quarter. His five goals tie a career-high for Morris, who scored five against Hobart College on April 16, in UMass' 14-12 victory.

The Minutemen were led by Jeff Zywicki and Morris in the fourth quarter, who combined for four of UMass' five goals in the period; Zywicki had four goals in the game. Brett Garber also added a goal in the period with just over six minutes left to play in regulation.

Zywicki's four-goal performance gives him 94 career goals for the Minutemen, ranking him 11th all time.

UMass has played Rutgers in the final game of each of the last four seasons. The Minutemen won all but one game during those meetings, with the Scarlet Knights winning 9-8 in 2003. The loss cost UMass the ECAC championship that season.

Jack Reid, who was a freshman on that team, remembers the game and was relieved that the Minutemen came home with the title.

"It feels great, we've been close. We were in the running last year, we had a chance my freshman year but we lost to Rutgers," Reid said. "We've been close, so it's a nice day to finally get it."

UMass coach Greg Cannella, who has led the Maroon and White to each of their three ECAC championships, has been harping on the importance of each game this season. Even after winning the championship, Cannella was quick to talk about the top-to-bottom power of the conference, rather than rest on his team's laurels.

"It's great to be champions of the ECAC because the conference is so competitive. Each and every week you go out there you're playing a quality opponent," Cannella said. "You look at it over the course of the season and it's a great accomplishment."

Rutgers and the Minutemen were

See SPORTS on page 15

HEY FRESHMEN!

WHEN IT COMES TO ON CAMPUS BANKING, THE DECISION IS EASY.

UMassFive, the Official Credit Union of UMass Amherst Students, is the obvious choice for your banking needs. Not only are we the only financial institution with a branch on campus, but as a non-profit financial cooperative, we are able to offer services with lower and fewer fees than a typical bank.

BANKING:
At UMassFive You'll Enjoy
FREE Checking Account with Debit Card
FREE EZbank Online Banking
FREE eStatements
PLUS A Branch conveniently located in the Student Union

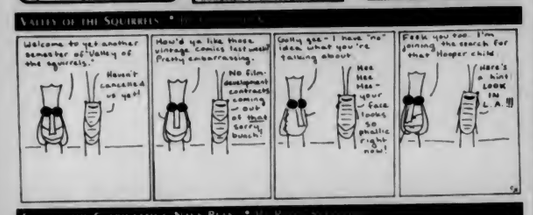
STUDENT FRIENDLY CREDIT CARD:
As a Credit Union member you can take advantage of our Student VISA Card, designed to help students build good credit with a low risk alternative to the default rates and high penalty fees of big credit card companies.
Our Student VISA features:
- Low 12.9% Interest Rate
- No Annual Fee
- $500 Credit Limit
- No Default Rates or High Penalty Fees

1.800.852.5886

OFFICIAL CREDIT UNION OF UMASS STUDENTS — UMASSFIVE

WANT TO SWEETEN THE DEAL?
When you sign up for the UMassFive Student Banking Package, you'll get a free membership to the UMass spirit group - the Maroon Platoon.

Come visit us in the Student Union (across from the ballroom) and get signed up today!



WWW.UMASSFIVE.ORG

UMASSFIVE COLLEGE FEDERAL CREDIT UNION
800.852.5886
www.umassfive.org

Come visit us in the Student Union (across from the ballroom) and get signed up today!

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"If you don't know where you are going, any road will take you there."

—Lewis Caroll

ACROSS
1 Backtalk
5 Racer's shape
9 Raised, as the ante
14 Conspire
15 Soft drink
16 Old Scandinavians
17 Musical medley
18 Branch of math
19 Loses footing
20 Measure of electrical power
22 Tailor's line
23 Force into bondage
24 Skater's milieu
27 Dictionary
29 Khaki shade
30 Miniature
34 Actor Chaney
35 Conceal
36 Ice-cream holder
37 Buff
39 Wicked
40 Presley's middle name
41 Oolong or Darjeeling
42 Bring to bear
43 Irish Sea isle
44 Foundation for a highway
47 Layered board
49 Mimic
54 Disposition
55 Receding seas
56 Rant and rage
58 Markdown event
59 Landlord's due
60 Entertain
61 Exposer
62 Otherwise
63 Skinflint
64 Scottish loch
65 Low grades

DOWN
1 Delivered an address
2 Worn out
3 Makes dirty
4 Bartly's perch
5 Musical span
6 Whirlwind or whirlpool
7 Landed
8 Fall behind
9 Hidden
10 Bear breed
11 Uncivilized
12 Kreisler's forte
13 ___ Plaines, IL
21 Mural site
22 Doughy pastry
24 PC symbol
25 Lowest point
26 Prepared to pray
28 Epic war story
30 Rascal
31 High-minded
32 Unknown author
33 Author Deighton
35 Spell
37 Tolerated
38 Main part of a bust
42 Correct a manuscript
44 Lodger
45 Gideons' gifts
46 Dying coals
48 More unfavorable
50 Weary
51 Dancer Fred's sister
52 Not at all relaxed
53 Senator Kefauver
55 Facilitate
56 Shepard or Houston
57 PA nuclear accident site
58 Baltimore paper

Find today's answers online

www.dailycollegian.com

We are looking for talented, aspiring cartoonists to create funny, witty cartoons for this page. E-mail us at:
COLLEGIANCOMICS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Want to increase the size of your Piggy bank?
Advertise with The Daily Collegian
and watch your profits grow!
Contact our advertising dept. 545-3500

H·O·R·O·S·C·O·P·E·S

aquarius • JAN. 20-FEB. 18
You're lucky you have such a sturdy cell phone that can withstand such abuse.

pisces • FEB. 19-MAR. 20
Be respectful when deciding how to handle another person's laundry.

aries • MAR. 21-APR. 19
Perhaps a little meditation will help clear your mind.

taurus • APR. 20-MAY 20
There is nothing special in store for you today; better luck tomorrow.

gemini • MAY 21-JUN. 21
Creative things are going to come flying out of your head all day long.

cancer • JUN. 22-JUL. 22
Try not to wander around in circles all day long.

leo • JUL. 23-AUG. 22
Time to sit down and watch a movie the whole way through. Do not fail.

virgo • AUG. 23-SEPT. 22
Lots of people will be stopping by your room now that it's nice and cozy.

libra • SEPT. 23-OCT. 22
Don't let your friend be stolen away by that person of the opposite sex.

scorpio • OCT. 23-NOV. 21
Today a childhood memory will come back to haunt you.

sagittarius • NOV. 22-DEC. 21
If you're lucky, you might see a shooting star tonight.

capricorn • DEC. 22-JAN. 19
Keep that smile on your face all day long, because you have a lot to be happy about.

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN MARKETPLACE

ANNOUNCEMENTS | ANNOUNCEMENTS | ANNOUNCEMENTS | COMPUTERS | EMPLOYMENT | SERVICES | TRAVEL | TRAVEL

Place your classified HERE!

Glancing through the year that was at UM

SPORTS from page 20

MARCH 15, 2005

Just a little more than two weeks ago, depending on who was asked, this game was nothing more than an over-hyped, one-sided, old-school rivalry.

But now, as the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team (13-2) has handed the Syracuse Orange (7-6) two straight losses, effectively ended their season, put a close on their historic NCAA Tournament run and eliminated the defending national champions, this game can officially be dubbed as an official, new-school college lacrosse rivalry.

The Minutemen stayed off yet another furious second-half charge by the Orange and used a pair of Bill Schell saves and Sean Morris' third goal of the game to eliminate Syracuse 16-15 in the first round of the NCAA Tournament, keeping them out of the national semifinals for the first time in 22 years.

"It's disappointing, but to go there 22 years in a row and be apart of it all of those 22 years is certainly special," said Syracuse coach John Desko, who has been with the team as a player, assistant coach and head coach since 1976.

"We'll probably come out of a game like this with even more of an appreciation of the past and the tradition and the wins. It'll be a little weird this Memorial Day Weekend not having the uniform on and walking onto the field... I plan on going to the championships and enjoying some of those games."

With the win, the Minutemen advance to the national quarterfinals against Johns Hopkins at Homewood Field in Baltimore on Saturday at noon.

"[Everyone] counted us out," Morris said. "It's our edge, and every time you give a team an edge, we take it. We take it personal. We took it real personal. We get to play them on our home field, and our confidence on Garber Field is extremely high.

"Everyone said, 'Hopkins and Syracuse is going to be a great matchup.' If you saw 37 faces when they said that, you would have known the outcome right then. We took it personal, and we knew it was going to come down to the end, and we were able to prevail.

"It's just kind of an edge that we were able to get when everyone counted us out. We look forward to Johns Hopkins, and probably the same thing will happen. People will probably knock us, and that's fine by us. That's fine."

UMass' very own Orange crusher, senior attackman Jeff Zywicki, scored six goals on Saturday and also chipped in with an assist. Zywicki scored the game-winning overtime goals in each of the previous two meetings between the teams on Garber Field, on April 30, and two years prior in 2003.

"I just wanted to win so badly," Zywicki said. "It's the playoffs, and if we lose, I'm done. My college career is over. I take a couple finals, and I go home. I told Morris before the game that I didn't come back for an extra year to lose in the first round, and there was no way we were going to lose in the first round today."

Fittingly enough, the Minutemen played keep-away from Syracuse for the last minute of the game, and it was Zywicki who held the ball last before launching it high into the air to signify a UMass win.

"It looked like Syracuse gave up with about 15 seconds left, and we were able to just throw the ball around," Zywicki said. "I ended up with it, and I was just watching the clock tick down, waiting for it, and waiting for it, and waiting for it. I just threw the ball as high as I could, and we just started celebrating."

Syracuse was able to slowly chip away at what was a four-goal UMass lead early in the second half, and after Zywicki's fifth goal of the afternoon to open the fourth quarter, the Orange were staring at a 14-11 deficit with just under 14 minutes to play.

After Cuse rallied to cut the lead down to 15-14 at the 4:06 mark of the fourth quarter, UMass coach Greg Cannella removed Elosa Guobodia from the net and sent in four-year starter Bill Schell to a standing ovation. Schell did not make the start against Syracuse because he was still suffering from a broken right hand that he suffered before the Rutgers game on May 7.

"[Not starting Schell] was one of the toughest decisions I've made in 11 years," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Billy has been a four-year starter for us, so to not play him in this game, I know it kind of hurt him, and it hurt me, too. I kind of went with my instincts.

"We went with [Guobodia]. I felt a little more confident in [Guobodia], not that I don't have confidence in Billy. That's why we put him in at the end. We knew that Billy would be ready. [Guobodia] was struggling a little bit, and Billy went in there and made a couple big saves. I'm proud of both of those guys for being unselfish and putting the team first."

It didn't take long for Schell to make his presence felt, as he stopped a Brian Crockett rocket with 3:39 left on the clock.

However, SU capped off a 4-1 run to tie the score at 15 at the 3:06 mark of the final quarter with the help of Brett Bucktooth's fourth goal of the game.

The Orange had a great chance to capitalize just seconds later after Danny Brennan won the ensuing faceoff and Minuteman Pat Larmon was called for a 30-second penalty for pushing.

Greg Rommel, who had three goals already on the day and is Syracuse's third leading goal scorer, found enough space to get a shot off with 2:45 to play, but Schell was ready to make the save and gained possession for the Minutemen to set up a play for the game-winner.

Morris held the ball to the left side of Orange goalie Jay Pfeifer and was working off defender John Wright.

After trying to dodge past Wright to little avail, he muscled his way through his defender and unleashed a low shot while falling down away from the cage that made its way past Pfeifer.

"It was a situation where we called a certain play, and I was on the wing," Morris said. "Me and Wright were going at it all day. I was able to get a step inside, and I was able to come underneath him. I think the slide came and just tried to put a stick check on me, and I was able to get my shot off. Fortunately for us it went in."

"It seems like every time we play them here at Garber Field, it's one of those games," Cannella said. "I thought both teams were outstanding today, tremendous athletes on the field, and it just seems that we made one more play than them."

NOTES: This marked the first season since 1982 when no Syracuse player wore No. 22, the number made legendary by the Powell brothers, Casey, Ryan and Mike. Coincidentally, this was the first time since 1982 that Syracuse did not advance to the national semifinal, which ended the team's 22-year run...

UMass sophomore midfielder Brett Bucktooth scored four goals on Saturday, marking his sixth career multi-goal game. Of those six performances, three came against Syracuse, as he also scored two goals on April 30 and tallied three goals plus an assist on May 1, 2004...

Syracuse junior midfielder Brett Bucktooth scored four goals against UMass on Saturday, the second time he notched four scores at the expense of the Minutemen in 15 days.

—Jeff Howe

COURTESY SID WORCESTER

UMass junior catcher KJ Kelley broke the school's all-time softball home run record when she hit the 27th of her career on April 12 in a 7-6 comeback win over the Connecticut Huskies in Storrs, Conn.

COURTESY SID WORCESTER

UMass freshman pitcher Jason Lavorgna delivers to the plate during the consolation game of this year's Beanpot against Boston College at Fenway Park. Lavorgna gave up two hits in his relief appearance.

TRAVIS FORD HIRING
MARCH 25, 2005

On March 5, the Massachusetts men's basketball team played its final regular season game and its last game at the William D. Mullins Center until next season. As I walked around the court, towards the Green Room, where the press conference is held, I stopped and looked at the sea of maroon one last time.

It was one last glance at the vast silence which encompasses this arena. One last time to see empty maroon seats and hear the solemn banter of apathetic fans looking for more than a two point nail-biting victory over a lesser opponent.

A mere 20 days later the university decided that not only would this be a last time for me, a graduating senior, to see this depressing scene, but it would be the last time the Minutemen ended a season with less energy than it started with.

Enter Travis Ford.

On Friday afternoon, the University of Massachusetts introduced Ford as its new head basketball coach. Cheerleaders lined the walkway to the podium and in the middle of dozens of side-conversations throughout the stands, the familiar UMass fight song broke through, turning the heads of those in attendance to the man who will be changing the face for their program.

Forty seconds they stood. Shouts and cheers from a spirited audience filled with students and alumni rang through as Ford stood at the podium. He looked around with a straight face and tried to cut in, but the crowd wasn't having it. They stood and Ford let them cheer, this was exactly what he was looking for.

When the crowd finally sat, bringing into view a large sign in the back row which said, "Welcome to UMass Travis Ford." Ford began talking about what he wants for this program. He mentioned that it was, in essence, a time for change.

The entire time he spoke, the Curry Hicks Cage sat in silence, occasionally cheering when he would hit a nerve. He mentioned how UMass was going to be, "the hottest ticket in town," a phrase which resonated with the alumni and represented something that most of the students had never truly seen... a sense of school pride.

Most of the team lined the first row of the Cage, just behind the two sections of chairs set aside for the press. None of the players had been introduced to their new coach, or his subsequent staff, and sat in the same position as everyone else, listening and analyzing this southern man that appeared to be saying all the right things.

He told the crowd that they needed to come to games and that they had to be, "a part of the team." He spoke of how his doors were always open and how this was the community's team. For the first time in years the men's basketball team at UMass took on the image of a maroon and white team lost in the Berkshires.

After telling the crowd what they needed to do, Ford directed attention to the men in black warm-ups sitting in those front row seats. Each hunched over figure had his eyes transfixed on the coach as he mentioned what their responsibility was. He told them that they were about to learn what it meant to truly work hard.

Each player had a straight, objective face after the initial comments, but Ford switched gears and had a few of his future pupils smiling. He said it was going to be fun, that as hard as they worked, they were going to have more fun than any other team they came across.

This comment appeared to hit everyone there than afternoon. Amidst the very heart of March Madness, the University of Massachusetts was absent, yet very much alive. Players and fans alike have been missing this fun the past few years and Coach Ford was adamant and confident that it was coming back sooner than later.

A new era of UMass basketball has arrived in the form of a hardworking southern man from Madisonville, Ky.

Perhaps it is truly time for this community to have some fun.

—Bob McGovern

No. 14 UMASS 30, No. 4 COLGATE 20
SEPTEMBER 10, 2004

You know what they say about payback.

Just shy of 10 months after the Massachusetts football team saw its 2003 season come to a bitter end on the snow-covered turf of Andy Kerr Stadium, the Minutemen finally had there crack at the Colgate Red Raiders on a clear and even playing field, and the results were distinctly different than the 19-7 loss that bounced UMass from the Division I-AA playoffs.

With a raucous crowd of 16,405 - the largest to watch a football game on the UMass campus in 30 years - nearly filling Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium for the university's second-ever night game, the 14th-ranked Minutemen seized the game's first two touchdowns and never looked back, shutting down No. 4 Colgate 30-20 to improve to 2-0 under new coach Don Brown.

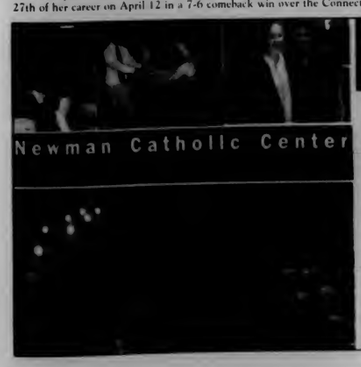
"I would be remiss if I didn't tell you our guys were looking forward to this one," UMass 12-0 head coach Don Brown said. "From the day I was hired we had this one circled on the calendar.

"I told the guys that I was going to have them ready and prepared 89 plus. We went out and had a great week of preparation and we came out and played at a very high level tonight and did what we wanted to do.

"Every time they delivered a blow, we hung in there and delivered a counter blow."

"It had nothing to do with last season," Colgate coach Dick Biddle said. "I'm sure they (UMass) were using it as motivation, but we just got beat."

"UMass was obviously motivated, but we hung in there."



Wide receiver Jason Peehler was once again the offensive star for the Maroon and White, catching four passes for 161 yards and two touchdowns, including a highlight reel run-after-the-catch on a 58 yard scoring strike in the fourth quarter.

The senior is now third all-time in career receiving yards at UMass with 1,624 and ninth overall in career receptions with 84. When asked if he felt the results of Saturday night's game should have taken the place of what transpired back in November, UMass' captain did not hesitate.

"Definitely. We have a better team, a better coach, better schemes and better players. We showed that tonight."

Junior tailback Steve Baylark also had a banner day for the Minutemen, carrying 18 times for 124 yards and two touchdowns in outgaining the Gate's Walter Payton Award

See SPORTS on page 17

YOUR UMASS ROMAN CATHOLIC COMMUNITY OF FAITH

WHADDAYAGOT?
Chapel, celebration of the Sacraments and spiritual activities? — Yep.

First year students & parents: Check out www.umass.edu/catholic

Study lounges, seminars, classrooms, & cool activities? — You bet. Plus, a cafeteria, "UMass' kitchen table."

A friendly, inquiring faith community? — Oh, yeah. Join our student leaders, faculty and staff mentors, priests, deacons, campus ministers & FOCUS missionaries.

472 North Pleasant Street
behind Isenberg
School of Management and
Mahar Auditorium

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian

SPORTS RECAP

ORIENTATION ISSUE 2005 SPORTS@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The year in UMass athletics

Jeff Howe

First of all, before I say anything, leading off, charging out of the gate, dropping the puck and ready for tip-off, welcome to the University of Massachusetts.

It's your new home away from home, not in the middle of nowhere but smack-dab in the center of everything, two hours west of Boston, three hours away from New York City, five hours south of Montreal, seven hours north of Baltimore and 14 hours east of Dayton.

It's the Mecca of the Western Massachusetts sporting world, a place where UMass men's hoops can take down defending champion UConn while mired in the middle of an up-and-down year.

It's where the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team can take down national power Syracuse twice in 15 days, ending a 22-year long string of nothing but Final Four appearances and national championship runs.

It's a place that strives for all things better than mediocrity, as the end of one basketball era has sparked the beginning of another one, a new age sprung forth on the shoulders of a young coach who has livened up UMass hoops to the point where it was at almost a decade earlier. And he hasn't even coached a game yet.

It's an athletic association that will have you joining cults such as Garber's Gorillas, Cahoonaville and the Maroon Platoon, even though you have never heard of such things before.

This is UMass, where the brick and cement buildings stretch to the sky, and the Massachusetts Daily Collegian makes an everyday effort to get to the bottom of it all, literally.

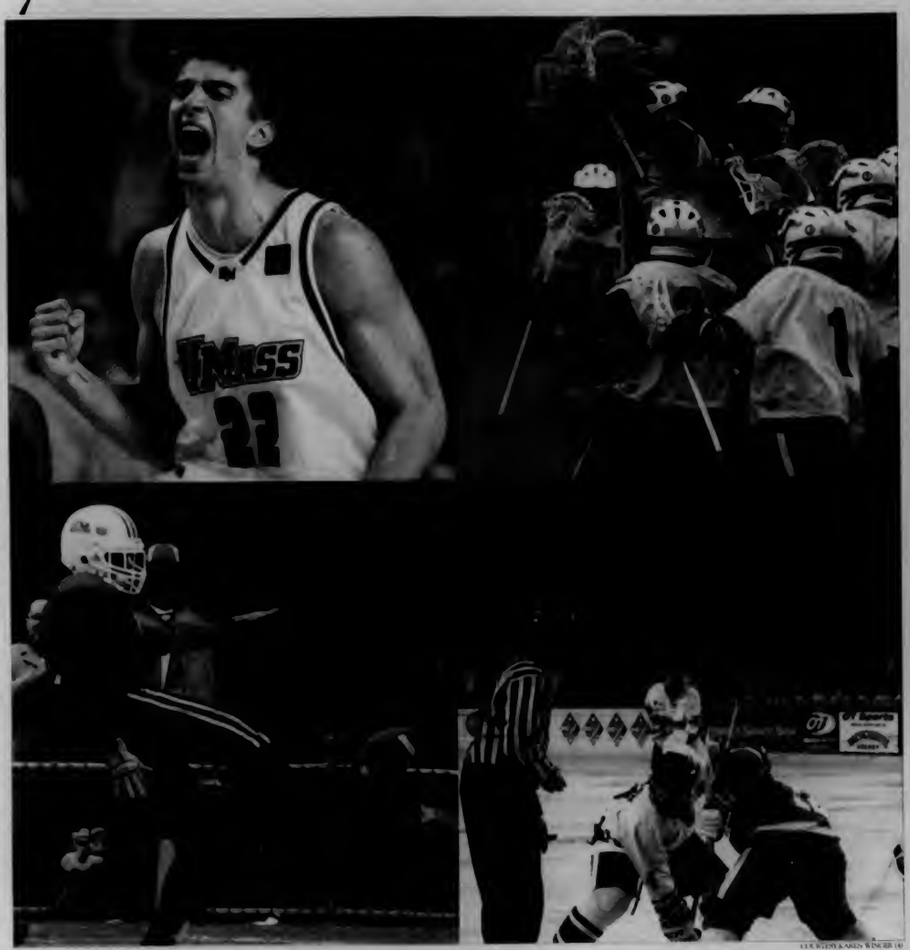
We're in the Campus Center basement, a place not many people even know exists, and we get here by driving through a Wizard-of-Oz-like factory into the bowels of a place tabbed as the "Bat Cave".

My name is Jeff Howe, and I am the Sports Editor here at the Collegian. My staff and I will make one promise to you: we will stop at nothing, not snow in upstate New York, rain in the middle of Maine, white out nights, Senior Days, field trip afternoons, 14-hour drives, flights to Miami (okay, I know, it's Miami, yeah, yeah) or anything else to bring this campus the best coverage of UMass athletics that anyone in this area can possibly fathom.

Why? Because this is what we do, and we love doing it.

If this is something you think you would love doing, come on down to the basement and talk some sports. We're always here.

To give you a taste of the things this staff is capable of, check out some of the best stories of the last year, which are re-printed below, where Collegian sports reporters were present.



That's all I've got for now, but the final whistle hasn't been blown. In fact, it never will in the world of sports journalism, especially Collegian sports journalism.

So here's to blocking extra points, overtime upsets, walk-off home runs, split-second victories, no-hitters, taking down the champs and seeing every last second of it.

Welcome to UMass, have a great summer and solid first school year.

And we'll see you at the games.

Jeff Howe is the Collegian Sports Editor. He can be reached at JeffHowe@DailyCollegian.com.

Clockwise from top left: Jeff Viggiano celebrates UMass' 61-59 upset over UConn. The UMass men's lacrosse team comes together after knocking off Syracuse 14-13 in overtime on April 30. James Solon faces off on White Out Night against BU. R.J. Cobbs punts the ball out of McGuirk Stadium after returning an interception 43 yards to score against Hofstra.

UMass 61, UConn 59
December 9, 2004

They did it.

The members of the Massachusetts men's basketball team finally did it. The team that hasn't had a winning season in five years, the team that has put head coach Steve Lappas on the ropes because of its poor performance during his tenure and the team that has watched its fan base dwindle to an all-time low did the one thing that no one thought it could do: it earned the one win that fans young and old who bleed maroon and white thought they may never see again.

On a cold, winter night in early December, the Massachusetts Minutemen took on, hung with and eventually beat archrival Connecticut – make that defending NCAA National Champion and No. 7 Connecticut – 61-59 before one of the more raucous and supportive crowds in the history of UMass basketball – 9,037 strong.

They accomplished, in one night, what every UMass basketball team since the departure of John Calipari was not able to do. They re-ignited a dormant passion for basketball on the campus of the state university of Massachusetts that hasn't seen a win of this magnitude in over half a decade, and did so in one small window of time when the eyes of the college basketball world were focused not just on the small college town of Amherst, but ultimately on the return of UMass basketball to the spotlight of national prominence.

"It feels like we just won the National Championship," Anderson said. "I've been waiting my whole career for this, and for it to finally happen is just amazing. It's an incredible feeling, and I don't want it to end.

"I still can't believe what just happened," sophomore forward Rashaun Freeman added. "I'm going to have to watch it again on SportsCenter to make sure it's really real."

Freeman led the Minutemen with a game-high 18 points, while Jeff Viggiano chipped in with 12 points.

Freshman Rudy Gay paced Connecticut with 15 points, and was joined in double-figures by Josh Boone with 12 points and Denham Brown with 11 points.

"This ranks up there with some of my top wins all time," Lappas said. "These guys really deserved this win, and to see the UMass fans fill the Mullins Center for a night like this is just tremendous."

With the game tied at 59 with just nine seconds remaining, Freeman's breakaway layup off a feed from classmate Art Bowers on a 2-on-1 last break gave UMass a 61-59 lead it did not relinquish, as UConn's Denham Brown was short on a game-winning 3-point attempt at the buzzer, sending the delirious UMass students flooding onto the court in pandemonium.

Feeding off the energy of a raucous student section and a season-best crowd, the Minutemen came flying out of the gates against the defending National Champions. After trading baskets with the Huskies over the first two minutes of action, a pair of easy baskets from Freeman sandwiched around a Stephane Lame dunk helped spark a 12-3 run that gave UMass an early 18-7 lead and further ignited the crowd.

UConn answered back with a mini 5-2 run of its own to pull within seven, but UMass continued its success on the offensive end by scoring the next five points to increase its leads to 25-13 with just under nine minutes to play in the half.

With the Maroon and White struggling on offense in scoring just four points over the final 8:15 of the half, the Huskies utilized four points from Boone and five from Denham Brown as part of a 14-4 run that culminated when Villanueva tied the game at 29 with a breakaway dunk at the 2:03 mark.

Bowers then gave the Minutemen the last laugh before the buzzer, converting on a strong driving layup to give UMass a 31-29 lead heading into intermission.

The Huskies could have elected to hold for the last shot, but Antonio Kellogg attempted an alley-oop lob to Villanueva that the sophomore forward clanged off the side of the rim. The Minutemen then elected to hold for the last shot themselves, but another strong move to the hoop by Bowers ended in the ball rolling in and out as the buzzer sounded.

After UMass scored the initial four points of the second half on a pair of Freeman layups, UConn stormed back with a 13-2 run, highlighted by back-to-back thunderous, breakaway dunks from highly-touted freshman Rudy Gay that gave the Huskies their largest lead of the game at 42-37.

With the teams trading baskets over the next few minutes, UMass was able to even the score when a Lasme free throw and Anderson's first basket of the game, a 3-pointer at the 8:28 mark, made the score 46-46.

Rashad Anderson answered right back with a 3-pointer of his own, however, and the Huskies used six points from the free throw line to pull ahead by five at 55-50 with just under five minutes to play.

From there the Minutemen battled back, however, and five consecutive points from Connecticut's own Jeff Viggiano gave UMass a 59-55 lead with 55 seconds to play. Two free throws apiece from Boone and Gay tied the score at 59, before Freeman gave UMass fans a reason to flood the court for the first time in recent history.

—Mike Marzelli

UMass 16, Syracuse 15
First Round NCAA Tournament

See SPORTS on page 19

UMass men's basketball coach Travis Ford (right) poses with Boston Red Sox manager Terry Francona at Fenway Park before Ford threw out the first pitch on May 9 to kick of Boston's game against Oakland.